PREFACE.

THO' Hiſtory wants not the moſt Solid Arguments that can be to recommend it to the Eſteem of all, who wou'd attain a competent Knowledge of Mankind and the Affairs of the World, yet the Pleaſure it affords is the general Inducement of its Readers, who for the moſt part are well enough content if they are but agreeably amus'd. That buſie Humour which makes People curious to know what others have done, or are doing, which furniſhes common Converſation, and puts every Body upon Enquiries after News, invites Men of Leiſure and Taſt to ſearch the Records of their own and former Ages. But whatever be the Motive, 'tis hardly poſſible but the Time thus employ'd will be rewarded with ſome real Improvement, and he that reads will have no Cauſe to complain, if in the Event he find his Judgment encreas'd, tho' perhaps he only intended that his Fancy ſhou'd be entertain'd.

This is a conſiderable Advantage which Hiſtory has in laying hold of Mens Natural Curioſity, and employing uſefully a Paſſion which is not only exercis'd for the moſt part frivolouſly, and to no good, but often tovery ill Purpoſes. The Riſe and Fall of Empires, the gradual Changes in their Laws, Manners, Arts and Government, the ſurprizing Events and Revolutions in their Story, and the Conduct and Fortunes of particular Men, have all that can be to entertain a curious Mind; and there are few of ſo little Penetration, but are capable of drawing from ſuch a Variety of Matter many proper Reflections, which may be ſerviceable in a private as well as publick Life. Beſides which, 'tis no vain Suppoſition, that Mens Morals may be ſometimes improv'd, together with their Underſtandings, and that the diſtinguiſh'd Characters of Vertue, which they find upon Record, may have ſomewhat of an aſſimilating Influence: For what we admire we are eaſily diſpos'd to imitate, and let every one conſult his own Breaſt, whether he does not feel it touch'd with a generous Sentiment of thoſe Men who are repreſented to have accompliſh'd great and worthy Deſigns, to have been the Authors of wiſe and good Counſels, or to have expos'd their Lives, and ſacrific'd their Fortunes for the publick Good and Security.

Whatever may be ſaid to the Advantage of Hiſtory in general, is yet with better Reaſon to be affirm'd of the Engliſh Hiſtory. 'Tis natural to all People, to have a Veneration for their Anceſtors, and a more particular Deſire to be inform'd of what paſs'd on the ſame Scene, where themſelves are now acting; and as England has been a Scene of as various and as memorable Tranſactions as moſt Parts of the World beſides, an Account of theſe cannot but be equally agreeable to an Engliſh Reader. As for the uſeful Part, 'tis a Queſtion eaſily reſolv'd, Whether 'tis not moſt for any Man's Advantage, to be chiefly familiar with thoſe Affairs to which he is neareſt related? The Original of our Laws and Cuſtoms is a part of Knowledge ſo requiſite to Men of Learning or of publick Employment, ſo neceſſary to the Underſtanding of our Conſtitution, Rights, and Liberties, and to the clearing of Controverſies which daily happen in private Converſation as well as in Courts of Judicature; and Matters of Fact have ſuch a Force in Precedents to all thoſe that have any Share in the Legiſlature or Adminiſtration, or wou'd judge of either, that 'tis needleſs to prove what every Body owns. However it may not be improper to take Notice, that it has ſometimes been reproach'd us by Foreigners, that the Humour of the Engliſh too often leads 'em abroad to learn the Curioſities of other Countries, before they have taken any Care to be tolerably inform'd of their own.

The mean and imperfect Performances of our moſt common Hiſtorians, is certainly the Reaſon why Many are more negligent of reading our Story than they would perhaps have been, if they had met with it better related. For tho' the Matter of Hiſtory is the firſt thing to recommend it, the Form, which depends wholly on the Writer, is almoſt of equal Conſequence; Now the Laws and Rules which the Criticks have preſcrib'd for it, are ſo endleſs and refin'd, that it may reaſonably be queſtion'd, Whether the Character of a perfect Hero, or that of a perfect Hiſtorian, be the greater Chimæra, and 'twill be eaſily allow'd by thoſe who well conſider the Compariſon, that to record great Actions in the fineſt manner is a Taſk no leſs difficult than to perform 'em.

'Tis neceſſary, That all Readers of Hiſtory ſhou'd be appris'd of this, that they may judge fairly as well as freely of the Authors they meet with, and not be ſo unreaſonable in in their Expectations, nor ſo prepoſſeſs'd by any great Names, as to look for what a Judge of Writing has ſtil'd on another Occaſion,

A Faultleſs Monſter that the World ne'er ſaw.

And whether a perfect Hiſtorian is not to be thought ſuch, let it appear by this ſhort Deſcription. He is requir'd to be a Man born with all the Felicities of a lively penetrating Wit, and unbounded Genius: Form'd by great Study, Experience, and Practice in the World; one that is both a Scholar and a Man of Buſineſs; a good Geographer, Chronologiſt, Antiquary, Linguiſt; converſant in Courts, Councils, Treaties, in Affairs Military as well as Civil, and in ſhort in every thing that is the Subject of Hiſtory; furniſh'd with all proper Materials and Records, and a perfect Maſter of all the Graces of the Language he writes in. This is a great deal, but not enough; for what is yet more extraordinary, he muſt have no Paſſions or Prejudices, but be a kind of Deity that from a Superior Orb looks unmov'd on Parties, Changes of State, and grand Revolutions. And you are to ſuppoſe him bleſs'd with Health, Leiſure, an eaſie Fortune, and a ſtedfaſt Application to his Subject. After which, the Perfections requiſite in his Performance are almoſt innumerable; a judicious Proportion of all the Parts of his Story; a beautiful Simplicity of Narration; a noble, yet unaffected Stile; few and ſignificant Epithets; Deſcriptions lively, but not Poetical; Reflections ſhort and proper; and laſtly, beſides a Multitude of Particulars, which cannot be mention'd here, a good Conduct thro' the whole, and an animating Spirit that may engage the Reader in every Action as if perſonally concern'd, and give him the firm Aſſurance that he ſees things in their own Light and Colours, and not in thoſe which the Art or Miſtake of the Writer has brought upon 'em.

'Twou'd be eaſie to enlarge this Diſcourſe; the Laws of Hiſtory are all but the Dictates of good Senſe, drawn out and methodis'd in Rules; of which a long detail may be found in * Books written purpoſely on this Subject. But what is here only touch'd, may ſuffice to repreſent the extream Difficulty of writing Hiſtory. And the Difficulty much encreaſes, when the Subject is of ſo large a Scope as the general Hiſtory of any Nation, which is eſteem'd of all the ſeveral Kinds the greateſt, as an Epick Poem is in Poetry. And as ſome will ſcarce allow, that there have been more than two Epick Poets, Homer and Virgil; ſo the Name and Honour of General Hiſtorians have been reſtrain'd by the Criticks to almoſt the ſame Number. Livy among the Ancients, and Mariana among the Moderns, are plac'd in the higheſt Rank, tho' others have their Parties and Favourers, and are allow'd many Beauties, which every one magnifies or leſſens, according to his particular Reliſh.

* Lucian. Le Moyne. Rapin. Le Clerc's Parrhaſiana.

But it has been a long Complaint, that whatever be the Difficulty of compiling a General Hiſtory, other Nations have maſter'd it better than our own, which yet all the World knows has not been unfruitful of very great Men, in all Capacities, both of acting and Writing. Some Attempts have indeed been made, but with what Succeſs is too well known; for 'tis not a tedious Chronicle fill'd with a World of frivolous Matter and minute Circumſtances, tho' ever ſo true and faithful, nor a laborious Plunder of Libraries, Manuſcripts, publick Rolls and Records, tho' put together by many Years Application in a cold and barren Stile, that will be valu'd as a Hiſtory. No body, that is acquainted with our Performances in other Parts of Learning and Wit, in all which we are allow'd to equal moſt of our Neighbours, and in ſome to excel 'em, or that conſiders the Solidity and Vigor of Genius, which is the known Character of the Engliſh, can doubt but that we have had many among us of Qualifications for ſuch a Work equal at leaſt with any other Nation. But whether a modeſt Diſtruſt of themſelves, or want of Leiſure and Encouragement, or whatever elſe has been the Impediment, it muſt be own'd we have not yet ſeen it done with Approbation; and if we may ever hope for it, 'tis perhaps a Happineſs in Reſerve, till the many Wonders of Her Majeſty's moſt Wiſe, Juſt, and Fortunate Reign, ſhall have made the Glory of the Engliſh Annals compleat.

However, 'tis thought a Deſign of ſuch Conſequence cannot be well executed by one Man; and therefore || ſome have wiſh'd to ſee it carry'd on by a Society or Club of Men of Parts and Learning, ſome whereof are Maſters of our ancient Languages, and others of the Modern; ſome vers'd in the Writings of the old Britains, Romans, Saxons, Danes, and others thoroughly acquainted with the Hiſtorians ſince the Conqueſt, ſome that know the Geography, and others the Law of the Realm, ſome that have been bred at Court, and others in the Camp; and that it ſhou'd be an Engagement generouſly enter'd into by Men of Leiſure and Fortune. This indeed is a rational Project, and might probably ſucceed, if the Gentlemen cou'd be found, who are both willing and fit to engage in it. But few are drawn to laborious Taſks, or have Conſtancy enough to ſtruggle with great Difficulties, when they are not animated by ſome other Motive than raiſing a Reputation to themſelves, and doing a Service to the Publick.

In

In the mean time, the preſent Collection is the neareſt ſuch a Deſign of any thing that has appear'd; for we are not ſo entirely at a Loſs for a Hiſtory of England, but that we have already many Parts of it by ſeveral Hands, in juſt Eſteem; and theſe are the ſtanding Authorities and Guides to which all Attempters in this Way muſt ever have Recourſe. Many of 'em anſwer the Characters mention'd in that imaginary Society, and ſome had the additional Advantage of living in or near the times they deſcribe, ſo that theirs may be reckon'd Pictures by the Life, which have uſually the moſt of Spirit as well as the trueſt Likeneſs; whereas ſucceeding Hands, tho' they copy ever ſo ſkilfully, can ſcarce avoid loſing much of the Force, and Juſtneſs, and Grace of the Original.

Their Reputation, as was hinted before, is not now to be made in the World, which is generally ſlow and ſparing, and diſagreed in diſtributing its Applauſe to Books even of the higheſt Merit, if their Authors are living. The procuring 'em ſeverally was formerly found troubleſome and expenſive; ſome of 'em were ſcarce, and others had ſuffer'd by the multiplying of Editions and wanted a careful Correction; the Deſign of Printing 'em in this Method, ſo as to compoſe a compleat Hiſtory of our Affairs has been for ſeveral Years recommended, and the Undertakers encourag'd to it by Letters from Eminent Hands in many Parts of the Kingdom; and to give it all proper Advantages, Care has been taken to procure many Manuſcripts and Papers of Value, by means of which, and other Helps, ſuch Additions have been made as were thought neceſſary for a Supplement or Illuſtration of the Hiſtory. The Stiles of the Engliſh Authors, tho' ſome of 'em a little antiquated, are preſerv'd according to their Originals, but the Latin Lives, Papers, Verſes, &c. are tranſlated for the Benefit of common Readers. If any one imagines the Difference of Stiles an Objection, others are of a contrary Opinion, and think that this Variety may divert and relieve the Mind, which is often tir'd by Voluminous Works by one Hand, tho' written ever ſo elegantly.

For the Times before William the Firſt, tho' the Views of 'em have been left leſs diſtinct than the reſt, and in ſome Places look like Scenes of Fairy-Land, yet ſo much as cou'd be trac'd and put into order, has been admirably done by Mr. John Milton, with whoſe Book this Collection begins. His great natural and acquir'd Parts, and his excelling in ſo many different kinds of Learning, beſides his daring and uncommon Genius in Poetry, have made him generally look'd upon as one of the moſt extraordinary Perſons that the laſt Age produc'd: And even the greateſt Admirers of Antiquity have a particular Reaſon to rank him with moſt of the Ancients, whom he ſo nearly reſembles. For this ſeems to be his diſtinguiſhing Character, and is agreeable to what Monſieur * Fontenelle obſerves, That "The Wit of one Climate more eaſily ſuffers tranſplanting into another, than its Trees and Fruit; and that tho' 'tis ſaid there's more Diverſity among "Wits than Faces, yet one Face by ſtedfaſtly regarding another cannot take a new Reſemblance, but Wit may. And 'tis thus, that People do not always retain the Turn of "Thought which they derive from their Native Climate, but by reading Greek Books, "become as it were ally'd to the Greeks.

* Digreſſion ſur les Anciens, &c. dans le dixiéme ſur la Nature d'Eglogue.

Mr. Milton's Hiſtory, as well as his Poetical Works, proves this; where, in his Thoughts and Language, he appears with the Majeſtick Air of old Greece or Rome. This makes him indeed look particular, and perhaps to ſome uncouth, like the Roman Architecture heretofore, when the Gothick was in Faſhion. But whether his or the more Modern Diction be the beſt, let the Controverters of old and new Books decide as they pleaſe. 'Tis ſufficient if his Hiſtory, as was ſaid, be the beſt Draught of thoſe rude Times he choſe to deſcribe. His Abilities and Diligence to perform that part were unqueſtionable, and his Impartiality too, which wou'd not have been, if he had written the Hiſtory of later Times. Sir William Temple, tho' he has very ingeniouſly treated the ſame Subject, is not particular enough, and ſeems ſo much in haſte to come to his Favourite Character of William the Norman, that the reſt of his Book is indeed but an Introduction.

Mr. Daniel's Hiſtory follows next, containing the Reigns of William I. and II. Henry I. King Stephen, Henry II. Richard I. King John, Henry III. Edward I, II, and III. The Author had a Place at Court in the Reign of King James I. being Groom of the Privy Chamber to the Queen, and ſeems to have taken all the Refinement a Court could give him. 'Tis ſaid he had a good Vein in Poetry, and 'tis certain he has ſhewn great Judgment in keeping it, as he did, from infecting his Proſe, and deſtroying that Simplicity which is a principal Beauty in the Stile of an Hiſtorian. His Narration is ſmooth and clear, and carries every where an Air of good Senſe and juſt Eloquence, and his Engliſh is much more Modern than Milton's, tho' he liv'd before him: But Mr. Milton choſe to write (if the Expreſſion may be allow'd) a hundred Years backward, whereas 'tis particularly to be admir'd how Mr. Daniel cou'd, ſo long ago, expreſs himſelf with the ſame Purity and Grace as our moſt ſenſible Writers do now, tho' we flatter our ſelves that we have conſiderably improv'd the Language.

The Continuation of his Hiſtory thro' the Reigns of Richard II. Henry IV, V, and VI. was ſo meanly perform'd by Mr. Truſſel, and the Stile ſo wretched, that there was a Neceſſity ceſſity to have thoſe Reigns new writ, which have therefore been done much larger and more exact, and after Mr. Daniel's Method. In this, and the former Work, and ſo throughout the firſt Volume, is added at the end of every Reign an Account of Eminent Men, and Remarkable Occurrences, from Hollingſhead and others. That the like Method is omitted in the ſucceeding Volumes, is becauſe 'twas thought unneceſſary; for the Hiſtorians are larger, and have not omitted any worth mentioning, and the Index ſupplies it once for all.

The next Author is Mr. Habington, whoſe Hiſtory is the beſt extant of Edward IV. No Reign afforded a Proſpect of more ſurprizing Turns and Reverſes of Fortune than this, all which he has largely and eloquently deſcrib'd; yet to ſpeak impartially, he ſeems to Moralize too much, and if he had been more ſparing of his General Remarks and Sentences, the Thread of his Story wou'd have run off evener: But this by the way, and with the utmoſt Deference to his excellent Performance, in which he has highly merited by painting in ſuch lively Colours thoſe Times of moſt remarkable Confuſion.

Sir Thomas Moor, that learned Lord Chancellour of England, writ his Hiſtory of the Short and Unhappy Reign of King Edward V. and of the Beginning of King Richard III. in Latin: His Maſterly Command of the Delicacies of that Language, conſiderably help'd to ſpread his Fame all over Europe; but to render the Work more uniform, and of more general Uſe, there was a Neceſſity to have this carefully tranſlated. Nothing can be ſaid to add to the Author's great Reputation; his high Employments were conferr'd on him as well in Reward of his Learning as of his other Merit, by a King, who was known chiefly to value himſelf upon being a Scholar and a Judge of Books. In this Reign the Intrigues of the Protector and his Creatures againſt the young Princes are related with wonderful Clearneſs and Judgment in Affairs of State; the Speeches are ſenſible, and the Deſcriptions proper; that of King Richard's guilty Terrors after the Murther of his Nephews, is admirable; which is mention'd here, becauſe 'tis certain, Deſcription in Hiſtory as well as in Poetry is a dangerous Part to manage, and the ſooneſt betrays an affected and injudicious Writer.

Sir Thomas Moor left the Reign of Richard III. unfiniſh'd; the Supplement to it is therefore extracted out of Hall and Hollingſhead; after which follows George Buck's Life of the ſame King, which makes this part of the Hiſtory compleat. His Relation is particular, and very remarkable for the Pains he takes to wipe off the bloody Stains upon King Richard's Character, and to vindicate from common Imputation one of the blackeſt Reigns in all our Story. Whether he has done it with Reaſon or not, let the Reader judge; for there are various Opinions about it, and 'tis upon this Account that the Booksellers were adviſ'd to print it. His Book indeed, tho' it were all Truth, is much too looſely writ for a Hiſtory; 'tis pedantick and full of Harangue, and may more properly be call'd a Defence of King Richard than any thing elſe; yet as he is the only Advocate of Note that has appear'd in ſo odd a Cauſe, 'tis well worth the while to give him a Place here, tho' among ſo many of his Betters. In ſome things 'tis highly probable he has done that King but Juſtice; yet 'tis ſtrange that he'll neither allow him to have had any Deformity in Mind or Body, for he is angry to find him deſcrib'd by others crook-back'd, and of an ill Viſage, and ſeems to be for reverſing his Character throughout. 'Twas not fit to let this Work paſs without ſome Animadverſions; and, to ſet all things as much in the Light as poſſible: Mr. Stripe, an induſtrious Antiquary, has added large Notes and Remarks, from an Authentick Manuſcript which he had by him, and from other Authors.

We come now to one of the moſt applauded Pieces of Hiſtory that has ever been writ in our own or any other Language, either Ancient or Modern, the incomparable Lord Bacon's Life and Reign of King Henry VII. which, with the Reverence due to ſo great a Man, is printed here in his own Stile without the Alteration of a Word. 'Tis impoſſible to exceed in his Praiſe: One may obſerve in him all the Depth of a Stateſman and Philoſopher, all the Ornament of a diſcreet Orator, and the Conduct of a juſt Hiſtorian. From him alone might ſufficiently be learn'd the Idea of that true Sublime which enobles Hiſtory; which conſiſts rather in a Greatneſs of Thinking than in a Pomp of Expreſſion, and is therefore reconcileable with that Simplicity requir'd too, tho' theſe are Beauties rarely ſeen united. He traces things with extraordinary Judgment, relates 'em with Clearneſs of Senſe and good Connexion, and has the Secret of making every part of the Story inſtructive, without ſprinkling it over with perpetual Adages and Obſervations, which retard it, and are the falſe Jewels for which Coquet Writers affect to be admir'd. Another maſterly Excellence in him is, that he does not content himſelf with a ſuperficial Narration, but enters deeper into his Subject, and diſcovers the Motives of Affairs, which every where ſeem true Repreſentations, and not fanciful Conjectures; this is the more worthy of notice, becauſe Tacitus, who is much admir'd for it by many, is by others thought to have over-acted the * Politician, and by too nice a Subtlety to have expounded

the ſimpleſt Actions in the World into Deſign and Artifice. But as nothing is more improving than this way of writing when well manag'd, ſo it ſeems to be the Talent of a wiſe rather than of a cunning Head.

'Tis remarkable that three of our Hiſtorians of greateſt Fame (of whom two have their Works in this Collection) have been Lords High Chancellours of England, and 'tis certain the Qualifications which properly recommend Men to that Truſt and Honour are ſuch as make 'em likewiſe better capable than moſt others of writing a good Engliſh Hiſtory.

The Notes which are added to the Lord Bacon's Book are chiefly extracted from that which was written by Sir James Ware, in Relation to the Affairs of Ireland, which was publiſh'd firſt in Latin at the End of the Antiquitates Hibernicæ, in 8° and afterwards turn'd into Engliſh, and printed lately with his other Works in Folio at Dublin. And this concludes the Account of the Hiſtorians in the firſt Volume.

The Second begins with the Ingenious Lord Herbert of Cherbury's Life of King Henry VIII. which for its great Reputation may well be compar'd with the Lord Bacon's. Theſe two Hiſtorians ſeem by their Senſe as well as Quality, of a Rank ſuperiour to moſt others; for few beſides have the Art of being particular in their Narration without growing flat and tireſome, and of making Remarks which are always worth the Reader's attending to, and no where offend by an unnatural or ambitious Air. The Lord Herbert, to qualifie him for this Undertaking, had an Education Military as well as Learned, the Improvement of Travel, and the Advantage of great Employments. He was of the Council to King James I. who, after he had employ'd him five Years in an Embaſſy to Louis XIII. of France, made him Baron of Caſtle-Iſland in Ireland. He afterwards ſerv'd King Charles I. both in the Field and in Council, and was by him created an Engliſh Peer. In order to write King Henry VIII's Life, he made a vaſt Collection of Manuſcripts and other Materials; of which the Athenæ Oxonienſes mentions four thick Folio Volumes which that Author ſays he had ſeen. The Original Copy of his Hiſtory, written by his own hand, is in the Poſſeſſion of the Univerſity of Oxford, to which he preſented it. 'Tis large and copious, as the multiply'd Affairs of a buſie Reign requir'd; and as all Europe was concern'd in the Intrigues of thoſe Times, the Politicks then were ſo intricate and variable, and of ſuch an unuſual Turn, that 'twas not poſſible for a common Hand to trace 'em; nor can we imagine that any one beſide himſelf cou'd ſo happily have conquer'd the Difficulty he complains of, viz. To write that Prince's Hiſtory of whom no one thing might conſtantly be affirm'd, and to draw his Picture well, who had ſeveral Countenances. Vol. II.

In this Edition the Pope's Bulls, the Letters, and other Pieces, which were in Latin before, are printed both in Latin and Engliſh.

The Life and Reign of King Edward VI. was written by Sir John Hayward, Doctor of Laws, and Hiſtoriographer to King James I. The ſame Hand had written the Reign of King Henry IV. but this of King Edward was publiſh'd after the Author's Death. 'Tis here printed with large Notes from a valuable Collection of Papers relating to the Reformation. 'Tis no wonder that in thoſe Party-Times the Characters of many Perſons and Circumſtances of Affairs were left ſo variouſly and doubtfully repreſented as might miſlead even a diligent Writer; wherefore an impartial Cenſure of this Author is prefix'd to his Book by Mr. Stripe, to which the Reader is referr'd.

The next is the Annals of Queen Mary, written originally by Francis Godwin Lord Biſhop of Hereford, who together with this wrote likewiſe the Reigns of King Henry VIII. and King Edward VI. in Latin, for the Uſe of Foreigners. His Stile is grave and ſuccinct, and he appears to have been a good Maſter of that Language, and a faithful and ſenſible Hiſtorian. His Son Morgan Godwin, Doctor of Laws, publiſh'd this Book afterwards in our own Tongue, with ſome Enlargements by the Author's Conſent. That which is here printed is new tranſlated in more modern Engliſh; and Mr. Stripe, who has a large Manuſcript of this Queen's Reign, has likewiſe perform'd his Part by adding Notes, and has inſerted ſome few Paſſages in the Margin, which he has obſerv'd to be in the former Engliſh Edition.

The long and happy Reign of Queen Elizabeth is deſcrib'd at large with the utmoſt Exactneſs by the Learned Mr. Cambden, call'd frequently the Prince of Modern Antiquaries. This elaborate Work was begun at the Inſtigation of his great Patron the Lord Treaſurer Burghley in 1597. the ſame Year that Mr. Cambden was made Clarenceux King at Arms; but that Nobleman had only the Satisfaction and Honour of laying the firſt Stone of the Building, without living to ſee it in any Forwardneſs, for he dy'd the next Year. This Loſs much afflicted Mr. Cambden, and interrupted his Deſign; and the Queen her ſelf dying about five Years after, it remain'd for ſome time at a ſtand; but, in the Year 1608. he fell to it again with great Application, and never perhaps had any Man more univerſal Qualifications or greater Advantages. He had premeditated it many Years, his chief Study had long before been the Antiquities of his Native Country, and the Tranſactions

he was now to record were ſuch as paſs'd in his own Time; he began it ſlow, and after his Studies were ripe, and his Judgment in full Maturity; for his Britannia was firſt compleated, which left him wholly at Liberty, and better inſtructed for this Undertaking. He wanted no Helps from Men of the greateſt Learning in England, who were proud of ſupplying him with Papers and Books; all Libraries were open to him, and if he had not been Maſter of an admirable Judgment for ſeparating, chuſing and digeſting his Materials, the Variety muſt have put him in Confuſion. The Queen's Collection of Writings, Letters, and Memorials, had been imparted to him by the Lord Burghley, who likewiſe furniſh'd him with his own, and he afterwards receiv'd great Aſſiſtance from his Friend Sir Robert Cotton, all which he mentions in his Preface; but nothing cou'd equal his own Induſtry and indefatigable Study, which was indeed wonderful.

For the Moral Qualifications of an Hiſtorian, ſuch as Fidelity, Diſintereſt, and a ſincere Affection to Truth, he has given all the Proofs of 'em that can be deſir'd; For beſides the Air of Probity, which is ſeen in his Annals, 'tis remarkable that he at firſt deſign'd they ſhou'd not be publiſh'd in his Life time, but had bequeath'd 'em by Will to the Famous Thuanus, with whom he had a particular Friendſhip. However, he was prevail'd on to alter this Reſolution, and in the Year 1615. came out the firſt Volume reaching to the Year 1589. It had the natural Effect of a well-writ Piece of Modern Hiſtory, for it gain'd him much Applauſe, and many Enemies; which laſt, tho' a good Proof of his Merit, was a ſevere one, and diſcourag'd him from venturing abroad his Second Volume till the Year 1625. and then it was in a manner extorted from him by Importunity, after it had lain finiſh'd for a conſiderable time.

The Affairs of Spain, France, and Scotland, were much interwoven with thoſe of England in that Queen's Reign, and conſequently Mr. Cambden has given 'em their proper Place in his Compoſure. 'Twas his Character to leave nothing imperfect that his Art or Labour cou'd compleat. In his manner of relating he rather choſe to be Exact than Ornamental, and diſpos'd his Matter into the plain Form of Annals, by that to excuſe himſelf from all ſuperfluous Finery. His Preface gives a very good Idea of his Book; and for the Particulars of his Life, the Reader may find 'em in Latin by Dr. Smith, printed with the Collection of Cambden's Letters, &c. and in Engliſh by Mr. Gibſon, prefix'd to the laſt Edition of his Britannia. Several Tranſlations have been made of theſe Annals from the Original Latin; but 'twas thought neceſſary to have 'em new tranſlated, examin'd and corrected, in a juſt Regard to the Author's Reputation. His Sketch of the Annals of King James, tho' conſiſting only of ſhort Heads, is likewiſe added in Engliſh, that nothing from ſo great a Hand might be omitted.

The laſt Hiſtorian, in the Second Volume, is Mr. Wilſon, who wrote the Life of King James I. The Learned Dr. Welwood has been prevail'd with to add ſome Notes and Obſervations of his own upon it, and has furniſh'd ſome few Original Papers relating to that Reign, which hitherto never ſaw the Light; all which Notes and Obſervations are printed at the bottom of the Pages. At the Beginning the Author has given us in courſe Rhime what he calls his own Picture, but in the Note there added the Reader will find it drawn with a truer Likeneſs than that which he drew himſelf, and with better Skill than can be done in this Preface.

For what remains to be ſaid concerning the Third Volume, the Judicious and Accompliſh'd Writer of it, has thought fit in his own Words to addreſs the Publick as follows.

To the READER.

THIS Third and Laſt Volume of our Engliſh Hiſtory requires but a ſhort and eaſie Introduction to it. For here is no Collection of Writers, that need a Character and Account of them, as in the two former Volumes. This Continuation is a New Work done by a particular Hand, with a ſtrict Regard to Truth and Juſtice.

Since the Period of the Second Volume, the Death of King James I. no one Reign hath been ſo exactly written, or at leaſt brought into ſo juſt a Compaſs, as to deſerve to be here intirely inſerted. And therefore it was thought more fair and reaſonable to draw up all the following Reigns into a New Proſpect, juſt and proportionable, and not deceiving the Eye. The Perſon who draws it is not ſo delighted with it, as to value himſelf on the Performance: He did it for his own Diverſion, rather than for the Satisfaction of the World. For he knows, that of all things Hiſtory is leaſt underſtood by the Generality of Mankind: And what is very ſtrange, People are for the moſt part leaſt able to judge of the Hiſtory of their own Times: They have imperfect Remembrances, they have confuſed Notions, they have a Partiality to one ſide, and a Prejudice to another, they have their Preſumptions, and their Conjectures, and like ſome diſtemper'd Heads have a Sight ſo uncertain, that it deceives them more than Blindneſs it ſelf could do. For this Reaſon, no prudent Writer would ſet a Name to the Hiſtory ſtory of his own Times; for it is impoſſible to pleaſe, or to be thought impartial, till Poſterity find out his plain and honeſt Dealing.

Therefore the Hand chiefly concern'd in thoſe Papers withdraws it ſelf from the Notice of the World, and does reſt ſatisfied with its own Intention; which was to hold an Even Balance, and to let nothing turn it but Truth and Juſtice. A great Regard has been had to the excellent Hiſtory written by my Lord Clarendon, which is far from ſerving any one ſide only; and the Characters which are the beſt Part of it are moſt of them here tranſcrib'd. The following Reigns are done with ſome few Diſcoveries of what had not been before publiſh'd in the general and common Affairs; the Story is told according to the beſt Writers, and very often in their very Words.

BOOK I.

THE Beginning of Nations, thoſe excepted of whom Sacred Books have ſpoken, is to this day unknown. Nor only the Beginning, but the Deeds alſo of many ſucceeding Ages, yea, periods of Ages, either wholly unknown, or obſcur'd and blemiſh'd with Fables. Whether it were that the uſe of Letters came in long after, or were it the Violence of barbarous Inundations, or they themſelves, at certain Revolutions of Time, fatally decaying, and degenerating into Sloth and Ignorance; whereby the Monuments of more ancient Civility have been ſome deſtroy'd, ſome loſt. Perhaps diſ-eſteem and contempt of the Publick Affairs then preſent, as not worth recording, might partly be in cauſe. Certainly oft-times we ſee that wiſe Men, and of beſt Ability, have forborn to write the Acts of their own Days, while they beheld with a juſt loathing and diſdain, not only how unworthy, how perverſe, how corrupt, but often how ignoble, how petty, how below all Hiſtory the Perſons and their Actions were; who either by Fortune, or ſome rude Election, had attain'd as a ſore Judgment, and Ignominy upon the Land, to have chief Sway in managing the Commonwealth. But that any Law, or Superſtition of our old Philoſophers the Druids, forbad the Britains to write their memorable Deeds, I know not why any out of Cæſar ſhould alledge: He indeed ſaith, that their Doctrine they thought not lawful to commit to Letters; but in moſt Matters elſe, both private and publick, among which well may Hiſtory be reckon'd, [a] they us'd the Greek Tongue: And that the Britiſh Druids, who taught thoſe in Gaul, would be ignorant of any Language known and us'd by their Diſciples, or ſo frequently writing other things, and ſo inquiſitive into the higheſt, would for want of Recording be ever Children in the Knowledge of Times and Ages, is not likely. Whatever might be the reaſon, this we find, that of Britiſh Affairs, from the firſt Peopling of the Iſland, to the coming of Julius Cæſar, nothing certain, either by Tradition, Hiſtory, or Ancient Fame, hath hitherto been left us. That which we have of oldeſt ſeeming, hath by the greater part of judicious Antiquaries been long rejected for a Modern Fable. Cæſ. l. 6.

Nevertheleſs, there being others beſides the firſt ſuppos'd Author, Men not unread, nor unlearned in Antiquity, who admit that for approved Story, which the former explode for Fiction; and ſeeing that oft-times Relations heretofore accounted fabulous, have been after found to contain in them many footſteps, and relicks of ſomething true, as what we read in Poets of the Flood, and Giants little believ'd, till undoubted Witneſſes taught us that all was not [a] There are ſome Objections, and thoſe not inconſiderable, againſt this Aſſertion. Græcis literis utuntur, ſaith Cæſar: Which does not neceſſarily imply that they uſed the Greek Tongue, but only their Letters: For if he had meant the Language, he would have rather ſaid, Græco ſermone, or Græcâ linguâ. But this does not take off the difficulty neither: For if they made uſe of the Greek Letters, it had been but a poor contrivance of Cæſar's, to write to Cicero (in Gaul) in the Greek Character, for fear the Letter ſhould be intercepted, and their Deſigns diſcovered. Hanc Græcis conſcriptam literis mittit, ne interceptâ epiſtolâ, noſtra ab hoſtibus conſilia cognoſcantur, ſaith Cæſar, lib. 5. Now if the Druids (the great Miniſters of State) us'd the Greek Character in their common buſineſs, why ſhould Cæſar think, that this Character would conceal his Deſigns? The learned Selden believes Græcis to have been foiſted into that place of Cæſar, where he ſpeaks of the Druids, (lib. 6.) and will have him mean no more, than that Religious Matters were never writ down, but in all Secular Affairs they made uſe of Writing: A Conjecture natural enough, and very probably true.

feign'd; I have therefore determin'd to beſtow the telling over of theſe reputed Tales; be it for nothing elſe but in favour of our Engliſh Poets, and Rhetoricians, who by their Art will know how to uſe them judiciouſly.

I might alſo produce Examples, as Diodorus among the Greeks, Livy and others of the Latines, Polydore and Virunnius among our own Writers. But I intend not with Controverſies and Quotations to delay or interrupt the ſmooth courſe of Hiſtory; much leſs to argue and debate long who were the firſt Inhabitants, with what Probabilities, what Authorities each Opinion hath been upheld; but ſhall endeavour that which hitherto hath been needed moſt, with plain and lightſome brevity, to relate well and orderly things worth the noting, ſo as may beſt inſtruct and benefit them that read. Which imploring Divine Aſſiſtance, that it may redound to his Glory, and the good of the Britiſh Nation, I now begin.

That the whole Earth was inhabited before the Flood, and to the utmoſt point of habitable Ground, from thoſe effectual words of God in the Creation, may be more than conjectur'd. Hence that this Iſland alſo had her Dwellers, her Affairs, and perhaps her Stories, even in that old World thoſe many hundred Years, with much reaſon we may infer. [b] After the Flood, and the diſperſing of Nations, as they journey'd leiſurely from the Eaſt, Gomer, the eldeſt Son of Japhet, and his Off-ſpring, as by Authorities, Arguments, and Affinity of divers Names is generally believ'd, were the firſt that peopl'd all theſe Weſt and Northern Climes. But they of our own Writers, who thought they had done nothing, unleſs with all circumſtance they tell us when, and who firſt ſet foot upon this Iſland, preſume to name out of fabulous and counterfeit Authors a certain Samothes or Dis, a fourth or ſixth Son of Japhet, whom they make about two hundred years after the Flood, to have planted with Colonies, firſt the Continent of Celtica, or Gaul, and next this Iſland: Thence to have nam'd it Samothea, to have reign'd here, and after him lineally four Kings, Magus, Saron, Druis, and Bardus. But the forg'd Beroſus, whom only they have to cite, no where mentions that either he, or any of thoſe whom they bring, did ever paſs into Britain, or ſend their People hither. So that this out-landiſh figment may eaſily excuſe our not allowing it the room here ſo much as of a Britiſh Fable.

That which follows, perhaps as wide from truth, though ſeeming leſs impertinent, is, That theſe Samotheans, under the Reign of Bardus, were ſubdu'd by Albian a Giant, Son of Neptune: who call'd the Iſland after his own name, and rul'd it forty four years. Till at length paſſing over into Gaul, in aid of his Brother Leſtrygon, againſt whom Hercules was haſting out of Spain into Italy, he was there ſlain in fight, and Bergion alſo his Brother.

Sure enough we are that Britain hath been anciently term'd Albion, both by the Greeks and Romans. And Mela the Geographer makes mention of a ſtony Shoar in Languedoc, where by report ſuch a Battel was fought. The reſt [c] as his giving name to the Iſle, or ever landing here depends altogether upon late ſurmiſes. But too abſurd, and too unconſcionably groſs is that fond invention that waſted hither the fifty Daughters of a ſtrange Diocleſian King of Syria; brought in doubtleſs by ſome illiterate pretender to ſomething miſtaken in the common poetical Story of Danaus King of Argos, while his Vanity, not pleas'd with the obſcure beginning which trueſt Antiquity affords the Nation, labour'd to contrive us a Pedigree, as he thought, more noble. Theſe Daughters, by appointment of Danaus on the Marriage-night, having murder'd all their Husbands, except Linceus, whom his Wife's Loyalty ſav'd, were by him, at the ſuit of his Wife their Siſter, not put to death, but turn'd out to Sea in a Ship unmann'd; of which whole Sex they had incurr'd the hate; and as the Tale goes, were driven on this Iſland. Where the Inhabitants, none but Devils, as ſome write, or as others, a lawleſs crew left here by Albion without Head or Governour, both entertain'd them, and had iſſue by them a ſecond breed of Giants, who tyranniz'd the Iſle till Brutus came.

The eldeſt of thoſe Dames in their Legend they call Albina; and from thence, for which cauſe the whole Scene was fram'd, will have the ſame Albion deriv'd. Incredible it may ſeem, ſo ſluggiſh a conceit ſhould prove ſo ancient, as to be authoriz'd by the elder Ninnius, reputed to have lived above a thouſand years ago. This I find not in him, but that Hiſtion ſprung of Japhet, had four Sons, Francus, Romanus, Alemannus, and Britto, of whom the Britains; as true, I believe, as that thoſe other Nations whoſe Names are reſembled, came of the other three; if theſe Dreams give not juſt occaſion to call in doubt the Book it ſelf, which bears that title. Holinſhed.

Hitherto the things themſelves have given us a warrantable diſpatch to run them ſoon over. But now of [d] Brutus and his Line, with the whole Progeny of Kings, to the entrance of Julius Cæſar, we cannot ſo eaſily be diſcharg'd; Deſcents of Anceſtry, long-continu'd Laws and Exploits, not plainly ſeeming to be borrow'd, or devis'd, which on the common belief have wrought no ſmall impreſſion: [e] defended by many, denyed utterly by few. For what though Brutus, and the whole Trojan pretence were yielded up, ſeeing they who firſt devis'd to bring us from ſome [f] noble Anceſtor, were content at firſt with Brutus the Conſul; till better invention, although not willing to forego the name, taught them to remove it higher, into a more fabulous Age, and by the ſame remove lighting on the Trojan Tales, in affectation to make the Britain of one Original with the Roman, pitch'd there, yet thoſe old and inborn Names of ſucceſſive Kings, never any to have been real perſons, or done in their lives, at leaſt ſome part of what ſo long hath been remember'd, cannot be thought without too ſtrict an incredulity. A. M. 2855.

[b] Concerning the firſt Peopling of Britain, Mr. Cambden has given us as diſtinct an account, as can be drawn from probable conjectures, and as the great diſtance of Time and want of Records will allow. See his Britannia, the Engliſh Edition, p. 10.

[c] 'Tis poſſible enough he might give name to the Iſle, though he never landed here. Pliny tells us it was call'd Albion, to diſtinguiſh it from the Iſlands round Britain, which went under the general name of Britannicæ: and this likely enough was done by the Greeks, who delighted ſo much in fabulous Names.

[d] That Romantick Story of Brutus and his Poſterity, is fairly confuted by Mr. Cambden, Engliſh Edit. p. 6.

[e] Leland has publiſhed a Vindication of the Story: and the Welſh are generally very unwilling to give it up for fabulous.

[f] If the Britains are ſo fond of a Trojan Original, Mr. Cambden has pointed out a much better claim to it, than the Story of Brutus can give them: For the Romans (deſcended from the Trojans) by their long continuance in this Iſland, could not but have many inter-marriages with the Britains; whereby a great many Britains at this day muſt be of Roman, and by conſequence, of Trojan Extraction.

For

2855. For these, and those Causes above-mention'd, that which hath receiv'd Approbation from so many, I have chosen not to omit. Certain or uncertain, be that upon the Credit of those whom I must follow; so far as keeps aloof from impossible and absurd, attested by ancient Writers from Books more ancient, I refuse not, as the due and proper Subject of Story. The principal Author is well known to be Geoffrey of Monmouth; [a] what he was, and whence his Authority, who in his Age, or before him have deliver'd the same Matter, and such like general Discourses, will better stand in a Treatise by themselves. All of them agree in this, that Brutus was the Son of Silvius, he of Ascanius, whose Father was Æneas a Trojan Prince, who at the burning of that City, with his Son Ascanius, and a collected Number that escap'd, after long wandring on the Sea, arriv'd in Italy. Where at length, by the Assistance of Latinus King of Latium, who had given him his Daughter Lavinia, he obtain'd to succeed in that Kingdom, and left it to Ascanius, whose Son Silvius (though Roman Histories deny Silvius to be the Son of Ascanius) had married secretly a Niece of Lavinia.

Henry of Huntingdon. Matthew of Westminster.

She being with Child, the Matter became known to Ascanius. Who commanding his Magicians to enquire by Art, what Sex the Maid had conceiv'd; had answer, That it was one who should be the Death of both his Parents; and baniſh'd for the Fact, should after all in a far Country attain to highest Honour. The Prediction fail'd not, for in Travail the Mother dy'd. And Brutus (the Child was so call'd) at fifteen Years of Age, attending his Father to the Chace, with an Arrow unfortunately kill'd him.

Baniſh'd therefore by his Kindred, he retires into Greece. Where meeting with the Race of Helenus, King Priam's Son, held there in servile Condition by Pandrasus, then King; with them he abides: For Pyrrhus in Revenge of his Father slain at Troy, had brought thither with him Helenus, and many others, into Servitude. There Brutus, among his own Stock so thrives in Vertue, and in Arms, as renders him belov'd by Kings, and great Captains, above all the Youth of that Land. Whereby the Trojans not only begin to hope, but secretly to move him, that he would lead them the way to Liberty. They alledge their Numbers, and the promis'd Help of Assaracus, a Noble Greekish Youth, by the Mother's Side a Trojan; whom for that Cause his Brother went about to dispossess of certain Castles bequeath'd him by his Father. Brutus considering both the Forces offer'd him, and the Strength of those Holds, not unwillingly consents.

First therefore, having fortify'd those Castles, he, with Assaracus, and the whole Multitude, betake them to the Woods and Hills, as the safest Place from whence to expostulate; and in the Name of all sends to Pandrasus this Message; That the Trojans holding it unworthy their Ancestors to serve in a Foreign Kingdom, had retreated to the Woods; chusing rather a savage Life, than a slavish: If that displeas'd him, that then with his Leave they might depart to some other Soil.

As this may pass with good Allowance, that the Trojans might be many in these Parts; for Helenus was by Pyrrhus made King of the Chaonians, and the Sons of Pyrrhus by Andromache, Hector's Wife, could not but be powerful through all Epirus; so much the more it may be doubted how these Trojans could be thus in Bondage, where they had Friends and Country-men so potent. But to examine these things with Diligence, were but to confute the Fables of Britain with the Fables of Greece or Italy; for of this Age, what we have to say, as well concerning most other Countries, as this Island, is equally under Question. Be't how it will, Pandrasus not expecting so bold a Message from the Sons of Captives, gathers an Army: And marching toward the Woods, Brutus, who had notice of his Approach nigh to a Town call'd Sparatinum, (I know not what Town, but certainly of no Greek Name) over Night planting himself there with good part of his Men, suddenly sets upon him, and with Slaughter of the Greeks, pursues him to the Passage of a River, which mine Author names Akalon, meaning perhaps Achelous, or Acheron: Where at the Ford he overlays them afresh. This Victory obtain'd, and a sufficient Strength left in Sparatinum, Brutus with Antigonus, the King's Brother, and his Friend Anacletus, whom he had taken in the Fight, returns to the residue of his Friends in the thick Woods. While Pandrasus with all speed recollecting, besieges the Town. Brutus to relieve his Men besieg'd, who earnestly call'd him, distrusting the Sufficiency of his Force, bethinks himself of this Policy. Calls to him Anacletus, and threatning instant Death else both to him and his Antigonus, enjoyns him, that he should go at the second Hour of Night to the Greekish League, and tell the Guards he had brought Antigonus by stealth out of Prison to a certain Woody Vale; unable through the Weight of his Fetters to move further; entreating them to come speedily and fetch him in. Anacletus, to save both himself and his Friend Antigonus, swears this; and at a fit Hour sets out alone toward the Camp: Is met, examin'd, and at last unquestionably known. To whom, great Profession of Fidelity first made, he frames his Tale, as had been taught him: And they now fully assur'd, with a credulous Rashness leaving their Stations, far'd accordingly by the Ambush that there awaited them. Forthwith Brutus dividing his Men into three parts, leads on in Silence to the Camp; commanding first each part at a several Place to enter, and forbear Execution, till he with his Squadron possess'd of the King's Tent, gave Signal to them by Trumpet. The Sound whereof no sooner heard, but huge havock begins upon the sleeping, and unguarded Enemy; whom the besieged also now sallying forth, on the other side, assail. Brutus the while had special Care to seize and secure the King's Person; whose Life still within his Custody, he knew was the surest Pledge to obtain what he should demand. Day appearing, he enters the Town, there distributes the King's Treasure, and leaving the Place better fortify'd, returns with the King his Prisoner to the Woods. Strait the ancient and grave Men he summons to Counsel, what they should now demand of the King.

After long Debate, Mempricius, one of the gravest, utterly dissuading them from Thought of longer stay in Greece, unless they meant to be deluded with a subtle Peace, and the awaited Revenge of those whose Friends they had slain, advises them to demand first the King's Eldest Daughter Innogen in Marriage to their Leader Brutus, with a rich Dowry, next Shipping, Mo-

[a] Nennius, who liv'd in the 7th Century, makes the Island to be first inhabited by Brito, Son to Ascanius and Grandson to Æneas; who, as he supposes, reign'd in Britain at the Time when Eli judg'd Israel, about the Year of the World, 2830. Sigebertus Gemblacensis, a French Monk, who liv'd 20 Years before Geoffrey of Monmouth, writes, that Brute past from Gaul into Britain; and Henry Huntington, Contemporary with Geoffrey, is of Opinion that Britain was Peopled by Brute.

2855. ney, and fit Proviſion for them all to depart the Land.

This Reſolution pleaſing beſt, the King now brought in, and plac'd in a high Seat, is briefly told, that on theſe Conditions granted, he might be free; not granted, he muſt prepare to die.

Preſs'd with Fear of Death, the King readily yields, eſpecially to beſtow his Daughter on whom he confeſs'd ſo Noble and ſo Valiant: Offers them alſo the Third part of his Kingdom, if they like to ſtay; if not, to be their Hoſtage himſelf, till he had made good his Word.

The Marriage therefore ſolemniz'd, and Shipping from all Parts got together, the Trojans in a Fleet, no leſs written than three Hundred four and Twenty Sail, betake them to the wide Sea; where with a proſperous Courſe two Days and a Night bring them on a certain Iſland, long before diſpeopl'd and left waſt by Sea-Rovers; the Name whereof was then Leogecia, now unknown. They who were ſent out to diſcover, came at length to a ruin'd City, where was a Temple and Image of Diana that gave Oracles: But not meeting firſt or laſt ſave wild Beaſts, they return with this notice to their Ships: Wiſhing their General would enquire of that Oracle what Voyage to purſue.

Conſultation had, Brutus taking with him Gerion his Diviner, and twelve of the ancienteſt, with wonted Ceremonies before the inward Shrine of the Goddeſs, in Verſe, as it ſeems the manner was, utters his Requeſt, Diva potens nemorum, &c.

To whom ſleeping before the Altar, Diana in a Viſion that Night thus anſwer'd, Brute, ſub occaſum Solis, &c.

Brutus, far to the Weſt, in th' Ocean wide
Beyond the Realm of Gaul, a Land there lies:
Sea-girt it lies, where Giants dwelt of old,
Now void, it fits thy People; thither bend
Thy Courſe, there ſhalt thou find a laſting Seat,
There to thy Sons another Troy ſhall riſe,
And Kings be born of thee, whoſe dreaded Might
Shall awe the World, and conquer Nations bold.

Theſe Verſes originally Greek, were put in Latin, ſaith Virunnius, by Gildas a Britiſh Poet, and him to have liv'd under Claudius. Which granted true, adds much to the Antiquity of this Fable; and indeed the Latin Verſes are much better, than for the Age of Geoffry ap Arthur, unleſs perhaps Joſeph of Exeter, the only ſmooth Poet of thoſe Times, befriended him. In this Diana over-ſhot her Oracle thus ending, Ipſis totius terræ ſubditus orbis erit, That to the Race of Brute, Kings of this Iſland, the whole Earth ſhall be ſubject.

But Brutus guided now, as he thought, by Divine Conduct, ſpeeds him towards the Weſt; and after ſome Encounters on the Afric Side, arrives at a Place on the Tyrrhene Sea, where he happens to find the Race of thoſe Trojans, who with Antenor, came into Italy; and Corineus, a Man much fam'd, was their Chief: Though by ſurer Authors it be reported, that thoſe Trojans with Antenor, were ſeated on the other ſide of Italy on the Adriatic, not the Tyrrhene Shoar. But theſe joyning Company, and paſt the Herculean Pillars, at the Mouth of Ligeris in Aquitania caſt Anchor. Where after ſome Diſcovery made of the Place, Corineus hunting nigh the Shoar with his Men, is by Meſſengers of the King Goffarius Pictus met, and queſtion'd about his Errand there. Who not anſwering to their Mind, Imbertus, one of them, lets fly an Arrow at Corineus, which he avoiding, ſlays him: And the Pictavian himſelf hereupon levying his whole Force, is overthrown by Brutus and Corineus; who with the Battle Ax, which he was wont to manage againſt the Tyrrhene Giants, is ſaid to have done Marvels. But Goffarius having drawn to his Aid the whole Country of Gaul, at that time govern'd by Twelve Kings, puts his Fortune to a ſecond Trial, wherein the Trojans, over-born by Multitude, are driven back, and beſieg'd in their own Camp, which by good Foreſight was ſtrongly ſituate. Whence Brutus unexpectedly iſſuing out, and Corineus in the mean while, whoſe Device it was, aſſaulting them behind from a Wood, where he had convey'd his Men the Night before, the Trojans are again Victors, but with the Loſs of Turon a valiant Nephew of Brutus; whoſe Aſhes left in that Place, gave Name to the City of Tours, built there by the Trojans. Brutus finding now his Powers much leſſen'd, and this yet not the Place foretold him, leaves Aquitain, and with an eaſie Courſe, [a] arriving at Totneſs in Devonſhire, quickly perceives here to be the promis'd End of his Labours. Brutus lands at Totneſs.

The Iſland, not yet Britain, but Albion, was in a manner deſart and inhoſpitable; kept only by a Remnant of Giants; whoſe exceſſive Force and Tyranny had conſum'd the reſt. Them Brutus deſtroys, and to his People divides the Land, which with ſome Reference to his own Name he thenceforth calls Britain. To Corineus, Cornwall, as we now call it, fell by Lot; the rather by him lik'd, for that the hugeſt Giants, in Rocks and Caves were ſaid to lurk ſtill there; which kind of Monſters to deal with was his old Exerciſe.

And here, with Leave beſpoken, to recite a grand Fable, though dignify'd by our beſt Poets; while Brutus on a certain Feſtival Day ſolemnly kept on that Shoar, where he firſt landed, was with the People in great Jollity and Mirth, a Crew of theſe Savages breaking in upon them, began on the ſudden another ſort of Game than at ſuch a Meeting was expected. But at length by many hands overcome, Goemagog the hugeſt, in height twelve Cubits, is reſerv'd alive; that with him Corineus, who deſir'd nothing more, might try his Strength; whom in a Wreſtle the Giant catching aloft, with a terrible hugg broke three of his Ribs: Nevertheleſs Corineus enrag'd, heaving him up by main Force, and on his Shoulders, bearing him to the next high Rock, threw him headlong all ſhatter'd into the Sea, and left his Name on the Cliff, called ever ſince Langoemagog, which is to ſay, the Giant's Leap.

After this, Brutus in a choſen place builds [b] Troja Nova, chang'd in time to Trinovantum, now London, and began to enact Laws; Heli being then High Prieſt in Judæa; and having govern'd the whole Iſle 24 Years, dy'd, and was buried in his new Troy. His three Sons Locrine, Albanact and Camber, divide the Land by Conſent. Locrine had the middle part Loegria;

[a] The time of his Landing is ſuppos'd to be about 1200 Years after the Flood, A. M. 2830.
[b] He gives it a Latin Name, tho' that Language was not then us'd in Italy.

Camber

2855. Camber poſſeſs'd Cambria or Wales; Albanact, Albania, now Scotland. But he in the end by Humber, King of the Hunns, who with a Fleet invaded that Land, was ſlain in Fight, and his People driven back into Loegria. Locrine and his Brother go out againſt Humber; who now marching onward, was by them defeated, and in a River drown'd, which to this Day retains his Name. Among the Spoils of his Camp and Navy, were found certain young Maids, and Eſtrildis, above the reſt, paſſing fair, the Daughter of a King in Germany, from whence Humber, as he went waſting the Sea-Coaſt, had led her Captive: Whom Locrine, though before contracted to the Daughter of Corineus, reſolves to marry. But being forc'd and threaten'd by Corineus, whoſe Authority and Power he fear'd; Guendolen the Daughter he yields to marry, but in ſecret loves the other; and oft-times retiring as to ſome private Sacrifice, through Vaults and Paſſages made under Ground; and ſeven Years thus enjoying her, had by her a Daughter equally fair, whoſe Name was Sabra. But when once his Fear was off by the Death of Corineus, not content with ſecret Enjoyment, divorcing Guendolen, he made Eſtrildis now his Queen. Guendolen all in Rage departs into Cornwall, where Madan, the Son ſhe had by Locrine, was hitherto brought up by Corineus his Grand-father. And gathering an Army of her Father's Friends and Subjects, gives Battle to her Husband by the River Sture; wherein Locrine ſhot with an Arrow ends his Life. But not ſo ends the Fury of Guendolen, for Eſtrildis, and her Daughter Sabra ſhe throws into a River; and to leave a Monument of Revenge, proclaims, that the Stream be thenceforth call'd after the Damſel's Name; which by length of time is chang'd now to Sabrina, or Severn.

Nor was he better in the ſole Poſſeſſion, whereof ſo ill he could endure a Partner, killing his Nobles, and thoſe eſpecially next to ſucceed him; till laſtly given over to unnatural Luſt, in the twentieth of his Reign, hunting in a Foreſt, he was devour'd by Wolves.

2969. His Son Ebranc, a Man of mighty Strength and Stature, reign'd 40 Years. He firſt after Brutus waſted Gaul; and returning rich and proſperous, builded Caerebranc, now York; in Albania, Alclud; Mount Agned, or the Caſtle of Maidens, now Edinburgh. He had 20 Sons and 30 Daughters by 20 Wives. His Daughters he ſent to Silvius Alba into Italy, who beſtow'd them on his Peers of the Trojan Line. His Sons under the leading of Aſſaracus their Brother, won them Lands and Signiories in Germany, thence call'd, from theſe Brethren, Germania: a Derivation too haſtily ſuppos'd, perhaps before the Word Germanus or the Latin Tongue was in uſe. Some who have deſcrib'd Henault, as Jacobus Bergomas, and Leſſabeus, are cited to affirm that Ebranc in his War there was by Brunchildis Lord of Henault put to the worſe.

Brutus therefore ſirnamed Greenſhield ſucceeding to repair his Father's Loſſes, as the ſame Leſſabeus reports, fought a ſecond Battle in Henault with Brunchild at the Mouth of Scaldis, and encamp'd on the River Hania. Of which 3000.

hath run on: But Leir, who next reign'd, had only three Daughters, and no Male Iſſue: Govern'd laudably, and built Caer-Leir, now Leiceſter on the Bank of Sora. But at laſt, failing through Age, he determines to beſtow his Daughters, and ſo among them to divide his Kingdom. Yet firſt to try which of them lov'd him beſt (a Trial that might have made him, had he known as wiſely how to try, as he ſeem'd to know how much the trying behov'd him) he reſolves a ſimple Reſolution, to ask them ſolemnly in order; and which of them ſhould profeſs largeſt, her to believe. Gonoril, the Eldeſt, apprehending too well her Father's Weakneſs, makes anſwer, invoking Heaven, That ſhe lov'd him above her Soul. Therefore, quoth the old Man over-joy'd, ſince thou ſo honoureſt my declined Age, to thee and the Huſband whom thou ſhalt chuſe, I give the third part of my Realm. So fair a ſpeeding for a few Words ſoon utter'd, was to Regan the ſecond, ample Inſtruction what to ſay. She on the ſame Demand ſpares no proteſting, and the Gods muſt witneſs, that otherwiſe to expreſs her Thoughts ſhe knew not, but that ſhe lov'd him above all Creatures; and ſo receives an equal Reward with her Siſter. But Cordeilla the youngeſt, though hitherto beſt belov'd, and now before her Eyes the rich and preſent Hire of a little eaſie ſoothing, the Danger alſo, and the Loſs likely to betide plain Dealing, yet moves not from the ſolid Purpoſe of a ſincere and vertuous Anſwer. Father, ſaith ſhe, my Love towards you is as my Duty bids; what ſhould a Father ſeek? What can a Child promiſe more? they who pretend beyond this, flatter. When the old Man, ſorry to hear this, and wiſhing her to recall thoſe Words, perſiſted asking; with a Loyal Sadneſs at her Father's Infirmity, but ſomething on the ſudden harſh, and glancing rather at her Siſters, than ſpeaking her own Mind, Two ways only, ſaith ſhe, I have to anſwer what you require me; the former, your Command is, I ſhould recant; accept then this other which is left me; look how much you have, ſo much is your Value, and ſo much I love you. Then hear thou, quoth Leir, now all in a Paſſion, what thy 3105. Ingratitude hath gain'd thee; because thou hast not reverenc'd thy aged Father equal to thy Sisters, part in my Kingdom, or what else is mine reckon to have none. And without delay gives in Marriage his other Daughters, Gonoril to Maglaunus Duke of Albania, Regan to Henninus Duke of Cornwall; with them in present half his Kingdom; the rest to follow at his Death. In the mean while Fame was not sparing to divulge the Wisdom, and other Graces of Cordeilla, insomuch that Aganippus a great King in Gaul (however he came by his Greek Name) seeks her to Wife, and nothing alter'd at the Loss of her Dowry, receives her gladly in such manner as she was sent him. After this, King Leir, more and more drooping with Years, became an easie Prey to his Daughters and their Husbands; who now by daily Encroachment had seiz'd the whole Kingdom into their hands, amd the old King is put to sojourn with his Eldest Daughter, attended only by threescore Knights. But they in a short while grudg'd at, as too numerous and disorderly for continual Guests, are reduc'd to Thirty. Not brooking that Affront, the old King betakes him to his second Daughter: But there also Discord soon arising between the Servants of differing Masters in one Family, five only are suffer'd to attend him. Then back again he returns to the other; hoping that she his Eldest could not but have more Pity on his gray Hairs: But she now refuses to admit him unless he be content with one only of his Followers. At last the Remembrance of his yougest, Cordeilla, comes to his Thoughts; and now acknowledging how true her Words had been, though with little Hope from one he had so injur'd, be it but to pay her the last Recompence she can have from him, his Confession of her wise forewarning, that so perhaps his Misery, the Proof and Experiment of her Wisdom, might something soften her, he takes his Journey into France. Now might be seen a Difference between the silent and downright spoken Affection of some Children to their Parents, and the talkative Obsequiousness of others; while the Hope of Inheritance over-acts them, and on the Tongues end enlarges their Duty. Cordeilla out of mere Love, without the Suspicion of expected Reward, at the Message only of her Father in Distress, pours forth true filial Tears. And not enduring either that her own, or any other Eye should see him in such forlorn Condition as his Messenger declar'd, discreetly appoints one of her most trusty Servants, first to convey him privately toward some good Sea Town, there to array him, bath him, cherish him, furnish him with such Attendants and State, as beseem'd his Dignity. That then, as from his first Landing, he might send word of his Arrival to her Husband Aganippus. Which done with all mature and requisite Contrivance, Cordeilla with the King her Husband, and all the Barony of his Realm, who then first had News of his passing the Sea, go out to meet him; and after all honourable and joyful Entertainment, Aganippus, as to his Wife's Father, and his Royal Guest, surrenders him, during his abode there, the Power and Disposal of his whole Dominion: Permitting his Wife Cordeilla to go with an Army, and set her Father upon his Throne. Wherein her Piety so prosper'd, as that she vanquish'd her impious Sisters with those Dukes, and Leir again, as saith the Story, three Years obtain'd the Crown. To whom dying, Cordeilla with all Regal Solemnities gave Burial in the Town of Leicester. And then as right Heir succeeding, and her Husband dead, rul'd the Land five Years in Peace; until Marganus and Cunedagius, her two Sisters Sons, not bearing that a Kingdom should be govern'd by a Woman, in the unseasonablest time to raise that Quarrel against a Woman so worthy, make War against her, depose her, and imprison her; of which impatient, and now long unexercis'd to suffer, she there, as is related, kill'd her self. The Victors between them part the Land: But Marganus the Eldest Sister's Son who held by Agreement from the North-side of Humber to Catbness, incited by those about him, to invade all as his own Right, wars on Cunedagius, who soon met him, overcame, and overtook him in a Town of Wales, where he left his Life, and ever since his Name to the Place. 3105. 3169.

Ingratitude

Cunedagius was now sole King, and govern'd with much Praise many Years, about the time when Rome was built.[a] Him succeeded Rivallo his Son, wise also and fortunate; save what they tell us of three Days raining Blood, and Swarms of stinging Flies, whereof Men dy'd. In order then Gurguſtius, Jago or Lago, his Nephew; [b] Sisillius, Kinmarcus. Then Gorbogudo, whom others name Gorbodego, and Gorbodion, who had two Sons, Ferrex and Porrex. They in the old Age of their Father falling to contend who should succeed, Porrex attempting by Treachery his Brother's Life, drives him into France; and in his return, though aided with the Force of that Country, defeats and slays him. But by his Mother Videna who less lov'd him, is himself, with the Assistance of her Women, soon after slain in his Bed: With whom ended, as is thought, the Line of Brutus; whereupon, the whole Land with civil Broils was rent into Five Kingdoms, long time waging War on each other; and some say 50 Years. At length Dunwallo Molmutius, the Son of Cloten King of Cornwall, one of the foresaid five, excelling in Valour, and Goodliness of Person, after his Father's Decease found means to reduce again the whole Island into a Monarchy: Subduing the rest at Opportunities. First Imner King of Loegria whom he slew; then Rudaucus of Cambria, Staterius of Albania, confederate together. In which Fight Dunwallo is reported, while the Victory hung doubtful, to have us'd this Art. He takes with him 600 stout Men, bids them put on the Armour of their slain Enemies, and so unexpectedly approaching the Squadron, where those two Kings had plac'd themselves in Fight, from that part which they thought securest, assaults and dispatches them. Then displaying his own Ensigns, which before he had conceal'd, and sending notice to the other part of his Army what was done, adds to them new Courage, and gains a final Victory. This Dunwallo was the first in Britain that wore a Crown of Gold; and therefore by some reputed the first King. He established the Molmutine Laws, famous among the English to this Day; written long after in Latin by Gildas, and in Saxon by King Alfred; so saith Geoffrey; but Gildas denies to have known ought of the Britains before Cæsar, much less knew Alfred. These Laws, whoever made them, bestow'd on Temples the Privilege of Sanctuary; to Cities also, and the ways thither leading, yea to Plows 3203. 3248. 3287. 3364. 3420. 3477. granted a kind of like Refuge: And made ſuch Riddance of Thieves and Robbers, that all Paſſages were ſafe. Forty Years he govern'd alone, and was buried nigh to [a] the Temple of Concord; which he, to the Memory of Peace reſtor'd, had built in Trinovant.

His two Sons, Belinus and Brennus, contending about the Crown, by Deciſion of Friends came at length to an accord; Brennus to have the North of Humber, Belinus the Sovereignty of all. But the younger not long ſo contented, that he, as they whiſper'd to him, whoſe Valour had ſo oft repell'd the Invaſions of Ceulphus the Morine Duke, ſhould now be ſubject to his Brother, upon new Deſign ſails into Norway; enters League and Affinity with Elſing that King; which Belinus perceiving, in his Abſence diſpoſſeſſes him of all the North. Brennus with a Fleet of Norwegians makes toward Britain; but encounter'd by Guithlac the Daniſh King, who laying claim to his Bride, purſu'd him on the Sea, his haſte was retarded, and he bereft of his Spouſe: Who from the Fight by ſudden Tempeſt, was by the Daniſh King driven on Northumberland, and brought to Belinus. Brennus nevertheleſs recollecting his Navy, lands in Albania, and gives Battle to his Brother in the Wood Calaterium; but loſing the Day, eſcapes with one ſingle Ship into Gaul. Mean while the Dane upon his own Offer to become tributary, ſent home with his new Prize, Belinus returns his Thoughts to the adminiſtring of Juſtice, and the perfecting of his Father's Laws; and to explain what High-ways might enjoy the foreſaid Privileges, he caus'd to be drawn out and pav'd four main Roads to the utmoſt Length and Breadth of the Iſland, and two others athwart; which are ſince attributed to the Romans. Brennus on the other ſide ſolliciting to his Aid the Kings of Gaul, happens at laſt on Seginus Duke of the Allobroges, where his Worth and Comelineſs of Perſon wan him the Duke's Daughter and Heir. In whoſe Right he ſhortly ſucceeding, and by obtain'd Leave paſſing with a great Hoſt through the length of Gaul, gets footing once again in Britain. Nor was Belinus unprepar'd, and now the Battle ready to joyn, Conuvenna the Mother of them both, all in a Fright, throws her ſelf between, and calling earneſtly to Brennus her Son, whoſe abſence had ſo long depriv'd her of his Sight, after Embracements and Tears, aſſails him with ſuch a Motherly Power, and the mention of things ſo dear and reverend, as irreſiſtibly wrung from him all his Enmity againſt Belinus.

Then are hands joyn'd, Reconciliation made firm, and Counſel held to turn their united Preparations on foreign Parts. Thence that by theſe two all Gallia was over-run, the Story tells; and what they did in Italy, and at Rome, if theſe be they, and not Gauls, who took that City, the Roman Authors can beſt relate. So far from home I undertake not for the Monmouth Chronicle; which here againſt the Stream of Hiſtory, carries up and down theſe Brethren, now into Germany, then again to Rome, purſuing Gabius and Porſena two unheard of Conſuls. Thus much is more generally believ'd, that both this Brennus, and another famous Captain, Britomarus, whom the Epitomiſt Florus and others mention, were not Gauls but Britains; the Name of the firſt in that Tongue ſignifying a King, and of the other a great Britain. However, Belinus after a while returning home, the reſt of his Days rul'd in Peace, Wealth and Honour above all his Predeceſſors; building ſome Cities, of which one was Caeroſe upon Oſca, ſince Caerlegion; beautifying others, as Trinovant with a Gate, a Haven, and a Tower on the Thames, retaining yet his Name; on the Top whereof his Aſhes are ſaid to have been laid up in a Golden Urn. 3563. Billingſgate.

After him Gurguntius Barbirus was King, mild and juſt, but yet inheriting his Father's Courage, he ſubdu'd the Dacian, or Dane, who refus'd to pay the Tribute covenanted to Belinus for his Enlargement. In his return finding about the Orkneys thirty Ships of Spain, or Biſcay, fraught with Men and Women for a Plantation, whoſe Captain alſo Bartholinus wrongfully baniſh'd, as he pleaded, beſought him that ſome part of his Territory might be aſſign'd them to dwell in, he ſent with them certain of his own Men to Ireland, which then lay unpeopl'd; and gave them that Iſland to hold of him as in Homage. [b] He was bury'd in Caerlegion, a City which he had wall'd about. 3596.

Guitheline his Son, is alſo remember'd, as a juſt and good Prince, and his Wife Martia to have excell'd ſo much in Wiſdom, as to venture upon a new Inſtitution of Laws. Which King Alfred tranſlating, call'd Marchen-League, but more truly thereby is meant the Mercian Law; not tranſlated by Alfred, but digeſted or incorporated with the Weſt-Saxon. In the Minority of her Son ſhe had the Rule, and then, as may be ſuppos'd, brought forth theſe Laws, not her ſelf, for Laws are Maſculine Births, but by the Advice of her ſageſt Counſellors; and therein ſhe might do vertuouſly, ſince it befel her to ſupply the Nonage of her Son: Elſe nothing more awry from the Law of God and Nature, than that a Woman ſhould give Laws to Men, 3615. 3656.

Her Son Siſillius coming to Years, receiv'd the Rule; then in order Kimarus, then Danius or Elanius his Brother. Then Morindus, his Son by Tangueſtela, a Concubine, who is recorded a Man of exceſſive Strength, Valiant, Liberal, and fair of Aſpect, but immanely Cruel; not ſparing in his Anger, Enemy or Friend, if any Weapon were in his Hand. A certain King of the Morines, or Picards invaded Northumberland; whoſe Army this King, though not wanting ſufficient Numbers, chiefly by his own Proweſs overcame; but diſhonour'd his Victory by the cruel Uſage of his Priſoners, whom his own hands, or others in his Preſence put all to ſeveral Deaths: Well fitted to ſuch a Beaſtial Cruelty was his end; for hearing of a huge Monſter that from the Iriſh Sea infeſted the Coaſt, and in the Pride of his Strength, fooliſhly attempting to ſet Manly Valour againſt a brute Vaſtneſs, when his Weapons were all in vain, by that horrible Mouth he was catch'd up and devour'd. Siſillius the 2d. 3666.

Gorbonian the Eldeſt of his five Sons, than whom a juſter Man liv'd not in his Age, was a great Builder of Temples, and gave to all what was their due; to his Gods devout Worſhip, to Men of Deſert, Honour, and Preferment; to the Commons Encouragement in their Labours, and Trades, Defence and Protection, from Injuries and Oppreſſions, ſo that the Land flouriſh'd above her Neighbours, Violence and Wrong ſeldom was heard of: His Death was a general Loſs; he was buried in Trinovant. Archigallo the ſecond Brother follow'd not his Example; but depreſs'd the ancient Nobility, and by peeling the wealthier ſort, ſtuff'd his Treaſury, and took the right way to be depos'd. Elidure the next Brother, ſirnam'd the Pious, was ſet up in his Place; a Mind 3676. 3686. 3687.

[a] Said to be built on the Ground where Blackwell-Hall now ſtands. Selden mentions Kinmarcus in his Janus Anglorum.
[b] He is ſaid to have built Lancaſter, and Warwick. And Cambridge, as is pretended, was now built by Cantabar a Spaniard.

ſo

3687. ſo noble and ſo moderate, as almoſt is incredible to have ever been found: For having held the Scepter five Years, hunting one day in the Foreſt of Calater, he chanc'd to meet his depoſed Brother wandring in mean condition; who had been long in vain beyond the Seas, importuning foreign Aids to his Reſtorement; and was now in a poor Habit, with only ten Followers, privately return'd to find ſubſiſtence among his ſecret Friends. At the unexpected ſight of him, Elidure himſelf alſo then but thinly accompanied, runs to him
3690. with open Arms; and after many dear and ſincere Welcomings, conveys him to the City Alclud, there hides him in his own Bed-Chamber. Afterwards faining himſelf ſick, ſummons all his Peers, as about greateſt Affairs; where admitting them one by one, as if his weakneſs endur'd not the diſturbance of more at once, cauſes them, willing or unwilling, once more to ſwear Allegiance to Archigallo. Whom, after reconciliation made on all ſides, he leads to York, and from his own Head, places the Crown on the Head of his Brother. Who thenceforth, Vice it ſelf diſſolving in him, and forgetting her firmeſt hold with the admiration of a Deed ſo Heroick, became a true converted Man, rul'd worthily ten Years, dy'd and was bury'd in Caerleir. Thus was a Brother ſav'd by a Brother, to whom love of a Crown, the thing that ſo often dazles and vitiates mortal Men, for which thouſands of neareſt Blood have deſtroy'd each other, was, in reſpect of Brotherly dearneſs, a contemptible thing.
3700. Elidure now, in his own behalf, re-aſſumes the Government, and did as was worthy ſuch a Man to do. When Providence, that ſo great Vertue might want no ſort of tryal to make it more illuſtrious, ſtirs up Vigenius and Peredure his youngeſt Brethren, againſt him who had deſerv'd ſo nobly of that relation, as leaſt of all by a Brother to be injur'd: Yet him they defeat, him they impriſon in the Tower of Trinovant, and divide his Kingdom; the North to Peredure, the South to Vigenius. After whoſe Death Peredure obtaining all, ſo much the better us'd his power, by how much the worſe he got it. So that Elidure now is hardly miſs'd. But yet in all right, owing to his Elder the due place whereof he had depriv'd him, Fate would that he ſhould die firſt.
3715. And Elidure, after many Years Impriſonment, is now the third time ſeated on the Throne; which at laſt he enjoy'd long in Peace; finiſhing the interrupted courſe of his mild and juſt Reign, as full of vertuous Deeds as Days, to the end. After 3720. theſe five Sons of Morindus, ſucceeded alſo their Sons in Order: * Regin of Gorbonian, Marganus of Archigallo, both good Kings. But Enniaunus his Brother taking other courſes, was after ſix Years depos'd. Then Idwallo, taught by a near Example, govern'd ſoberly. Then Runno, then Gerontius, he of Peredure, this laſt the Son of Elidure. From whoſe Loins (for that likely is the durable and ſurviving Race that ſprings of juſt Progenitors) iſſu'd a long deſcent of Kings, whoſe Names only for many Succeſſions, without other memory, ſtand thus regiſter'd, Catellus, Coillus, Porrex, Cherin, and his three Sons; Fulgenius, Eldadus, and Andragius, his Son Urianus; Eliud, Eledaucus, Clotenus, Gurguntius, Merianus, Bleduno, Capis,

* Matthew of Weſtminſter.

Oenus, Siſillius, twenty Kings in a continu'd row, 3720. that either did nothing, or liv'd in Ages that wrote nothing, at leaſt a foul preterminſion in the Author of this, whether Story or Fable; himſelf weary, as ſeems, of his own tedious Tale.

But to make amends for this ſilence, Blegabredus next ſucceeding, is recorded to have excell'd 3800. all before him in the Art of Muſick; opportunely, had he but left us one Song of his twenty Predeceſſors doings. Yet after him nine more ſucceeded in Name; his Brother Archimailus, Eldol, Redion, Rederchius, Samulius, Peniſſel, Pir, Capoirus, [a] but Cliguellius, with the addition of Modeſt, Wiſe and Juſt. His Son Heli reign'd 3818. forty Years, and had three Sons, Lud, Caſſibelan and Nennius. This Heli ſeems to be the ſame whom Ninnius in his Fragment calls Minocan; for him he writes to be the Father of Caſſibelan. Lud was he that enlarg'd and wall'd about Trinovant, there kept his Court, made it the prime City, and call'd it from his own name Caer-Lud, or Lud's Town, now London. Which, as is alledg'd out of Gildas, became matter of great Diſſention betwixt him and his Brother Nennius; [b] who took 3878. it hainouſly that the name of Troy, their ancient Country, ſhould be aboliſhed for any new one. Lud was hardy and bold in War, in Peace a jolly Feaſter. He conquer'd many Iſlands in the Sea, ſaith Huntingdon, and was bury'd by the Gate which from thence we call Ludgate. His two Sons, Androgeus and Tenuantius, were left to the tuition of Caſſibelan; whoſe bounty and high demeanor ſo wrought with the common People, as got him eaſily the Kingdom transferr'd upon himſelf. He nevertheleſs continuing to favour and 3880. ſupport his Nephews, confers freely upon Androgeus, London with Kent; upon Tenuantius, Cornwall: Reſerving a ſuperiority both over them, and all the other Princes to himſelf; till the Romans for a while circumſcrib'd his Power. Thus far, though leaning only on the Credit of Geoffrey Monmouth, and his Aſſertors, I yet for the ſpecify'd cauſes have thought it not beneath my purpoſe to relate what I found. Whereto I neither oblige the belief of other Perſon, nor overhaſtily ſubſcribe mine own. Nor have I ſtood with others, computing or collating Years and Chronologies, leſt I ſhould be vainly curious about the Time and Circumſtances of things whereof the Subſtance is ſo much in doubt. By this time, like one who had ſet out on his way by Night, and travell'd thro' a Rigion of ſmooth or idle Dreams, our Hiſtory now arrives on the Confines, where Day-light and Truth meets us with a clear dawn, repreſenting to our view, though at a far diſtance, true Colours and Shapes. For albeit Caſar, whoſe Authority we are now firſt to follow, wanted not who tax'd him of miſreporting in his Commentaries, yea in his Civil Wars againſt Pompey, much more may we think in the Britiſh Affairs, of whoſe little ſkill in writing he did not eaſily hope to be contradicted, yet now in ſuch variety of good Authors, we hardly can miſs from one hand or other to be ſufficiently inform'd, as of things paſt ſo long ago. But this will better be referr'd to a ſecond Diſcourſe.

[a] Cliguellus or Dinellius, the Son of Capoire, about eighty Years after the Death of Elidure, in which time there had reign'd thirty Kings, came to the Crown, and is the firſt of ſo many Princes that Geoffrey could or would ſay any thing of.

[b] 'Tis ſaid, this Nennius wrote the Hiſtory of Britain, which was turn'd into Latin by another Nennius.

THE

By Mr. JOHN MILTON. Book II.

3897. I Am now to write of what befel the Britains from fifty and three Years before the Birth of our Saviour, when first the Romans came in, till the decay and ceasing of that Empire; a Story of much Truth, and for the first Hundred Years and somewhat more, collected without much Labour. So many and so prudent were the Writers, which those two, the Civilest, and Wisest of European Nations, both Italy and Greece, afforded to the Actions of that puissant City. For Worthy Deeds are not often destitute of Worthy Relators: As by a certain Fate great Acts and great Eloquence have most commonly gone hand in hand, equalling and honouring each other in the same Ages. 'Tis true, that in obscurest Times, by shallow and unskilful Writers, the indistinct Noise of many Battles, and Devastations of many Kingdoms over-run and lost, hath come to our Ears. For what wonder, if in all Ages, Ambition and the Love of Rapine hath stirr'd up greedy and violent Men to bold Attempts in wasting and ruining Wars, which to Posterity have left the Work of wild Beasts and Destroyers, rather than the Deeds and Monuments of Men and Conquerors? But he whose just and true Valour uses the necessity of War and Dominion, not to destroy but to prevent Destruction, to bring in Liberty against Tyrants, Law and Civility among barbarous Nations, knowing that when he conquers all things else, he cannot conquer Time or Detraction, wisely conscious of this his Wants as well as of his Worth not to be forgotten or conceal'd, honours and hath recourse to the Aid of Eloquence, his friendliest and best Supply; by whose immortal Record his noble Deeds, which else were transitory, becoming fixt and durable against the Force of Years and Generations, he fails not to continue through all Posterity, over Envy, Death, and Time, also victorious. Therefore when the Esteem of Science, and liberal Study waxes low in the Commonwealth, we may presume that also there all civil Vertue, and worthy Action is grown as low to a decline: And then Eloquence, as it were consorted in the same Destiny, with the Decrease and Fall of Virtue corrupts also and fades; at least resigns her Office of relating, to illiterate and frivolous Historians; such as the Persons themselves both deserve, and are best pleas'd with; whilst they want either the Understanding to chuse better, or the Innocence to dare invite the examining and searching Stile of an intelligent and faithful Writer to the Survey of their unsound Exploits, better befriended by Obscurity than Fame. As for these, the only Authors we have of British Matters, while the Power of Rome reach'd hither (for Gildas affirms, that of the Roman Times no British Writer was in his Days extant, or if any ever were, either burnt by Enemies, or transported with such as fled the Pictish and Saxon Invasions) these therefore only Roman Authors there be, who in the English Tongue have laid together, as much, and perhaps more than was requisite to a History of Britain. So that were it not for leaving an unsightly Gap so near to the beginning, I should have judg'd this Labour, wherein so little seems to be requir'd above Transcription, almost superfluous. Notwithstanding since I must through it, if ought by Diligence may be added, or omitted, or by other disposing may be more explain'd, or more express'd, I shall assay. 3897.

Julius Cæsar (of whom, and of the Roman Free State, more than what appertains, is not here to be discours'd) having subdu'd most part of Gallia, which by a potent Faction, he had obtain'd of the Senate as his Province for many Years, stirr'd up with a Desire of adding still more Glory to his Name, and the whole Roman Empire to his Ambition, some say, with a far meaner and ignobler, the Desire of British Pearls, whose Bigness he delighted to balance in his hand, determines, and that upon no unjust pretended Occasion, to try his Force in the Conquest also of Britain. For he understood that the Britains in most of his Gallian Wars, had sent Supplies against him, had receiv'd Fugitives of the Bellovaci his Enemies, and were call'd over to aid the Cities of Armorica, which had the Year before conspir'd all in a new Rebellion. Therefore Cæsar, though now the Summer well nigh ending, and the Season unagreeable to transport a War, yet judg'd it would be great Advantage, only to get entrance into the Isle, Knowledge of the Men, the Places, the Ports, the Accesses, which then, it seems, were even to the Gauls their Neighbours almost unknown. For except Merchants and Traders, it is not oft, saith he, that any use to travel thither; and to those that do, besides the Sea-Coast, and the Ports next to Gallia, nothing else is known. But here I must require, as Pollio did, the Diligence, at least the Memory of Cæsar: For if it were true, as they of Rhemes told him, that Divitiacus, not long before, a puissant King of the Soisons, had Britain also under his Command, besides the Belgian Colonies which he affirms to have nam'd and peopl'd many Provinces there, if also the Britains had so frequently given them aid in all their Wars; if lastly the Druid Learning, honour'd so much among them, were at first taught them out of Britain, and they who soonest would attain that Discipline, sent hither to learn, it appears not how Britain at that time should be so utterly unknown in Gallia, 3897. lia, or only known to Merchants, yea to them ſo little, that being call'd together from all parts, none could be found to inform Cæſar of what bigneſs the Iſle, what Nations, how great, what uſe of War they had, what Laws, or ſo much as what commodious Havens for bigger Veſſels. Of all which things, as it were then firſt to make Diſcovery, he ſends Caius Voluſenus, in a long Galley, with command to return as ſoon as this could be effected. He in the mean time with his whole power draws nigh to the Morine [a] Coaſt, whence the ſhorteſt paſſage was into Britain. Hither his Navy, which he us'd againſt the Armoricans, and what elſe of Shipping can be provided, he draws together. This known in Britain, Ambaſſadors are ſent from many of the States there, who promiſe Hoſtages, and Obedience to the Roman Empire. Them, after Audience given, Cæſar as largely promiſing, and exhorting to continue in that mind, ſends home, and with them Comius of Arras, whom he had made King of that Country, and now ſecretly employ'd to gain a Roman Party among the Britains, in as many Cities as he found inclineable, and to tell them, that he himſelf was ſpeeding thither. Voluſenus, with what diſcovery of the Iſland he could make from aboard his Ship, not daring to venture on the ſhoar, within five Days returns to Cæſar. Who ſoon after, with two Legions, ordinarily amounting, of Romans and their Allies, to about 25000 Foot, and 4500 Horſe, the Foot in 80 Ships of Burthen, the Horſe in 18, beſides what Gallies were appointed for his chief Commanders, ſets off about the third Watch of the Night with a good Gale to Sea; leaving behind him Sulpitius Ruſus to make good the Port with a ſufficient ſtrength. [b] But the Horſe, whoſe appointed Shipping lay Wind-bound eight Mile upward in another Haven, had much trouble to imbark. Cæſar now within ſight of Britain, beholds on every Hill multitudes of armed Men, ready to forbid his Landing; and

Cic. Att. l. 4. Ep. 17. Cicero writes to his Friend Atticus, that the Acceſſes of the Iſland were wondrouſly fortify'd with ſtrong Works or Moles. Here from the fourth to the ninth hour of Day he awaits at Anchor the coming up of his whole Fleet: Mean while with his Legates and Tribunes conſulting, and giving order to fit all things for what might happen in ſuch a various and floating Water-fight as was to be expected. This place, which was a narrow Bay, cloſe environ'd with Hills, appearing no way commodious, he removes to a plain and open Shoar eight Mile diſtant, commonly

Cambden. ſuppos'd about Deal in Kent. Which when the Britains perceiv'd, their Horſe and Chariots, as then they us'd in fight, ſcowring before, their main Power ſpeeding after, ſome thick upon the ſhoar, others not tarrying to be aſſail'd, ride in among the Waves to encounter and aſſault the Romans, even under their Ships, with ſuch a bold and free hardihood, that Cæſar himſelf, between confeſſing and excuſing that his Soldiers were to come down from their Ships, to ſtand in Water heavy arm'd, and to fight at once, denies not but that the Terror of ſuch new and reſolute Oppoſition made them forget their wonted Valour. To ſuccour which he commands his Gallies, a ſight unuſual to the Britains, and more apt for motion, drawn from the bigger Veſſels, to row againſt the open ſide of the Enemy, and thence with Slings, Engines and Darts, to beat them back. But neither yet, though amaz'd at the ſtrangeneſs of thoſe new Sea Caſtles, bearing up ſo near and ſo ſwiftly, as almoſt to overwhelm them, the hurtling of Oars, the battering of fierce Engines againſt their Bodies barely expos'd, did the Britains give much ground, or the Romans gain, till he who bore the Eagle of the Tenth Legion, yet in the Gallies, firſt beſeeching his Gods, ſaid thus aloud: Leap down, Soldiers, unleſs ye mean to betray your Enſign; I, for my part, will perform what I owe to the Common-wealth and my General. This utter'd, over-board he leaps, and with his Eagle fiercely advanc'd, runs upon the Enemy, the reſt heartning one another not to admit the diſhonour of ſo nigh loſing their chief Standard, follow him reſolutely. Now was fought eagerly on both ſides. Ours, who well knew their own advantages, and expertly us'd them, now in the Shallows, now on the Sand, ſtill as the Romans went trooping to their Enſigns, receiv'd them, diſpatch'd them, and with the help of their Horſe, put them every where to great diſorder. But Cæſar cauſing all his Boats and Shallops to be fill'd with Soldiers, commanded to ply up and down continually with Relief where they ſaw need; whereby at length all the Foot now diſembark'd, and got together in ſome order on firm Ground, with a more ſteddy Charge put the Britains to flight: But wanting all their Horſe, whom the Winds yet with-held from ſailing, they were not able to make purſuit. In this confuſed Fight, Scæva, a Roman Soldier, having preſs'd too far among the Britains, and beſet round, after incredible Valour ſhewn ſingle againſt a multitude, ſwom back ſafe to his General; and in the place that rung with his Praiſes, earneſtly beſought Pardon for his raſh adventure againſt Diſcipline: Which modeſt confeſſing after no bad event, for ſuch a Deed wherein Valour and Ingenuity ſo much out-weigh'd Tranſgreſſion, eaſily made amends, and preferr'd him to be a Centurion [c]. Cæſar alſo is brought in by Julian, attributing to himſelf the honour (if it were at all an honour to that Perſon which he ſuſtain'd) of being the firſt that left his Ship, and took Land: But this were to make Cæſar leſs underſtand what became him than Scæva. The Britains finding themſelves maſter'd in Fight, forthwith ſend Ambaſſadors to treat of Peace; promiſing to give Hoſtages, and to be at command. With them Comius of Arras alſo return'd; whom hitherto, ſince his firſt coming from Cæſar, they had detain'd in Priſon as a Spy; the blame whereof they lay on the common People, for whoſe violence and their own imprudence they crave pardon. Cæſar complaining they had firſt ſought Peace, and then without cauſe had begun War, yet content to pardon them, commands Hoſtages: Whereof part they bring in ſtrait, others far up in the Country to be ſent for, they promiſe in a few Days. Mean while the People diſbanded and ſent home, many Princes and chief Men from all parts of the Iſle ſubmit themſelves and their Cities to the diſpoſe of Cæſar, who lay then encamp'd, as is thought, on Barham Down. Thus had the Britains made their Peace, when ſuddenly an Accident unlook'd for put new Counſels into their Minds. Four Days after the coming of Cæſar, thoſe 18 Ships of Burthen, which from the upper Haven had taken in all 3897. the Roman Horſe, born with a ſoft Wind to the very Coaſt, in ſight of the Roman Camp, were by a ſudden Tempeſt ſcatter'd, and driven back, ſome to the Port from whence they loos'd, others down into the Weſt Country; who finding there no Safety either to Land, or to caſt Anchor, choſe rather to commit themſelves again to the troubled Sea; and as Oroſius reports, were moſt of them caſt away. The ſame Night, it being full Moon, the Gallies left upon dry Land, were unaware to the Romans cover'd with a Spring-tide, and the greater Ships that lay off at Anchor, torn and beaten with Waves, to the great Perplexity of Cæſar and his whole Army; who now had neither Shipping left to convey them back, nor any Proviſion made to ſtay here, intending to have winter'd in Gallia. All this the Britains well perceiving, and by the Compaſs of his Camp, which without Baggage appear'd the ſmaller, gueſſing at his Numbers, conſult together, and one by one ſlily withdrawing from the Camp, where they were waiting the Concluſion of a Peace, reſolve to ſtop all Proviſions, and to draw out the Buſineſs till Winter. Cæſar though ignorant of what they intended, yet from the Condition wherein we was, and their other Hoſtages not ſent, ſuſpecting what was likely, begins to provide apace, all that might be, againſt what might happen: lays in Corn, and with Materials fetch'd from the Continent, and what was left of thoſe Ships which were paſt help he repairs the reſt. So that now by the inceſſant Labour of his Soldiers, all but twelve were again made ſerviceable. While theſe things are doing, one of the Legions being ſent out to forage, as was accuſtom'd, and no Suſpicion of War, while ſome of the Britains were remaining in the Country about, others alſo going and coming freely to the Roman Quarters, they who were in Station at the Camp Gates ſent ſpeedy Word to Cæſar, that from that part of the Country, to which the Legion went, a greater Duſt than uſual was ſeen to riſe. Cæſar gueſſing the Matter, commands the Cohorts of Guard to follow him thither, two others to ſucceed in their ſtead, the reſt all to arm and follow. They had not march'd long, when Cæſar diſcerns his Legion ſore over-charg'd: For the Britains not doubting but that their Enemies on the Morrow would be in that place which only they had left unreap'd of all their Harveſt, had plac'd an Ambuſh; and while they were diſperſt and buſieſt at their Labour, ſet upon them, kill'd ſome, and routed the reſt. The manner of their Fight was from a kind of * Chariots; wherein riding about, and throwing Darts, with the clutter of their Horſe, and of their Wheels, they oft-times broke the Rank of their Enemies; then retreating among the Horſe, and quitting their Chariots, they fought on foot. The Charioteers, in the mean while ſomewhat aſide from the Battel, ſet themſelves in ſuch order, that their Maſters at any time oppreſs'd with odds, might retire ſafely thither, having perform'd with one Perſon both the nimble Service of a Horſe-man, and the ſtedfaſt Duty of a Foot Soldier. So much they could with their Chariots by Uſe, and exerciſe, as riding on the ſpeed down a ſteep Hill, to ſtop ſuddenly, and with a ſhort Rein turn ſwiftly, now running on the † Beam, now on the * Yoke, then in the Seat. With this ſort of new skirmiſhing, the Romans now overmatch'd, and terrify'd, Cæſar with opportune aid appears; for then the Britains make a ſtand: But he conſidering that now was not fit time to offer Battel, while his Men were ſcarce recover'd of ſo late a fear, only keeps his ground, and ſoon after leads back his Legions to the Camp. Farther Action for many Days following was hinder'd on both ſides by foul Weather; in which time the Britains diſpatching Meſſengers round about, to how few the Romans were reduc'd, what hope of Prize and Booty, and now if ever of freeing themſelves from the fear of like Invaſions hereafter, by making theſe an example, if they could but now uncamp their Enemies; at this intimation multitudes of Horſe and Foot coming down from all parts make towards the Romans. Cæſar foreſeeing that the Britains, tho' beaten and put to flight, would eaſily evade his Foot, yet with no more than 30 Horſe, which Comius had brought over, draws out his Men to Battel, puts again the Britains to flight, purſues with Slaughter; and returning, burns and lays waſte all about. Whereupon Ambaſſadors the ſame day being ſent from the Britains to deſire Peace: Cæſar, as his Affairs at preſent ſtood, for ſo great a breach of Faith, only impoſes on them double the former Hoſtages to be ſent after him into Gallia: And becauſe September was nigh half ſpent, a ſeaſon not fit to tempt the Sea with his Weather-beaten Fleet, the ſame Night with a fair Wind he departs towards Belgia: Whither two only of the Britain Cities ſent Hoſtages, as they promis'd, the reſt neglected. But at Rome, when the news came of Cæſar's Acts here, whether it were eſteem'd a Conqueſt, or a fair Eſcape, Supplication of twenty Days is decreed by the Senate, as either for an Exploit done, or a Diſcovery made, wherein both Cæſar and the Romans gloried not a little, though it brought no Benefit either to him, or the Common-wealth. 3898.

The Winter following, Cæſar, as his Cuſtom was, going into Italy, when as he ſaw that moſt of the Britains regarded not to ſend their Hoſtages, appoints his Legates whom he left in Belgia, to provide what poſſible Shipping they could either build or repair. Low built they were to be, as thereby eaſier both to fraught, and to hale aſhoar; nor needed to be higher, becauſe the Tide ſo often changing, was obſerv'd to make the Billows leſs in our Sea than thoſe in the Mediterranean: Broader likewiſe they were made, for the better tranſporting of Horſes, and all other Fraughtage, being intended chiefly to that end. Theſe all about 600 in a Readineſs, with 28 Ships of Burden, and what with Adventurers, and other Hulks above 200, Cotta, one of the Legates wrote them, as Athenæus affirms, in all 1000, Cæſar from * Port Iccius, a Paſſage of ſome 30 Mile over, leaving behind him Labienus to guard the Haven, and for other Supply at need, with five Legions, though but 2000 Horſe, about Sun ſet hoiſting Sail with a ſlack South-Weſt, at Midnight was becalm'd. And finding when it was light, that the whole Navy lying on the Current, had fallen off from the Iſle, which now they could deſcry on their left hand, by the unwearied Labour of his Soldiers, who refus'd not to tug the Oar, and kept courſe with Ships under ſail, he bore up as near as might be, to the ſame place where he had landed the Year before; where about Noon arriving, no Enemy could be ſeen. For the Britains, which in great Numbers, as was after known, had been there, at ſight of ſo

And at length by a River commonly thought the Stowre in Kent, eſpies embattel'd the Britiſh Forces. They with their Horſes and Chariots advancing to the higher Banks, oppoſe the Romans in their March, and begin the Fight; but repuls'd by the Roman Cavalry give back into the Woods, to a Place notably made ſtrong both by Art and Nature; which, it ſeems, had been a Fort, or Hold of Strength rais'd heretofore in Times of Wars among themſelves. For Entrance and Acceſs on all ſides, by the felling of huge Trees overthwart one another, was quite barr'd up; and within theſe Britains did their utmoſt to keep out the Enemy. But the Soldiers of the ſeventh Legion locking all their Shields together like a Roof cloſe over head, and others raiſing a Mount, without much Loſs of Blood took the Place, and drove them all to forſake the Woods. Purſuit they made not long, as being through Ways unknown; and now Evening came on, which they more wiſely ſpent, in chuſing out where to pitch and fortifie their Camp that Night. The next Morning Cæſar had but newly ſent out his Men in three Bodies to purſue, and the laſt no further gone than yet in ſight, when Horſemen all in poſt from Quintus Atrius bring word to Cæſar, that almoſt all his Ships in a Tempeſt that Night had ſuffer'd Wrack, and lay broken upon the Shoar. Cæſar at this News recals his Legions, himſelf in all haſt riding back to the Sea-ſide, beheld with his own Eyes the ruinous Proſpect. About forty Veſſels were ſunk and loſt, the reſidue ſo torn, and ſhaken, as not to be new rigg'd without much Labour. Straight he aſſembles what Number of Ship-wrights either in his own Legions or from beyond Sea, could be ſummon'd; appoints Labienus on the Belgian ſide to build more; and with a dreadful Induſtry of ten Days, not reſpiting his Soldiers Day or Night, drew up all his Ships, and entrench'd them round within the Circuit of his Camp. This done, and leaving to their Defence the ſame Strength as before, he returns with his whole Forces to the ſame Wood, where he had defeated the Britains: Who preventing him with greater Powers than before, had now repoſſeſs'd themſelves of that Place, under Caſſibelan their chief Leader. Whoſe Territory from the States bordering on the Sea, was divided by the River Thames about 80 Mile inward. With him formerly other Cities had continual War; but now in the common Danger had all made choice of him to be their General. Here the Britiſh Horſe and Charioteers meeting with the Roman Cavalry fought ſtoutly; and at firſt, ſomething over-match'd, they retreat to the near Advantage of their Woods and Hills, but ſtill follow'd by the Romans, made head again, cut off the forwardeſt among them, and after ſome pauſe, while Cæſar, who thought the Day's Work had been done, was buſied about the entrenching of his Camp, march out again, give fierce Aſſault to the very Stations of his Guards and Senteries; and while the main Cohorts of two Legions that were ſent to the Alarm, ſtood within a ſmall diſtance of each other, terrify'd at the Newneſs and Boldneſs of their Fight, charg'd back again through the midſt, without Loſs of a Man. Of the Romans that Day was ſlain Quintus Laberius Durus, a Tribune: The Britains having fought their fill at the very Entrance of Cæſar's Camp, and ſuſtain'd the Reſiſtance of his whole Army entrench'd, gave over the Aſſault. Cæſar here acknowledges that the Roman way both of arming and of fighting, was not ſo well fitted againſt this kind of Enemy; for that the Foot in heavy Armour could not follow their cunning Flight, and durſt not by ancient Diſcipline ſtir from their Enſign; and the Horſe alone disjoyn'd from the Legions, againſt a Foe that turn'd ſuddenly upon them, with a mixt Encounter both of Horſe and Foot, were in equal Danger both following and retiring. Beſides their Faſhion was, not in great Bodies, and cloſe Order, but in ſmall Diviſions, and open Diſtances to make their onſet; appointing others at certain Spaces, now to relieve and bring off the weary, now to ſucceed and renew the Conflict; which argu'd no ſmall Experience, and Uſe of Arms. Next Day the Britains afar off upon the Hills begin to ſhew themſelves here and there, and though leſs boldly than before, to ſkirmiſh with the Roman Horſe. But at Noon Cæſar having ſent out three Legions, and all his Horſe with Trebonius the Legate, to ſeek Fodder, ſuddenly on all ſides they ſet upon the Foragers, and charge up after them to the very Legions, and their Standards. The Romans with great Courage beat them back, and in the Chace, being well ſeconded by the Legions, not giving them time either to rally, to ſtand or to deſcend from their Chariots as they were wont, ſlew many. From this Overthrow, the Britains that dwelt farther off, betook them home; and came no more after that time with ſo great a Power againſt Cæſar. Whereof advertis'd, he marches onward to the Frontiers of Caſſibelan, which on this ſide were bounded by the Thames, not paſſable except in one Place, and that difficult, about Coway-Stakes near Oatlands, as is conjectur'd. Hither coming he deſcries on the other ſide great Forces of the Enemy plac'd in good Array; the Bank ſet all with ſharp Stakes, others in the bottom, cover'd with Water; whereof the Marks in Beda's time were to be ſeen as he relates. This having learnt by ſuch as were taken, or had run to him, he firſt commands his Horſe to paſs over, then his Foot, who wading up to the Neck went on ſo reſolutely and ſo faſt, that they on the further ſide not enduring the Violence, retreated and fled. Caſſibelan no more now in hope to contend for Victory, diſmiſſing all but 4000 of thoſe Charioteers, through Woods, and intricate ways attends their Motion; where the Romans are to paſs, drives all before him; and with continual Sallies upon the Horſe, where they leaſt expected, cutting off ſome and terrifying others, compels them ſo cloſe together, as gave them no leave to fetch in Prey or Booty without ill Succeſs. Whereupon Cæſar ſtrictly commanding all not to part from the Legions, had nothing left him in his way but empty Fields and Houſes, which he ſpoil'd and burnt. Mean while the * Trinobantes a State or Kingdom, and perhaps the greateſt then among the Britains, leſs favouring Caſſibelan, ſend Ambaſſadors, and yield to Cæſar upon this Reaſon. Immanuentius had been their King: Him Caſſibelan had ſlain, and purpos'd the like to Mandubratius his Son, whom Oroſius calls Androgorius, Beda Androgius; but the Youth eſcaping by Flight into Gallia, put himſelf under the Protection of Cæſar. Theſe entreat that Mandubratius may be ſtill defended, and ſent home to ſucceed in his Father's Right. Cæſar ſends him, demands forty Hoſtages and Proviſion for his Army,

By their Example the [a] Cenimagni, [b] Segontiaci, [c] Ancalites, [d] Bibroci, [e] Cassi (so I write them for the Modern Names are but gues'd) on like Terms make their Peace. By them he learns that the Town of Cassibelan, suppos'd to be Verulam, was not far distant; fenc'd about with Woods and Marshes, well stuff'd with Men and much Cattle. For Towns then in Britain were only Woody Places ditch'd round, and with a Mud Wall encompass'd against the Inrodes of Enemies. Thither goes Cæsar with his Legions, and though a Place of great Strength both by Art and Nature, assaults it in two Places. The Britains after some Defence, fled out all at another end of the Town; in the Flight many were taken, many slain, and great store of Cattle found there. Cassibelan, for all these Losses, yet deserts not himself; nor was yet his Authority so much impair'd, but that in Kent, though in a manner possess'd by the Enemy, his Messengers and Commands find Obedience enough to raise all the People. By his Direction Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax, four [f] Kings reigning in those Countries which lie upon the Sea, lead them on to assault that Camp wherein the Romans had entrench'd their Shipping: But they whom Cæsar left there, issuing out slew many, and took Prisoners Cingetorix a noted Leader, without Loss of their own. Cassibelan after so many Defeats, mov'd especially by revolt of the Cities from him, their Inconstancy and Falshood one to another, uses Mediation by Comius of Arras to send Embassadors about Treaty of Yielding. Cæsar, who had determin'd to Winter in the Continent, by reason that Gallia was unsettl'd, and not much of the Summer now behind, commands him only Hostages, and what Yearly Tribute the Island should pay to Rome, forbids him to molest the Trinobantes, or Mandubratius; and with his Hostages, and great number of Captives he puts to Sea, having at twice embark'd his whole Army.

Pliny. At his return to Rome, as from a glorious Enterprize, he offers to Venus the Patroness of his Family, a Corslet of British Pearls. Howbeit, other ancient Writers have spoken more doubtfully of Cæsar's Victories here; and that in plain Terms he fled from hence; for which the common Verse in Lucan, with divers Passages here and

Oros. lib. 6. cap. 7. & 9. there in Tacitus is alledg'd. Paulus Orosius, who took what he wrote from a History of Suetonius now lost, writes that Cæsar in his first Journey entertain'd with a sharp Fight, lost no small number of his Foot, and by Tempest nigh all his Horse. Dion affirms that once in the second Expedition all his Foot were routed; Orosius that another time all his Horse. The British Author, whom I use only then when others are all silent, hath many trivial Discourses of Cæsar's being here, which are best omitted. Nor have we more of Cassibelan than what the same Story tells, how he warr'd soon after with Androgeus, about his Nephew slain by Evelinus Nephew to the other; which Business at length compos'd, Cassibelan dies and was buried in York, if the Monmouth Book fable not. But at Cæsar's coming hither, such likeliest were the Britains, as the Writers of those Times and their own Actions represent them, in Courage and warlike Readiness to take Advantage by Ambush or sudden Onset, not inferiour to the Romans, nor Cassibelan to Cæsar, in Weapons, Arms, and the Skill of Encamping, Embatteling, Fortifying overmatch'd; their Weapons were a short Spear and light Target, a Sword also by their side, their Fight sometimes in Chariots phang'd at the Axle with Iron Sithes, their Bodies most part naked, only painted with Woad in sundry Figures to seem terrible as they thought, but pursu'd by Enemies, not nice of their painting to run into Bogs, worse than wild Irish, up to the Neck, and there to stay many Days, holding a certain Morsel in their Mouths no bigger than a Bean, to suffice Hunger; but that Receit, and the Temperance it taught, is long since unknown among us: Their Towns and strong Holds were Spaces of Ground fenc'd about with a Ditch, and great Trees fell'd overthwart each other, their Buildings within were thatch'd Houses for themselves and their Cattle: In Peace, the upland Inhabitants, besides hunting, tended their Flocks and Herds, but with little Skill of Country Affairs; the making of Cheese they commonly knew not, Wool or Flax they spun not, gardening and planting many of them knew not; clothing they had none, but what the Skins of Beasts afforded them, and that not always; yet Gallantry they had, painting their own Skins with several Portraitures of Beast, Bird or Flower, A Vanity which hath not yet left us, remov'd only from the Skin to the Skirt, hebung now with as many colour'd Ribbons and Gewgaws: Toward the Sea-side they till'd the Ground, and liv'd much after the manner of the Gauls their Neighbours, or first Planters: Their Money was brazen Pieces or Iron Rings, their best Merchandize Tin, the rest Trifles of Glass, Ivory, and such like; yet Gems and Pearls they had, saith Mela, in some Rivers: Their Ships of light Timber wickered with Osier between, and cover'd over with Leather, serv'd not therefore to transport them far, and their Commodities were fetch'd away by foreign Merchants: Their dealing, saith Diodorus, plain and simple without Fraud; their civil Government under many Princes and States, not confederate or consulting in common, but mistrustful, and oft-times warring one with the other, which gave them up one by one an easie Conquest to the Romans: Their Religion was govern'd by a sort of Priests or Magicians call'd Druides from the Greek Name of an Oak, which Tree they had in great Reverence, and the Misletoe especially growing thereon; Pliny writes them skill'd in Magick no less than those of Persia: By their abstaining from a Hen, a Hare, and a Goose, from Fish also, saith Dion, and their Opinion of the Soul's passing after Death into other Bodies, they may be thought to have studied Pythagoras; yet Philosophers I cannot call them, reported Men factious and ambitious, contending sometimes about the Arch-priesthood, not without civil War and Slaughter; nor restrain'd they the People under them from a lewd, adulterous and incestuous Life, ten or twelve Men absurdly against Nature, possessing one Woman as their common Wife, though of neares Kin, Mother, Daughter, or Sister; Progenitors not to be glory'd in. But the Gospel, not long after preach'd here, abolish'd such Impurities, and of the Romans

3918. we have cauſe not to ſay much worſe, than that they beat us into ſome Civility; likely elſe to have continu'd longer in a barbarous and ſavage manner of Life. After Julius (for Julius before his Death tyrannouſly had made himſelf Emperor of the Roman Commonwealth, and was ſlain in the Senate for ſo doing) he who next ob-

For about twenty Years after, all which time the Britains had liv'd at their own diſpoſe, Auguſtus in Imitation of his Uncle Julius, either intending, or ſeeming to intend an Expedition hither, was come into Gallia, when the News of a Revolt in Pannonia diverted him: About ſeven Years after in the ſame Reſolution, what with the Unſettl'dneſs of Gallia, and what with Embaſſadors from Britain, which met him there, he proceeded not.

Strabo l. 4. obſequious Addreſſes; inſomuch that the whole Iſland became even in thoſe Days well known to the Romans; too well perhaps for them, who from the Knowledge of us were ſo like to prove Enemies. But as for Tribute, the Britains paid none to Auguſtus, except what eaſie Cuſtoms were levy'd on the ſlight Commodities wherewith they traded into Gallia. After Caſſibelan, Tenantius the younger Son of Lud, according to the Monmouth Story was made King. For Androgeus the Elder, conceiving himſelf generally hated, for ſiding with the Romans, forſook his Claim here, and follow'd Cæſar's Fortune. This King is recorded Juſt and Warlike. His Son Kymbeline or Cunobeline ſucceeding, was brought up, as is ſaid, in the Court of Auguſtus, and with him held friendly Correſpondencies to the end; was a warlike Prince; his chief Seat Camalodunum, or Maldon *, as by certain of his Coins yet to be ſeen, appears [a]. Tiberius the next Emperor, adhering always to the advice of Auguſtus, and of himſelf leſs caring to extend the Bounds of his Empire, fought not the Britains; and they as little to incite him, ſent home courteouſly the Soldiers of Germanicus, that by Shipwrack had been caſt on the Britain Shore. But Caligula his Succeſſor, a wild and diſſolute Tyrant, having paſt the Alps with intent to rob and ſpoil thoſe Provinces, and ſtirr'd up by Adminius the Son of Cunobeline, who by his Father baniſh'd, with a ſmall number fled thither to him, made Semblance of marching toward Britain; but being come to the Ocean, and there behaving himſelf madly and ridiculouſly, went back the ſame way; yet ſent before him boaſting Letters to the Senate, as if all Britain had been yielded to him. Cunobeline now dead, Adminius the Eldeſt by his Father baniſh'd from his Country, and by his own Practice againſt it, from the Crown, though by an old Coin ſeeming to have alſo reign'd; Togodumnus, and Caractacus the two younger, uncertain whether equal or ſubordinate in Power, were advanc'd into his Place. But through civil Diſcord, Bericus (what he was further is not known) with others of his Party flying to Rome, perſwaded Claudius the Emperor to an Invaſion. Claudius now Conſul the third time, and deſirous to do ſomething, whence he might gain the Honour of a Triumph, at the Perſwaſion of theſe Fugitives, whom the Britains demanding, he had deny'd to render, and they for that Cauſe had deny'd further Amity with Rome, makes choice of this Iſland for his Province: And ſends before him Aulus Plautius the Prætor, with this Command, if the Buſineſs grew difficult to give him notice. Plautius with much ado perſwaded the Legions to move out of Gallia, murmuring that now they muſt be put to make War beyond the World's End; for ſo they counted Britain; and what welcome Julius the Dictator found there, doubtleſs they had heard. At laſt prevail'd with, and hoiſting ſail from three ſeveral Ports, leſt their landing ſhould in any one place be reſiſted, meeting croſs Winds, they were caſt back and diſhearten'd: Till in the Night a Meteor ſhooting Flames from the Eaſt, and, as they fanſy'd, directing their Courſe, they took Heart again to try the Sea, and without Oppoſition landed. For the Britains having heard of their Unwillingneſs to come, had been negligent to provide againſt them; and retiring to the Woods and Moors, intended to fruſtrate, and wear them out with delays, as they had ſerv'd Cæſar before. Plautius after much trouble to find them out, encountring firſt with Caractacus, then with Togodumnus, overthrew them; and receiving into Conditions part of the Boduni, who then were ſubject to the Catuellani, and leaving there a Garriſon, went on toward a River; where the Britains not imagining that Plautius without a Bridge could paſs, lay on the further ſide careleſs and ſecure. But he ſending firſt the Germans, whoſe Cuſtom was, arm'd as they were, to ſwim with eaſe the ſtrongeſt Current, commands them to ſtrike eſpecially at the Horſes, whereby the Chariots, wherein conſiſted their chief Art of Fight, became unſerviceable. To ſecond them, he ſent Veſpaſian, who in his latter Days obtain'd the Empire, and Sabinus his Brother; who unexpectedly aſſailing thoſe who were leaſt aware, did much Execution. Yet not for this were the Britains diſmay'd; but re-uniting the next Day fought with ſuch a Courage, as made it hard to decide which way hung the Victory: Till Caius Sidius Geta, at point to have been taken, recover'd himſelf ſo valiantly, as brought the Day on his ſide; for which at Rome he receiv'd high Honours. After this the Britains drew back toward the Mouth of Thames, and acquainted with thoſe Places, croſs'd over, where the Romans following them through Bogs and dangerous Flats, hazarded the Loſs of all. Yet the Germans getting over, and others by a Bridge at ſome place above, fell on them again with ſundry Alarms and great Slaughter; but in the heat of Purſuit running themſelves again into Bogs and Mires, loſt as many of their own. Upon which ill Succeſs, and ſeeing the Britains more enrag'd at the Death of Togodumnus, who in one of theſe Battles had been ſlain: Plautius fearing the worſt, and glad that he could hold what he held, as was enjoyn'd him,

A. D. 43. sends to Claudius. He who waited ready with a huge Preparation, as if not safe enough amidst the Flower of all his Romans, like a great Eastern King with arm'd Elephants, marches through Gallia. So full of peril was this Enterprize esteem'd, as not without all this Equipage, and stranger Terrors than Roman Armies to meet the native and the naked British Valour defending their Country. Join'd with Plautius, who encamping on the Bank of Thames, attended him, he passes the River. The Britains, who had the Courage, but not the wise Conduct of old Cassibelan, laying all Stratagem aside, in downright Manhood scrupled not to affront in open Field almost the whole Power of the Roman Empire. But overcome and vanquish'd, part by force, others by treaty come in and yield. Claudius therefore, who took Camalodunum, the Royal Seat of Cunobeline, was often by his Army saluted Imperator; a Military Title which usually they gave their General after any notable Exploit; but to others not above once in the same War; as if Claudius by these Acts had deserv'd more than the Laws of Rome had provided Honour to reward. Having therefore disarm'd the Britains, but remitted the Confiscation of their Goods, for which they worshipp'd him with Sacrifice and Temple as a God; leaving Plautius to subdue what remain'd, he returns to Rome, from whence he had been absent only six Months, and in Britain but sixteen Days; sending the News before him of his Victories, though in a small part of the Island. To whom the Senate, as for Atchievements of highest Merit, decreed excessive Honours; Arches, Triumphs, Annual Solemnities, and the Sirname of Britannicus both to him and his Son. Suetonius writes, that Claudius found here no Resistance, and that all was done without Stroke: But this seems not probable. The Monmouth Writer names these two Sons of Cunobeline, Guiderius and Arviragus; that Guiderius being slain in fight, Arviragus to conceal it put on his Brother's Habillements, and in his Person held up the Battel to a Victory; the rest, as of Hanio the Roman Captain, Genuissa the Emperor's Daughter, and such like stuff, is too palpably untrue to be worth rehearsing in the midst of Truth. Plautius after this, employing his fresh Forces to conquer on, and quiet the rebelling Countries, found work enough to deserve at his return a kind of Triumphant Riding into the Capitol, side by side with the Emperor. Vespasian [a] also under Plautius had thirty Conflicts with the Enemy; in one of which encompass'd, and in great danger, he was valiantly and piously rescu'd by his Son Titus: Two powerful Nations he subdu'd here, above twenty Towns and the Isle of Wight, for which he received at Rome Triumphal Ornaments, and other great Dignities. For that City in reward of Virtue, was ever magnificent; and long after, when true Merit was ceas'd among them, lest any thing resembling Virtue should want Honour, the same Rewards were yet allow'd to the very Shadow and Ostentation of Merit. Ostorius in the room of Plautius Vice-prætor, met with turbulent Affairs; the Britains not ceasing to vex with Inrodes all those Countries that were yielded to the Romans; and now the more eagerly, supposing that the new General unacquainted with his Army, and on the edge of Winter, would not hastily oppose them. But he weighing that first Events were most available to breed Fear or Contempt, with such cohorts as were next at hand, sets out against them: Whom having routed, so close he follows, as one who meant not to be every Day molested with the Cavils of a slight Peace, or an emboldened Enemy. Lest they should make head again, he disarms whom he suspects; and to surround them, ‖ places many Garrisons upon the Rivers of [b] Antona and Sabrina. But the [c] Iceinians, a stout People, untouch'd yet by these Wars, as having before sought Alliance with the Romans, were the first that brook'd not this. By their Example others rise; and in a chosen place, fenc'd with high Banks of Earth, and narrow Lanes to prevent the Horse, warily Encamp. Ostorius, though yet not strengthen'd with his Legions, causes the Auxiliar Bands, his Troops also alighting, to assault the Rampart. They within, tho' pester'd with their own number, stood to it like Men resolv'd, and in a narrow compass did remarkable Deeds. But over-power'd at last, and others by their success quieted, who till then wavered, Ostorius next bends his Force upon the [d] Cangians, wasting all even to the Sea of Ireland, without Foe in his way, or them who durst ill handl'd: When the [e] Brigantes attempting new matters, drew him back to settle first what was unsecure behind him. They, of whom the chief were punish'd, the rest forgiven, soon gave over; but the Silures, no way tractable, were not to be repress'd without a set War. To further this, Camalodunum was planted with a Colony of Veteran Soldiers to be a firm and ready Aid against Revolts, and a means to teach the Natives Roman Law and Civility. Cogidunus also a British King, their fast Friend, had to the same intent certain Cities given him: A haughty Craft, which the Romans us'd, to make Kings also the servile Agents of enslaving others. But the [f] Silures, hardy of themselves, rely'd more on the Valour of Caractacus; whom many doubtful, many prosperous Successes had made eminent above all that rul'd in Britain. He adding to his Courage Policy; and knowing himself to be of strength inferiour, in other advantages the better; makes the Seat of his War among the [g] Ordovices; a Country wherein all the odds were to his own Party, all the difficulties to his Enemy. The Hills and every Access he fortify'd with Heaps of Stones, and Guards of Men; to come at whom a River of unsafe Passage must be first waded. The place, as Cambden conjectures, had thence the name of [h] Caer-Caradoc, on the West edge of Shropshire. He himself continually went up and down, animating his Officers and Leaders, that This was the Day, This the Field, either to defend their Liberty, or to die free; calling to mind the Names of his glorious Ancestors, who drove Cæsar the Dictator out of Britain, whose Valour hitherto had preserv'd them from bondage, their Wives and Children from dishonour. Inflam'd with these words, they all vow their utmost, with such undaunted Resolution as amaz'd the Roman

General;

A.D. 50. General; but the Soldier leſs weighing, becauſe leſs knowing, clamour'd to be led on againſt any danger. Oſtorius, after wary Circumſpection, bids them paſs the River: The Britains no ſooner had them within reach of their Arrows, Darts and Stones, but ſlew and wounded largely of the Romans. They on the other ſide cloſing their Ranks, and over head cloſing their Targets, threw down the looſe Rampiers of the Britains, and purſue them up the Hills, both light arm'd, and Legions; till what with gauling Darts and heavy Strokes, the Britains who wore neither Helmet nor Cuiraſs to defend them, were at laſt overcome. This the Romans thought a famous Victory; wherein the Wife and Daughter of [a] Caractacus were taken, his Brothers alſo reduc'd to Obedience; himſelf eſcaping to Cartiſmandua Queen of the Brigantes, againſt Faith given, was to the Victors deliver'd bound: Having held out againſt the Romans nine Years, ſaith Tacitus; but by truer computation [b] ſeven. Whereby his Name was up through all the adjoyning Provinces, even to Italy and Rome: Many deſiring to ſee who he was that could withſtand ſo many Years the Romans Puiſſance: And Cæſar, to extol his own Victory, extoll'd the Man whom he had vanquiſh'd. Being brought to Rome, the People, as to a ſolemn Spectacle, were call'd together, the Emperor's Guard ſtood in Arms. In order came firſt the King's Servants, bearing his Trophies, won in other Wars; next, his Brothers, Wife, and Daughter; laſt, himſelf. The Behaviour of others through fear was low and degenerate: He only, neither in Countenance, Word or Action ſubmiſſive, ſtanding at the Tribunal of Claudius, briefly ſpake to this purpoſe: If my Mind, Cæſar, had been as moderate in the highth of Fortune, as my Birth and Dignity was eminent, I might have come a Friend rather than a Captive into this City. Nor could'ſt thou have diſlik'd him for a Confederate, ſo Noble of Deſcent, and Ruling ſo many Nations. My preſent Eſtate, to me diſgraceful, to thee is glorious; I had Riches, Horſes, Arms, and Men; no wonder then if I contended, not to loſe them. But if by Fate, yours only muſt be Empire, then of neceſſity ours among the reſt muſt be Subjection. If I ſooner had been brought to yield, my Misfortune had been leſs notorious, your Conqueſt had been leſs renown'd, and in your ſevereſt determining of me, both will be ſoon forgotten. But if you grant that I ſhall live, by me will live to you for ever that Praiſe which is ſo near divine, the Clemency of a Conqueror. Cæſar mov'd at ſuch a Spectacle of Fortune, but eſpecially at the nobleneſs of his bearing it, gave him pardon, and to all the reſt. They all unbound, ſubmiſſively thank him, and did like reverence to Agrippina the Emperor's Wife, who ſat by in State: A new and diſdained ſight to the Manly Eyes of Romans, a Woman ſitting publick in her Female Pride among Enſigns and Armed Cohorts. To Oſtorius, Triumph is decreed; and his Acts eſteemed equal to theirs that brought in Bonds to Rome famouſeſt Kings. But the ſame proſperity attended not his later Actions here. For the Silures, whether to revenge their loſs of Caractacus, or that they ſaw Oſtorius, as if now all were done, leſs earneſt to reſtrain them, beſet the Prefect of his Camp, left there with Legionary Bands to appoint Garriſons: And had not ſpeedy Aid come in from the neighbouring Holds and Caſtles, had cut them all off; notwithſtanding which, the Præfect with eight Centurions, and many their ſtouteſt Men were ſlain: And upon the neck of this, meeting firſt with Roman Forragers, then with other Troops haſting to their relief, utterly foil'd and broke them alſo. Oſtorius ſending more after, could hardly ſtay their flight; till the weighty Legions coming on, at firſt pois'd the Battel, at length turn'd the Scale; to the Britains without much loſs, for by that time it grew Night. Then was the War ſhivered as it were into ſmall Frays and Bickerings, not unlike ſometimes to ſo many Robberies, in Woods, at Waters, as Chance or Valour, Advice or Raſhneſs led them on, commanded or without command. That which moſt exaſperated the Silures, was a Report of certain Words caſt out by the Emperor, That he would root them out to the very Name. Therefore two Cohorts more of Auxiliars, by the avarice of their Leaders too ſecurely pillaging, they quite intercepted: And beſtowing liberally the Spoils and Captives, whereof they took plenty; drew other Countries to join with them. Theſe Loſſes falling ſo thick upon the Romans, Oſtorius with the thought and anguiſh thereof ended his Days: The Britains rejoicing, although no Battel, that yet adverſe War had worn out ſo great a Soldier. Cæſar in his place ordains Aulus Didius: But ere his coming, tho' much haſten'd, that the Province might not want a Governour; the Silures had given an overthrow to Manlius Valens with his Legion, rumour'd on both ſides greater than was true; by the Silures to amate the new General; by him in a double reſpect, of the more praiſe if he quell'd them, or the more excuſe if he fail'd. Mean time, the Silures forget not to infeſt the Roman Pale with wide Excurſions; till Didius marching out, kept them ſomewhat more within bounds. Nor were they long to ſeek, who after Caractacus ſhould lead them; for next to him, in Worth and Skill of War, Venutius a Prince of the Brigantes merited to be their chief. He at firſt faithful to the Romans, and by them protected, was the Huſband of Cartiſmandua Queen of the Brigantes, himſelf perhaps reigning elſewhere. She who had betray'd Caractacus and her Country to adorn the Triumph of Claudius, thereby grown powerful and gratious with the Romans, preſuming on the Hire of her Treaſon, deſerted her Huſband; and marrying Vellocatus, one of his Squires, confers on him the Kingdom alſo. This Deed, ſo odious and full of Infamy, diſturb'd the whole State: Venutius with other Forces, and the help of her own Subjects, who deteſted the Example of ſo foul a Fact, and withal the uncomelineſs of their Subjection to the Monarchy of a Woman, a piece of Manhood not every Day to be found among Britains, though ſhe had got by ſubtle train his Brother with many of his Kindred into her hands, brought her ſoon below the confidence of being able to reſiſt longer. When imploring the Roman Aid, with much ado, and after many a hard encounter, ſhe eſcap'd the Puniſhment which was ready to have ſeiz'd her. Venutius thus debarr'd the Authority of ruling his own Houſhold, juſtly turns his Anger againſt the Romans themſelves; whoſe Magnanimity, not wont to undertake diſhonourable Cauſes, had arrogantly intermeddled in his domeſtick Affairs, to uphold the Rebellion of an Adultreſs againſt her Huſband.

And

A.D. 54. And the Kingdom he retain'd againſt their utmoſt oppoſition; and of War gave them their fill: Firſt in a ſharp Conflict of uncertain Event, then againſt the Legion of Ceſius Naſica. Inſomuch that Didius growing old, and managing the War by Deputies, had work enough to ſtand on his defence, with the gaining now and then of a ſmall Caſtle. And Nero (for in that part of the Iſle things continu'd in the ſame plight to the Reign of Veſpaſian) was minded but for ſhame to have withdrawn the Roman Forces out of Britain: In other parts whereof, about the ſame time, other things befel. Verannius, whom Nero ſent hither to ſucceed Didius, dying in his firſt Year, ſave a few Inrodes upon the Silures, left only a great Boaſt behind him, That in two Years, had he liv'd, he would have Conquer'd all. But Suetonius Paulinus, who next was ſent hither, eſteem'd a Soldier equal to the beſt in that Age, for two Years together went on proſperouſly; both confirming what was got, and ſubduing onward. At laſt, over-confident of his preſent Actions, and emulating others, of whoſe Deeds he heard from abroad, marches up as far as Mona, the Iſle of Angleſey, a populous place. For they, it ſeems, had both entertain'd Fugitives, and given good aſſiſtance to the reſt that withſtood him. He makes him Boats with flat bottoms, fitted to the Shallows which he expected in that narrow Frith: His Foot ſo paſs'd over, his Horſe waded or ſwom. Thick upon ſhoar ſtood ſeveral groſs Bands of Men well weapon'd, many Women like Furies running to and fro in diſmal Habit, with Hair looſe about their Shoulders, held Torches in their Hands. The Druids, thoſe were their Prieſts, of whom more in another place, with Hands lift up to Heaven, uttering direful Prayers, aſtoniſh'd the Romans; who, at ſo ſtrange a ſight, ſtood in amaze, tho' wounded: At length awak'd, and encourag'd by their General, not to fear a barbarous and lunatick Rout, fall on, and beat them down ſcorch'd and rouling in their own Fire. Then were they yoak'd with Garriſons, and the Places conſecrate to their Bloody Superſtitions deſtroy'd. For whom they took in War they held it lawful to Sacrifice; and by the Entrails of Men us'd Divination. While thus Paulinus had his thought ſtill fix'd before, to go on winning, his back lay broad open to occaſion of loſing more behind. For the Britains urg'd and oppreſs'd with many unſufferable Injuries, had all banded themſelves to a general Revolt. The particular Cauſes are not all written by one Author; Tacitus, who liv'd next thoſe times of any to us extant, writes, that Praſutagus King of the Icenians, abounding in Wealth, had left Cæſar Coheir with his two Daughters; thereby hoping to have ſecur'd from all wrong both his Kingdom and his Houſe; which fell out far otherwiſe. For under colour to overſee and take poſſeſſion of the Emperor's new Inheritance, his Kingdom became a prey to Centurions, his Houſe to ravening Officers, his Wife Boadicea violated with Stripes, his Daughters with Rape, the wealthieſt of his Subjects, as it were by the Will and Teſtament of their King, thrown out of their Eſtates, his Kindred made little better than Slaves. The new Colony alſo at Camalodunum took Houſe or Land from whom they pleas'd, terming them Slaves and Vaſſals; the Soldiers complying with the Colony, out of hope hereafter to uſe the ſame licence themſelves. Moreover the Temple erected to Claudius, as a Badge of their eternal Slavery, ſtood a great Eyeſore; the Prieſts whereof under pretext of what was due to the Religious Service, waſted and imbezzled each Man's Subſtance upon themſelves.

Boadicea Queen of the Britains, Wars with the Romans.

And Catus Decianus, the Procurator, endeavour'd A.D. 63. to bring all their Goods under the compaſs of a new Confiſcation, by diſavowing the Remitment of Claudius. Laſtly, Seneca, in his Books, a Philoſopher, having drawn the Britains unwillingly to borrow of him vaſt Sums upon fair promiſes of eaſie Loan, and for Repayment to take their own time, on a ſudden compels them to pay in all at once with great extortion. Thus provok'd by heavieſt Sufferings, and thus invited by opportunities in the abſence of Paulinus, the Icenians, and by their Example the Trinobantes, and as many elſe as hated Servitude, riſe up in Arms. Of theſe enſuing Troubles many foregoing Signs appear'd: The Image of Victory at Camalodunum fell down of it ſelf, with her Face turn'd as it were to the Britains; certain Women, in a kind of extaſie, foretold of Calamities to come; in the Counſel-houſe were heard by Night barbarous Noiſes; in the Theatre hideous Howlings; in the Creek horrid Sights, betokening the deſtruction of that Colony; hereto the Ocean ſeeming of a Bloody Hew, and Humane Shapes, at a low ebb left imprinted on the Sand, wrought in the Britains new Courage, in the Romans unwonted Fears. Camalodunum, where the Romans had ſeated themſelves to dwell pleaſantly, rather than defenſively, was not fortify'd: Againſt that therefore the Britains make firſt Aſſault. The Soldiers within were not very many. Decianus the Procurator could ſend them but two hundred, thoſe ill Arm'd: And through the Treachery of ſome among them, who ſecretly favour'd the Inſurrection, they had deferr'd both to entrench and to ſend out ſuch as bore not Arms; ſuch as did, flying to the Temple, which on the ſecond Day was forcibly taken, were put all to the Sword, the Temple made a heap, the reſt rifled and burnt. Petilius Cerealis coming to his ſuccour, is in his way met, and overthrown, his whole Legion cut to pieces; he with his Horſe hardly eſcaping to the Roman Camp. Decianus, whoſe rapine was the cauſe of all this, fled into Gallia. But Suetonius at theſe tidings not diſmay'd, through the midſt of his Enemy's Country marches to London (though not term'd a Colony, yet full of Roman Inhabitants, and for the frequency of Trade and other Commodities, a Town even then of principal note) with purpoſe to have made there the Seat of War. But conſidering the ſmallneſs of his numbers, and the late raſhneſs of Petilius, he chooſes rather with the loſs of one Town to ſave the reſt. Nor was he flexible to any Prayers or Weeping of them that beſought him to tarry there; but taking with him ſuch as were willing, gave ſignal to depart; they, who through weakneſs of Sex or Age, or love of the place, went not along, periſh'd by the Enemy; ſo did Verulam, a Roman free Town. For the Britains omitting Forts and Caſtles, flew thither firſt where richeſt Booty, and the hope of pillaging toal'd them on. In this Maſſacre, about ſeventy thouſand Romans, and their Aſſociates, in the places above-mention'd, of a certain, loſt their Lives. None might be ſpar'd, none ranſom'd, but taſted all either a preſent or a lingring Death; no Cruelty that either Outrage, or the inſolence of Succeſs put into their Heads, was left unacted. The Romans Wives and Virgins hang'd up all naked, had their Breaſts cut off, and ſow'd to their Mouths; that in the grimneſs of Death they might ſeem to eat their own Fleſh; while the Britains fell to feaſting and corouſing in the Temple of Andate their Goddeſs of Victory. Suetonius adding to his Legion * other old Officers and Soldiers thereabout, which gather'd to him, were near upon ten thouſand; and purpoſing

A.D. 63. poſing with thoſe not to defer Battel, had choſen a place narrow, and not to be overwing'd on his Rear a Wood; being well inform'd, that his Enemies were all in Front on a Plain unapt for Ambuſh: The Legionaries ſtood thick in order, impal'd with light armed; the Horſe on either Wing. The Britains in Companies and Squadrons were every where ſhouting and ſwarming, ſuch a multitude as at other time never; no leſs reckon'd than two hundred and thirty thouſand, ſo fierce and confident of Victory, that their Wives alſo came in Waggons to ſit and behold the ſport, as they made full account, of killing Romans: A Folly doubtleſs for the ſerious Romans to ſmile at, as a ſure token of proſpering that Day: A Woman alſo was their Commander in chief. For Baodicea and her Daughters ride about in a Chariot, telling the tall Champions, as a great encouragement, that with the Britains it was uſual for Women to be their Leaders. A deal of other fondneſs they put into her Mouth, not worth recital; how ſhe was laſh'd, how her Daughters were handled, things worthier ſilence, retirement, and a Vail, than for a Woman to repeat, as done to her own Perſon, or to hear repeated before an Hoſt of Men. The Greek Hiſtorian ſets her in the Field on a high heap of Turves, in a looſe-body'd Gown declaiming, a Spear in her Hand, a Hare in her Boſom, which after a long Circumlocution ſhe was to let ſlip among them for Luck's ſake; then praying to Andate, the Britiſh Goddeſs, to talk again as fondly as before. And this they do out of a vanity, hoping to embeliſh and ſet out their Hiſtory with the ſtrangeneſs of our Manners; not caring in the mean while to brand us with the rankeſt note of Barbariſm, as if in Britain Women were Men, and Men Women. I affect not ſet Speeches in a Hiſtory, unleſs known for certain to have been ſo ſpoken in effect as they were written; nor then, unleſs worth rehearſal: And to invent ſuch, though eloquently, as ſome Hiſtorians have done, is an abuſe of Poſterity, raiſing, in them that read, other Conceptions of thoſe Times and Perſons than were true. Much leſs therefore do I purpoſe here or elſewhere to copy out tedious Orations without decorum, though in their Authors compos'd ready to my hand. Hitherto what we have heard of Caſſibelan, Togadumnus, Veruſius, and Caractacus, hath been full of Magnanimity, Soberneſs, and Martial Skill: But the truth is, that in this Battel, and whole buſineſs, the Britains never more plainly manifeſted themſelves to be right Barbarians; no Rule, no Foreſight, no Forecaſt, Experience or Eſtimation, either of themſelves, or of their Enemies; ſuch Confuſion, ſuch Impotence, as ſeem'd likeſt not to a War, but to the wild Hurry of a diſtracted Woman, with as mad a Crew at her Heels. Therefore Suetonius contemning their unruly Noiſes, and fierce Looks, heartens his Men but to ſtand cloſe a while, and ſtrike manfully this headleſs Rabble that ſtood neareſt, the reſt would be a Purchaſe rather than a Toil. And ſo it fell out; For the Legion, when they ſaw their time, burſting out like a violent Wedge, quickly broke and diſſipated what oppos'd them; all elſe held only out their Necks to the Slayer, for their own Carts and Waggons were ſo plac'd by themſelves, as left them but little room to eſcape between. The Romans ſlew all; Men, Women, and the very drawing Horſes lay heap'd along the Field, in a gory mixture of Slaughter. About fourſcore thouſand Britains are ſaid to have been A.D. 64. ſlain on the place; of the Enemy ſcarce four hundred, and not many more wounded. Boadicea poyſon'd her ſelf, or, as others ſay, ſicken'd and dy'd. [a] She was of Stature big and tall, of Viſſage grim and ſtern, harſh of Voice, her Hair of bright colour, flowing down to her Hips; ſhe wore a plaited Garment of divers colours, with a great Golden Chain, button'd over all a thick Robe. Gildas calls her the crafty Lioneſs, and leaves an ill Fame upon her Doings. Dion ſets down otherwiſe the Order of this Fight, and that the Field was not won without much difficulty, nor without intention of the Britains to give another Battel, had not the Death of Boadicea come between. Howbeit Suetonius, to preſerve Diſcipline, and to diſpatch the Relicks of War, lodg'd with all his Army in the open Field; which was ſupply'd out of Germany with a thouſand Horſe, and ten thouſand Foot; thence diſpers'd to Winter, and with Incurſions to waſte thoſe Countries that ſtood out. But to the Britains Famine was a worſe Affliction; having left off during this Uproar, to till the Ground, and made reckoning to ſerve themſelves on the Proviſions of their Enemy. Nevertheleſs thoſe Nations, that were yet untam'd, hearing of ſome diſcord riſen between Suetonius and the new Procurator Claſſicianus, were brought but ſlowly to terms of Peace; and the rigour us'd by Suetonius on them that yielded, taught them the better courſe to ſtand on their defence. For it is certain, that Suetonius, though elſe a worthy Man, over-proud of his Victory, gave too much way to his Anger againſt the Britains. Claſſician therefore ſending ſuch word to Rome, that theſe ſevere proceedings would beget an endleſs War; Polycletus, [b] no Roman, but a Courtier, was ſent by Nero to examine how things went. He admoniſhing Suetonius to uſe more mildneſs, aw'd the Army, and to the Britains gave matter of Laughter. Who ſo much even till then were nurs'd up in their Native Liberty, as to wonder that ſo great a General with his whole Army ſhould be at the rebuke and ordering of a Court Servitor. But Suetonius a while after having loſt a few Gallies on the Shoar, was bid reſign his Command to Petronius Turpilianus, who not provoking the Britains, nor by them provok'd, was thought to have pretended the love of Peace to what indeed was his love of Eaſe and Sloth. Trebellius Maximus follow'd his ſteps, uſurping the Name of gentle Government to any remiſneſs or neglect of Diſcipline; which brought in firſt Licence, next Diſobedience into his Camp; incens'd againſt him, partly for his Covetouſneſs, partly by the Incitement of Roſcius Cælius Legate of a Legion; with whom formerly diſagreeing, now that Civil War began in the Empire, he fell to open diſcord; charging him with Diſorder and Sedition, and him Cælius with peeling and defrauding the Legions of their pay; inſomuch that Trebellius hated, and deſerted of the Soldiers, was content a while to govern by a baſe entreaty, and forc'd at length to flie the Land. Which notwithſtanding remain'd in good quiet, govern'd by Cælius, and the other Legate of a Legion, both faithful to Vitellius then Emperor; who ſent hither Vettius Bolanus; under whoſe lenity, though not tainted with other fault, againſt the Britains nothing was done, nor in their own Diſcipline reform'd. Petilius Cerealis [c] by appointment of Veſpaſian ſucceeding, had to do with

A.D. 74. with the populous Brigantes in many Battels, and ſome of thoſe, not unbloody. For as we heard before, it was Venuſius who even to theſe times held them tack, both himſelf remaining to the end unvanquiſh'd. and ſome part of his Country not ſo much as reach'd. It appears alſo by ſeveral Paſſages in the Hiſtories of Tacitus, that no ſmall number of Britiſh Forces were commanded over Sea the Year before to ſerve in thoſe bloody Wars between Otho and Vitellius, Vitellius and Veſpaſian contending for the Empire. To Cerealis ſucceeded Julius Frontinus in the Government of Britain, who by taming the Silures, a People warlike and ſtrongly inhabiting, augmented much his Reputation. But Julius Agricola, [a] whom Veſpaſian in his laſt Year 79. ſent hither, train'd up from his Youth in the Britiſh Wars, extended with Victories the Roman Limit beyond all his Predeceſſors. His coming was in the midſt of Summer; and the Ordovices to welcome the new General, had hew'n in pieces a whole Squadron of Horſe, which lay upon their Bounds, few eſcaping. Agricola, who perceiv'd that the Noiſe of this Defeat had alſo in the Province deſirous of Novelty, ſtir'd up new Expectations, reſolves to be before-hand with the Danger: And drawing together the Choice of his Legions with a competent Number of Auxiliars, not being met by the Ordovices, who kept the Hills, himſelf in the Head of his Men hunts them up and down through difficult Places, almoſt to the final extirpating of that whole Nation. With the ſame current of Succeſs, what Paulinus had left unfiniſh'd he conquers in the Iſle of Mona: For the Iſlanders altogether fearleſs of his approach, whom they knew to have no Shipping, when they ſaw themſelves invaded on a ſudden by the Auxiliars, whoſe Country Uſe had taught them to ſwim over with Horſe and Arms, were compell'd to yield. This gain'd Agricola much Opinion; who at his very Entrance, a time which others beſtow'd of courſe in hearing Complements and Gratulations, had made ſuch early Progreſs into laborious and hardeſt Enterpriſes. But by far not ſo famous was Agricola in bringing War to a ſpeedy end, as in cutting off the Cauſes from whence War ariſes. For he knowing that the end of War was not to make way for Injuries in Peace, began Reformation from his own Houſe; permitted not his Attendants and Followers to ſway, or have to do at all in Publick Affairs: Lays on with Equality the Proportions of Corn and Tribute that were impos'd; takes off Exactions and the Fees of encroaching Officers, heavier than the Tribute it ſelf. For the Countries had been compell'd before, to ſit and wait the opening of publick Granaries, and both to ſell and buy their Corn at what rate the Publicans thought fit; the Pourveyers alſo commanding when they pleas'd to bring it in, not to the neareſt, but ſtill to the remoteſt Places, either by the compounding of ſuch as would be excus'd, or by cauſing a Dearth, where none was, made a particular Gain. Theſe Grievances and the like, he in the time of Peace removing, brought Peace into ſome Credit; which before, ſince the Romans coming, had as 80. ill a Name as War. The Summer following, Titus then Emperor, he ſo continually with Inrodes diſquieted the Enemy over all the Iſle, and after Terror ſo allur'd them with his gentle Demeanour, that many Cities which till that time would not bend, gave Hoſtages, admitted Garriſons, and came in voluntarily. The Winter he ſpent all in worthy Actions; teaching and promoting like a publick Father, the Inſtitutes and Cuſtoms of civil Life. The Inhabitants rude and ſcatter'd, and by that the prone to War, he ſo perſwaded as to build Houſes, Temples, and Seats of Juſtice; and by praiſing the forward, quick'ning the ſlow, aſſiſting all, turn'd the Name of Neceſſity into an Emulation. He caus'd moreover the Noblemens Sons to be bred up in Liberal Arts; and by preferring the Wits of Britain, before the Studies of Gallia, brought them to affect the Latin Eloquence, who before hated the Language. Then were the Roman Faſhions imitated, and the Gown; after a while the Incitements alſo and Materials of Vice, and voluptuous Life, proud Buildings, Baths, and the Elegance of Banqueting; [b] which the fooliſher ſort call'd Civility, but was indeed a ſecret Art to prepare them for Bondage. Spring 81. appearing, he took the Field, and with a proſperous Expedition waſted as far Northward as the Frith of Taus all that obey'd not; with ſuch a Terror, as he went, that the Roman Army, though much hinder'd by tempeſtuous Weather, had the leiſure to build Forts and Caſtles where they pleas'd, none daring to oppoſe them. Beſides, Agricola had this Excellence in him, ſo providently to chuſe his Places where to fortifie, as not another General then alive. No Sconce, or Fortreſs of his raiſing was ever known either to have been forc'd, or yielded up, or quitted. Out of theſe impregnable by Siege, or in that caſe duely reliev'd, with continual Irruptions he ſo prevail'd, that the Enemy, whoſe manner was in Winter to regain, what in Summer he had loſt, was now alike in both Seaſons kept ſhort, and ſtreiten'd. For theſe Exploits then Dion. L.66. eſteem'd ſo great, and honourable, Titus in whoſe Reign they were atchiev'd, was the fifteenth time ſaluted Imperator; and of him Agricola receiv'd Triumphal Honours. The fourth 82. Summer, Domitian then ruling the Empire, he ſpent in ſettling and confirming what the Year before he had travail'd over with a running Conqueſt. And had the Valour of his Soldiers been anſwerable, he had reach'd that Year, as was thought, the utmoſt Bounds of Britain. For Glota, and Bodotria, now Dunbritton, and the Frith of Edinborough; two oppoſite Arms of the Sea, divided only by a Neck of Land, and all the Creeks and Inlets on this ſide, were held by the Romans, and the Enemy driv'n as it were into another Iſland. In his fifth Year he paſs'd 83. over into the Orcades, as we may probably gueſs, and other Scotch Iſles; diſcovering and ſubduing Nations till then unknown. He gain'd alſo with his Forces that part of Britain which faces Ireland, as aiming alſo to conquer that Iſland; where one of the Iriſh Kings driv'n out by Civil Wars, coming to him, he both gladly receiv'd, and retain'd him as againſt a fit time. The Summer 84. enſuing on, miſtruſt that the Nations beyond Bodotria would generally riſe, and forelay the Paſſages by Land, he caus'd his Fleet, making a great ſhew, to bear along the Coaſt, and up the Friths and Harbours; joining moſt commonly at Night on the ſame Shoar both Land and Sea Forces, with mutual Shouts and loud Greetings. At ſight whereof the Britains, not wont to ſee their Sea ſo ridden, were much daunted. Howbeit, the Caledonians with great Preparation, and by Rumor, as of things unknown, much greater, taking Arms, and of their own accord beginning War by the Aſſault of ſundry Caſtles, ſent back ſome of their Fear to the Romans themſelves: And there were of the Com-

Which Advantage the Britains quickly ſpying, and on a ſudden uniting what before they had disjoyn'd, aſſail by Night with all their Forces that part of the Roman Army, which they knew to be the weakeſt; and breaking in upon the Camp ſurpriz'd between Sleep and Fear, had begun ſome Execution. When Agricola, who had learnt what way the Enemies took, and follow'd them with all ſpeed, ſending before him the lighteſt of his Horſe and Foot to charge them behind, the reſt as they came on to affright them with Clamour, ſo ply'd them without reſpite, that by approach of Day the Roman Enſigns glittering all about, had encompaſs'd the Britains: Who now after a ſharp Fight in the very Ports of the Camp, betook them to their wonted refuge, the Woods and Fens, purſu'd a while by the Romans, that Day elſe in all Appearance had ended the War. The Legions reincourag'd by this Event, they alſo now boaſting, who but lately trembl'd, cry all to be led on as far as there was Britiſh Ground. The Britains alſo not acknowledging the Loſs of that Day to Roman Valour, but to the Policy of their Captain, abated nothing of their Stoutneſs, but arming their Youth, conveying their Wives and Children to Places of Safety, in frequent Aſſemblies, and by ſolemn Covenants bound themſelves to mutual Aſſiſtance againſt the Common Enemy. About the ſame time a Cohort of Germans having ſlain their Centurion with other Roman Officers in a Mutiny, and for
Dion. L.66. fear of Puniſhment fled a Shipboard, launch'd forth in three light Gallies without Pilot: And by Tide or Weather carried round about the Coaſt, uſing Piracy where they landed, while their Ships held out, and as their Skill ſerv'd them, with various Fortune, were the firſt Diſcoverers to the Romans that Britain was an Iſland.

85. The following Summer, Agricola having before ſent his Navy to hover on the Coaſt, and with ſundry and uncertain landings to divert and diſunite the Britains, himſelf with a Power beſt appointed for Expedition, wherein alſo were many Britains, whom he had long try'd both valiant and faithful, marches onward to the Mountain Grampius[a], where the Britiſh, above 30000, were now lodg'd, and ſtill increaſing: For neither would their old Men, ſo many as were yet vigorous and luſty, be left at home, long practis'd in War, and every one adorn'd with ſome Badge, or Cogniſance of his Warlike Deeds long ago. Of whom Galgacus[b], both by Birth and Merit the prime Leader, to their Courage, though of it ſelf hot and violent, is by his rough Oratory, in Deteſtation of Servitude and the Roman Yoke, ſaid to have added much more Eagerneſs of Fight; teſtified by their Shouts and barbarous Applauſes. As much did on the other ſide Agricola exhort his Soldiers to Victory and Glory; as much the Soldiers by his firm and well grounded Exhortations were all on a fire to the onſet. But firſt he orders them in this ſort. Of 8000 Auxiliar Foot he makes his middle Ward, on the Wings 3000 Horſe, the Legions as a reſerve, ſtood in array before the Camp; either to ſeize the Victory won without their own Hazard, or to keep up the Battel if it ſhould need. The Britiſh Powers on the Hill ſide, as might beſt ſerve for Shew and Terrour, ſtood in A.D. 85. their Battalions; the firſt on even Ground, the next riſing behind, as the Hill aſcended. The Field between rung with the Noiſe of Horſemen and Chariots ranging up and down. Agricola doubting to be over-wing'd, ſtretches out his Front, though ſomewhat with the thinneſt, inſomuch that many advis'd to bring up the Legions; yet he not altering, alights from his Horſe, and ſtands on foot before the Enſigns. The Fight began aloof, and the Britains had a certain Skill with their broad ſwaſhing Swords and ſhort Bucklers either to ſtrike aſide, or to bear off the Darts of their Enemies; and withal to ſend back Showers of their own. Until Agricola diſcerning that thoſe little Targets and unweildy Glaves ill pointed, would ſoon become ridiculous againſt the thruſt and cloſe, commanded three Batavian Cohorts, and two of the Tungrians exercis'd and arm'd for cloſe Fight, to draw up, and come to handy Strokes. The Batavians, as they were commanded, running in upon them, now with their long Tucks thruſting at the Face, now their piked Targets bearing them down, had made good riddance of them that ſtood below; and for haſt omitting farther Execution, began apace to advance up Hill, ſeconded now by all the other Cohorts. Mean while the Horſe-men fly, the Charioters mix themſelves to fight among the Foot; where many of their Horſe alſo fall'n in diſorderly, were now more a Miſchief to their own, than before a Terror to their Enemies. The Battel was a confus'd Heap; the Ground unequal; Men, Horſes, Chariots crowded pelmel; ſometimes in little room, by and by in large, fighting, ruſhing, felling, over-bearing, over-turning. They on the Hill, which were not yet come to Blows, perceiving the Fewneſs of their Enemies, came down amain; and had enclos'd the Romans unawares behind, but that Agricola with a ſtrong Body of Horſe, which he reſerv'd for ſuch a purpoſe, repell'd them back as faſt: And others drawn off the Front, were commanded to wheel about and charge them on the backs. Then were the Romans clearly Maſters; they follow, they wound, they take, and to take more, kill whom they take: The Britains in whole Troops with Weapons in their hands, one while flying the Purſuer, anon without Weapons deſperately running upon the Slayer. But all of them, when once they got the Woods to their Shelter, with freſh Boldneſs made head again, and the forwardeſt on a ſudden they turn'd and flew, the reſt ſo hamper'd, as had not Agricola, who was every where at hand, ſent out his readieſt Cohorts, with part of his Horſe to alight and ſcowr the Woods, they had receiv'd a foil in the midſt of Victory; but following with a cloſe and orderly Purſuit, the Britains fled again, and were totally ſcatter'd; till Night and Wearineſs ended the Chaſe. And of them that Day 10000 fell; of the Romans 340, among whom Aulus Atticus the Leader of a Cohort; carried with Heat of Youth and the Fierceneſs of his Horſe too far on. The Romans jocond of this Victory, and the Spoil they got, ſpent the Night; the vanquiſhed wandring about the Field, both Men and Women, ſome lamenting, ſome calling their loſt Friends, or carrying off their wounded; others forſaking, ſome burning their own Houſes; and it was certain enough, that there were who with a ſtern Compaſſion laid violent hands on their Wives and Children to prevent

A. D. 85. prevent the more violent hands of hoſtile Injury: Next Day appearing manifeſted more plainly the greatneſs of their loſs receiv'd; every where Silence, Deſolation, Houſes burning afar off, not a Man ſeen, all fled and doubtful whither: Such word the Scouts bringing in from all parts, and the Summer now ſpent, no fit ſeaſon to diſperſe a War, the Roman General leads his Army among the [a] Horeſtians; by whom Hoſtages being given, he commands his Admiral with a ſufficient Navy to ſail round the Coaſt of Britain: Himſelf with ſlow marches, that his delay in paſſing might ſerve to awe thoſe new-conquer'd Nations, beſtows his Army in their Winter-Quarters. The Fleet alſo having fetch'd a proſperous and ſpeedy compaſs about the Iſle, put in at the Haven Trutulenſis, now Richborrow near Sandwich, from whence it firſt ſet out: And now likelieſt, if not two Years before, as was mention'd, the Romans might diſcover and ſubdue the Iſles of Orkney; which others with leſs reaſon following Euſebius and Oroſius, attribute to the Deeds of Claudius. Theſe perpetual Exploits abroad won him wide Fame; with Domitian, under whom great Virtue was as puniſhable as open Crime, won him Hatred. For he maligning the Renown of theſe his Acts, in ſhew decreed him Honours, in ſecret deviſ'd his Ruine. Agricola therefore commanded home for doing too much of what he was ſent to do, left the Province to his Succeſſor quiet and ſecure [b]. Whether he, as is conjectured, were [c] Saluſtius Lucullus, or before him ſome other, for Suetonius only names him Legate of Britain under Domitian; but farther of him, or ought elſe done here until the time of Hadrian, is no where plainly to be found. Some gather by a Preface in Tacitus to the Book of his Hiſtories, that what Agricola won here, was ſoon after by Domitian either through want of Valour loſt, or through Envy neglected. And Juvenal [d] the Poet ſpeaks of Arviragus [e] in theſe Days, and not before, King of Britain: Who ſtood ſo well in his reſiſtance, as not only to be talk'd of at Rome, but to be held matter of a glorious Triumph, if Domitian could take him Captive, or overcome him. Then alſo Claudia Ruſina, the Daughter of a Britain, and Wife of Pudence a Roman Senator, liv'd at Rome; famous by the Verſe of Martial for Beauty, Wit and Learning. The next we hear of Britain, is that when Trajan was Emperor, it revolted, and was ſubdu'd. Under Adrian, Julius Severus, ſaith Dion, govern'd the Iſland, a prime Soldier of that Age, but he being call'd away to ſuppreſs the Jews then in tumult, left things at ſuch paſs, as caus'd the Emperor in Perſon to take a Journey hither; where many things he reform'd, and, as Auguſtus and Tiberius counſell'd, to gird the Empire within moderate bounds, he rais'd a Wall with great Stakes driven in deep, and faſten'd together, in manner of a ſtrong Mound, eighty Mile in length, to divide what was Roman from Barbarian: No ancient Author names the place, but old Inſcriptions, and Ruine it ſelf yet teſtifies where it went along between Solway Frith, by Carliſle, and the Mouth of Tine. Hadrian having quieted the Iſland, took it for honour to be titl'd on his Coin, the Reſtorer of Britain. In his time alſo Priſcus Licinius, as appears by an old Inſcription, was Lieutenant here. Antoninus Pius reigning, the Brigantes ever leaſt patient of foreign Servitude, breaking in upon Genounia (which Cambden gueſſes to be Guinethia or North-Wales) part of the Roman Province, were with the loſs of much territory driven back by Lollius Urbicus, who drew another Wall of Turves, in likelihood much beyond the former, and as Cambden proves, between the Frith of Dunbritton, and of Edenborough, to hedge out Incurſions from the North. And Seius Saturninus, as is collected from the Digeſts, had charge here of the Roman Navy. With like ſucceſs did Marcus Aurelius next Emperor, by his Legate Calphurnius Agricola, finiſh here a new War: Commodius after him obtaining the Empire. In his time, as among ſo many different accounts may ſeem moſt probable, Lucius a ſuppos'd King in ſome part of Britain, the firſt of any King in Europe, that we read of, receiv'd the Chriſtian Faith, and this Nation the firſt by publick Authority profeſs'd it: A high and ſingular Grace from above, if ſincerity and perſeverance went along, otherwiſe an empty boaſt, and to be fear'd the verifying of that true Sentence, the firſt ſhall be laſt. And indeed the Praiſe of this Action is more proper to King Lucius, than common to the Nation; whoſe firſt profeſſing by publick Authority was no real commendation of their true Faith; which had appear'd more ſincere and praiſe-worthy, whether in this or other Nation, firſt profeſs'd without publick Authority, or againſt it, might elſe have been but outward conformity. Lucius in our Monmouth Story is made the ſecond by deſcent from Marius. Marius, the Son of Arviragus, is there ſaid to have overthrown the Picts, then firſt coming out of Scythia, ſlain Rodoric their King; and in ſign of Victory to have ſet up a Monument of Stone in the Country, ſince call'd Weſtmaria; but theſe things have no foundation. Coilus, the Son of Marius, all his Reign, which was juſt and peaceable, holding great amity with the Romans, left it hereditary to Lucius. He (if Beda err not, living near five hundred Years after, yet our antienteſt Author of this report) ſent to Eleutherius, then Biſhop of Rome, an improbable Letter, as ſome of the Contents diſcover, deſiring that by his appointment he and his People might receive Chriſtianity. two

A. D. 181. two Religious Doctors, nam'd in our Chronicles Faganus and Deruvianus, forthwith ſent, are ſaid to have converted and baptiz'd well nigh the whole Nation: Thence Lucius to have had the Sirname of Levermaur, that is to ſay, Great Light. Nor yet then firſt was the Chriſtian Faith here known, but even from the latter Days of Tiberius, as Gildas confidently affirms, taught and propagated, and that as ſome ſay by Simon Zelotes, as others by [a] Joſeph of Arimathea, Barnabas, Paul, Peter, and their prime Diſciples. But of theſe matters, variouſly written and believ'd, Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtorians can beſt determine: As the beſt of them do, with little credit given to the particulars of ſuch uncertain relations. [b] As for Lucius, they write, that after a long Reign he was buried at Gloceſter; but dying without Iſſue, left the Kingdom in great Commotion. By truer teſtimony we find that the greateſt War, which in thoſe days buſy'd Commodus, was in this Iſland. For the Nations Northward, notwithſtanding the Wall rais'd to keep them out, breaking in upon the Roman Province, waſted wide; and both the Army, and the Leader that came againſt them, wholly routed and deſtroy'd; which put the Emperor in ſuch a fear, as to diſpatch hither one of his beſt Com-

183. manders, Ulpius Marcellus. He, a Man endu'd with all Nobleneſs of Mind, frugal, temperate, mild and magnanimous, in War bold and watchful, invincible againſt Lucre, and the aſſault of Bribes, what with his Valour, and theſe his other Virtues, quickly ended this War that look'd ſo dangerous, and had himſelf like to have been ended by the Peace which he brought home, for preſuming to be ſo worthy and ſo good under the envy of ſo worthleſs and ſo bad an Emperor. After whoſe departure the Roman Le-

186. gions fell to Sedition among themſelves; 1500 of them went to Rome in name of the reſt, and were ſo terrible to Commodus himſelf, as that to pleaſe them he put to Death Perennius the Captain of his Guard. Notwithſtanding which compliance they endeavour'd here to ſet up another Emperor againſt him; and Helvius Pertinax [c] who ſucceeded Governour, found it a work ſo difficult to appeaſe them, that once in a mutiny he was left for dead among many ſlain; and was fain at length to ſeek a diſmiſſion from his Charge. After him Clodius Albinus took the Government; but he, for having to the Soldiers made an Oration againſt Monarchy, by the appointment of Commodus was bid reſign to Junius Severus. But Albinus in thoſe troubleſome times enſuing under the ſhort Reign of Pertinax and Didius Julianus, found means to keep in his hands the Government of Britain; although Septimius Severus, who next held the Empire, ſent hither Heraclitus to diſplace him; but in vain, for Albinus, with all the Britiſh Powers, and thoſe of Gallia, met Severus about Lyons in France, and fought a bloody Battel with him for the Empire, though at laſt vanquiſh'd and

193. flain [d]. The Government of Britain, Severus divided between two Deputies; till then one Legate was thought ſufficient; the North he committed to Virius Lupus. Where the Meatæ riſing in Arms, and the Caledonians, though they had promis'd the contrary to Lupus, preparing to defend them, ſo hard beſet, he was compell'd to buy his Peace, and a few of Priſoners with great Sums of Money. But hearing that Severus had now brought to an end his other Wars, he writes him plainly the ſtate of things here, that the Britains of the North made War upon him, broke into the Province, and harraſs'd all the Countries nigh them, that there needed ſuddenly either more aid, or himſelf in perſon. Severus, though now much weaken'd with Age and the Gout, yet deſirous to leave ſome Memorial of his Warlike Achievements here, as he had done in other places, and beſides to withdraw by this means his two Sons [e] from the pleaſures of Rome, and his Soldiers from idleneſs, with a Mighty Power, far ſooner than could be expected, arrives in Britain. The Northern People much daunted with the report of ſo great Forces brought over with him, and yet more preparing, ſend Ambaſſadors to treat of Peace, and to excuſe their former doings. The Emperor now loth to return home without ſome memorable thing, whereby he might aſſume to his other Titles the addition of Britannicus, delays his anſwer, and quickens his preparations; till in the end, when all things were in readineſs to follow them, they are diſmiſs'd without effect. His principal care was to have many Bridges laid over Bogs and rotten Moars, that his Soldiers might have to fight on ſure footing. For it ſeems, through lack of tillage, the Northern parts were then, as Ireland is at this day; and the Inhabitants in like manner wonted to retire, and defend themſelves in ſuch watry places half naked. He alſo being paſt Adrian's Wall, cut down Woods, made way through Hills, faſten'd and fill'd up unſound and plaſhy Fens. Notwithſtanding all this induſtry us'd, the Enemy kept himſelf ſo cunningly within his beſt advantages, and ſeldom appearing, ſo opportunely found his times to make irruption upon the Romans, when they were moſt in ſtraights and difficulties, ſometimes training them on with a few Cattel turn'd out, and drawn within ambuſh, cruelly handling them, that many a time enclos'd in the midſt of Sloughs and Quagmires, they choſe rather themſelves to kill ſuch as were faint and could not ſhift away, than leave them there a prey to the Caledonians. Thus loſt Severus, and by Sickneſs in thoſe noiſome places, no leſs than 50000 Men: And yet deſiſted not, though for weakneſs carry'd in a Litter, till he had march'd through with his Army to the utmoſt Northern verge of the Iſle; and the Britains offering Peace were compell'd to loſe much of their Country, not before ſubject to the Romans. Severus on the Frontiers of what he had firmly conquer'd builds a Wall croſs the Iſland from Sea to Sea; which one Author judges the moſt magnificent of all his other Deeds; and that he thence receiv'd the Stile of Britannicus; in length [f] 132

Miles. Oroſius adds it fortify'd with a deep Trench, and between certain Spaces many Towers, or Battlements. The Place whereof ſome will have to be in Scotland[a], the ſame which Lollius Urbicus had wall'd before. Others affirm it only Hadrian's Work re-edified; both plead Authorities and the ancient Tract yet viſible: But this I leave among the ſtudious of theſe Antiquities to be diſcuſs'd more at large. While Peace held, the Empreſs Julia meeting on a time certain Britiſh Ladies, and diſcourſing with the Wife of Argentocoxus a Caledonian, caſt out a ſcoff againſt the Looſeneſs of our Iſland Women; whoſe manner then was to uſe promiſcuouſly the Company of divers Men. Whom ſtraight the Britiſh Woman boldly thus anſwer'd: Much better do we Britains fulfil the Work of Nature, than you Romans; we with the beſt men accuſtom openly; you with the baſeſt commit private Adulteries. Whether ſhe thought this Anſwer might ſerve to juſtifie the Practice of her Country, as when Vices are compar'd, the greater ſeems to juſtifie the leſs, or whether the Law and Cuſtom wherein ſhe was bred, had wip'd out of her Conſcience the better Dictate of Nature, and not convinc'd her of the Shame; certain it is, that whereas other Nations us'd a Liberty not unnatural for one Man to have many Wives, the Britains altogether as licentious, but more abſurd and prepoſterous in their Licence, had one or many Wives in common among ten or twelve Husbands; and thoſe for the moſt part inceſtuouſly. But no ſooner was Severus return'd into the Province, than the Britains take Arms again. Againſt whom Severus worn out with Labours and Infirmity, ſends Antoninus his eldeſt Son; expreſly commanding him to ſpare neither Sex nor Age. But Antoninus who had his wicked Thoughts taken up with the contriving of his Father's Death, a ſafer Enemy than a Son, did the Britains not much Detriment. Whereat Severus more overcome with Grief than any other Malady, ended his Life at York. After whoſe deceaſe Antoninus Caracalla his impious Son concluding Peace with the Britains, took Hoſtages and departed to Rome. The Conductor of all this Northern War Scottiſh Writers Name Donaldus, he of Monmouth Fulgenius, in the reſt of his Relation nothing worth. From hence the Roman Empire declining apace, good Hiſtorians growing ſcarce, or loſt, have left us little elſe but Fragments for many Years enſuing. Under Gordian the Emperor we find by the Inſcription of an Altar ſtone, that Nonius Philippus govern'd here. Under Galienus we read there was a ſtrong and general Revolt from the Roman Legate. Of the thirty Tyrants which not long after took upon them the Stile of Emperor, by many Coins found among us, Lollianus, Victorinus, Poſthumus, the Tetrici and Marius are conjectured to have riſen or born great ſway in this Iſland. Whence Porphyrius, a Philoſopher, then living, ſaid that Britain was a Soil fruitful of Tyrants; and is noted to be the firſt Author that makes mention of the Scottiſh Nation. While Probus was Emperor, Bonoſus the Son of a Rhetorician, bred up a Spaniard, though by deſcent a Britain, and a matchleſs Drinker, nor much to be blam'd, if, as they write, he were ſtill wiſeſt in his Cups, having attained in Warfare to high Honours, and laſtly in his Charge over the German Shipping, willingly, as was thought, miſcarried, truſting on his Power with the Weſtern Armies, and join'd with Proculus, bore himſelf a while for Emperor; but after a long and bloody Fight at Cullen vanquiſh'd by Probus, he hang'd himſelf, and gave occaſion of a ready Jeſt made on him for his much drinking; Here hangs a Tankard not a Man. After this, Probus with much Wiſdom prevented a new Riſing here in Britain, by the ſevere Loyalty of Victorinus a Moor, at whoſe Entreaty he had plac'd here that Governour which rebelled. For the Emperor upbraiding him with the Diſloyalty of whom he had commended, Victorinus undertaking to ſet all right again, haſtes hither, and finding indeed the Governor to intend Sedition, by ſome Contrivance not mention'd in the Story, ſlew him, whoſe Name ſome imagine to be Cornelius Lelianus. They write alſo that Probus gave leave to the Spaniards, Gauls, and Britains to plant Vines, and to make Wine; and having ſubdu'd the Vandals, and Burgundians in a great Battel, ſent over many of them hither to inhabit, where they did good Service to the Romans when any Inſurrection happen'd in the Iſle. After whom Carus Emperor going againſt the Perſians, left Carinus, one of his Sons, to govern among other Weſtern Provinces this Iſland with Imperial Authority; but him Dioclefian, ſaluted Emperor by the Eaſtern Armies, overcame and ſlew. About which time Caruſius a Man of low Parentage, born in Menapia, about the parts of Cleves and Juliers, who through all Military Degrees was made at length Admiral of the Belgic and Armoric Seas, then much infeſted by the Franks and Saxons, what he took from the Pirates, neither reſtoring to the Owners, nor accounting to the Publick, but enriching himſelf, and yet not ſcowring the Seas, but conniving rather at thoſe Sea Robbers, was grown at length too great a Delinquent to be leſs than an Emperor: For Fear and Guiltineſs in thoſe Days made Emperors ofter than Merit: And underſtanding that Maximianus Herculius, Dioclefian's adopted Son, was come againſt him into Gallia, paſs'd over with the Navy which he had made his own, into Britain, and poſſeſs'd the Iſland. Where he built a new Fleet after the Roman Faſhion, got into his Power the Legion that was left here in Garriſon, other Outlandiſh Cohorts detain'd, liſted the very Merchants and Factors of Gallia, and with the Allurement of Spoil invited great Numbers of other barbarous Nations to his Part, and train'd them to Sea-ſervice, wherein the Romans at that time were grown ſo out of Skill, that Carauſius with his Navy did at Sea what he liſted, robbing on every Coaſt; whereby Maximian, able to come no nearer than the Shoar of Boloigne, was forc'd to conclude a Peace with Carauſius, and yield him Britain; as one fitteſt to guard the Province there againſt Inroads from the North. But not long after having aſſum'd Conſtantius Chlorus to the Dignity of Cæſar, ſent him againſt Carauſius; who in the mean while had made himſelf ſtrong both within the Land and without. Galfred of Monmouth writes that he made the Picts his Confederates; to whom lately come out of Scythia he gave Albany to dwell in: And it is obſerv'd that before his time the Picts are not known to have been any where mention'd, and then firſt by Eumenius a Rhetorician. He repair'd and fortifi'd the Wall of Severus with ſeven Caſtles, and a round Houſe of ſmooth Stone on the Bank of Carron, which River, ſaith Ninnius, was of his Name ſo

In France he held Geſſoriacum, or Boloigne; and all the Franks which had by his Permiſſion ſeated themſelves in Belgia, were at his Devotion. But Paneg. Sigonius. Conſtantius haſting into Gallia, beſieges Boloigne, and with Stones and Timber obſtructing the Port, keeps out all Relief that could be ſent in by Carauſius. Who, e're Conſtantius with the great Fleet which he had prepar'd, could arrive hither [a], was ſlain treacherouſly by Alectus, one of his Friends, who long'd to ſtep into his Place; 292. when he ſeven Years, and worthily, as ſome ſay, as others, tyranically, had rul'd the Iſland. Cambd. ex Nin. Eumen. Pan. 3. So much the more did Conſtantius proſecute that Opportunity, before Alectus could well ſtrengthen his Affairs: and though in ill Weather, putting to Sea with all Urgency from ſeveral Havens to ſpread the Terror of his landing, and the Doubt where to expect him, in a Mift paſſing the Britiſh Fleet unſeen, that lay ſcouting near the Iſle of Wight, no ſooner got aſhoar, but fires his own Ships, to leave no hope of Refuge but in Victory. Alectus alſo, though now much diſmaid, transfers his Fortune to a Battel on the Shoar; but encountred by Aſclepiodotus Captain of the Prætorian Bands, and deſperately ruſhing on, unmindful both of ordering his Men, or bringing them all to fight, ſave the Acceſſories of his Treaſon, and his Outlandiſh Hirelings, is overthrown, and ſlain with little or no Loſs to the Romans, but great Execution on the Franks. His Body was found almoſt naked in the Field, for his Purple Robe he had thrown aſide, leſt it ſhould deſcry him, unwilling to be found. The reſt taking flight to London, and purpoſing with the Pillage of that City to eſcape by Sea, are met by another of the Roman Army, whom the Miſt at Sea disjoining had by chance brought thither, and with a new Slaughter chas'd through all the Streets. The Britains, their Wives alſo and Children, with great Joy go out to meet Conſtantius, as one whom they acknowledge their Deliverer from Bondage and Inſolence. All this ſeems by Eumenius, who then liv'd, and was of Conſtantius's Houſhold, to have been done in the Courſe of one continu'd Action; ſo alſo thinks Sigonius a learned Writer: Though all other allow three Years to the Tyranny of A- Eumen. lectus [b]. In theſe Days were great Store of Workmen, and excellent Builders in this Iſland, whom after the Alteration of things here, the Æduans in Burgundy entertain'd to build their Temples and publick Edifices. Diocleſian having hitherto ſucceſsfully us'd his Valour againſt the Enemies of his Empire, uſes now his Rage in a bloody Perſecution againſt his obedient and Gildas. harmleſs Chriſtian Subjects: From the feeling whereof neither was this Iſland, though moſt remote, far enough remov'd. His Son Conſtantine, who happily came Poſt from Rome to Boloigne juſt about the time, ſaith Eumenius, that his Father was ſetting ſail his laſt time hither, and not long before his Death, was by him on his Death-bed nam'd, and after his Funeral, by the whole Army ſaluted Emperor [d]. There goes a Fame, and that ſeconded by [e] moſt of our own Hiſtorians, though not thoſe the ancienteſt, that Conſtantine was born in this Iſland, his Mother Helena the Daughter of [f] Coilus a Britiſh Prince, not ſure the Father of King Lucius, whoſe Siſter ſhe muſt then be, for that would detect her too old by an Hundred Years to be the Mother of Conſtantine. But to ſalve this Incoherence, another Coilus is feign'd to be then Earl of Colcheſter. To this therefore the Roman Authors give no Teſtimony, except a Paſſage or two in the Panegyrics, about the Senſe whereof much is argu'd: Others near- *Idem vit. Auth. ignot. Euſeb. Howbeit, e're his Departure hence he ſeems to have had ſome Bickerings in the North, which by reaſon of more urgent Affairs compos'd, he paſſes into Gallia; and after four Years returns either to ſettle or to alter the State of things here; until a new War againſt Maxentius call'd him back, leaving Pacatianus his Vicegerent [g]. Somewhat before this time Gratianus Funarius, the Father of Valentinian, afterwards Emperor, had chief Command of thoſe Armies which the Romans kept here. And the Ammian. Arrian Doctrine which then divided Chriſtendom, wrought alſo in this Iſland no ſmall Diſturbance: A Land, ſaith Gildas, greedy of every thing new, ſtedfaſt in nothing. At laſt Conſtantius appointed a Synod of more than 400 Biſhops to aſſemble at Ariminum on the Emperor's charges, which the reſt all refuſing, three only of the Britiſh [i], Poverty

A. D. 353. constraining them, accepted; though the other Bishops among them offer'd to have born their Charges: Esteeming it more honourable to live on the Publick, than to be obnoxious to any private Purse. Doubtless an ingenious Mind, and far above the Presbyters of our Age; who like well to sit in Assembly on the publick Stipend, but like not the Poverty that caus'd these to do so. After this Martinus was Deputy of the Province; who being offended with the Cruelty which Paulus, an Inquisitor sent from Constantius, exercis'd in his enquiry after those Military Officers, who had conspir'd with Magnentius, was himself laid hold on as an accessory; at which enrag'd, he runs at [a]Paulus with his drawn Sword; but failing to kill him, turns it on himself. Next to whom, as may be gues's'd, Alipius was made Deputy. In the mean time Julian, whom Constantius had made Cæsar, having recover'd much Territory about Rhine, where the German inrodes before had long insulted, to relieve those Countries almost ruin'd, causes 800 Pinaces to be built; and with them by frequent Voyages, plenty of Corn to be fetch'd in from Britain; which even then was the usual bounty of this Soil to those parts, as oft as French and Saxon Pirates hinder'd not the transportation. While Constantius yet reign'd, the Scots and Picts breaking in upon the Northern Confines, Julian being at Paris sends over Lupicinus, a well try'd Soldier, but a proud and covetous Man; who with a Power of light-arm'd Herulians, Batavians, and Mœsians, in the midst of Winter sailing from Boloigne, arrives at [b]Rutupiæ, seated on the opposite shoar, and comes to London, to consult there about the War; but soon after was recall'd by Julian, then chosen Emperor. Under whom we read not of ought happening here; only that Palladius, one of his great Officers, was hither banish'd. This Year, Valentinian being Emperor, the [c]Attacots, Picts, and Scots roaving up and down; and last the Saxons, with perpetual Landings and Invasions, harry'd the South Coast of Britain; slew Nectaridius, who govern'd the Sea Borders, and Bulchobaudes with his Forces by an ambush. With which News Valentinian, not a little perplex'd, sends first Severus, High Steward of his House, and soon recalls him; then Jovinus, who intimating the necessity of greater Supplies, he sends at length Theodosius, a Man of try'd Valour and Experience, Father to the first Emperor of that Name. He with selected Numbers out of the Legions and Cohorts, crosses the Sea from Boloigne to Rutupiæ; from whence with the Batavians, Herulians, [d]and other Legions that arriv'd soon after, he marches to London; and dividing his Forces into several Bodies, sets upon the dispers'd and plundering Enemy, laden with spoil; from whom recovering the Booty which they led away, and were forc'd to leave there with their Lives, he restores all to the right Owners, save a small portion to his wearied Soldiers, and enters London victoriously; which, before in many straights and difficulties, was now reviv'd as with a great deliverance. The numerous Enemy, with whom he had to deal, was of different Nations, and the War scatter'd: Which Theodosius, getting daily some intelligence from Fugitives and Prisoners, resolves to carry on by sudden Parties and Surprisals, rather than set Battels; nor omits he to proclaim Indemnity to such as would lay down Arms, and accept of Peace, which brought in many. Yet all this not ending the work, he requires that Civilis, a Man of much uprightness, might be sent him, to be as Deputy of the Island, and Dulcitius a famous Captain. Thus was Theodosius busy'd, besetting with Ambushes the roving Enemy, repressing his Roads, restoring Cities and Castles to their former safety and defence, laying every where the firm foundation of a long Peace, when Valentius [e] a Pannonian for some great offence banish'd into Britain, conspiring with certain Exiles and Soldiers against Theodosius, whose Worth he dreaded as the only obstacle to his greater design of gaining the Isle into his power, is discover'd, and with his chief accomplices deliver'd over to condign Punishment: Against the rest, Theodosius with a wise lenity suffer'd not inquisition to proceed too rigorously, lest the fear thereof appertaining to so many, occasion might arise of new trouble in a time so unsettled. This done, he applies himself to reform things out of order, raises on the Confines many strong Holds; and in them appoints due and diligent Watches; and so reduc'd all things out of danger, that the Province, which but lately was under command of the Enemy, became now wholly Roman, new nam'd Valentia of Valentinian, and the City of London, Augusta. Thus Theodosius nobly acquitting himself in all Affairs, with general applause of the whole Province, accompanied to the Sea-side, returns to Valentinian. Who about five Years after sent hither Fraomarius, a King of the Almans, with authority of a Tribune over his own Country Forces, which then both for number and good service were in high esteem. Against Gratian, who succeeded in the Western Empire, Maximus a Spaniard, and one who had serv'd in the British Wars with younger Theodosius (for he also, either with his Father, or not long after him, seems to have done something in this Island) and now General of the Roman Armies here, either discontented that Theodosius was preferr'd before him to the Empire, or constrain'd by the Soldiers who hated Gratian, assumes the Imperial Purple, and having attain'd Victory against the Scots and Picts, with the Flower and Strength of Britain, passes into France; there slays Gracian, and without much difficulty, the space of five Years, obtains his part of the Empire, overthrown at length and slain by Theodosius. With whom perishing most of his followers, or not returning out of Armorica, [f]which Maximus had given them to possess, the South of Britain by this means exhausted of her Youth, and what there was of Roman Soldiers on the Confines drawn off, became a prey to savage Invasions;

These Virgins are esteem'd Martyrs in the Roman Legends; and Card. Baronius, from no better Authority than Geoffrey of Monmouth, reports the same Story, as if it had been Matter of Fact, though it carries so many Improbabilities with it.

This is spoken by the Author with reference to the Assembly of Divines, who sat with daily Wages.

A. D. 389. of Scots from the Irish Seas, of Saxons from the German, of Picts from the North. Against them, first Chrysanthus the Son of Marcian a Novatian Bishop, made Deputy of Britain by Theodosius, demean'd himself worthily: Then Stilicho, a Man of great Power, whom Theodosius dying left Protector of his Son Honorius, either came in Person, or sending over sufficient aid, repress'd them, and as it seems new fortify'd the Wall against them. But that Legion being call'd away, when the Roman Armies from all parts hasted to relieve Honorius, then besieg'd in Asta of Piemont, by Alaric the Goth, Britain was left expos'd as before to those barbarous Robbers. Lest any wonder how the Scots came to infest Britain from the Irish Sea, it must be understood, that the Scots not many Years before had been driven all out of Britain by Maximus; and their King Eugenius slain in fight, as their own Annals report: Whereby, it seems, wandring up and down, without certain seat, they liv'd by scumming those Seas and Shoars as Pirates. But more Authentick Writers confirm us, that the Scots, whoever they be originally, came first into Ireland, and dwelt there, and nam'd it Scotia, long before the North of Britain took that Name. About this time, though troublesome, Pelagius a Britain found the leisure to bring new and dangerous Opinions into the Church, and is largely writ against by St. Austin. But the Roman Powers which were call'd into Italy, when once the fear of Alaric was over, made return into several Provinces: And perhaps [a] Victorinus of Tolosa, whom Rutilius the Poet much commends, might be then Prefect of the Island; if it were not he whom Stilicho sent hither [b]. Buchanan writes, that endeavouring to reduce the Picts into a Province, he gave the occasion of their calling back Fergusius and the Scots, whom Maximus with their help had quite driven out of the Island: And indeed the Verses of that Poet speak him to have been active in those parts. But the time which is assign'd him later Buchanan after Gratianus Municeps, by Cambden after Constantine the Tyrant, accords not with that which follows in the plain course of History. For the Vandals having broke in

407. and wasted all Belgia, even to those places from whence easiest passage is into Britain, the Roman Forces here, doubting to be suddenly invaded, were all in uproar, and in tumultuous manner set up [c] Marcus, who it may seem was then Deputy. But him not found agreeable to their heady courses, they as hastily kill: For the giddy favour of a mutining rout is as dangerous as their fury. The like they do by Gratian a British Roman, in four Months advanc'd, ador'd, and destroy'd. There was among them a common Soldier, whose name was Constantine, with him on a sudden so taken they are, [d] upon the conceit put in them of a Luckiness in his Name, as without other visible merit to create him Emperor [e]. It fortun'd that the Man had not his Name for nought; so well he knew to lay hold, and make good use of an unexpected offer. He therefore with a waken'd Spirit, to the extent of his Fortune dilating his Mind, which in his mean condition before lay contracted and shrunk up, orders with good advice his Military Affairs: And with the whole Force of the Province, and what of British was able to bear Arms, he passes into France, aspiring at least to an equal share with Honorius in the Empire. Where by the valour of Edobecus a Franck, and Gerontius a Britain, and partly by persuasion gaining all in his way, he comes to Arles. With like felicity 408. by his Son Constans, whom of a Monk he had made a Cæsar, and by the conduct of Gerontius he reduces all Spain to his obedience. But Constans after this displacing Gerontius, the Affairs of Constantine soon went to wrack: For he by this means alienated, set up Maximus one of his 409. Friends against him in Spain; and passing into France took [f] Vienna by assault, and having slain Constans in that City, calls on the Vandals against Constantine; who by him incited, as by him before they had been repress'd, breaking forward, over-run most part of France. But when Constantius comes, the Emperor's General, with a strong Power came out of Italy, Gerontius deserted by his own Forces, retires into Spain; where also growing into contempt with the Soldiers, after his flight out of France, by whom his House in the night was beset, having first with a few of his Servants defended himself valiantly, and slain above 300, though when his Darts and other Weapons were spent, he might have scap'd at a private door, as all his Servants did, not enduring to leave his Wife Nonnichia, whom he lov'd, to the violence of an enraged Crew, he first cuts off the Head of his Friend Alanus, as were agreed; next his Wife, though loth and delaying, yet by her entreated and importun'd, refusing to out-live her Husband, he dispatches: For which her Resolution, Sozomenus an Ecclesiastick Writer gives her high praise, both as a Wife and as a Christian. Last of all, against himself he turns his Sword; but missing the mortal place, with his Ponyard finishes the work. Thus far is pursu'd the Story of a famous Britain, [g] related negligently by our other Historians. As for Constantine, his ending was not answer- 411. able to his setting out: For he with his other Son Julian besieg'd by Constantius in Arles, and mistrusting the change of his wonted success, to save his Head, poorly turns Priest; but that not availing him, is carry'd into Italy, and there put to death; having four Years acted the Emperor. While these things were doing, the Britains at home destitute of Roman aid, and the chief strength of their own Youth, that went first with Maximus, then with Constantine, not returning home, vex'd and haras's'd by their wonted Enemies, had sent Messages to Honorius; but he at that time not being able to defend Rome it self, which the same Year was taken by Alaric, advises them by his Letter to consult how best they

They therefore thus relinquish'd, and by all Right the Government relapsing into their own hands, thenceforth betook themselves to live after their own Laws, defending their Bounds as well as they were able, and the Armoricans, who not long after were call'd the Britains of France, follow'd their Example. Thus expir'd this great Empire of the Romans; first in Britain, soon after in Italy it self: Having born chief Sway in this Island, though never throughly subdu'd, or all at once in Subjection, if we reckon from the coming in of Julius to the taking of Rome by Alaric, in which Year Honorius wrote those Letters of Discharge into Britain, the space of 462 Years[a]. And with the Empire fell also what before in this Western World was chiefly Roman; Learning, Valour, Eloquence, History, Civility, and even Language it self, all these together, as it were, with equal pace diminishing, and decaying. Henceforth we are to steer by another sort of Authors; near enough to the things they write, as in their own Country, if that would serve; in time not much belated, some of equal Age; in Expression barbarous; and to say how judicious, I suspend a while: This we must expect; in civil Matters to find them dubious Relaters, and still to the best Advantage of what they term Holy Church, meaning indeed themselves: In most other Matters of Religion, blind, astonish'd, and struck with Superstition, as with a Planet; in one word, Monks. Yet these Guides, where can be had no better, must be follow'd; in gross it may be true enough; in Circumstance each Man as his Judgment gives him, may reserve his Faith, or bestow it. But so different a State of things requires a several Relation. A. D. 416.

THE History of ENGLAND,

By Mr. JOHN MILTON. Book III.

A. D. 416. THIS Third Book having to tell of Accidents as various and exemplary, as the Intermission or Change of Government hath any where brought forth, may deserve Attention more than common, and repay it with like Benefit to them who can judiciously read: Considering especially that the late Civil Broils had cast us into a Condition not much unlike to what the Britains then were in, when the Imperial Jurisdiction departing hence, left them to the sway of their own Councils; which Times by comparing seriously with these later, and that confused Anarchy with this interreign, we may be able from two such remarkable Turns of State, producing like Events among us, to raise a Knowledge of our selves both great and weighty, by judging hence what kind of Men the Britains generally are in Matters of so high Enterprize, how by Nature, Industry, or Custom fitted to attempt or undergo Matters of so main Consequence: For if it be a high Point of Wisdom in every private Man, much more is it in a Nation to know it self; rather than puft up with vulgar Flatteries, and Encomiums, for want self-knowledge, to enterprise rashly, and come off miserably in great Undertakings. The Britains, thus as we heard, being left without Protection from the Empire, and the Land in a manner emptied of all her Youth, consumed in Wars abroad, or not caring to return Home, themselves through long Subjection, servile in Mind, slothful of Body, and with the Use of Arms unacquainted, sustain'd but ill for many Years the Violence of those barbarous Invaders, who now daily grew upon them. For although at first greedy of Change, and to be thought the leading Nation to Freedom from the Empire, they seem'd a while to bestir them with a Shew of Diligence in their new Affairs, some secretly aspiring to Rule, others adoring the Name of Liberty, yet so soon as they felt by Proof the Weight of what it was to govern well themselves, and what was wanting within them, not Stomack or the Love of Licence, but the Wisdom, the Virtue, the Labour, to use and maintain true Liberty, they soon remitted their Heat, and shrunk more wretchedly under the Burden of their own Liberty, than before under a Foreign Yoke. Insomuch that the residue of those Romans which had planted themselves here, despairing of their ill Deportment at Home, and weak Resistance in the Field, by those few who had the Courage, or the Strength to bear Arms, nine Years after the sacking of Rome remov'd out of Britain into France, hiding for haste great part of their Treasure, which was never after found. And now again the Britains, no longer able to support themselves against the prevailing Enemy, solicit Honorius to their Aid, with mournful Letters, Embassages and Vows of perpetual Subjection to Rome, if the Northern Foe were but repuls'd. He at their request spares them A. D. 416. 418.

But the Material being only Turf, and by the rude Multitude unartificially built up without better Direction, avail'd them little. For no ſooner was the Legion departed, but the greedy Spoilers returning, land in great Numbers from their Boats and Pinaces, waſting, ſlaying, and treading down all before them. Then are Meſſengers again poſted to Rome in lamentable ſort, beſeeching that they would not ſuffer a whole Province to be deſtroy'd, and the Roman Name, ſo honourable yet among them, to become the Subject of Barbarian Scorn and Inſolence. The Emperor, at their ſad Complaint, with what ſpeed was poſſible ſends to their Succour. Who coming ſuddenly on thoſe ravenous Multitudes that minded only Spoil, ſurprize them with a terrible Slaughter. They who eſcap'd, fled back to thoſe Seas, from whence yearly they were wont to arrive, and return laden with Booties. But the Romans, who came not now to rule, but charitably to aid, declaring that it ſtood not longer with the Eaſe of their Affairs to make ſuch laborious Voyages in purſuit of ſo baſe and vagabond Robbers, of whom neither Glory was to be got, nor gain, exhorted them to manage their own Warfare; and to defend like Men their Country, their Wives, their Children, and what was to be dearer than Life, their Liberty, againſt an Enemy not ſtronger than themſelves, if their own Sloth and Cowardice had not made them ſo; if they would but only find hands to graſp defenſive Arms, rather than baſely ſtretch them out to receive Bonds. They gave them alſo their Help to build a new Wall, not of Earth as the former, but of Stone (both at the publick Coſt, and by particular Contributions) traverſing the Iſle in direct Line from Eaſt to Weſt, between certain Cities placed there as Frontiers to bear off the Enemy, where Severus had wall'd once before. They rais'd it twelve Foot high, eight broad. Along the South Shoar[a], becauſe from thence alſo like Hoſtility was fear'd, they place Towers by the Sea-ſide at certain Diſtances, for Safety of the Coaſt. Withal, they inſtruct them in the Art of War, leaving Patterns of their Arms and Weapons behind them; and with animating words, and many Leſſons of Valour to a faint-hearted Audience, bid them finally farewel, without purpoſe to return. And theſe two friendly Expeditions, the laſt of any hither by the Romans, were perform'd, as may be gather'd out of Beda, and Diaconus, the two laſt Years of Honorius. Their Leader, as ſome modernly write, was Gallio of Ravenna; Buchanan, who departs not much from the Fables of his Predeceſſor Boethius, names him Maximianus, and brings againſt him to this Battel Fergus firſt King of Scots after their ſecond ſuppos'd coming into Scotland, Durſtus King of Picts, both there ſlain, and Dioneth an imaginary King of Britain, or Duke of Cornwall, who improbably ſided with them againſt his own Country, hardly eſcaping. With no leſs Exactneſs of particular Circumſtances, he takes upon him to relate all thoſe tumultuary Inrodes of the Scots and Picts into Britain, as if they had but Yeſterday happen'd, their Order of Battel, manner of Fight, Number of Slain, Articles of Peace, things whereof Gildas and Beda are utterly ſilent, Authors to whom the Scotch Writers have none to cite comparable in Antiquity; no more therefore to be believ'd for bare Aſſertions, however quaintly dreſt, than our Geoffrey of Monmouth when he varies moſt from Authentick Story. But either the inbred Vanity of ſome, in that reſpect unworthily call'd Hiſtorians, or the fond Zeal of praiſing their Nations above Truth hath ſo far tranſported them, that where they find nothing faithfully to relate, they fall confidently to invent what they think may either beſt ſet off their Hiſtory, or magnifie their Country. The Scots and Picts in Manners differing ſomewhat from each other, but ſtill unanimous to rob and ſpoil, hearing that the Romans intended not to return, from the Gorroghs, or Leathern Frigats pour out themſelves in Swarms upon the Land, more confident than ever: And from the North end of the Iſle to the very Wall ſide, then firſt took Poſſeſſion as Inhabitants; while the Britains with idle Weapons in their hands ſtand treimbling on the Battlements, till the half-naked Barbarians with their long and formidable Iron Hooks pull them down headlong. The reſt not only quitting the Wall but Towns and Cities, leave them to the bloody Purſuer, who follows killing, waſting, and deſtroying all in his way. From theſe Confuſions aroſe a Famine, and from thence Diſcord and Civil Commotion among the Britains: Each Man living by what he robb'd or took violently from his Neighbour. When all Stores were conſumed and ſpent where Men inhabited, they betook them to the Woods, and liv'd by hunting, which was their only Suſtainment. To the Heaps of theſe Evils from without, were added new Diviſions within the Church. For Agricola the Son of Severianus, a Pelagian Biſhop, had ſpread his Doctrine wide among the Britains not uninfected before. The ſounder part neither willing to embrace his Opinion to the overthrow of Divine Grace, not able to refute him, crave Aſſiſtance from the Churches of France: Who ſend them Germanus Biſhop of Auxerre, and Lupus of Troyes. They by continual preaching in Churches, in Streets, in Fields, and not without Miracles, as is written, confirm'd ſome, regain'd others, and at Verulam in a publick Diſputation put to ſilence their Chief Adverſaries. This Reformation in the Church was believ'd to be the Cauſe of their Succeſs a while after in the Field. For the Saxons and Picts with joynt Force, which was no new thing before the Saxons at leaſt had any dwelling in this Iſland, during this abode of Germanus here, had made a ſtrong Impreſſion from the North. The Britains marching out againſt them, and miſtruſting their own Power, ſend to Germanus and his Colleague, repoſing more in the ſpiritual Strength of thoſe two Men, than in their own Thouſands arm'd. They came, and their Preſence in the Camp was not leſs than if a whole Army had come to ſecond them. It was then the time of Lent, and the People inſtructed by the daily Sermons of theſe two Paſtors, came flocking to receive Baptiſm. There was a Place in the Camp ſet apart as a Church, and trick'd up with Boughs upon Eaſter-Day. The Enemy underſtanding this, and that the Britains were taken up with Religion more than with Feats of Arms, advances, after the Paſchal Feaſt, as to a certain Victory. Germanus, who alſo had Intelligence of their Approach, undertakes to be Captain that Day; and riding out with ſelected

A. D. 430. Troops to discover what Advantages the Place might offer, lights on a Valley compass'd about with Hills, by which the Enemy was to pass. And placing there his Ambush, warns them that what Word they heard him pronounce aloud, the same they should repeat with universal Shout. The Enemy passes on securely, and German thrice aloud cries Halleluia; which answered by the Soldiers with a sudden burst of clamour, is from the Hills and Valleys redoubled. The Saxons and Picts on a sudden supposing it the noise of a huge Host, throw themselves into flight, casting down their Arms, and great numbers of them are drown'd in the River which they had newly pass'd. This Victory, thus won without hands, left to the Britains plenty of Spoil, and to the Person and the Preaching of Germanns greater Authority and Reverence than before. And the exploit might pass for current, if Constantius, the Writer of his Life in the next Age, had resolv'd us how the British Army came to want baptizing; for of any Paganism at that time, or long before in the Land, we read not, or that Pelagianism was re-baptiz'd. The place of this Victory, as is reported, was in Flintshire, by a Town call'd [a] Guid-cruk, and the River Allen, where a Field retains the name of [b] Maes German to this day. But so soon as Germanus was return'd home, the Scots and Picts, though now so many of them Christians, that Palladius a Deacon was ordain'd and sent by Celestine the Pope to be a Bishop over them, were not so well reclaim'd, or not so many of them as to cease from doing mischief to their Neighbours, where they found no impeachment to fall in yearly as they were wont. They therefore of the Britains, who perhaps were not yet wholly ruin'd, in the strongest and South-west parts of the Isle, send Letters to Ætius, then third time Consul of Rome, with this superscription; To Ætius thrice Consul, the Groans of the Britains. And after a few words thus, The Barbarians drive us to the Sea, the Sea drives us back to the Barbarians; thus bandied up and down between two deaths we perish, either by the Sword or by the Sea. But the Empire at that time overspread with Huns and Vandals, was not in condition to lend them aid. Thus rejected and wearied out with continual flying from place to place, but more afflicted with Famine, which then grew outrageous among them, many for hunger yielded to the Enemy, others either more resolute, or less expos'd to wants, keeping within Woods and Mountainous places, not only defended themselves, but sallying out at length gave a stop to the insulting Foe with many seasonable defeats; led by some eminent Person, as may be thought, who exhorted them not to trust in their own strength, but in Divine Assistance. And perhaps no other here is meant than the foresaid deliverance by German, if computation would permit, which Gildas either not much regarded, or might mistake; but that he tarried so long here, the Writers of his Life assent not. Finding therefore such opposition, the Scots or Irish Robbers, for so they are indifferently term'd, without delay get them home. The Picts, as before was mention'd, then first began to settle in the utmost parts of the Island, using now and then to make inrodes upon the Britains. But they in the mean while thus rid of their Enemies, begin afresh to till the Ground; which after cessation yields her fruit in such abundance, as had not formerly been known for many Ages. But Wantonness and Luxury, the wonted companions of Plenty, grow up as fast; and with them, if Gildas deserve belief, all other Vices incident to Humane Corruption. That which he notes especially to be the chief perverting of all good in the Land, and so continued in his days, was the hatred of Truth, and all such as durst appear to vindicate and maintain it. Against them, as against the only disturbers, all the Malice of the Land was bent. Lyes and Falsities, and such as could best invent them, were only in request. Evil was embrac'd for Good, Wickedness honour'd and esteem'd as Virtue. And this Quality their Valour had against a foreign Enemy to be ever backward and heartless; to Civil Broils eager and prompt. In matters of Government, and the search of Truth, weak and shallow; in Falshood and wicked Deeds pregnant and industrious. Pleasing to God, or not pleasing, with them weighed alike; and the worse, most an end, was the weightier. All things were done contrary to publick Welfare and Safety; nor only by secular Men, for the Clergy also, whose Example should have guided others, were as vitious and corrupt. Many of them besotted with continual Drunkenness; or swoll'n with Pride and Wilfulness, full of Contention, full of Envy, indiscreet, incompetent Judges to determine what in the practice of Life is good or evil, what lawful or unlawful. Thus furnish'd with Judgment, and for Manners thus qualify'd both Priest and Lay, they agree to choose them several Kings of their own, as near as might be, likest themselves; and the words of my Author import as much. Kings were anointed, saith he, not of God's Anointing, but such as were cruellest, and soon after as inconsiderately, without examining the Truth, put to Death by their Anointers, to set up others more fierce and proud. As for the Election of their Kings (and that they had not all one Monarch, appears both in Ages past and by the sequel) it began, as nigh as may be guess'd, either this Year or the following, when they saw the Romans had quite deserted their Claim. About which time also Pelagianism again prevailing by means of some few, the British Clergy too weak it seems at dispute, intreat the second time, German to their assistance. Who coming with Severus a Disciple of Lupus that was his former associate, stands not now to argue, for the People generally continu'd right; but enquiring those Authors of new disturbance, adjudges them to Banishment. They therefore by consent of all were deliver'd to German; who carrying them over with him, dispos'd of them in such place, where neither they could infect others, and were themselves under cure of better instruction. But Germanus the same Year dy'd in Italy; and the Britains not long after found themselves again in much perplexity, with no slight rumour that their old troublers the Scots and Picts had prepar'd a strong Invasion, purposing to kill all, and dwell themselves in the Land from end to end. But ere their coming in, as if the instruments of Divine Justice had been at strife, which of them first should destroy a wicked Nation, the Pestilence forestalling the Sword, left scarce alive whom to bury the dead; and for that time, as one Extremity keeps off another, preserv'd the Land from a worse incumbrance of those barbarous Dispossessors, whom the Contagion gave not leave now to enter far. And yet the Britains nothing better'd by these heavy Judgments, the one threaten'd, the other felt,

But they who can remember how Constantine with his Son Constans the Monk, the one made Emperor, the other Cæsar, perish'd in France, may discern the simple fraud of this Fable. But Vortigern however coming to reign, is decipher'd by truer Stories a proud unfortunate Tyrant, and yet of the People much belov'd, because his Vices sorted so well with
449. theirs. For neither was he skill'd in War, nor wise in Counsel, but covetous, lustful, luxurious, and prone to all Vice; wasting the publick Treasure in Gluttony and Riot, careless of the common Danger, and through a haughty Ignorance, unapprehensive of his own. Nevertheless importun'd and awak'd at length, by unusual clamours of the People, he summons a General Council, to provide some better means than heretofore had been us'd against these continual Annoyances from the North. Wherein by advice of all it was determin'd, that the Saxons be invited into Britain against the Scots and Picts; whose breaking in they either shortly expected, or already found they had not strength enough to oppose. The Saxons were a barbarous and heathen Nation, famous for nothing else but Robberies and Cruelties done to all their Neighbours both by Sea and Land; in particular to this Island, witness that military Force which the Roman Emperors maintain'd here purposely against them, under a special Commander, whose Title, as is found on good record, was Count of the Saxon-shoar in Britain; and the many Mischiefs done by their landing here, both alone and with the Picts, as above hath been related, witness as much. They were a People thought by[b] good Writers to be descended of the Sacæ, a kind of Scythian in the North of Asia, thence call'd Sacasons, or Sons of Sacæ, who with a Flood of other Northern Nations came into Europe, toward the declining of the Roman Empire; and using Piracy from Denmark all along these Seas, possess'd at length by intrusion all that Coast of Germany and the Netherlands, which took thence the name of Old Saxony, lying between the Rhine and Elve, and from thence North as far as Fidora, the River bounding Holsatia, tho' not so firmly or so largely, but that their multitude wander'd yet uncertain of habitation. Such Guests as these the Britains resolve now to send for, and entreat into their Houses and Possessions, at whose very Name heretofore they trembled afar off. So much

Or whether it be that Men in the despair of better, imagine fondly a kind of Refuge from one Misery to another. The Britains therefore, with Vortigern, who was then accounted King over them all, resolve in full Council to send Ambassadors to their choicest Men with great Gifts, and saith a Saxon Writer in these words, desiring their aid: Worthy Saxons, hearing the Fame of your Prowess, the distressed Britains wearied out, and overpress'd by a continual invading Enemy, have sent us to beseech your aid. They have a Land fertile and spatious, [c] which to your Commands they bid us surrender. Heretofore we have liv'd with freedom under the obedience and protection of the Roman Empire. Next to them we know none worthier than your selves; and therefore become Suppliants to your Valour. Leave us not below our present Enemies, and to ought by you impos'd, willingly we shall submit. Yet Ethelwerd writes not that they promis'd Subjection, but only Amity and League. They therefore who had chief rule among them, hearing themselves entreated by the Britains to that which gladly they would have wish'd to obtain of them by entreating, to the British Embassy return this answer: Be assur'd henceforth of the Saxons, as of faithful Friends to the Britains, no less ready to stand by them in their Need, than in their best of Fortune. The Ambassadors return joyful, and with News as welcome to their Country, whose sinister Fate had now blinded them for destruction. The Saxons, consulting first their Gods, (for they had answer, that the Land whereto they went, they should hold 300 Years, half that time conquering, and half quietly possessing) furnish out three long Gallies, or Kyules, with a * chosen Company of Warlike Youth, under the Conduct of two Brothers, Hengist and Horsa, descended in the fourth degree from Woden; of whom, deify'd for the fame of his Acts, most Kings of those Nations derive their Pedigree. These, and either mix'd with these, or soon after by themselves, two other Tribes, or neighbouring People, [d] Jutes and [e] Angles, the one from Jutland, the other from Anglen by the City of Sleswich, both Provinces of Denmark, arrive in the first Year of Martian the Greek Emperor, from the Birth of Christ 450, receiv'd with much good will of the People first, then of the King, who after some assurances given and taken, bestows on them the Isle of Tanet, where they first landed, hoping they might be made hereby more eager against the Picts, when they fought as for their own Country, and more loyal to the Britains, from whom they had receiv'd a place to dwell in, which before they wanted. The British Nennius writes, that these Brethren were driven into

And Busbequius in his Epistles writes, that the Inhabitants of the Taurick Chersonese have these words, Wind, Silver, Corn, Salt, Fish, Son, Apple; and forty others in the same signification as they are now in with us. From whence Mr. Cambden in his Remains, p. 22. argues, that our Saxon Progenitors planted their Colonies in the East as well as the West.

[c] I know not how Liberal the Britains might be in this Distress; but if they made such a frank Surrender, 'tis strange why the Saxons (designing to make themselves Masters of the Kingdom) should insist upon the poor pretence of short Diet and bad Pay; and not rather urge the express promise of the Saxon-Ambassadors.

exile out of Germany, and to Vortigern who reign'd in much fear, one while of the Picts, then of the Romans, and Ambrosius came opportunely into the Haven. For it was the custom in old Saxony, when their numerous Off-spring overflow'd the narrowness of their bounds, to send them out by lot into new Dwellings, where-ever they found room, either vacant or to be forc'd. But whether sought, or unsought, they dwelt not here long without Employment. For the Scots and Picts were now come down, some say, as far Stamford in Lincolnshire [a], whom, perhaps not imagining to meet new Opposition, the Saxons, though not till after a sharp Encounter, put to flight; and that more than once: Slaying in Fight, as some Scotch Writers affirm, their King Eugenius the Son of Fergus, Hengist perceiving the Island to be rich and fruitful, but her Princes and other Inhabitants given to vicious Ease, sends word home, inviting others to a Share of his good Success. Who returning with seventeen Ships, were grown up now to a sufficient Army, and entertain'd without Suspicion on these Terms, that they should bear the brunt of War against the Picts, receiving Stipend and some Place to inhabit. With these was brought over the Daughter of Hengist, a Virgin wondrous fair, as is reported, Rowen the British call her: She by Commandment of her Father, who had invited the King to a Banquet, coming in Presence with a Bowl of Wine to welcome him, and to attend on his Cup till the Feast ended, won so much upon his Fancy, though already wiv'd, as to demand her in Marriage upon any Conditions. Hengist at first, though it fell out perhaps according to the drift, held off, excusing his Meanness; then obscurely intimating a Desire and almost a Necessity, by reason of his augmented Numbers, to have his narrow Bounds of Tanet enlarg'd to the Circuit of Kent [b], had it strait by Donation: Though [c] Guorangonus till then was King of that Place: And so, as it were overcome by the great Munificence of Vortigern, gave his Daughter. And still encroaching on the King's Favour, got farther leave to call over Octa and Ebissa, his own and his Brother's Son; pretending that they, if the North were given them, would sit there as a continual Defence against the Scots, while himself guarded the East. They therefore sailing with forty Ships even to the Orcades, and every way curbing the Scots and Picts, possess'd that part of the Isle which is now Northumberland. Notwithstanding this they complain, that their Monthly Pay was grown much into Arrear; which when the Britains found means to satisfie, though alledging withal, that they to whom Promise was made of Wages, were nothing so many in number, quieted with this a while, but still seeking Occasion to fall off, they find fault next, that their Pay is too small for the Danger they undergo, threatning open War unless it be augmented. Guortimer, the King's Son, perceiving his Father and the Kingdom thus betray'd, from that time bends his utmost Endeavour to drive them out. They on the other side making League with the Picts and Scots, and issuing out of Kent, wasted without Resistance almost the whole Land even to the Western Sea, with such a horrid Devastation, that Towns and Colonies overturn'd, Priests and People slain, Temples and Palaces, what with Fire and Sword, lay altogether heaped in one mixt Ruin. Of all which Multitude, so great was the Sinfulness that brought this upon them, Gildas adds that few or none were likely to be other than lew'd and wicked Persons: The residue of these, part overtaken in the Mountains, were slain; others subdu'd with Hunger preferr'd Slavery before instant Death; some getting to Rocks, Hills and Woods inaccessible, preferr'd the Fear and Danger of any Death before the Shame of a secure Slavery; many fled over Sea into other Countries; some into Holland, where yet remain the Ruines of Brittenburgh, an old Castle on the Sea, to be seen at low Water not far from Leiden; either built, as Writers of their own affirm, or seiz'd on by those Britains in their Escape from Hengist: Others into Armorica, peopl'd, as some think, with Britains long before; either by Gift of Constantine the Great, or else of Maximus to those British Forces which had serv'd them in Foreign Wars; to whom those also that miscarried not with the latter Constantine at Arles: And lastly, these Exiles driven out by Saxons, fled for Refuge. But the ancient Chronicles of those Provinces attest their coming thither to be then first when they fled the Saxons, and indeed the Name of Britain in France is not read till after that time [d]. Yet how a sort of Fugitives, who had quitted without Stroke their own Country, should so soon win another, appears not; unless joyn'd to some part of their own settl'd there before. Vortigern nothing better'd by these Calamities, grew at last so obdurate as to commit Incest with his Daughter, tempted or tempting him out of an Ambition to the Crown. For which being censur'd and condemn'd in a great Synod of Clerks and Laicks, and partly for fear of the Saxons, according to the Counsel of his Peers he retir'd into Wales, and built him there a strong Castle in Radnorshire, by the Advice of Ambrosius a young Prophet, whom others call Merlin. Nevertheless Faustus, who was the Son thus incestuously begotten, under the Instructions of German, or some of his Disciples, for German was dead before, prov'd a Religious Man, and liv'd in Devotion by the River Rennis in Glamorganshire. But the Saxons, though finding it so easie to subdue the Isle, with most of their Forces, uncertain for what Cause, return'd home: When as the Easiness of their Conquest might seem rather likely to have call'd in more. Which makes more probable that which the British write of Guortimer. For he coming to Reign, instead of his Father depos'd for Incest, is said to have thrice driv'n and besieg'd the Saxons in the Isle of Taneth; and when they issu'd out with powerful Supplies sent from Saxony, to have fought with them four other Battels, whereof three are nam'd; the first on the River Darwent, the second at Episford, wherein Horsa the Brother of Hengist fell, and on the British part Catigern,

[a] Hengist, in this County, vanquish'd the Scots and Picts, and obtain'd of Vortigern as much Land as he cou'd encompass with with an Ox's Hide cut into very small thongs; from which Treaty, the Town of Thongcaster in Lincolnshire was so call'd.

[b] This, we know, is the common Story: But the Saxon Annals, as they say nothing of Rowena, so they seem to intimate that Hengist got it by Force of Arms; telling us, that he worsted the Britains in two pitch'd Battels; and that, upon this, they quitted Kent, and betook themselves to London.

[c] Mr. Milton calls the Name of this King of Kent, Guerangonus: Whereas Cambden in his Brit. says, The Person who then govern'd Kent, was Vortigern's Vice-Roy, or Guorong.

In the space whereof Guortemir dying, commanded they should bury him in the Port of Stonar; perswaded that his Bones lying there would be Terrour enough to keep the Saxons from ever landing in that place: They, saith Nennius, neglecting his Command, buried him in Lincoln. But concerning these times, antientest Annals of the Saxons relate in this manner. In the Year

455. Bede. Ethelwerd. Florent. Annal. Sax. 455. Hengist and Horsa fought against Vortigern, in a Place call'd Egleſthrip, now Ailsford in Kent; where Horsa lost his Life, of whom Horsted, the Place of his Burial, took Name. After this first Battel and the Death of his Brother, Hengist with his Son Esca took on him Kingly Title, and peopl'd Kent with Jutes; who also then or not long after possess'd the Isle of Wight, and part of Hamshire lying opposite. Two Years after in a Fight at Creganford, or Craford, Hengist and his Son slew of the Britains four Chief Commanders[c], and as many thousand Men: The rest in great Disorder flying to London, with the total Loss of Kent. And eight Years passing between, he made new War on the Britains; of whom in a Battel at Wepped-fleot, twelve Princes were slain, and Wipped the Saxon Earl, who left his Name to that Place, though not sufficient to direct us where it now stands. His last Encounter was at a Place not mention'd, where he gave them such an Overthrow, that flying in great Fear they left the Spoil of all to their Enemies. And these perhaps are the four Battels, according to Nennius, fought by Guortemir, though by these Writers far differently related; and happening, besides many other Bickerings, in the Space of twenty Years, as Malmsbury reckons. Nevertheless it plainly appears that the Saxons, by whomsoever, were put to hard Shifts, being all this while fought withal in Kent, their own allotted Dwelling, and sometimes on the very edge of the Sea, which the word Wippeds-fleot seems to intimate. But Guortemir now dead[d], and none

The King, both for his Wive's Sake and his own Sottishness, consulting also with his Peers not unlike himself, readily yields; and the Place of Parly is agreed on; to which either side was to repair without Weapons. Hengist, whose meaning was not Peace but Treachery, appointed his Men to be secretly arm'd, and acquainted them to what

Malmsb. intent. The Watch-word was Nemet eour Saxes, that is, Draw your Daggers; which they observing, when the Britains were throughly heated with Wine (for the Treaty it seems was not without Cups) and provok'd, as was plotted, by some Affront, dispatch'd with those Poinards every one his next Man, to the number of 200, the chief of those that could do ought against him either in Counsel or in Field. Vortigern they only bound and kept in Custody, until he granted them for his Ransom three Provinces, which were called afterward Essex, Sussex, and Middlesex[e]. Who thus dismist, retiring again to his solitary abode in his Country of Guorthigirniaun[f], so call'd by his Name, from thence to the Castle of his own building in North-Wales by the River Tiebi; and living there obscurely among his Wives, was at length burnt in his Tower by Fire from Heaven, at the Prayer, as some say, of German, but that coheres not; as others, Nin. ex legend. St. Ger. Galfrid. Monmouth. by Ambrosius Aurelian; of whom as we have heard at first, he stood in great Fear, and partly for that Cause invited in the Saxons. Who whether by constraint, or of their own accord, after much Mischief done, most of them returning back into their own Country, left a fair Opportunity to the Britains of revenging themselves the easier on those that staid behind. Repenting therefore, and with earnest Supplication imploring divine Help to prevent their final rooting out, they gather from all parts, and under the leading of Ambrosius Aurelianus, a vertuous and modest Man, the last here of Roman Stock, advancing now onward against the late Victors, defeat them in a memorable Battel. Common Opinion, but grounded chiefly on the British Fables, makes this Ambrosius to be a younger Son of that Constantine, whose eldest, as we heard, was Constance the Monk: Who both lost their Lives abroad usurping the Empire. But the express Words both of Gildas and Bede, assures us that the Parents of this Ambrosius having here born Regal Dignity, were slain in these Pictish Wars and Commotions in the Island. And if the Fear of Ambrose induc'd Vortigern to call in the Saxons, it seems Vortigern usurp'd his Right. I perceive not that Nennius makes any Difference between him and Merlin: For that Child without Father that prophecy'd to Vortigern, he names not Merlin but Ambrose, makes him the Son of a Roman Consul; but conceal'd by his Mother, as fearing that the King therefore sought his Life; yet the Youth no sooner had confess'd his Parentage, but Vortigern either in Reward of his Predictions, or as his right, bestow'd upon him all the West of Britain; himself retiring to a solitary Life. Whose ever Son he was, he was Gild. the first, according to surest Authors, that led Bede. against the Saxons, and overthrew them; but whether before this time or after, none have written. This is certain, that in a time when most of the Saxon Forces were departed home, the Britains gather'd Strength; and either against those who were left remaining, or against their whole Powers, the second time returning obtain'd this Victory[g]. Thus Ambrose as Chief Monarch

A. D. 527. not seldomer than the Britains. For besides that first Victory of Ambrose, and the interchangeable success long after, he tells that the last overthrow which they receiv'd at Badon-Hill was not the least; which they in their oldest Annals mention not at all. And because the time of this Battel, by any who could do more than guess, is not set down, or any foundation given from whence to draw a solid compute, it cannot be much wide to insert it in this place. For such Authors as we have to follow give the Conduct and Praise of this Exploit to Arthur; and that this was the last of twelve great Battels which he fought victoriously against the Saxons. Nenn. The several places written by Nennius in their Welsh Names, were many hundred Years ago unknown, and so here omitted. But who Arthur was, and whether ever any such reign'd in Britain, hath been doubted heretofore, and may again with good reason[a]. For the Monk of Malmsbury, and others whose Credit hath sway'd most with the learneder sort, we may well perceive to have known no more of this Arthur five hundred Years past, nor of his Doings, than we now living: And what they had to say, transcrib'd out of Nennius, a very trivial Writer yet extant, which hath already been related. Or out of a British Book, the same which he of Monmouth set forth, utterly unknown to the World till more than six hundred Years after the Days of Arthur, of whom (as Sigebert in his Chronicle confesses) all other Histories were silent, both foreign and domestick, except only that fabulous Book. Others of later time have sought to assert him by old Legends and Cathedral Regests. But he who can accept of Legends for good Story, may quickly swell a Volume with Trash, and had need be furnish'd with two only necessaries, Leisure and Belief, whether it be the Writer, or he that shall read. As to Artur, no less is in doubt who was his Father; for if it be true, as Nennius or his Notist avers, that Artur was call'd Mab-Uther, that is to say, a cruel Son, for the fierceness that Men saw in him of a Child, and the intent of his name Arturus imports as much, it might well be that some in after-Ages, who sought to turn him into a Fable, wrested the word Uther into a proper Name, and so fain'd him the Son of Uther; since we read not in any certain Story, that ever such Person liv'd, till Geoffrey of Monmouth set him off with the surname of Pendragon. And as we doubted of his Parentage, so may we also of his Puissance; for whether that Victory at Baden-Hill were his or no, is uncertain; Gildas not naming him, as he did Ambrose in the former. Next, if it be true as Caradoc relates, that Melvas King of that Country, which is now Summerset, kept from him Gueniver his Wife a whole Year in the Town of Glaston, and restor'd her at the entreaty of Gildas, rather than for any enforcement that Artur with all his Chivalry could make against a small Town, defended only by a moory situation; had either his knowledge in War, or the force he had to make, been answerable to the fame they bear, that petty King had neither dar'd such an affront, nor he been so long, and at last without effect, in revenging it. Considering, lastly, how the Saxons gain'd upon him every where all the time of his suppos'd Reign, which began, as some write, in the tenth Year of Kerdic, who wrung from him by long War the Countries of Summerset and Hamshire; there will remain neither Place nor Circumstance in Story, which may administer any likelihood of those great Acts that are ascribed him. This only is alledg'd by Nennius in Artur's behalf, that the Saxons, tho' vanquish'd never so oft, grew still more numerous upon him by continual supplies out of Germany. And the truth is, that Valour may be over-toil'd, and overcome at last with endless overcoming. But as for this Battel of Mount Baden, where the Saxons were hemm'd in, or besieg'd, whether by Arthur won, or whensoever, it seems indeed to have given a most undoubted and important blow to the Saxons, and to have stopp'd their proceedings for a good while after. Gildas himself witnessing that the Britains having thus compell'd them to sit down with peace, fell thereupon to civil discord among themselves. Which words may seem to let in some light toward the searching out when this Battel was fought. And we shall find no time since the first Saxon War, from whence a longer Peace ensu'd, than from the Fight of Kerdics-League in the Year 527. which all the Chronicles mention, without Victory to Kerdic; and gave us argument, from the custom they have of magnifying their own Deeds upon all occasions, to presume here his ill speeding. And if we look still onward, even to the 44th Year after, wherein Gildas wrote, if his obscure utterance be understood, we shall meet with very little War between the Britains and Saxons. This only remains difficult, that the Victory first won by Ambrose was not so long before this at Baden Siege, but that the same Men living might be Eye-witnesses of both; and by this rate hardly can the latter be thought won by Artur, unless we reckon him a grown Youth at least in the days of Ambrose, and much more than a Youth, if Malmsbury be heard, who affirms all the Exploits of Ambrose to have been done chiefly by Artur as his General, which will add much unbelief to the common assertion of his reigning after Ambrose and Uther, especially the Fight at Badon being the last of his twelve Battels[b]. But to prove by that which follows, that the Fight at Kerdics-League, though it differ in name from that of Badon, may be thought the same by all effects; Kerdic three Years after, not proceeding onward, as his manner was, on the Continent, turns back his Forces on the Isle of Wight, which with the slaying of a few only in [c]Withgarburgh, he soon masters; and not long surviving, left it to his Nephews by the Mother's side, Stuff and Withgar; the rest of what he had subdu'd, Kenric his Son held, and reign'd 26 Years, in whose tenth Year Withgar was bury'd in the Town of that Island which bore his Name. Notwithstanding all these unlikelihoods of Artur's Reign and great Atchievements, in a narration crept in I know not how among the Laws of Edward the Confessor, Artur the famous King of Britains, is said not only to have expell'd hence the Saracens,

When should this be done? From the Saxons, till after twelve Battels, he had no rest at home; after those, the Britains conteited with the Quiet they had from the Saxon Enemies, were so far from seeking Conquests abroad, that by report of Gildas above cited, they fell to Civil Wars at home. Surely Artur much better had made War in old Saxony, to repress their flowing hither, than to have won Kingdoms as far as Russia, scarce able here to defend his own. Buchanan our Neighbour Historian repreheids him of Monmouth and others for fabling in the Deeds of Artur, yet what he writes thereof himself, as of better Credit, shews not whence he had but from those Fables; which he seems content to believe in part, on condition that the Scots and Picts may be thought to have assisted Arthur in all his Wars and Atchievements, whereof appears as little Ground by any credible Story, as of that which he most counts Fabulous. 560. Annal. Florent. The Kingdom of the Northumbers divided into two Monarchies, Bernicia and Deira. by another Line, set up a second Kingdom in Deira the South part of Northumberland, and held it thirty Years; while Adda the Son of Ida, and five more after him reign'd without other Memory in Bernicia: And in Kent, Ethelbert the next Year began. For Esca the Son of Hengist had left Otha, and he Emeric to Rule after

561. him; both which without adding to their Bounds, kept what they had in Peace fifty three Years. But Ethelbert in length of Reign equall'd both his Progenitors, and as Beda counts, three Years

Malmsb. exceeded. Young at his first Entrance, and unexperienc'd, he was the first Raiser of Civil War among the Saxons; claiming from the Priority of time wherein Hengist took Possession here, a kind of Right over the later Kingdoms; and thereupon was troublesome to their Confines: But by them twice defeated, he who but now thought to seem dreadful, became almost contemptible. For Ceaulin and Cutha his Son, pursuing him into his own Territory, shew there in Battel, at Wibbandun, two of his Earls, Oslac, and Cnebban. By this means the Britains, but chiefly by this Victory at Badon, for the space of forty four Years ending in 571, receiv'd no great Annoyance from the Saxons: But the Peace they enjoy'd, by ill using it, prov'd more destructive to them than War. For being rais'd on a sudden by two such eminent Successes, from the lowest Condition of Thraldom, they whose Eyes had beheld both those Deliverances, that by Ambrose, and this at Badon, were taught by the Experience of either Fortune, both Kings, Magistrates, Priests, and private Men, to live orderly. But when the next Age, unacquainted Gildas. with past Evils, and only sensible of their present Ease and Quiet, succeeded, strait follow'd the apparent Subversion of all Truth, and Justice, in the Minds of most Men: Scarce the least Footstep, or Impression of Goodness left remaining through all Ranks and Degrees in the Land; except in some so very few, as to be hardly visible in a general Corruption: which grew in short space not only manifest, but odious to all the Neighbour Nations. And first their Kings, among whom also, the Sons or Grand-Children of Ambrose, were foully degenerated to all Tyranny and Vitious Life. Whereof to hear some Particulars out of Gildas will not be impertinent. They avenge, saith he, and they protect; not the innocent, but the guilty: They swear oft, but perjure; they wage War, but civil and unjust War. They punish rigorously them that rob by the high Way; but those grand Robbers that sit with them at Table, they honour and reward. They give Alms largely, but in the Face of their Alms-deeds, pile up Wickedness to a far higher Heap. They sit in the seat of Judgment, but go seldom by the Rule of Right; neglecting and proudly overlooking the modest and harmless; but countenancing the audacious, though guilty of abominablest Crimes; they stuff their Prisons, but with Men committed rather by Circumvention, than any just Cause. Nothing better were the Clergy, but at the same pass or rather worse, than when the Saxons came first in; unlearned, unapprehensive, yet impudent; subtle Prowlers, Pastors in Name, but indeed Wolves; intent upon all Occasions, not to feed the Flock, but to pamper and well line themselves: Not call'd, but seising on the Ministry as a Trade, not as a Spiritual Charge: Teaching the People, not by sound Doctrine, but by evil Example: Usurping the Chair of Peter, but through the Blindness of their own Worldly Lusts, they stumble upon the Seat of Judas: Deadly Haters of Truth, Broachers of Lies: Looking on the poor Christian with Eyes of Pride and Contempt; but fawning on the wickedest rich Men without Shame: Great Promoters of other Men Alms with their set Exhortations; but themselves contributing ever least; slightly touching the many Vices of the Age, but preaching without end their own Grievances, as done to Christ; seeking after Preferments and Degrees in the Church more than after Heav'n; and so gain'd, make it their whole Study how to keep them by any Tyranny. Yet lest they should be thought things of no Use in their eminent Places, they have their Niceties and trivial Points to keep in awe the superstitious Multitude; but in true saving Knowledge leave them still as gross and stupid as themselves; Bunglers at the Scripture, nay forbidding and silencing them that know; but in Worldly Matters, practis'd and cunning Shifters; in that only Art and Simony, great Clerks and Masters, bearing their Heads high, but their Thoughts abject and low. He taxes them also as gluttonous, incontinent, and daily Drunkards. And what shouldst thou expect from these, poor Laity, so he goes on, these Beasts, all Belly? Shall these amend thee, who are themselves laborious in evil Doings? Shalt thou see with their Eyes, who see right forward nothing but Gain? Leave them rather, as bids our Saviour, lest ye fall both blind-fold into the same Perdition. Are all thus? Perhaps not all, or not so grosly. But what avail'd it Eli to be himself blameless, while he conniv'd at others that were abominable? Who of them hath been envy'd for his better Life? Who of them hath hated to consort with these, or withstood their entering the Ministry, or endeavour'd zealously their casting out? Yet some of these perhaps by others are legended for great Saints. This was the State of Government, this of Religion among the Britains, in that long Calm of Peace, which the Fight at Badon Hill had brought forth. Whereby it came to pass, that so fair a Victory came to nothing. Towns and Cities were not reinhabited, but lay ruin'd and waste; nor was it long e're Domestick War breaking out, wasted them more. For Britain, as at other times, had then also several Kings. Five of whom Gildas living then in Armorica, at a safe Distance, boldly reproves by Name; First Constantine (fabl'd the Son of Cador, Duke of Cornwall, Artur's half Brother by the Mother's Side) who then reign'd in Cornwall and Devon, a Tyrannical and Bloody King, polluted also with many Adulteries: He got into his Power, two young Princes of the Blood Royal, uncertain whether before him in Right, or otherwise suspected: And after solemn Oath given of their Safety, the Year that Gildas wrote, slew them with their two Governours in the Church, and in their Mother's Arms, through the Abbot's Cope, which he had thrown over them, thinking by the Reverence of his Vesture to have with-held the Murtherer. These are commonly suppos'd to be the Sons of Mordred, Artur's Nephew, said to have revolted from his Uncle, given him in a Battel his Death's Wound, and by him after to have been slain. Which things were they true, would much diminish the Blame of Cruelty in Constantine, revenging Artur on the Sons of so false a Mordred. In another part, but not express'd where, Aurelius Conianus was King: Him he charges also with Adulteries, and Parricide; Cruelties worse than the former; to be a Hater of his Countries Peace, thirsting after Civil War and Prey: His Condition, it seems, was not very prosperous; for Gildas wishes him, being now left alone, like a Tree withering in the midst of a barren Field, to remember the Vanity, and Arrogance of his Father, and elder Brethren, who came all to untimely Death in their Youth. The third reigning in Demetia, or South Wales, was Vortipor, the Son of a good Father; he was when Gildas wrote, grown old, not in Years only, but in Adulteries, and in governing full of Falshood, and cruel Actions. In his latter Days, putting away his Wife, who dy'd in Divorce, he became, if we mistake not Gildas, incestuous with his Daughter. The fourth was Cuneglas, imbru'd in Civil War; he also had divorc'd his Wife, and taken her Sister, who had vow'd Widowhood: He was a great Enemy to the Clergy, high-minded, and trusting to his Wealth. The last but greatest of all in Power, was Maglocune, and greatest also in Wickedness; he had driv'n out or slain many other Kings, or Tyrants; and was called the Island Dragon, perhaps having his Seat in Anglesey; a profuse Giver, a great Warrior, and of a goodly Stature. While he was yet young, he overthrew his Uncle, though in the Head of a compleat Army, and took from him the Kingdom: Then touch'd with Remorse of his Doings, not without Deliberation took upon him the Profession of a Monk; but soon forsook his Vow, and his Wife also, which for that Vow he had left, making Love to the Wife of his Brother's Son then living. Who not refusing the Offer, if she were not rather the first that entic'd, found means both to dispatch her own Husband, and the former Wife of Maglocune, to make her Marriage with him the more unquestionable. Neither did he this for want of better Instructions, having had the learnedest and wisest Man reputed of all Britain, the Instituter of his Youth. Thus much, the utmost that can be learnt by truer Story, of what past among the Britains from the time of their useless Victory at Badon, to the time that Gildas wrote, that is to say, as may be guess'd, from 527 to 571, is here set down all together; not to be reduc'd under any Certainty of Years. But now the Saxons, who for the most part all this while had been still, unless among themselves, began afresh to assault them, and e're long to drive them out of all which they yet maintain'd on this side Wales. For Cuthulf the Brother of Keaulin, by a Victory obtain'd at Bedanford, now Bedford took from them four good Towns, [a] Liganburgh, * Eglesburgh, Besington, now Benson in Oxfordshire, and † Igneham; but outliv'd not many Months his good Success [b]. And after six Years more, Keaulin, and Cuthwin his Son, gave them a great Overthrow at Deorrham in Glocestershire, slew three of their Kings, Comail, Condidan, and Farinmail, and took three of their chief Cities; Glocester, Cirencester, and Badencester. The Britains notwithstanding, after some space of time, judging to have out-grown their Losses, gather to a head, and encounter Keaulin with Cutha his Son, at Fethanleage; whom valiantly fighting, they slew among the thickest, and as is said, forc'd the Saxons to retire. But Keaulin reinforcing the Fight, put them to a main Rout, and following his Advantage, took many Towns, and return'd laden with rich Booty. The last of those Saxons who rais'd their own Atchievements to a Monarchy, was Crida, much about this time [c], first Founder of the Mercian Kingdom, drawing also his Pedigree from Woden. Of whom all to write the several Genealogies, though it might be done without long search, were, in my Opinion, to encumber the Story with a sort of barbarous Names, to little purpose. This may suffice, that of Woden's three Sons, from the Eldest issu'd Hengist, and his Succession; from the second, the Kings of Mercia; from the third, all that Reign'd in West-Saxon, and most of the Northumbers, of whom

A. D. 584. Florent. ad ann.

Alla was one, the first King of Deira; which after his Death, the Race of Ida seiz'd, and made it one Kingdom with Bernicia, usurping on the Childhood of Edwin, Alla's Son, whom Ethelric the Son of Ida expell'd. Notwithstanding others write of him; that from a poor Life, and beyond hope in his old Age, coming to the Crown, he could hardly by the access of a Kingdom, have overcome his former obscurity, had not the fame of his Son preserv'd him. Once more the Britains, e're they quitted all on this side the Mountains, forgot not to shew some Manhood; for meeting Keaulin at Wodens Beorth, that is to say, [a] Wodens Mount in Wiltshire, whether it were by their own Forces, or assisted by the Angles, whose hatred Keaulin had incurr'd, they ruin'd his whole Army, and chas'd him out of his Kingdom, from whence flying, he dy'd the next Year in Poverty, who a little before was the most Potent and indeed Sole King of all the Saxons on this side Humber. But who was chief among the Britains in this Exploit had been worth remembring, whether it were Maglocune, of whose Prowess hath been spoken, or Teudric King of Glamorgan, whom the Regest of Landaff recounts to have been always Victorious in Fight; to have Reign'd about this time, and at length to have exchanged his Crown for a Hermitage; till in the aid of his Son Mouric, whom the Saxons had reduc'd to extremes, taking Arms again, he defeated them at Tinterne by the River Wye; but himself receiv'd a mortal wound. The same Year with Keaulin, whom Keola the Son of Cuthulf, Keaulin's Brother succeeded, Crida also the Mercian King deceas'd, in whose room Wibba succeeded; and in Northumberland, Ethelfred in the room of Ethelric, Reigning twenty four Years. Thus omitting Fables, we have the view of what with reason can be rely'd on for truth, done in Britain, since the Romans forsook it. Wherein we have heard the many Miseries and Desolations brought by Divine Hand on a perverse Nation; driven, when nothing else would reform them, out of a fair Country, into a Mountanous and Barren Corner [b], by Strangers and Pagans. So much more tolerable in the Eye of Heaven is Infidelity profess'd, than Christian Faith and Religion dishonoured by unchristian works. Yet they also at length renounc'd their Heathenism; which how it came to pass, will be the matter next related.

THE History of ENGLAND,

By Mr. JOHN MILTON. Book IV.

A. D. 593.

THE Saxons grown up now to seven Absolute Kingdoms, and the latest of them establish'd by Succession, finding their Power arrive well nigh at the utmost of what was to be gain'd upon the Britains, and as little fearing to be displanted by them, had time now to survey at leisure one another's Greatness. Which quickly bred among them either Envy or mutual Jealousies; till the West Kingdom at length grown over-powerful, put an end to all the rest. Mean while, above others, Ethelbert of Kent, who by this time had well ripen'd his young Ambition, with more ability of Years and experience in War, what before he attempted to his loss, now successfully attains; and by degrees brought all the other Monarchies between Kent and Humber, to be at his devotion. To which design the Kingdom of West-Saxons, being the firmest of them all, at that time sore shaken by their overthrow at Wodens-beorth, and the Death of Keaulin, gave him no doubt a main advantage; the rest yielded not subjection, but as he earn'd it by continual Victories. And to win him the more regard abroad, he marries Bertha the French King's Daughter, though a Christian, and with this condition, to have the free exercise of her Faith, under the care and instruction of Letardus a Bishop, sent by her Parents along with her; the King notwithstanding and his People retaining their own Religion. Beda out of Gildas lays it sadly to the Britains charge, that they never would vouchsafe their Saxon Neighbours the means of Conversion: But how far to blame they were, and what hope there was of converting in the midst of so much hostility, at least fallhood from their first arrival, is not now easie to determine. Howbeit not long after, they had the Christian Faith preach'd to them by a Nation more remote, and (as report went, accounted old in Beda's time) upon this occasion. The Northumbrians had a custom at that time, and many hundred Years after not abolish'd, to sell their Children for a small value into any foreign Land. Of which number, two comely Youths were brought to Rome, whose fair and honest Countenance invited Gregory Arch-Deacon of that City, among others that beheld them, pitying their condition, to demand whence they were; it was answer'd by some who stood by, that they were Angli of the Province of Deira, Subjects to Alla King of Northumberland, and by Religion Pagans. Which last Gregory deploring

For a while after, ſucceeding in the Papal Seat, and now in his fourth Year, admoniſh'd, ſaith Beda, by divine Inſtinct, he ſent Auguſtine, whom he had deſign'd for Biſhop of the Engliſh Nation, and other zealous Monks with him, to preach to them the Goſpel. Who being now on their way, diſcouraged by ſome reports, or their own carnal fear, ſent back Auſtin, in the name of all, to beſeech Gregory they might return home, and not be ſent a Journey ſo full of hazard, to a fierce and infidel Nation, whoſe Tongue they underſtood not. Gregory with Pious and Apoſtolick Perſuaſions exhorts them not to ſhrink back from ſo good a work, but cheerfully to go on in the ſtrength of Divine Aſſiſtance. The Letter it ſelf yet extant among our Writers of Eccleſiaſtick Story, I omit here, as not profeſſing to relate of thoſe Matters more than what mixes aptly with Civil Affairs. The Abbot Auſtin, for ſo he was ordain'd over the reſt, reincourag'd by the Exhortations of Gregory, and his Fellows, by the Letter which he brought them, came ſafe to the
597. Iſle of Tanet, in number about forty, beſides ſome of the French Nation, whom they took along as Interpreters. Ethelbert the King, to whom Auſtin at his landing had ſent a new and wondrous Meſſage, that he came from Rome to proffer Heaven and Eternal Happineſs in the knowledge of another God than the Saxons knew, appoints them to remain where they landed, and Neceſſaries to be provided them, conſulting in the mean time what was to be done. And after certain days coming into the Iſland, choſe a place to meet them under the open Sky, poſſeſs'd with an old perſuaſion, that all Spells, if they ſhould uſe any to deceive him, ſo it were not within doors, would be unavailable. They on the other ſide, call'd to his preſence, advancing for their Standard a Silver Croſs, and the painted Image of our Saviour, came ſlowly forward ſinging their Solemn Letanies: Which wrought in Ethelbert more ſuſpicion perhaps that they us'd Enchantments; till ſitting down as the King will'd them, they there preach'd to him, and all in that Aſſembly, the tidings of Salvation. Whom having heard attentively, the King thus anſwer'd: Fair indeed and ample are the promiſes which ye bring, and ſuch things as have the appearance in them of much good; yet ſuch as being new and uncertain, I cannot haſtily aſſent to, quitting the Religion which from my Anceſtors, with all the Engliſh Nation, ſo many Years I have retain'd. Nevertheleſs becauſe ye are Strangers, and have endured ſo long a journey, to impart us the knowledge of things, which I perſuade me you believe to be the trueſt and the beſt, ye may be ſure we ſhall not recompence you with any moleſtation, but ſhall provide rather how we may friendlieſt entertain ye; nor do we forbid whom ye can by preaching gain to your belief. And accordingly their Reſidence he allotted them in Doroverne or Canterbury his chief City, and made proviſion for their Maintenance, with free leave to preach their Doctrine where they pleaſed. By which, and by the example of their holy Life, ſpent in Prayer, Faſting, and continual labour in the Converſion of Souls, they won many; on whoſe bounty and the King's, receiving only what was neceſſary, they ſubſiſted. There ſtood without the City, on the Eaſt-ſide, an ancient Church built in honour of St. Martin, while yet the Romans remain'd here: In which Bertha the Queen went out uſually to pray. Here they alſo began firſt to preach, baptize, and openly to exerciſe Divine Worſhip. But when the King himſelf, convinc'd by their good Life and Miracles, became Chriſtian, and was baptiz'd, which came to paſs in the very firſt Year of their arrival; then Multitudes [a] daily, conforming to their Prince, thought it honour to be reckon'd among thoſe of his Faith: To whom Ethelbert indeed principally ſhewed his favour, but compell'd none. For ſo he had been taught by them, who were both the Inſtructors and the Authors of his Faith, that Chriſtian Religion ought to be voluntary, not compell'd. About this time Kelwulf the Son of Cutha, Ceaulin's Brother, reign'd over the Weſt-Saxons, after his Brother Keola or Kelric, and had continual War either with Engliſh, Welſh, Picts, or Scots. But Auſtin, whom with his Fellows, Ethelbert now had endow'd with a better place for their abode in the City, and other poſſeſſions neceſſary to livelihood, croſſing into France, was by the Archbiſhop of Arles, at the appointment of Pope Gregory, ordain'd Archbiſhop of the Engliſh: And returning, ſent to Rome Laurence and Peter, two of his Aſſociates, to acquaint the Pope of his good ſucceſs in England, and to be reſolv'd of certain Theological, or rather Levitical Queſtions: With anſwers to which, not proper in this place, Gregory ſends alſo to the great Work of Converting, that went on ſo happily, a ſupply of Labourers, Mellitus Juſtus, Paulinus, Rufinian, and many others; who what they were may be gueſs'd by the ſtuff which they brought with them, Veſſels and Veſtments for the Altar, Copes, Relicks, and for the Archbiſhop Auſtin a Pall to ſay Maſs in: To ſuch a rank Superſtition that Age was grown, though ſome of them yet retaining an emulation of Apoſtolick Zeal. Laſtly, to Ethelbert they brought a Letter with many Preſents. Auſtin thus exalted to Archiepiſcopal Authority, recover'd from the ruins and other profane uſes, a Chriſtian Church in Canterbury, built of old by the Romans; which he dedicated by the Name of Chriſt's Church, and joining to it built a Seat for himſelf and his Succeſſors; a Monaſtery alſo near the City Eaſtward, where Ethelbert at his motion built St. Peter's, and enrich'd it with great Endowments, to be a place of burial for the Archbiſhops and Kings of Kent: So quickly they ſtept up into fellowſhip of Pomp with Kings. While thus Ethelbert and his People had their Minds intent, Ethelfrid the Northumbrian King was not leſs buſied in far different affairs: For being altogether Warlike, and covetous of Fame, he more waſted the Britains than any Saxon King before him; winning from them large Territories, which either he made tributary, or planted with his own Subjects. Whence Edan King of thoſe Scots that dwelt in Britain, jealous of his ſucceſſes, came againſt him with a mighty Army, to a place call'd Degſaſtan; but in the Fight loſing moſt of his Men, himſelf with a few eſcap'd: Only Theobald the King's Brother, and the whole Wing which he commanded, unfortunately cut off, made the Victory to Ethelfrid leſs intire. Yet from that time no King of Scots in hoſtile manner durſt paſs into Britain for a hundred and more Years after:

And

A. D. 603. and what some Years before, Kelwulf the West-Saxon is annal'd to have done against the Scots and Picts, passing through the Land of Ethelfrid a King so Potent, unless in his Aid and Alliance, is not likely. Buchanan writes as if Ethelfrid, assisted by Keaulin, whom he mis-titles King of East-Saxons, had before this time a Battel with Aidan, wherein Cutha Keaulin's Son was slain. But Cutha, as is above written from better Authority, was slain in Fight against the Welch twenty Years before. The Number of Christians began now to increase so fast, that Augustine ordaining Bishops under him, two of his Assistants Mellitus [a] and Justus, sent them out both to the Work of their Ministry. And Mellitus by preaching converted the East-Saxons, over whom Sebert the Son of Sleda, by Permission of Ethelbert, being born of his Sister Ricula, then reign'd. Whose Conversion Ethelbert to gratulate, built them the great Church of St. Paul in London to be their Bishop's Cathedral; as Justus also had his built at Rochester, and both gifted by the same King with fair Possessions. Hitherto Austin laboured well among Infidels, but not with like Commendation soon after among Christians. For by means of Ethelbert summoning the Britain Bishops to a place [b] on the Edge of Worcestershire, call'd from that time Augustine's Oak, he requires them to conform with him in the same Day of celebrating Easter, and many other Points wherein they differ'd from the Rites of Rome: Which when they refus'd to do, not prevailing by Dispute, he appeals to a Miracle, restoring to sight a blind Man whom the Britains could not cure. At this something mov'd, though not minded to recede from their own Opinions, without farther Consultation, they request a second Meeting: To which came seven Britain Bishops, with many other learned Men, especially from the famous Monastery of Bangor, in which were said to be so many Monks, living all by their own Labour, that being divided under seven Rectors, none had fewer than three hundred. One Man there was who staid behind, a Hermit by the Life he led, who by his Wisdom effected more than all the rest who went; Being demanded, for they held him as an Oracle, how they might know Austin to be a Man from God, that they might follow him, he answer'd, that if they found him meek and humble, they should be taught by him, for it was likeliest to be the Yoke of Christ, both what he bore himself, and would have them bear; but if he bore himself proudly, that they should not regard him, for he was then certainly not of God. They took his Advice, and hasted to the Place of Meeting. Whom Austin, being already there before them, neither arose to meet, nor receiv'd in any Brotherly sort, but sat all the while pontifically in his Chair. Whereat the Britains, as they were counsell'd by the Holy Man, neglected him, and neither hearken'd to his Proposals of Conformity, nor would acknowledge him for an Arch-bishop: And in Name of the rest, Dimothus then Abbot of Bangor, is said, thus sagely to have answer'd him. As to the Subjection which you require, be thus perswaded of us, that in the Bond of Love and Charity we are all Subjects and Servants to the Church of God, yea to the Pope of Rome, and every good Christian to help them forward, both by Word and Deed, to be the Children of God: Other Obedience than this we know not to be due to him whom you term the Pope; and this Obedience we are ready to give both to him and to every Christian continually. Besides, we are govern'd under God by the Bishop of Caerleon *, who is to oversee us in Spiritual Matters. To which Austin thus presaging, some say menacing, replies, Since ye refuse to accept of Peace with your Brethren, ye shall have War from your Enemies; and since ye will not with us preach the Word of Life, to whom ye ought, from their hands ye shall receive Death. This, though Writers agree not whether Austin spake it as his Prophecy, or as his Plot against the Britains, fell out accordingly. For many Years were not past, when Ethelfrid, whether of his own accord, or at the request of Ethelbert, incens'd by Austin, with a powerful Host came to Westchester, then Caer-legion. Where being met by the British Forces, and both sides in readiness to give the Onset, he discerns a Company of Men, not habited for War, standing together in a place of some Safety; and by them a Squadron arm'd. Whom having learn'd upon some Enquiry to be Priests and Monks, assembl'd thither after three Days fasting to pray for the good Success of their Forces against him, therefore they first, saith he, shall feel our Swords; for they who pray against us, fight heaviest against us by their Prayers, and are our dangerousest Enemies. And with that turns his first Charge upon the Monks: Brocmail, the Captain, set to guard them, quickly turns his back, and leaves above 1200 Monks to a sudden Massacre, whereof scarce fifty scap'd: But not so easie Work found Ethelfrid against another part of Britains that stood in Arms, whom though at last he overthrew, yet with Slaughter nigh as great to his own Soldiers. To excuse Austin of this Bloodshed, lest some might think it his revengeful Policy, Beda writes that he was dead long before, although if the time of his sitting Arch-bishop be right computed sixteen Years, he must survive this Action. Other just Ground of charging him with this Imputation appears not, save what evidently we have from Geoffrey Monmouth, whose weight we know. The same Year Kelwulf made War on the South-Saxons, bloody, saith Huntingdon, to both sides, but most to them of the South [c]: And four Years after dying left the Government of West-Saxons to Kineglis and Cuichelm the Sons of his Brother Keola. Others, as Florent of Worcester, and Matthew of Westminster, will have Cuichelm Son of Kineglis, but admitted to reign with his Father, in whose third Year they are recorded with joynt Forces or Conduct to have fought against the Britains in [d] Beandune, now Bindon in Dorsetshire, and to have slain of them above two Thousand. More memorable was the second Year following, by the Death of Ethelbert the first Christian King of Saxons, and no less a Favourer of all Civility in that rude Age [e]. He gave Laws and Statutes after the Example of Roman Emperors, written with the Advice of Wherein his ſpecial Care was to puniſh thoſe who had ſtoll'n ought from Church or Churchman, thereby ſhewing how gratefully he receiv'd at their hands the Chriſtian Faith. Which, he no ſooner dead, but his Son Eadbald took the Courſe as faſt to extinguiſh; not only falling back to Heatheniſm, but that which Heatheniſm was wont to abhor, marrying his Father's ſecond Wife. Then ſoon was perceiv'd what Multitudes for Fear or Countenance of the King had profeſs'd Chriſtianity, returning now as eagerly to their old Religion. Nor ſtaid the Apoſtaſie within one Province, but quickly ſpread over to the Eaſt-Saxons; occaſion'd there likewiſe, or ſet forward by the Death of their Chriſtian King Sebert: Whoſe three Sons, of whom two are nam'd, Sexted and Seward, neither in his Life-time would be brought to Baptiſm, and after his Deceaſe re-eſtabliſh'd the free Exerciſe of Idolatry; nor ſo content, they ſet themſelves in Deſpight to do ſome open Profanation againſt the other Sacrament. Coming therefore into the Church, where Mellitus the Biſhop was miniſtring, they requir'd him in Abuſe and Scorn to deliver to them unbaptiz'd the conſecrated Bread; and him refuſing, drove diſgracefully out of their Dominion. Who croſs'd forthwith into Kent, where things were in the ſame plight, and thence into France, with Juſtus Biſhop of Rochеſter. But Divine Vengeance deferr'd not long the Puniſhment of Men ſo impious; for Eadbald, vext with an evil Spirit, fell often into foul Fits of Diſtraction; and the Sons of Sebert, in a Fight againſt the Weſt-Saxons periſh'd, with their whole Army. But Eadbald, within the Year, by an extraordinary means became penitent. For when Laurence the Archbiſhop and Succeſſor of Auſtin was preparing to ſhip for France, after Juſtus and Mellitus, the Story goes, if it be worth believing [a], that St. Peter, in whoſe Church he ſpent the Night before in watching and praying, appear'd to him, and to make the Viſion more ſenſible, gave him many Stripes for offering to deſert his Flock; at ſight whereof the King (to whom next Morning he ſhewed the Marks of what he had ſuffer'd, by whom and for what Cauſe) relenting and in great Fear diſſolv'd his inceſtuous Marriage, and apply'd himſelf to the Chriſtian Faith more ſincerely than before, with all his People. But the Londoners, addicted ſtill to Paganiſm, would not be perſwaded to receive again Mellitus their Biſhop, and to compel them was not in his Power.

617. Thus much through all the South was troubl'd in Religion, as much were the North Parts diſquieted through Ambition. For Ethelfrid of Bernicia, as was touch'd before, having thrown Edwin out of Deira, and joyn'd that Kingdom to his own, not content to have bereav'd him of his Right, whoſe known Vertues and high Parts gave cauſe of Suſpicion to his Enemies, ſends Meſſengers to demand him of Redwald King of Eaſt-Angles; under whoſe Protection, after many Years wandring obſcurely through all the Iſland, he had plac'd his Safety. Redwald, though having promis'd all Defence to Edwin as to his Suppliant, yet tempted with continual and large Offers of Gold, and not contemning the Puiſſance of Ethelfrid, yielded at length, either to diſpatch him, or to give him into their hands: But earneſtly exhorted by his Wife, not to betray the Faith and inviolable Law of Hoſpitality and Refuge given, prefers his firſt Proviſe as the more Religious; nor only refuſes to deliver him; but ſince War was thereupon denounc'd, determines to be beforehand with the Danger; and with a ſudden Army rais'd, ſurprizes Ethelfrid, little dreaming an Invaſion, and in a Fight near to the Eaſt-ſide of the River Idle, on the Mercian Border, now Nottinghamſhire [b], ſlays him, diſſipating eaſily thoſe few Forces which he had got to march out overhaſtily with him; who yet as a Teſtimony of his Fortune, not his Valour to be blam'd, ſlew firſt with his own hands Reiner the King's Son. His two Sons Oſwald, and Oſwi, by Acca, Edwin's Siſter, eſcap'd into Scotland. By this Victory, Redwald became ſo far Superiour to the other Saxon Kings, that Beda reckons him the next after Ella and Ethelbert; who beſides this Conqueſt of the North, had likewiſe all on the hither-ſide Humber at his Obedience. He had formerly in Kent receiv'd Baptiſm, but coming home, and perſwaded by his Wife, who ſtill it ſeems, was his chief Counſellor to good or bad alike, relaps'd into his old Religion; yet not willing to forego his new, thought it not the worſt way, leſt perhaps he might err in either, for more Aſſurance to keep them both; and in the ſame Temple erected one Altar to Chriſt, another to his Idols. But Edwin, as with more Deliberation he undertook, and with more Sincerity retain'd the Chriſtian Profeſſion, ſo alſo in Power and Extent of Dominion far exceeded all before him; ſubduing all, ſaith Beda, Engliſh or Britiſh, even to the Iſles, then call'd Mevanian, Angleſey, and Man; ſettl'd in his Kingdom by Redwald, he ſought in Marriage Edelburga, whom others call'd Tate, the Daughter of Ethelbert. To whoſe Embaſſadors, Eadbald her Brother made anſwer, That to wed their Daughter to a Pagan, was not the Chriſtian Law. Edwin reply'd, that to her Religion he would be no Hindrance, which with her whole Houſhold ſhe might freely exerciſe. And moreover, that if examin'd it were found the better, he would imbrace it. Theſe ingenuous Offers, opening ſo fair a way to the Advancement of Truth, are accepted, and Paulinus as a ſpiritual Guardian ſent along with the Virgin. He being to that purpoſe made Biſhop by Juſtus, omitted no Occaſion to plant the Goſpel in thoſe Parts, but with ſmall Succeſs, till the next Year, Cuichelm, at that time one of the two Weſt-Saxon Kings, envious of the Greatneſs which he ſaw Edwin growing up to, ſent privily Eumerus a hir'd Sword-man to aſſaſſin him; who under Pretence of doing a Meſſage from his Maſter, with a poiſon'd Weapon, ſtabs at Edwin, conferring with him in his Houſe, by the River Derwent in Yorkſhire, on an Eaſter-day; which Lilla, one of the King's Attendants, at the inſtant perceiving, with a Loyalty that ſtood not then to deliberate, abandon'd his whole Body to the Blow; which notwithſtanding made Paſſage through to the King's Perſon, with a Wound not to be ſlighted. The Murtherer encompaſs'd now with Swords, and deſperate, fore-revenges his own Fall with the Death of another, whom his Poinard reach'd home. Paulinus omitting no Opportunity to win the King from Miſ-belief, obtain'd at length this Promiſe from him; that if Chriſt, whom he ſo magnifi'd, would give him to recover of his Wound, and Victory of his Enemies who had thus aſſaulted him, he would then become Chriſtian, in Peldge whereof he gave his young Daughter Eanfled to be bred up in Religion;

A. D. 626. who with twelve others of his Family, on the Day of Pentecoſt was baptiz'd. And by that time well recover'd of his wound, to puniſh the Authors of ſo foul a fact, he went with an Army againſt the Weſt-Saxons: Whom having quell'd by War, and of ſuch as had conſpir'd againſt him, put ſome to death, others pardon'd, he return'd home victorious; and from that time worſhipp'd no more his Idols, yet ventur'd not raſhly into Baptiſm, but firſt took care to be inſtructed rightly, what he learnt, examining and ſtill conſidering with himſelf and others, whom he held wiſeſt; though Boniface the Pope, by large Letters of Exhortation, both to him and his Queen, was not wanting to quicken his belief. But while he ſtill deferr'd, and his deferring might ſeem now to have paſt the maturity of Wiſdom to a faulty lingring. Paulinus by Revelation, as was believ'd, coming to the knowledge of a Secret, which befel him ſtrangely in the time of his troubles, on a certain day went in boldly to him, and laying his right hand on the head of the King, ask'd him if he remembred what that ſign meant? The King trembling, and in amaze riſing up, ſtraight fell at his Feet: Behold, ſaith Paulinus, raiſing him from the ground, God hath deliver'd you from your Enemies, and given you the Kingdom, as you deſir'd: Perform now what long ſince you promis'd him, to receive his Doctrine which I now bring you, and the Faith, which if you accept, ſhall to your Temporal Felicity add Eternal. The promiſe claim'd of him by Paulinus, how and wherefore made, though ſavouring much of Legend, is thus related: [a] Redwald, as we heard before, dazled with the Gold of Ethelfrid, or by his threatning over-aw'd, having promis'd to yield up Edwin, one of his faithful Companions, of which he had ſome few with him in the Court of Redwald, that never ſhrunk from his adverſity, about the firſt hour of night comes in haſte to his Chamber, and calling him forth for better ſecurity, reveals to him his danger, offers him his aid to make eſcape; but that courſe not approv'd, as ſeeming diſhonourable without more manifeſt cauſe to begin diſtruſt towards one who had ſo long been his only refuge, the Friend departs. Edwin left alone without the Palace-Gate, full of ſadneſs and perplext thoughts, diſcerns about the dead of night a Man, neither by Countenance nor by Habit to him known, approaching towards him: Who, after ſalutation, ask'd him, why at this hour, when all others were at reſt, he alone ſo ſadly ſat waking on a cold Stone? Edwin, not a little miſdoubting who he might be, ask'd him again, What his ſitting within doors or without concern'd him to know? To whom he again, Think not that who thou art, or why ſitting here, or what danger hangs over thee, is to me unknown: But what would you promiſe to that Man, who ever would befriend you out of all theſe troubles, and perſuade Redwald to the like? All that I am able, anſwer'd Edwin. And he, What if the ſame Man ſhould promiſe to make you greater than any Engliſh King hath been before you? I ſhould not doubt, quoth Edwin, to be anſwerably grateful. And what if to all this he would inform you, ſaid the other, in a way to Happineſs, beyond what any of your Anceſtors hath known? would you hearken to his Counſel? Edwin, without ſtopping, promis'd he would. And the other, laying his right Hand on Edwin's Head, When A. D. 626. this ſign, ſaith he, ſhall next befall thee, remember this time of night, and this diſcourſe, to perform what thou haſt promis'd; and with theſe words diſappearing, left Edwin much reviv'd, but not leſs fill'd with wonder, who this unknown ſhould be. When ſuddenly the Friend who had been gone all this while to liſten farther what was like to be decreed of Edwin, comes back, and joyfully bids him riſe to his repoſe, for that the King's Mind, tho' for a while drawn aſide, was now fully reſolv'd not only not to betray him, but to defend him againſt all Enemies, as he had promis'd. This was ſaid to be the cauſe why Edwin admoniſh'd by the Biſhop of a ſign which had befallen him ſo ſtrangely, and as he thought ſo ſecretly, aroſe to him with that Reverence and Amazement, as to one ſent from Heaven, to claim that promiſe of him which he perceiv'd well was due to a Divine Power that had aſſiſted him in his troubles. To Paulinus therefore he makes anſwer, That the Chriſtian Belief he himſelf ought by promiſe, and intended to receive; but would confer firſt with his chief Peers and Counſellers, that if they likewiſe could be won, all at once might be baptiz'd. They therefore being ask'd in Counſel what their Opinion was concerning this new Doctrine, and well perceiving which way the King enclin'd, every one hereafter ſhap'd his reply. The Chief Prieſt ſpeaking firſt, diſcover'd an old Grudge he had againſt his Gods, for advancing others in the King's Favour above him their Chief Prieſt: Another hiding his Court-compliance with a grave ſentence, commended the choice of certain, before uncertain, upon due examination; to like purpoſe anſwer'd all the reſt of his Sages, none openly diſſenting from what was likely to be the King's Creed: Whereas the Preaching of Paulinus could work no ſuch effect upon them, toiling till that time without ſucceſs. Whereupon Edwin renouncing Heatheniſm, became Chriſtian: And the Pagan Prieſt offering himſelf freely to demoliſh the Altars of his former Gods, made ſome amends for his teaching to adore them. With Edwin, his two Sons, Oſfrid and Eanfrid, born to 627. him by Quenburga, Daughter, as ſaith Beda, of Kearle King of Mercia, in the time of his baniſhment, and with them moſt of the People, both Nobles and Commons, eaſily converted, were baptized [b]; he with his whole Family at York, in a Church haſtily built up of Wood, the multitude moſt part in Rivers. Northumberland thus chriſten'd, Paulinus croſſing Humber, converted alſo the Province of Linſey, and Blecca the Go- 628. vernour of Lincoln, with his Houſhold and moſt of that City; wherein he built a Church of Stone, curiouſly wrought, but of ſmall continuance; for the Roof in Beda's time [c], uncertain whether by Neglect or Enemies, was down, the Walls only ſtanding. Mean while in Mercia, Kearle a Kinſman of Wibba, ſaith Huntingdon, not a Son, having long with-held the Kingdom from Penda, Wibba's Son, left it now at length to the fiftieth Year of his Age: With whom Kineglis and Cuichelm, the Weſt-Saxon Kings, two Year after, 629. *Sax. But Edwin ſeeking every way to propagate the Faith, which with ſo much deliberation he had receiv'd, perſuaded [d] Eorpwald the Son of Redwald, King

A. D. 632. of East-Angles, to embrace the same Belief; willingly or in awe, is not known, retaining under Edwin the Name only of a King. But Eorpwald not long surviv'd his Conversion, slain in Fight by Ricbert a Pagan: Whereby the People having lightly follow'd the Religion of their King, as lightly fell back to their old Superstitions for above three Years after: Edwin in the mean while, to his Faith adding Virtue, by the due administration of Justice, wrought such peace over all his Territories, that from Sea to Sea, Man or Woman might have travell'd in safety. His care also was of Fountains by the way-side, to make them fittest for the use of Travellers. And not unmindful of Regal State, whether in War or Peace, he had a Royal Banner carry'd before him. But having Reign'd with much Honour seventeen Years, he was at length by Kedwalla, or Cadwallon, King of the Britains, who with aid of the Mercian Pinda[a], had rebell'd against him, slain in a Battel with his Son Offrid, at a place call'd Hethfield[b], and his whole Army overthrown or dispers'd in the Year 633, and the 47th of his Age, in the Eye of Man worthy a more peaceful end. His Head brought to York, was there bury'd in the Church by him begun. Sad was this overthrow both to Church and State of the Northumbrians: For Penda being a Heathen, and the British King, though in name a Christian, yet in deeds more bloody than the Pagan, nothing was omitted of barbarous Cruelty in the slaughter of Sex or Age; Kedwalla threatning to root out the whole Nation, though then newly Christian. For the Britains, and, as Beda saith, even to his Days, accounted Saxon Christianity no better than Paganism, and with them held as little Communion. From these Calamities no refuge being left but flight, Paulinus taking with him Ethelburga the Queen and her Children, aided by Bassus, one of Edwin's Captains, made escape by Sea to Eadbald King of Kent: Who receiving his Sister with all kindness, made Paulinus Bishop of Rochester, where he ended his Days. After Edwin, the Kingdom of Northumberland became divided as before, each rightful Heir seizing his part; in Deira, Osric the Son of Elfric, Edwin's Uncle, by profession a Christian, and baptiz'd by Paulinus; in Bernicia, Eanfrid the Son of Ethelfrid; who all the time of Edwin, with his Brother Oswald, and many of the young Nobility, liv'd in Scotland exil'd, and had been there taught and baptiz'd. No sooner had they gotten each a Kingdom, but both turn'd recreant, sliding back into their old Religion, and both were the same Year slain; Osric by a sudden eruption of Kedwalla, whom he in a strong Town had unadvisedly besieg'd; Eanfrid seeking Peace, and inconsiderately with a few surrendring himself. Kedwalla now rang'd at will through both those Provinces, using cru-
634. elly his Conquest; when Oswald, [c] the Brother of Eanfrid, with a small but Christian Army, unexpectedly coming on, defeated and destroy'd both him and his huge Forces, which he boasted to be invincible, by a little River running into Tine, near the antient Roman Wall then call'd Denisburn[d], the place afterwards Heaven-field, from the Cross reported miraculous for Cures, which Oswald there erected before the Battel, in token of his Faith against the great number of his Enemies. Obtaining the Kingdom, he took care to instruct again the People in Christianity. Sending therefore to the Scotish Elders, Beda so terms them, among whom he had receiv'd Baptism, requested of them some faithful Teacher, who might again settle Religion in his Realm, which the late Troubles had impair'd; they as readily hearkning to his request, send Aidan, a Scotch Monk and Bishop, but of singular Zeal and Meekness, with others to assist him, whom at their own desire he seated in Lindisfarne, as the Episcopal Seat, now Holy Island: And being the Son of Ethelfrid, by the Sister of Edwin, as right Heir, others failing, easily reduc'd both Kingdoms of Northumberland as before into one; nor of Edwin's Dominion lost any part, but enlarg'd it rather, over all the four British Nations, Angles, Britains, Picts and Scots, exercising Regal Authority. Of his Devotion, Humility and Almsdeeds, much is spoken; that he disdain'd not to be the Interpreter of Aidan, preaching in Scotch or bad English, to his Nobles and Houshold Servants; and had the Poor continually serv'd at his Gate, after the promiscuous manner of those times: His Meaning might be upright, but the Manner more antient of Private or of Church Contribution, is doubtless more Evangelical. About this time the West-Saxons, antiently call'd Gevissi, by the Preaching of Berinus a Bishop, whom Pope Honorius had sent, were converted to the Faith with Kineglis their King: Him Oswald receiv'd out of the Font, and his Daughter in Marriage. The next Year Cuichelm was baptiz'd in Dorchester[e], but liv'd not to the Year's end. The East-Angles also this Year were reclaim'd to the Faith of Christ, which for some Years past they had thrown off. But Sigbert the Brother of Eorpwald now succeeded in that Kingdom, prais'd for a most Christian and Learned Man: Who while his Brother yet reign'd, living in France an exile for some Displeasure conceiv'd against him by Redwald his Father, learn'd there the Christian Faith; and reigning soon after, in the same instructed his People, by the Preaching of Felix[f] a Burgundian Bishop. In the Year 640, Eadbald deceasing, left to Ercombert his Son by Emma the French King's Daughter, the Kingdom of Kent; recorded the first of English Kings, who commanded through his Limits the destroying of Idols; laudably, if all Idols without exception; and the first to have establish'd Lent among us, under strict penalty, not worth remembring, but only to inform us, that no Lent was observ'd here till his time by compulsion; especially being noted by some to have fraudulently usurp'd upon his Elder Brother Ermenred, whose right was Precedent to the Crown. Oswald having Reign'd eight Years, worthy also as might seem of longer Life[g], fell into the same Fate with Edwin, and from the same Hand, in a great Battel overcome and slain by Penda, at a place call'd Maserfield, now [h] Oswestre in Shropshire, miraculous, as saith Beda, after his Death. His Brother Oswi succeeded him, Reigning, tho' in much trouble, twenty eight Years; oppos'd either by Penda, or his own Son Alfred, or his

Brother's

A. D. 643. Brother's Son Ethelwald. Next Year Kinegils the West-Saxon dying, left his Son Kenwalk in his ſtead, though as yet unconverted. About this time Sigebert, King of Eaſt-Angles, having learn'd in France, e're his coming to reign, the manner of their Schools, with the Aſſiſtance of ſome Teachers out of Kent, inſtituted a School here after the ſame Diſcipline, thought to be the Univerſity of Cambridge then firſt founded [a]: And at length weary of his Kingly Office, betook him to a Monaſtical Life; commending the Care of Government to his Kinſman Egric, who had ſuſtain'd with him part of that Burthen before. It happen'd ſome Years after, that Penda made War on the Eaſt-Angles: They expecting a ſharp Encounter, beſought Sigebert, whom they eſteem'd an expert Leader, with his Preſence to confirm the Soldiery: And him refuſing carried by force out of the Monaſtery into the Camp; where acting the Monk rather than the Captain, with a ſingle Wand in his hand, he was ſlain with Egric, and his whole Army put to flight. Anna of the Royal Stock, as next in Right, ſucceeded; and hath the Praiſe of a vertuous and moſt Chriſtian Prince. But Kenwalk the Weſt-Saxon having married the Siſter of Penda, and divorc'd her, was by him with more Appearance of a juſt Cauſe vanquiſh'd in Fight, and depriv'd of his Crown: Whence retiring to Anna King of the Eaſt-Angles, after three Years abode in his Court, he there became Chriſtian, and afterwards regain'd his Kingdom. Oſwi in the former Years of his Reign, had Sharer with him, Oſwin Nephew of Edwin, who rul'd in Deira ſeven Years, commended much for his Zeal in Religion, and for Comelineſs of Perſon, with other Princely Qualities, belov'd of all. Notwithſtanding which, Diſſentions growing between them, it came to Arms. Oſwin ſeeing himſelf much exceeded in Numbers, thought it more Prudence, diſmiſſing his Army, to reſerve himſelf for ſome better Occaſion. But committing his Perſon with one faithful Attendant to the Loyalty of Hunwald an Earl, his imagin'd Friend, he was by him treacherouſly diſcover'd and by Command of Oſwi ſlain. After whom within twelve Days, and for Grief of him whoſe Death he foretold, dy'd Biſhop Aidan, famous for his Charity, Meekneſs, and labour in the Goſpel. The Fact of Oſwi was deteſtable to all; which therefore to expiate, a Monaſtery was built in the Place where it was done, and Prayers there daily offer'd up for the Souls of both Kings, the ſlain and the Slayer. Kenwalk by this time reinſtall'd in his Kingdom, kept it long, but with various Fortune; for Beda relates him oft-times afflicted by his Enemies with great Loſſes: And in 652 by the Annals, fought a Battel (Civil War Ethelwerd calls it) at Bradanford by the River Aſene; againſt whom, and for what Cauſe, or who had the Victory, they write not. Cambden names the Place Bradford in Wiltſhire, by the River Avon, and Cuthred his near Kinſman, againſt whom he fought, but cites no Authority; certain it is, that Kenwalk four Years before had given large Poſſeſſions to his Nephew Cuthred, the more unlikely therefore now to have rebell'd. The next Year Peada, whom his Father Penda, though a Heathen, had for his Princely Vertues made Prince of Middle Angles, belonging to the Mercians, was with that People converted to the Faith. For coming to Oſwi with Requeſt to have in Marriage Alfleda his Daughter, he was deny'd her but on Condition, that he with all his People ſhould receive Chriſtianity. Hearing therefore not unwillingly what was preach'd to him of Reſurrection and Eternal Life, much perſwaded alſo by Alfrid the King's Son, who had his Siſter Kyniburg to Wife, he eaſily aſſented, for the Truth's ſake only, as he profeſs'd, whether he obtain'd the Virgin or no, and was baptiz'd with all his Followers. Returning, he took with him four Preſbyters to teach the People of his Province; who by their daily preaching won many. Neither did Penda, though himſelf no Believer, prohibit any in his Kingdom to hear or believe the Goſpel, but rather hated and deſpis'd thoſe, who profeſſing to believe, atteſted not their Faith by good Works; condemning them for miſerable and juſtly to be deſpis'd, who obey not that God in whom they chuſe to believe. How well might Penda, this Heathen, riſe up in Judgment againſt many pretending Chriſtians, both of his own and theſe Days! Yet being a Man bred up to War (as no leſs were others then reigning, and oft-times one againſt another, though both Chriſtians) he warr'd on Anna, King of the Eaſt-Angles, perhaps without Cauſe, for Anna was eſteem'd a juſt Man, and at length ſlew him. About this time the Eaſt-Saxons, who as above hath been ſaid, had expell'd their Biſhop Mellitus, and renounc'd the Faith, were by the means of Oſwi thus reconverted. Sigebert, ſirnam'd the Small, being the Son of Seward, without other Memory of his Reign, left his Son King of that Province, after him Sigebert the Second, who coming often to viſit Oſwi his great Friend, was by him at ſeveral times fervently diſſuaded from Idolatry, and convinc'd at length to forſake it, was there baptiz'd; on his return home, taking with him Kedda a laborious Preacher, afterwards made Biſhop; by whoſe teaching with ſome help of others, the People were again recover'd from Miſbelief. But Sigebert ſome Years* after, though ſtanding faſt in Religion, was by the Conſpiracy of two Brethren in place near about him, wickedly murther'd; who being ask'd what mov'd them to do a Deed ſo heinous, gave no other than this barbarous Anſwer; That they were angry with him for being ſo gentle to his Enemies, as to forgive them their Injuries whenever they beſought him. Yet his Death ſeems to have happen'd not without ſome Cauſe by him given of Divine Diſpleaſure. For one of thoſe Earls who ſlew him, living in unlawful Wedlock, and therefore excommunicated ſo ſeverely by the Biſhop, that no Man might preſume to enter into his Houſe, much leſs to ſit at Meat with him, the King not regarding this Church Cenſure, went to feaſt with him at his Invitation. Whom the Biſhop meeting in his return, though penitent for what he had done, and fall'n at his Feet, touch'd with the Rod in his Hand, and angerly thus foretold: Becauſe thou haſt neglected to abſtain from the Houſe of that Excommunicate, in that Houſe thou ſhalt die: And ſo it fell out, perhaps from that Prediction, God bearing Witneſs to his Miniſter in the Power of Church Diſcipline, ſpiritually executed, not juridically on the Contemner thereof. This Year 655 prov'd fortunate to Oſwi, and fatal to Penda, for Oſwi by the continual Inrodes of Penda, having long endur'd much Devaſtation, to the endangering once by Aſſault and Fire Bebbanburg, his ſtrongeſt City, now Banborrow Caſtle, unable to reſiſt

Which not accepted by the Pagan, who intended nothing but Destruction to that King, though more than once in Affinity with him, turning Gifts into Vows, he implores Divine Assistance, devoting, if he were deliver'd from his Enemy, a Child of one Year old, his Daughter to be a Nun, and twelve Portions of Land whereon to build Monasteries. His Vows, as may be thought, found better Success than his proffer'd Gifts; for hereupon with his Son Alfrid, gathering a small Power, he encounter'd and Cambd. discomfited the Mercians, thirty times exceeding his in Number, and led on by expert Captains; at a Place call'd Loydes, now Leeds in Yorkshire. Besides this Ethelwald, the Son of Oswald, who rul'd in Deira, took part with the Mercians, but in the Fight withdrew his Forces, and in a safe Place expected the Event: With which unseasonable retreat, the Mercians perhaps terrifi'd and misdoubting more Danger, fled; their Commanders, with Penda himself, most being slain, among whom Edelbere the Brother of Anna, who rul'd after him the East-Angles, and was the Author of this War; many more flying were drown'd in the River, which Mat. West. Beda calls [a] Winved, then swoll'n above his Banks. The Death of Penda, who had been the Death of so many good Kings, made general rejoicing, as the Song witness'd. At the River Winved, Anna was aveng'd. To Edelbere succeeded Ethelwald his Brother, in the East-Angles; to Sigebert in the East-Saxons, Suidhelm the Son of Sexbald, saith Bede, the Brother of Sigebert, Bed. l. 3. c. 22. saith Malmsbury; he was baptiz'd by Kedda, then residing in the East-Angles, and by Ethelwald the King, receiv'd out of the Font. But

658. Sax. An. Oswi in the Strength of his late Victory, within three Years after subdu'd all Mercia, and of the Pictish Nation greatest part, at which time he gave to Peada his Son-in-Law the Kingdom of South-Mercia, divided from the Northern by

659. Trent. But Peada the Spring following, as was said, by the Treason of his Wife the Daughter of Oswi, married by him for a special Christian, on the Feast of Easter, not protected by the holy time, was slain. The Mercian Nobles, Immin, Eaba, and Eadbert, throwing off the Government of Oswi, set up Wulfer the other Son of Penda to be their King, whom till then they had kept hid, and with him adhered to the Christian Faith. Kenwalk the West-Saxon, now settl'd at home, and desirous to enlarge his Dominion, prepares against the Britains, joins Battel with them at Pen in Somersetshire, and overcoming pursues them to Pedridan. Another Fight he had with them before, at a Place call'd Witgeornesbrug, barely mention'd by the Monk of Malmsbury. Nor was it long e're he fell at

661. Sax. An. Variance with Wulfer the Son of Penda, his old Enemy, scarce yet warm in his Throne, fought with him at [b] Possentesburg, on the Easter Holydays, and as Ethelwerd saith, took him Prisoner; but the Saxon Annals, quite otherwise, that Wulfer winning the Field, wasted the West-Saxon Country as far as Eskesdun [c]; nor staying there, took and wasted the Isle of Wight, but causing the Inhabitants to be baptiz'd, till then Unbelievers, gave the Island to Ethelwald King of the South-Saxons, whom he had receiv'd out of the Font [d]. The Year 664. a Synod of Scotch and

664. Bede. English Bishops, in the Presence of Oswi and Alfred his Son, was held at a Monastery in those Parts *, to debate upon what Day Easter should be kept; a Controversie which long before had disturb'd the Greek and Latin Churches: Wherein the Scots not agreeing with the way of Rome, nor yielding to the Disputants on that side, to whom the King most enclin'd, such as were Bishops here, resign'd, and return'd home with their Disciples. Another Clerical Question was there also much controverted, not so superstitious in my Opinion as ridiculous, about the right shaving of Crowns. The same Year was seen an Eclipse of the Sun in May, followed by a sore Pestilence beginning in the South, but spreading to the North, and over all Ireland with great Mortality. In which time the East-Saxons after Swithelm's decease, being govern'd by Siger the Son of Sigebert the Small, and Sebbi of Seward, though both subject to the Mercians. Siger and his People unsteady of Faith, supposing that this Plague was come upon them for renouncing their old Religion, fell off the second time to Infidelity. Which the Mercian King Wulfer understanding, sent Jeruniannus a faithful Bishop, who with other his Fellow Labourers, by sound Doctrine and gentle dealing, soon recur'd them of their second Relapse. In Kent, Ercombert expiring, was succeeded by his Son Ecbert. In whose fourth Year by means of Theodore, a Learned Greekish Monk of Tarsus, whom Pope Vitalian had ordain'd Arch-bishop of Canterbury, the Greek and Latin Tongue, with other Liberal Arts, Arithmetick, Musick, Astronomy, and the like; began first to flourish among the Saxons; as did also the whole Land, under Potent and Religious Kings, more than ever before, as Bede affirms, till his own Days. Two Years after, in Northumberland dy'd Oswi, much addicted to Romish Rites, and resolv'd, had his Disease releas'd him, to have ended his Days at Rome: Ecfrid the eldest of his Sons begot in Wedlock, succeeded him. After other three Years, Ecbert in Kent deceasing, left nothing memorable behind him, but the general Suspicion to have slain or conniv'd at the Slaughter of his Uncles two Sons, Elbert, and Egelbright. In Recompence whereof, he gave to the Mother of them part of Tanet, wherein to build an Abbey; the Kingdom fell to his Brother Lothair. And much about this time, by best Account it should be, however plac'd in Beda, that Ecfrid of Northumberland, having War with the Mercian Wulfer, Bed. l. 4. c. 12. won from him Lindsey, and the Country thereabout. Sebbi having reign'd over the East-Saxons thirty Years, not long before his Death, though long before desiring, took on him the Habit of a Monk; and drew his Wife at length, though unwilling, to the same Devotion. Kenwalk also dying, left the Government to Sexburga his Wife, who out-liv'd him in it but one Year, driven out, saith Mat. West. by the Nobles, disdaining Female Government. After whom several petty Kings, as Beda calls them, for ten Years space divided the West-Saxons; Bed. l. 4. c. 12. others name two, Escwin the Nephew of Kinigils, and Kentwin the Son, not petty by their Deeds: For Escwin fought a Battel with Wulfer, *Sax. A. D. 676. not only recover'd Lindſey, and what beſides in thoſe Parts Wulfer had loſt to Ecfrid ſome Years before, but found himſelf ſtrong enough to extend his Arms another way, as far as Kent, waſting that Country without reſpect to Church or Monaſtery, much alſo endamaging the City of Rocheſter: Notwithſtanding what Reſiſtance Lothair could make againſt him. In Auguſt 678. was ſeen a Morning Comet for three Months following, in manner of a fiery Pillar. And the South-Saxons about this time were converted to the Chriſtian Faith, upon this Occaſion. Wilfrid Biſhop of the Northumbrians entring into Contention with Ecfrid the King, was by him depriv'd of his Biſhoprick, and long wandring up and down as far as Rome, return'd at length into England, but not daring to approach the North, whence he was baniſh'd, bethought him where he might to beſt purpoſe elſewhere exerciſe his Miniſtry. The South of all other Saxons remain'd yet Heathen; but Edelwalk their King not long before had been baptiz'd in Mercia, perſuaded by Wulfer, and by him, as hath been ſaid, receiv'd out of the Font. For which Relation's ſake he had the Iſle of Wight, and a Province of the Meanuari adjoining, given him on the Continent about Meanesborow in Hantſhire, which Wulfer had a little before gotten from Kenwalk. Thither Wilfrid takes his Journey, and with the help of other Spiritual Labourers about him, in ſhort time planted there the Goſpel. It had not rain'd, as is ſaid, of three Years before in that Country, whence many of the People daily periſh'd by Famine; till on the firſt Day of their publick Baptiſm, ſoft and plentiful Showers deſcending, reſtor'd all Abundance to the Summer following. Two Years after this, Kentwin the other Weſt-Saxon King above-nam'd, chac'd the Welch-Britains, as is Chronicl'd without Circumſtance, to the very Sea Shoar. But in the Year, by Beda's reck'ning, 683, Kedwalla a Weſt-Saxon of the Royal Line (whom the Welch will have to be Cadwallader, laſt King of the Britains) thrown out by Faction, return'd from Baniſhment, and invaded both Kentwin, if then living, or whoever elſe had divided the Succeſſion of Kenwalk, ſlaying in Fight Edelwalk the South-Saxon, who oppos'd him in their Aid; but ſoon after was repuls'd by two of his Captains, Bertune, and Andune, who for a while held the Province in their Power. But Kedwalla gathering new Force, with the Slaughter of Bertune, and alſo of Edric the Succeſſor of Edelwalk, won the Kingdom: But reduc'd the People to heavy Thraldom. Then addreſſing to conquer the Iſle of Wight, till that time Pagan, ſaith Beda (others otherwiſe, as above hath been related) made a Vow, though himſelf yet unbaptiz'd, to devote the fourth part of that Iſland, and the Spoils thereof, to holy Uſes. Conqueſt obtain'd, paying his Vow as then was the Belief, he gave his fourth to Biſhop Wilfrid, by chance there preſent; and he to Berrwin a Prieſt, his Siſter's Son, with Commiſſion to baptize all the vanquiſh'd, who meant to ſave their Lives. But the two young Sons of Arwald, King of that Iſland, met with much more Hoſtility; for they at the Enemies approach flying out of the Iſle, and betray'd where they were hid not far from thence, were led to Kedwalla, who lay then under Cure of ſome Wounds receiv'd, and by his Appointment, after Inſtruction and Baptiſm, firſt given them, harſhly put to Death, which the Youths are ſaid above their Age to have Chriſtianly ſuffer'd. In Kent, Lothair dy'd this Year of his Wounds receiv'd in Fight againſt the South-Saxons, led on by Edric, who deſcending from Ermenred, it ſeems challeng'd the Crown; and wore it, though not commendably, one Year and a half: But coming to a violent Death, left the Land expos'd a Prey either to home-bred Uſurpers, or Neighbouring Invaders. Among whom Kedwalla, taking Advantage from their Civil Diſtempers, and marching eaſily through the South-Saxons, whom he had ſubdu'd, ſorely harraſs'd the Country, untouch'd of long time by any Hoſtile Incurſion. But the Kentiſh Men, all Parties uniting againſt a Common Enemy, with joynt Power ſo oppos'd him, that he was conſtrain'd to retire back; his Brother Mollo in the Fight with twelve Men of his Company, ſeeking Shelter in a Houſe, was beſet and therein burnt by the Purſuers: Kedwalla much troubl'd at ſo great a Loſs, recalling and ſoon rallying his diſordered Forces, return'd fiercely upon the chaſing Enemy; nor could be got out of the Province, till both by Fire and Sword, he had aveng'd the Death of his Brother. At length Victred the Son of Ecbert, attaining the Kingdom, both ſettl'd at home all things in Peace, and ſecur'd his Borders from all outward Hoſtility. While thus Kedwalla diſquieted both Weſt and Eaſt, after his winning the Crown, Ecfrid the Northumbrian, and Ethelfred the Mercian, fought a ſore Battel by the River Trent; wherein Elfwin Brother to Ecfrid, a Youth of eighteen Years, much belov'd, was ſlain; and the Accident likely to occaſion much more ſhedding of Blood, Peace was happily made by the grave Exhortation of Arch-biſhop Theodore, a Pecuniary Fine only paid to Ecfrid, as ſome Satisfaction for the Loſs of his Brother's Life. Another Adverſity befel Ecfrid in his Family, by means of Ethildrith his Wife, King Anna's Daughter, who having taken him for her Husband, and profeſſing to love him above all other Men, perſiſted twelve Years in the obſtinate Refuſal of his Bed, thereby thinking to live the purer Life. So perverſly then was Chaſtity inſtructed againſt the Apoſtles Rule. At length obtaining of him with much Importunity her Departure, ſhe veild her ſelf a Nun, then made Abbeſs of Ely, dy'd ſeven Years after the Peſtilence; and might with better Warrant have kept faithfully her undertaken Wedlock, though now canoniz'd St. Audrey of Ely. In the mean while Ecfrid had ſent Bertus with a Power to ſubdue Ireland, a harmleſs Nation, ſaith Beda, and ever friendly to the Engliſh; in both which they ſeem to have left a Poſterity much unlike them at this Day: Miſerably waſted, without regard had to Places hallowed or profane, they betook them partly to their Weapons, partly to implore Divine Aid; and, as was thought, obtain'd it in their full Avengement upon Ecfrid, for he the next Year, againſt the Mind and Perſuaſion of his ſageſt Friends, and eſpecially of Cudbert, a famous Biſhop of that Age, marching unadviſedly againſt the Picts, who long before had been ſubject to Northumberland, was by them, feigning flight, drawn unawares into narrow Streights overtopt with Hills, and cut off with moſt of his Army. From which time, ſaith Bede, Military Valour began among the Saxons to decay, nor only the Picts till then peaceable, but ſome part of the Britains alſo recover'd by Arms their Liberty for many Years after. Yet Aldfrid elder, but baſe Brother to Ecfrid, a Man ſaid to be learned in the Scriptures, recall'd from Ireland, to which Place in his Brother's Reign he had retir'd, and now ſucceeding, upheld with much Honour, though in narrower Bounds, the reſidue of his Kingdom. Kedwalla having now with great diſturbance of his

All which notwithstanding, surpriz'd with a Disease, he out-liv'd not the Ceremony so far sought, much above the space of five weeks, in the thirtieth Year of his Age, and in the Church of St. Peter was there bury'd, with a large Epitaph upon his Tomb. Him succeeded Ina of the Royal Family, and from the time of his coming in, for many Years oppress'd the Land with like Grievances, as Kedwalla had done before him, insomuch that in those times there was no Bishop among them. His first Expedition was into Kent, to demand satisfaction for the burning of Mollo: Victred, loth to hazard all for the rash Act of a few, deliver'd up thirty of those that could be found accessory; or, as others say, pacify'd Ina with a great Sum of Money [b]. Mean while, at the incitement of Ecbert, a devout Monk, Wilbrod a Priest, eminent for Learning, pass'd over Sea, having twelve others in Company, with intent to preach the 694. Gospel in Germany. And coming to Pepin, chief Regent of the Franks, who a little before had conquer'd the hither Frisia, by his Countenance and Protection, promise also of many benefits to them who should believe, they found the Work of Conversion much the easier, and Wilbrod the first Bishop in that Nation [c]. But two Priests, each of them Hewald by Name, and for distinction surnam'd from the Colour of their Hair, the Black and the White, by his Example, piously affected to the Souls of their Countrymen the old Saxons, at their coming thither to convert them, met with much worse entertainment. For in the House of a Farmer, who had promis'd to convey them, as they desir'd, to the Governour of that Country, discover'd by their daily Ceremonies to be Christian Priests, and the cause of their coming suspected, they were by him and his Heathen Neighbours cruelly butcher'd; yet not unaveng'd, for the Governour enrag'd at such Violence offer'd to his Strangers, sending arm'd Men, slew all those Inhabitants, and burnt their Village. 697. After three Years in Mercia, Osfred the Queen, Wife to Ethelred, was kill'd by her own Nobles, as Beda's Epitome records; Florence calls them Southimbrians, negligently omitting the Cause of 698. so strange a Fact. And the Year following, Bertred, a Northumbrian General, was slain by the Picts. 704. Ethelred, seven Years after the violent Death of his Queen, put on the * Monk, and resign'd his Kingdom to Kenred the Son of Wulfer his Brother. The next Year, Aldfrid in Northumberland dy'd, leaving Osred a Child of eight Years 705. to succeed him. Four Years after which, Kenred 709. having a while with praise govern'd the Mercian Kingdom, went to Rome in the time of Pope Constantine, and shorn a Monk spent there the residue of his Days. Kelred succeded him, the Son of Ethelred, who had reign'd the next before.

Malms. Sax. An. Ethelwerd.

With Kenred went Offa the Son of Siger, King of East-Saxons, and betook him to the same Habit, leaving his Wife and Native Country; a comely Person in the prime of his Youth, much desir'd of the People; and such his Virtue, by report, as might have otherwise been worthy to have reign'd. Ina the West-Saxon one Year after fought a Battel, 710. at first doubtful, at last successful, against [b] Gerent King of Wales. The next Year Bertfrid, another Northumbrian Captain, fought with the Picts, and 711. slaughter'd them, saith Huntingdon, to the full avengement of Ecfrid's Death. The fourth Year after, Ina had another doubtful and cruel Battel 715. at Wodnesburg in Wiltshire, with Kelred the Mercian, who dy'd the Year following a lamentable Death: For as he sat one day feasting with his Nobles, 716. suddenly possess'd with an Evil Spirit, he expir'd in despair, as Boniface Archbishop of Mentz, an Englishman, who taxes him for a defiler of Nuns, writes by way of caution to Ethelbald, his next of kin, who succeeded him. Osred also the young Northumbrian King, slain by his Kindred in the eleventh of his Reign, for his vicious Life and Incest committed with Nuns; was by Kenred succeeded and aveng'd. He Reigning two Years, left Osric in his room. In whose seventh Year, if Beda 718. calculate right, Victred King of Kent deceas'd, having reign'd thirty four Years, and some part of them with Suebhard, as Beda testifies. He left L. 5. c. 9. behind him three Sons, Ethelbert, Eadbert, and 725. Alric his Heirs [e]. Three Years after which, ap- 728. pear'd two Comets about the Sun, terrible to behold, the one before him in the Morning, the other after him in the Evening, for the space of two Weeks in January, bending their Blaze toward the North; at which time the Saracens furiously invaded France, but were expell'd soon after with great overthrow. The same Year in Northumberland, Osric dying or slain, adopted Beda. l. 5. Kelwulf the Brother of Kenred his Successor, to f. 24. whom Beda dedicates his Story; but writes this only of him, that the beginning and the process of his Reign met with many adverse Commotions, whereof the event was then doubtfully expected. Mean while Ina seven Years before having slain Kenwulf, to whom Florent gives the addition of Clito, given usually to none but of the Blood Royal, and the fourth Year after overthrown and slain Albright another Clito, driven from Taunton to the South-Saxons for aid, vanquish'd also the East-Angles in more than one Battel, as Malmsbury writes, but not the Year, whether to expiate so much Blood, or infected with the contagious Humour of those Times, Malmsbury saith, at the persuasion of Ethelburga his Wife, went to Rome, and there ended his Days; yet this praise left behind him, to have made good Laws, the first of Saxon that remain extant to this day, and to his Kinsman Edelard, bequeath'd the Crown: No less than the whole Monarchy of England and Wales. For Ina, if we believe a digression in the Ina Laws of Edward Confessor, was the first King crown'd crown'd of English and British, since the Saxon King of entrance; of the British by means of his second England Wife, some way related to Cadwallader last King and Wales. of Wales, which I had not noted, being unlikely,

Other Welsh Authors pretend, Cadwalla here mention'd was their King Cadwallader; who, according to Caradoc, publish'd by Dr. Powell, went to Rome, Anno 664. and dy'd there eight Years afterwards.

but for the place where I found it[a]. After Ina, by a ſurer Author, Ethelbald King of Mercia commanded all the Provinces on this ſide Humber, with their Kings; the Picts were in League with the Engliſh, the Scots peaceable within their bounds, and the Britains part were in their own Government, part ſubject to the Engliſh. In which peaceful ſtate of the Land, many in Northumberland, both Nobles and Commons, laying aſide the exerciſe of Arms, betook them to the Cloiſter: And not content ſo to do at home, many in the Days of Ina, Clerks and Laicks, Men and Women, haſting to Rome in Herds, thought themſelves no where ſure of Eternal Life, till they were cloiſter'd there. Thus repreſenting the ſtate of things in this Iſland, Beda ſurceas'd to write. Out of whom chiefly hath been gather'd, ſince the Saxons arrival, ſuch as hath been deliver'd, a ſcatter'd Story pick'd out here and there, with ſome trouble and tedious work from among his many Legends of Viſions and Miracles; toward the latter end ſo bare of Civil Matters, as what can be thence collected may ſeem a Kalendar rather than a Hiſtory, taken up for the moſt part with Succeſſion of Kings, and Computation of Years, yet thoſe hard to be reconcil'd with the Saxon Annals. Their Actions, we read of, were moſt commonly Wars, but for what Cauſe wag'd, or by what Counſels carry'd on, no care was had to let us know: Whereby their Strength and Violence we underſtand, of their Wiſdom, Reaſon, or Juſtice, little or nothing, the reſt Superſtition and Monaſtical Affectation; Kings, one after another, leaving their Kingly Charge, to run their Heads fondly into a Monk's Cowle: Which leaves us uncertain, whether Beda was wanting to his Matter, or his Matter to him. Yet from hence to the Daniſh Invaſion it will be worſe with us, deſtitute of Beda. Left only to obſcure and blockiſh Chronicles; whom Malmſbury and Huntingdon, (for neither they than we had better Authors of thoſe times) ambitious to adorn the Hiſtory, make no ſcruple oft-times, I doubt, to interline with Conjectures and Surmiſes of their own: Them rather than imitate, I ſhall chooſe to repreſent the Truth naked, though as lean as a plain Journal. Yet William of Malmſbury muſt be acknowledg'd, both for Stile and Judgment, to be by far the beſt Writer of them all: But what labour is to be endur'd, turning over Volumes of Rubbiſh in the reſt, Florence of Worceſter, Huntingdon, Simeon of Durham, Hoveden, Matthew of Weſtminſter, and many others of obſcurer note, with all their Monachiſms, is a penance to think. Yet theſe are our only Regiſters, Tranſcribers one after another for the moſt part, and ſometimes worthy enough for the things they regiſter. This travel rather than not know at once what may be known of our Antient Story, ſifted from Fables and Impertinences, I voluntarily undergo; and to ſave others, if they pleaſe, the like unpleaſing labour; except thoſe who take pleaſure to be all their Life-time raking in the Foundations of old Abbies and Cathedrals: But to my Task now as it befalls. In the Year 733. on the 18th Kalends of September, was an Eclipſe of the Sun about the third Hour of day, abſcuring almoſt his whole Orb, as with a black Shield[b]. Ethelbald of Mercia beſieg'd and took the Caſtle or Town of Somerton: And two Years after, Beda our Hiſtorian dy'd, ſome ſay the Year before. Kelwulf in Northumberland three Years after became Monk in Lindisfarne, yet none of the ſevereſt; for he brought thoſe Monks from Milk and Water, to Wine and Ale; in which Doctrine no doubt but they were ſoon docile; and well might, for Kelwulf[c] brought with him good Proviſion, great Treaſure and Revenues of Land, recited by Simeon, yet all under pretence of following (I uſe the Author's words) poor Chriſt, by voluntary Poverty: No marvel then if ſuch applauſe were given by Monkiſh Writers to Kings turning Monks, and much Cunning perhaps us'd to allure them. To Eadbert, his Uncle's Son, he left the Kingdom, whoſe Brother Ecbert, Archbiſhop of York, built a Library there. But two Years after, while Eadbert was buſy'd in War againſt the Picts, Ethelbald the Mercian, by foul fraud, aſſaulted part of Northumberland in his abſence, as the Supplement of Beda's Epitomy records. In the Weſt-Saxons, Edelard who ſucceeded Ina, having been much moleſted in the beginning of his Reign, with the Rebellion of Oſwald his Kinſman, who contended with him for the Right of Succeſſion; overcoming at laſt thoſe Troubles, dy'd in Peace 741, leaving Cuthred one of the ſame Lineage to ſucceed him: Who at firſt had much War with Ethelbald the Mercian, and various ſucceſs, but joining with him in League two Years after, made War on the Welſh: Huntingdon doubts not to give them a great Victory. And Simeon reports, another Battel fought between Britains and Picts the Year enſuing. Now was the Kingdom of Eaſt-Saxons drawing to a Period; for Sigeard and Senfred, the Sons of Sebbi, having reign'd a while, and after them young Offa, who ſoon quitted his Kingdom to go to Rome with Kenred, as hath been ſaid, the Government was conferr'd on Selred Son of Sigebert the Good, who having rul'd thirty eight Years, came to a violent Death; how or wherefore, is not ſet down. After whom Swithred was the laſt King, driven out by Ecbert the Weſt-Saxon: But London, with the Countries adjacent, obey'd the Mercians till they alſo were diſſolv'd. Cuthred had now reign'd about nine Years, when Kenric his Son a valiant young Prince, was in military tumult ſlain by his own Soldiers. The ſame Year Eadbert dying in Kent, his Brother Edilbert reign'd in his ſtead. But after two Years, the other Eadbert in Northumberland, whoſe War with the Picts hath been above mention'd, made now ſuch progreſs there, as to ſubdue Kyle[d], ſo ſaith the Auctary of Bede, and other Countries thereabout, to his dominion; while Cuthred the Weſt-Saxon had a Fight with Ethelbun, one of his Nobles, a ſtout Warrier, envy'd by him in ſome matter of the Commonwealth, as far as by the Latin of Ethelwerd can be underſtood, (others interpret it Sedition) and with much ado overcoming, took Ethelbun for his Valour into Favour, by whom faithfully ſerv'd in the twelfth or thirteenth of his Reign, he encounter'd in a ſet Battel with Ethelbald the Mercian at Beorford, now Burford in Oxfordſhire; one Year after againſt the Welch, which was the laſt but one of his Life. Huntingdon, as his manner is to comment upon the Annal Text, makes a terrible Deſcription of that Fight between Cuthred and Mean while Offa the Mercian, growing powerful, had ſubdu'd a Neighbouring People, by Simeon call'd Heſtings [c]; and fought ſucceſsfully this Year with Alric King of Kent, at a Place call'd * Otford: The Annals alſo ſpeak of wondrous * Otford in Kent. Serpents then ſeen in Suſſex. Nor had Kinwulf the Weſt-Saxon given ſmall proof of his Valour in ſeveral Battels againſt the Welch heretofore, but this Year 775. meeting with Offa, at a Place 775. call'd † Beſington, was put to the worſe, and Offa *Sax. In † Benſington in Oxfordſhire, now Benſon. Northumberland, Ethelred having caus'd three of his Nobles, Aldwulf, Kinwulf, and Ecca, treacherouſly to be ſlain by two other Peers, was 778. himſelf the next Year driven into Baniſhment [d], Sim. Dun. Elfwald the Son of Oſwulf ſucceeding in his Place, yet not without Civil Broils; for in his ſecond 780. Year Oſbald and Ethelbeard, two Nobleinen, Sim. Dun. raiſing Forces againſt him, routed Bearne his General, and purſuing, burnt him at a Place call'd Seletune. I am ſenſible how weariſome it may likely be to read of ſo many bare and reaſonleſs Actions, ſo many Names of Kings one after another, acting little more than mute Perſons in a Scene; What would it be to have inſerted the long Bead-roll of Arch-biſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Abbeſſes, and their Doings, neither to Religion profitable, nor to Morality, ſwelling my Authors each to a voluminous Body, by me ſtudiouſly omitted; and left as their Propriety, who have a mind to write the Eccleſiaſtical Matters of thoſe Ages; neither do I care to wrinkle the Smoothneſs of Hiſtory with rugged Names of Places unknown, better harp'd at in Cambden, and other Chorographers. A. D. 788. of Kerdic the Founder of that Kingdom. Not better was the end of Elfwald in Northumberland, two Years after ſlain miſerably by the Conſpiracy of Siggan, one of his Nobles, others ſay of the whole People at Scilceſter by the Roman Wall; yet undeſervedly, as his Sepulchre at Hagulſtald, now Hexham upon Tine, and ſome Miracles there ſaid to be done, are alledg'd to witneſs; and Siggan five Years after laid violent hands on himſelf. Oſred, Son of Alcred, advanc'd into the room of Elfwald, and within one Year driven out, left his Seat vacant to Ethelred Son of Mollo, who after ten Years of Baniſhment (Impriſonment, ſaith Alcuin) had the Scepter put again into his hand. The third Year of Birthric King of Weſt-Saxons, gave beginning from abroad to a new and fatal Revolution of Calamity on this Land. For three Daniſh Ships, the firſt that had been ſeen here of that Nation arriving in the Weſt, to viſit theſe, as was ſuppos'd, Foreign Merchants, the King's Gatherer of Cuſtoms taking Horſe from Dorcheſter [a], found them Spies and Enemies. For being commanded to come and give account of their lading at the King's Cuſtom-Houſe, they ſlew him and all who came with him; as an earneſt of the many Slaughters, Rapines, and Hoſtilities, which they return'd not long after to commit over all the Iſland. Of this Daniſh firſt Arrival, and on a ſudden worſe than Hoſtile Aggreſſion, the Daniſh Hiſtory far otherwiſe relates, as if their landing had been at the Mouth of Humber, and their ſpoilful March far into the Country; tho' ſoon repell'd by the Inhabitants, they haſted back as faſt to their Ships: But from what Cauſe, what Reaſon of State, what Authority or Publick Council the Invaſion proceeded, makes not mention, and our Wonder yet the more, by telling us that Sigefrid then King in Denmark, and long after, was a Man ſtudious more of Peace and Quiet than of Warlike Matters. Theſe therefore ſeem rather to have been ſome Wanderers at Sea, who with publick Commiſſion, or without, through Love of Spoil, or Hatred of Chriſtianity, ſeeking Booties on any Land of Chriſtians, came by Chance or Weather on this Shoar. The next Year Oſred in Northumberland, who driven out by his Nobles had given place to Ethelred, was taken and forcibly ſhaven a Monk at York. And the Year after, Oelf, and Oelfwin, Sons of Elfwald, formerly King, formerly King, were drawn by fair Promiſes from the Principal Church of York, and after by Command of Ethelred, cruelly put to Death at Wonwaldremere, a Village by the great Pool in Lancaſhire, now call'd Winandermere*. Nor was the third Year leſs bloody; for Oſred, who not liking a ſhaven Crown, had deſired Baniſhment and obtain'd it, returning from the Iſle of Man with ſmall Forces, at the ſecret but deceitful Call of certain Nobles, who by Oath had promis'd to aſſiſt him, was alſo taken, and by Ethelred dealt with in the ſame manner; who the better to avouch his Cruelties, thereupon married Elfled the Daughter of Offa: For in Offa was found as little Faith or Mercy. He the ſame Year having drawn to his Palace Ethelbrite King of Eaſt-Angles, with fair Invitations to marry his Daughter, caus'd him to be there inhoſpitably beheaded, and his Kingdom wrongfully ſeiz'd, by the wicked Counſel of his Wife, ſaith Mat. Weſt. annexing thereto a long unlikely Tale. For which Violence and Bloodſhed to make Attonement, with Fryars at leaſt, he beſtows the Reliques of St. Alban, in a Shrine of Pearl and Gold. Far worſe it far'd the next Year with the Reliques in Lendisfarne; where the Danes landing, pillag'd that Monaſtery, and of Fryars kill'd ſome, carried away others Captive, ſparing neither Prieſt nor Lay: Which many ſtrange Thunders and fiery Dragons, with other Impreſſions in the Air ſeen frequently before, were judg'd to foreſignifie. This Year Alric third Son of Victred, ended in Kent his long Reign of thirty four Years. With him ended the Race of Hengiſt: Thenceforth whomſoever Wealth or Faction advanc'd, took on him the Name and State of a King. The Saxon Annals of 784. name Ealmund then reigning in Kent; but that conſiſts not with the time of Alric, and I find him no where elſe mention'd. The Year following was remarkable for the Death of Offa the Mercian, a ſtrenuous and ſubtle King; he had much intercourſe with Charles the Great, at firſt Enmity, to the interdicting of Commerce on either ſide, at length much Amity and firm League, as appears by the Letter of Charles himſelf yet extant, procur'd by [b] Alcuin a learned and prudent Man, though a Monk, whom the Kings of England in thoſe Days had ſent Orator into France, to maintain good Correſpondence between them and Charles the Great. He granted, ſaith Huntingdon, a perpetual Tribute to the Pope, out of every Houſe in his Kingdom; for yielding perhaps to tranſlate the Primacy of Canterbury to Lichfield in his own Dominion. He drew a Trench [c] of wondrous length [d] between Mercia and the Britiſh Confines, from Sea to Sea. Ecſerth the Son of Offa, a Prince of great Hope, who alſo had been crown'd nine Years before his Father's Deceaſe, reſtoring to the Church what his Father had ſeiz'd on: Yet within four Months by a Sickneſs ended his Reign. And to Kenulf next in right of the ſame Progeny bequeath'd his Kingdom. Mean while the Daniſh Pirates who ſtill waſted Northumberland, ventring on Shoar to ſpoil another Monaſtery at the Mouth of the River Don, were aſſail'd by the Engliſh, their Chief Captain ſlain on the Place; then returning to Sea, were moſt of them ſhip-wrack'd; others driven again on Shoar, were put all to the Sword. Simeon attributes this their Puniſhment to the Power of St. Cudbert, offended with them for the rifling of his Covent. Two Years after this, dy'd Ethelred twice King, but not exempted at laſt from the Fate of many his Predeceſſors, miſerably ſlain by his People, ſome ſay deſervedly, as not inconſcious with them who train'd Oſred to his Ruine. Osbald, a Nobleman, exalted to the Throne, and in leſs than a Month, deſerted and expelled, was forc'd to fly at laſt from Lindisfarne by Sea to the Pictiſh King, and dy'd an Abbot. Eardulf whom Ethelred ſix Years before had commanded to be put to Death at Ripun, before the Abbey-Gate, dead as was ſuppos'd, and with ſolemn Dirge carried into the Church, after Midnight found there alive, I read not how, then baniſh'd, now recall'd was in York created King. The ſame Year London, with a great multitude of her Inhabitants, by a 800. ſudden Fire was conſum'd. The Year 800 made way for great alteration in England, uniting her ſeven Kingdoms into one, by Ecbert the famous Weſt-Saxon; him Birthric dying Childleſs left next to Reign, the only Surviver of that Lineage, deſcended from Inegild the Brother of Malmſb. King Ina. And according to his Birth liberally bred, he began early from his Youth to give ſignal hopes of more than ordinary Worth growing up in him; which Birthric fearing, and withal his juſter Title to the Crown, ſecretly ſought his Life, and Ecbirt perceiving, fled to Offa the Mercian: But he having marry'd Eadburg his Daughter to Birthric, eaſily gave ear to *Sax. The ſame day Ethelmund at [b] Kinmereſford, paſſing over with the Worceſterſhire Men, was met by Weolſtan another Nobleman with thoſe of Wiltſhire, between whom happen'd a great Fray, wherein the Wiltſhire Men overcame, but both Dukes were ſlain; no reaſon of their Quarrel written. Keolwulf, the Brother of Kenulf, after one Year's Reign was driven out by one Bernulf an Usurper: Who in his third Year, uncertain whether invading or invaded, was by Ecbert, though with great loss on both sides, overthrown and put to flight at Ellandune, or Wilton: Yet Malmsbury accounts this Battel fought in 806, a wide difference, but frequently found in their Computations. Bernulf thence retiring to the East-Angles, as part of his Dominion by the late Seazure of Offa, was by them met in the Field and slain: But they doubting what the Mercians might do in revenge hereof, forthwith yielded themselves, both King and People, to the Sovereignty of Ecbert. As for the Kings of East-Angles, our Annals mention them not since Ethelwald; him succeeded his Brother's Sons, as we find in Malmsbury, Aldulf (a good King, well acquainted with Bede) and Elwold who left the Kingdom to Beorn, he to Ethelred the Father of this Ethelbrite, whom Offa perfidiously put to Death. Simeon and Hoveden, in the Year 749, write, that Elfwald King of East-Angles dying, Humbeanna and Albert shar'd the Kingdom between them; but where to insert this among the former Successions, is not easie, nor much material: After Ethelbrite none is nam'd of that Kingdom till their submitting now to Ecbert: He from this Victory against Bernulf sent part of his Army under Ethelwulf his Son, with Alstan Bishop of Shirburn, and Wulfred a Chief Commander, into Kent. Who finding Baldred there Reigning in his eighteenth Year, overcame and drove him over the Thames; whereupon all Kent, Surrey, Sussex, and lastly Essex, with her King Swithred, became subject to the Dominion of Ecbert. Neither were these all his Exploits of this Year, the first in order set down in Saxon Annals, being his Fight against the Devonshire Welsh, at a place call'd Gafulford, now Camelford in Cornwall. Ludiken the Mercian, after two Years preparing to avenge Bernulf his Kinsman on the East-Angles, was by them with his five Consuls, as the Annals call them, surpriz'd and put to the Sword: And Withlaf his Successor first vanquish'd, then upon submission with all Mercia, made Tributary to Ecbert. Mean while the Northumbrian Kingdom of it self was fallen to shivers; their Kings, one after another, so often slain by the People, no Man daring, tho' never so ambitious, to take up the Scepter, which many had found so hot, (the only effectual Cure of Ambition that I have read) for the space of thirty three Years after the Death of Ethelred Son of Mollo, as Malmsbury writes, there was no King: Many Noblemen and Prelates were fled the Country. Which mis-rule among them, the Danes having understood, oft-times from their Ships entring far into the Land, infested those parts with wide depopulation, wasting Towns, Churches and Monasteries, for they were yet Heathen: The Lent before whose coming, on the North-side of St. Peter's Church in York, was seen from the Roof to rain Blood. The Causes of these Calamities, and the Ruine of that Kingdom, Alcuin, a learned Monk living in those Days, attributes in several Epistles, and well may, to the general ignorance and decay of Learning, which crept in among them after the Death of Beda, and of Ecbert the Archbishop; their neglect of breeding up Youth in the Scriptures, the spruce and gay Apparel of their Priests and Nuns, discovering their vain and wanton Minds; Examples are also read, even in Beda's Days, of their wanton Deeds: Thence Altars defil'd with Perjuries, Cloisters violated with Adulteries, the Land polluted with Blood of their Princes, Civil Dissentions among the People, and finally all the same Vices which Gildas alledg'd of old to have ruin'd the Britains. In this estate, Ecbert, who had now conquer'd all the South, finding them in the Year 827, (for he was march'd thither with an Army to compleat his Conquest of the whole Island) no wonder if they submitted themselves to the Yoke without resistance, Eandred their King becoming Tributary. Thence turning his Forces the Year following, he subdu'd more throughly what remain'd of North-Wales.

THE History of ENGLAND,

By Mr. JOHN MILTON. Book V.

A. D. 828.

THE Sum of things in this Island, or the best part thereof, reduc'd now under the Power of one Man; and him one of the worthiest, which, as far as can be found in good Authors, was by none attain'd at any time here before unless in Fables; Men might with some Reason have expected from such Union, Peace and Plenty, Greatness, and the flourishing of all Estates and Degrees: But far the contrary fell out soon after, Invasion, Spoil, Desolation, Slaughter of many, Slavery of the rest, by the forcible landing of a fierce Nation; Danes commonly called, and sometimes Dacians, by others, the same with Normans; as barbarous as the Saxons themselves were at first reputed, and much more; for the Saxons first invited came hither to dwell; these unsent for, unprovok'd, came only to destroy. But if the Saxons, as is above related, came most of them from Jutland and Anglen, a part of Denmark, as Danish Writers affirm, and that Danes and Normans are the same; then in this Invasion, Danes drove out Danes, their own Posterity. And Normans afterwards, none but Ancienter Normans. Which Invasion perhaps, had the Heptarchy stood divided as it was, had either not been attempted, or not uneasily resisted; while each Prince and People, excited by their neareſt Concernments, had more industriously defended their own Bounds, than depending on the neglect of a deputed Governour, sent oft-times from the remote residence of a secure Monarch. Though as it fell out in those Troubles, the lesser Kingdoms revolting from the West-Saxon Yoke, and not aiding each other, too much concern'd with their own Safety, it came to no better pass; while severally they sought to repel the Danger nigh at hand, rather than jointly to prevent it far off. But when God hath decreed Servitude on a sinful Nation, fitted by their own Vices for no Condition but servile, all Estates of Government are alike unable to avoid it. God had purpos'd to punish our instrumental Punishers, though now Christians, by other Heathen, according to his Divine Retaliation; Invasion for Invasion, Spoil for Spoil, Destruction for Destruction. The Saxons were now full as wicked as the Britains were at their Arrival, broken with Luxury and Sloth, either secular, or superstitious; for laying aside the Exercise of Arms, and the Study of all vertuous Knowledge, some betook them to over-worldly or vicious Practice, others to Religious Idleness and Solitude, which brought forth nothing but vain and delusive Visions; easily perceiv'd such, by their commanding of things, either not belonging to the Gospel, or utterly forbidden, Ceremonies, Reliques, Monasteries, Masses, Idols, add to these Ostentation of Alms, got of-times by Rapine and Oppression, or intermixt with violent and lustful Deeds, sometimes prodigally bestow'd, as the Expiation of Cruelty and Bloodshed. What longer suffering could there be, when Religion it self grew so void of Sincerity, and the greatest Shews of Purity were impur'd. A. D. 828.

ECBERT.

Egbert first Monarch of England, which Name was at this time given to this Kingdom.

Ecbert in full heighth of Glory, having now enjoy'd his Conquest seven peaceful Years, his victorious Army long since disbanded, and the Exercise of Arms perhaps laid aside, the more was found unprovided against a sudden Storm of Danes from the Sea, who landing in the 32 of his Reign, wasted Shepey in Kent. Ecbert the next Year, gathering an Army, for he had heard of their Arrival in 35 Ships, gave them Battel by the River Carr [a] in Dorsetshire; the Event whereof was, that the Danes kept their Ground, and encamp'd where the Field was fought; two Saxon Leaders, Dudda and Osmund, and two Bishops as some say, were there slain. This was the only Check of Fortune we read of, that Ecbert in all his time receiv'd. For the Danes returning two Years after with a great Navy, and joining Forces with the Cornish, who had enter'd League with them, were overthrown and put to flight [b]. Of these Invasions against Ecbert, the Danish History is not silent; whether out of their own Records or ours, may be justly doubted; for of these times at home, I find them in much Uncertainty, and beholding rather to Out-landish Chronicles than any Records of their own. The Victor Ecbert, as one who had done enough, seasonably now, after prosperous Success, the next Year with Glory ended his Days, and was buried at Winchester.

Mat. West. whose Authority is Elder, saith plainly, that both these Countries and Sussex, were bequeath'd to Ethelstan by Ecbert his Father. The unwarlike Disposition of Ethelwolf, gave Encouragement no doubt, and easier Entrance to the

Worse was the Success of Earl Herebert at a Place call'd

And to be yet farther like him in Fate, was slain the fourth Year after. Osbert succeeded in his room. But more

Sax. An. some stop in the full course of their outragious Insolences. For Earnulf with the Men of Somerset, Alstan the Bishop, and Osric with those of Dorsetshire, setting upon them at the River's Mouth of * Pedridan, slaughter'd them in great Num-

Hard it is through the bad Expression of these Writers to define this Fight, whether by Sea or Land; Hoveden terms it a Huntingd. Mat. Mat. Sea-fight. Nevertheless, with fifty Ships (Asser and others add three Hundred) they enter'd the Mouth of Thames, and made Excursions as far as Canterbury and London, and as Ethelwerd writes destroy'd both; of London, Asser signifies only that they pillag'd it. Bertulf also the Mercian, Successor of Withlaf, with all his Army they forc'd to fly, and him beyond the Sea. This done, Ethelwolf sent his Son Alfrid a Child of five Years, well accompanied to Rome, whom Leo the Pope both consecrated to be King afterward, and adopted to be his Son; at home Ealker with the Forces of Kent, and Huda with those of Surrey, fell on the Danes at their landing in Tanet, and at first put them back; but the slain and drown'd were at length so many on either side, as left the Loss equal on both: Which yet hinder'd not the Solemnity of a Marriage [f] at the Feast of Malmsb.

The Disturbance was expected to bring forth nothing less than War: But the King abhorring Civil-Discord, after many Conferences tending to Peace, condescended to divide the Kingdom with his Son; Division was made, but the Matter so carried, that the Eastern and worst part was malignly afforded to the Father: The Western and best given to the Son, at which many of the Nobles had great Indignation, offering to the King their utmost Assistance for the Recovery of all; whom he peacefully dissuading, sat down contented with his Portion assign'd. A. D. 857. Picts, who not long before had by the Scots been driven out of their Country, part of them coming to Oſbert and Ella, then Kings of Northumberland, obtain'd Aid againſt Donaldus the Scotiſh King, to recover their Ancient Poſſeſſion. Oſbert, who in Perſon undertook the Expedition, marching into Scotland, was at firſt put to a Retreat; but returning ſoon after on the Scots, overſecure of their ſuppos'd Victory, put them to flight with great ſlaughter, took Priſoner their King, and purſu'd his Victory beyond Sterlingbridge. The Scots unable to reſiſt longer, and by Ambaſſadors intreating Peace, had it granted them on theſe Conditions: The Scots were to quit all they had poſſeſs'd within the Wall of Severus: The Limits of Scotland were beneath Sterlingbridge to be the River Forth, and on the other ſide Dumbritton-Frith; from that time ſo call'd of the Britiſh then ſeated in Cumberland, who had join'd with Oſbert in this Action, and ſo far extended on that ſide the Britiſh Limits. If this be true, as the Scotch Writers themſelves witneſs (and who would think them fabulous to the diſparagement of their own Country?) How much wanting have been our Hiſtorians to their Country's Honour, in letting paſs unmention'd an Exploit ſo memorable, by them remember'd and atteſted, who are wont ofter to extenuate than to amplifie ought done in Scotland by the Engliſh? Donaltus on theſe Conditions releas'd, ſoon after dies, according to Buchanan, in 858. Ethelwolf, chief King in England, had the Year before ended his Life, Mat. Weſt. and was bury'd as his Father at Winchеſter. He was from his Youth much addicted to Devotion; ſo that in his Father's time he was ordain'd Biſhop of Winchеſter; and unwillingly, for want of other Legitimate Iſſue, ſucceeded him in the Throne: Managing therefore his greateſt Affairs by the Activity of two Biſhops, Alſtan of Sherburne, and Swithin of Winchеſter. But Alſtan is Malmſb. noted of Covetouſneſs and Oppreſſion, by William of Malmſbury; the more vehemently, no doubt, for doing ſome notable damage to that Sigon. de Regn. Ital. l. 5. Monaſtery. The ſame Author writes, that Ethelwolf at Rome paid a Tribute to the Pope, continu'd to his Days. However he were facile to his Son and ſeditious Nobles, in yielding up part of his Kingdom; yet his Queen he treated not the leſs honourably, for whomſoever it diſ- Aſſer. pleas'd. The Weſt-Saxons had decreed, ever ſince the time of Eadburga, the infamous Wife of Birthric, that no Queen ſhould ſit in State with the King, or be dignify'd with the Title of Queen. But Ethelwolf permitted not that Judith his Queen ſhould loſe any point of Regal State by that Law. At his Death he divided the Kingdom between his two Sons, Ethelbald and Ethelbert; to the Younger, Kent, Eſſex, Surrey, Suſſex; to the Elder, all the reſt: To Peter and Paul certain Revenues yearly, for what Uſes let others relate, who write alſo his Pedigree, from Son to Father, up to Adam.

ETHELBALD, and ETHELBERT.

Aſſer. Malmſb. Sim. Dun. ETHELBALD, unnatural and diſloyal to his Father, fell juſtly into another, though contrary Sin, of too much Love to his Father's Wife; and whom at firſt he oppos'd coming into the Land, her now unlawfully marrying, he takes into his Bed; but not long enjoying, dy'd at three Years end, without doing ought more worthy to be remember'd; having Reign'd two Years with his Father, unpiouſly uſurping, and three after him, as unworthily inheriting. And his hap was all that while to be unmoleſted by the Danes; not of Divine Favour doubtleſs, but to his great Condemnation, living the more ſecurely his inceſtuous Life. Huntingdon on the other ſide much praiſes Ethelbald, and writes him bury'd at Sherburn, with great ſorrow of his People, who miſs'd him long after. Mat. Weſt. ſaith, that he repented of his Inceſt with Judith, and diſmiſs'd her: But Aſſer, an Eye-witneſs of thoſe Times, mentions no ſuch thing. A. D. 860. Sax. An.

ETHELBERT alone.

ETHELBALD by Death remov'd, the whole Kingdom came rightfully to Ethelbert his next Brother. Who though a Prince of great Virtue and no Blame, had as ſhort a Reign allotted him as his faulty Brother, nor that ſo peaceful; once or twice invaded by the Danes. But they having landed in the Weſt with a great Army, and ſack'd Winchеſter, were met by Oſric Earl of Southampton, and Ethelwolf of Barkſhire, beaten to their Ships, and forc'd to leave their Booty. Five Years after, about the time of his Death, 865. they ſet foot again in Tanet; the Kentiſhmen Sax. An. weary'd out with ſo frequent Alarms, came to agreement with them for a certain Sum of Money; but e're the Peace could be ratify'd, and the Money gather'd, the Danes impatient of delay by a ſudden Eruption in the Night, ſoon waſted all the Eaſt of Kent. Mean while, or ſomething before, Ethelbert deceaſing was bury'd as his Brother at Sherburn.

ETHELRED.

ETHELRED the third Son of Ethelwolf, at his firſt 866. coming to the Crown was entertain'd with a freſh Invaſion of Danes, led by Hinguar and Sax. An. Hubba, two Brothers, who now had got footing Huntingd. among the Eaſt-Angles; there they winter'd, and coming to terms of Peace with the Inhabitants *, *The furniſh'd themſelves of Horſes, forming by that Danes means many Troops with Riders of their own: winter'd in Theſe Pagans, Aſſer ſaith, came from the River England. Danubius. Fitted thus for a long Expedition, 867. they ventur'd the next Year to make their way Sax. An. over Land and over Humber, as far as York, them they found to their hands embroil'd in Civil Diſſentions; their King Oſbert they had thrown out, and Ella Leader of another Faction choſen in his room; who both, though late, admoniſh'd by their Common Danger, towards the Year's end, with United Powers made Head againſt the Danes and prevail'd; but purſuing them over-eagerly into York, then but ſlenderly wall'd, the North- Aſſer. thumbrians were every where ſlaughter'd, both within and without; their Kings alſo both ſlain, their City burnt, ſaith Malmſbury, the reſt as they could made their Peace, over-run and vanquiſh'd as far as the River Tine, and Ecbert of Engliſh Race appointed King over them. Bromton, no antient Author (for he wrote ſince Mat. Weſt.) nor of much Credit, writes a particular Cauſe of the Danes coming to York: That Bruern a Nobleman, whoſe Wife King Oſbert had raviſh'd, call'd in Hinguar and Hubba to revenge him. The Example is remarkable, if the Truth were as evident. Thence Victorious, the Danes next Year enter'd into Mercia towards Notting- 868. ham, where they ſpent the Winter. Burhed, then King of that Country, unable to reſiſt, implores,

868. Brother, they aſſembling their Forces and joining with the Mercians about Nottingham, offer Battel: The Danes, not daring to come forth, kept themſelves within that Town and Caſtle, ſo that no great Fight was hazarded there; at length the Mercians, weary of long ſuſpence, enter'd into Conditions of Peace with their Enemies. After which the Danes returning back to York, made their abode there the ſpace of one Year, committing, ſome ſay, many Cruelties.
869. Thence imbarking to Lindſey, and all the Sum-
Sim. Dun. mer deſtroying that Country, about September
870. they came with like Fury into Keſteven, ano-
Ingulf. ther part of Lincolnſhire, where Algar, the Earl of Howland, now Holland, with his Forces, and two hundred ſtout Soldiers belonging to the Abby of Croiland, three hundred from about Boſton, Morcard Lord of Brunne, with his numerous Family, well train'd and arm'd, Oſgot Governour of Lincoln, with five hundred of that City, all joining together, gave Battel to the Danes, ſlew of them a great multitude, with three of their Kings, and purſu'd the reſt to their Tents: But the Night following, Gotburn, Baſeg, Oſketil, Halfden and Hamond, five Kings; and as many Earls, Frena, Hinguar, Hubba, Sidroc the Elder and Younger, coming in from ſeveral parts with great Forces and Spoils, great part of the Engliſh began to ſlink home. Nevertheleſs Algar, with ſuch as forſook him not, all next Day in order of Battel facing the Danes, and ſuſtaining unmov'd the brunt of their Aſſaults, could not withhold his Men at laſt from purſuing their counterfeited flight; whereby open'd and diſorder'd, they fell into the Snares of their Enemies ruſhing back upon them. Algar, and thoſe Captains fore-nam'd with him, all reſolute Men, retreating to a Hill ſide, and ſlaying of ſuch as follow'd them, manifold their own number, dy'd at length upon heaps of Dead which they had made round about them. The Danes thence paſſing on into the Country of Eaſt-Angles, rifl'd and burnt the Monaſtery of Ely, overthrew Earl Wulketul with his whole Army, and lodg'd out the Winter at Thetford; where King Edmund aſſailing them, was with his whole Army put to flight, himſelf taken, bound to a Stake, and ſhot to Death with Arrows, his whole Country ſubdu'd *. The next Year with great Supplies, ſaith Huntingdon, bending their march toward the Weſt-Saxons, the only People now left, in whom might ſeem yet to remain Strengh or Courage likely to oppoſe them, they came to Reading, fortify'd there between the two Rivers of Thames and Kenet; and about three Days after, ſent out Wings of Horſe under two Earls to Aſſer. forage the Country; but Ethelwulf Earl of Barkſhire, at Engleſield a Village nigh, encounter'd them, ſlew one of their Earls, and obtain'd a great Victory. Four Days after came the King himſelf and his Brother Alfred with the main Battel; and the Danes iſſuing forth, a bloody Fight began, on either ſide great Slaughter, in which Earl Ethelwulf loſt his Life; but the Danes loſing no ground, kept their place of ſtanding to the end. Neither did the Engliſh for this make leſs haſte to another Conflict at Eceſdune, or Aſhdown †, four Days after, where both Armies with their whole Forces on either ſide met. The Danes were imbattel'd in two great Boddies, the A. D. one led by Baſcai and Halfden, their two Kings, 871. the other by ſuch Earls as were appointed: In like manner the Engliſh divided their Powers, Ethelred the King ſtood againſt their Kings; and though on the lower ground, and coming later into the Battel from his Oriſons, gave a fierce onſet, wherein Baſcai (the Daniſh Hiſtory names him Ivarus the Son of Regnerus) was ſlain. Alfred was plac'd againſt the Earls, and beginning the Battel e're his Brother came into the Field, with ſuch Reſolution charged them, that in the ſhock moſt of them were ſlain; they are nam'd; Sidroc, Elder and Younger, Oſbern, Frean, Harald; at length in both Diviſions, the Danes turn their backs; many thouſands of them cut off, the reſt purſu'd till Night. So much the more it may be wonder'd to hear next in the Annals, that the Danes fourteen Days after ſuch an Overthrow, fighting again with Ethelred and his Brother Alfred at Baſing, under conduct, ſaith the Daniſh Hiſtory, of Agnerus and Hubbo, Brothers of the ſlain Ivarus, ſhould obtain the Victory; eſpecially ſince the new Supply of Danes, mention'd by Aſſer, arriv'd after this Action. But after two Months, the King and his Brother Pontan. Hiſt. Dan. l. 4. fought with them again at Merrun ‖, in two Squadrons as before, in which Fight hard it is to underſtand who had the better; ſo darkly do the Saxon Annals deliver their Meaning with more than wonted infancy. Yet theſe I take (for Aſſer is here ſilent) to be the chief Fountain of our Story, the Ground and Baſis upon which the Monks later in time Gloſs and Comment at their Pleaſure. Nevertheleſs it appears, that on the Saxon part, not Heamund the Biſhop only, but many valiant Men loſt their Lives. This Fight was follow'd by a heavy Summer Plague; whereof, as is thought, King Ethelred dy'd in the fifth of his Reign, and was bury'd Cambden. at Winburne, where his Epitaph inſcribes, that he had his Death's Wound by the Danes, according to the Daniſh Hiſtory 872 [a]. Of all theſe terrible Landings and Devaſtations by the Danes, from the Days of Ethelwolf till their two laſt Battels with Ethelred, or of their Leaders, whether Kings, Dukes, or Earls, the Daniſh Hiſtory of beſt Credit ſaith nothing; ſo little Wit or Conſcience it ſeems they had to leave any Memory of their Britiſh, rather than Manly Actions; unleſs we ſhall ſuppoſe them to have come, as above was cited out of Aſſer, from Danubius, rather than from Denmark, more probably ſome barbarous Nations of Pruſſia, or Livonia, not long before ſeated more Northward on the Baltick Sea.

ALFRED.

ALfred [b] the fourth Son of Ethelwolf, had ſcarce perform'd his Brother's Obſequies, and the Solemnity of his own Crowning, when at the Month's end in haſte with a ſmall Power he encounter'd the whole Army of Danes at Wilton, and moſt part of the Day foil'd them; but unwarily following the Chaſe, gave others of them the advantage to rally; who returning upon him now weary, remained Maſters of the

[a] It appears by the Inſcription on his Tomb, which may be read in Winbourn Church, that he fell per manus Danorum Paganorum, by the hands of the Pagan Danes, the 23d of April, Anno 872.

[b] Aſſerius Menevenſis, Aſſer Biſhop of St. David's, wrote the Life of this Prince, in whoſe Reign he liv'd. The Life of King Alfred was alſo written at large by Sir John Spelman, (Son to Sir Henry) the Original Manuſcript whereof is now in the Bodleian Library. It was tranſlated into Latin; and publiſh'd in Folio, with Mr. Walker's Notes, ſome Years ago.

Field.

A. D. Field. This Year, as is affirm'd in the Annals,
871. nine Battels had been fought againſt the Danes on the South-ſide of Thames, beſides innumerable Excurſions made by Alfred and other Leaders; one King, nine Earls were fall'n in Fight, ſo that weary on both ſides at the Year's end, League
872. or Truce was concluded. Yet next Year the Sax. An. Danes took their march to London, now expos'd their Prey, there they winter'd, and thither came the Mercians to renew Peace with them. The Year following they rov'd back to the Parts beyond Humber, but winter'd at Torkſey in Lin-
873. colnſhire, where the Mercians now the third time
Sax. An. made Peace with them. Notwithſtanding which,
Camden. removing their Camp to Rependune in Mercia,
874. now Repton upon Trent in Darbyſhire, and there
Sax. An. wint'ring, they conſtrain'd Burhed the King to fly into Foreign Parts, making Seiſure of his Kingdom, he running the direct way to Rome, with better Reaſon than his Anceſtors, dy'd there, and was buried in a Church by the Engliſh School. His Kingdom the Danes farm'd out to Kelwulf, one of his Houſhold Servants or Officers, with Condition to be reſign'd them when they com-
875. manded. From Rependune they diſlodg'd, Haf-
Sax. Ann. den their King leading part of his Army Northward, winter'd by the River Tine, and ſubjecting all thoſe Quarters, waſted alſo the Picts and Britiſh beyond: But Cuthrun, Oſkitell, and Anwynd, other three of their Kings moving from
* Repton in Darbyſhire. † Cambridge. * Rependune, came with a great Army to † Grantbrig, and remain'd there a whole Year. Alfred that Summer purpoſing to try his Fortune with a Fleet at Sea (for he had found that the want of Shipping and Neglect of Navigation, had expos'd the Land to theſe Piracies) met with ſeven Daniſh Rovers, took one, the reſt eſcaping; an acceptable Succeſs from ſo ſmall a Beginning: For the Engliſh at that time were but little experi-
876. enc'd in Sea Affairs. The next Year's firſt Motion
Sax. An. of the Danes was towards Warham Caſtle: Where Alfred meeting them, either by Policy, or their Doubt of his Power; Ethelwerd ſaith, by Money brought them to ſuch Terms of Peace, as that they ſwore to him upon a hallow'd Bracelet,
Florent. others ſay upon certain Reliques (a ſolemn Oath it ſeems which they never vouchſafed before to any other Nation) forthwith to depart the Land: But falſifying that Oath, by Night with all the Florent. Horſe they had (Aſſer ſaith, ſlaying all the Horſemen he had) ſtole to Exeter, and there winter'd. In Northumberland, Hafden their King began to ſettle, to divide the Land, to till, and to inhabit. Mean while they in the Weſt who were marched to Exeter, enter'd the City, courſing 877. now and then to Warham; but their Fleet the
Sax. Ann. next Year ſailing or rowing about the Weſt, met
* Swanwick in Hampſhire. with ſuch a Tempeſt near to *Swanſwich, or Gnavewic, as wrack'd 120 of their Ships, and left the reſt eaſie to be maſter'd by thoſe Gallies
Aſſer. which Alfred had ſet there to guard the Seas, and ſtreiten Exeter of Proviſion. He the while beleaguering them in the City; now humbled with the Loſs of their Navy (two Navies, ſaith Aſſer, the one at Gnavewic, the other at Swanwine) diſtreſs'd them ſo, as that they gave him as many Hoſtages as he requir'd, and as many Oaths, to keep their covenanted Peace, and kept it. For the Summer coming on, they departed into Mercia, whereof part they divided amongſt themſelves, part left to Kelwulf their ſubſtituted King.
878. The Twelftide following, all Oaths forgotten,
Sax. An. they came to Chippenham in Wiltſhire, diſpeopling the Countries round, diſpoſſeſſing ſome, driving others beyond the Sea; Alfred himſelf with a ſmall Company was forc'd to keep within Woods and Fenny Places[a], and for ſome time all alone, as Florent ſaith, ſojourn'd with Dunwulf a Swine-herd, made afterwards for his Devotion, and Aptneſs to Learning, Biſhop of Winchester. Hafden and the Brother of Hinguar, Sim. Dun. coming with twenty three Ships from North-Wales, where they had made great Spoil, landed in Devonſhire, nigh to a ſtrong Caſtle nam'd Kinwith; where by the Garriſon iſſuing forth unexpectedly, they were ſlain with twelve Hundred of their Men. Mean while the King about Aſſer. Eaſter, not deſpairing of his Affairs, built a Fortreſs at a Place call'd Athelney in Somerſetſhire, therein valiantly defending himſelf and his Followers, frequently ſallying forth. The ſeventh Week after, he rode out to a Place call'd [b] Ecbryt-ſtone in the Eaſt part of Selwood: Thither reſorted to him with much Gratulation the Somerſet and Wiltſhire Men, with many out of Hamſhire, ſome of whom a little before had fled Camden. their Country; with theſe marching to Ethandune now Edindon in Wiltſhire, he gave Battel to the whole Daniſh Power, and put them to flight. Then beſieging their Caſtle, within fourteen Days took it. Malmſbury writes, that in this time of his receſs, to go a Spy into the Daniſh Camp, he took upon him with one Servant the Habit of a Fidler; by this means gaining acceſs to the King's Table, and ſometimes to his Bed-Chamber, got Knowledge of their Secrets, their careleſs encamping, and thereby this Opportunity of aſſailing them on a ſudden. The Danes by this Misfortune broken, gave him more Hoſtages, and renew'd their Oaths to depart out of his Kingdom. Their King Gytro, or Gothrun, offer'd willingly to receive Baptiſm, and accordingly came with thirty of his Friends, to a Camd. Place call'd Aldra, or * Aulre, near to Athelney,  Auler.* and were baptiz'd at Wedmore; where Alfred receiv'd him out of the Font, and nam'd him Athelſtan. After which, they abode with him twelve Days, and were diſmiſs'd with rich Preſents. Whereupon the Danes remov'd next Year

A. D. 885. Sim. Dun. inhabited by the Danes, which at the Mouth of Stour [a], meeting with sixteen Danish Ships, after some fight took them all, and slew the Soldiers aboard; but in their way home lying careless, were overtaken by another part of that Fleet, and came off with Loss; whereupon perhaps those Danes who were settl'd among the East-Angles, erected with new Hopes, violated the Peace which they had sworn to Alfred, who 886. Sax. An. spent the next Year in repairing London, (besieging, saith Huntingdon) much ruin'd and unpeopl'd by the Danes; the Londoners, all but those who had been led away Captive, soon return'd to their Dwellings, and Ethred Duke of Sim. Dun. Mercia, was by the King appointed their Governour [b]. 893. Sax. An. But after thirteen Years respite of Peace, another Danish Fleet of 250 Sail [c], from the East part of France arriv'd at the Mouth of a River in East Kent, call'd [d] Limen, nigh to the great Wood [e] Andred, famous for Length and Breadth; into that Wood they drew up their Ships four Mile from the River's Mouth, and built a Fortress. After whom Haesten with another Danish Fleet of Eighty Ships, entring the Mouth of Thames, built a Fort at Middleton, the former Army remaining at a Place call'd Apeltre. Appledore in Kent. Alfred perceiving this, took of those Danes who dwelt in Northumberland, a new Oath of Fidelity, and of those in Essex, Hostages, lest they should joyn, as they were wont, with their Country-men newly arriv'd. And by the next 894. Sax. An. Year, having got together his Forces, between either Army of the Danes encamp'd so, as to be ready for either of them, who first should happen to stir forth; Troops of Horse also he sent continually abroad, assisted by such as could be spar'd from strong Places, wherever the Countries wanted them, to encounter foraging Parties of the Enemy. The King also divided sometimes his whole Army, marching out with one part by turns, the other keeping intrench'd. In Conclusion, rowling up and down, both sides met at Farnham in Surrey [f]; where the Danes by Alfred's Horse Troops were put to flight, and crossing the Thames to a certain Island near Coln in Essex, or as Cambden thinks, by Colebrooke, Cambden Tit. Buckinghamshire. were besieg'd there by Alfred till Provision fail'd the Besiegers, another part staid behind with the King wounded. Mean while Alfred preparing to reinforce the Siege in Colney, the Danes of Northumberland breaking Faith, came by Sea to the East-Angles, and with a Hundred Ships coasting Southward, landed in Devonshire, and besieged Exeter; thither Alfred hasted with his Powers, except a Squadron of Welch that came to London: With whom the Citizens marching forth to * Beamfleet, where Haestan the Dane had built  South Bamfleet in Essex.* a strong Fort, and left a Garrison, while he himself with the Main of his Army was enter'd far into the Country, luckily surprize the Fort, master the Garrison, make prey of all they find there; their Ships also they burnt or brought away with good Booty, and many Prisoners, among whom, the Wife and two Sons of Heasten were sent to the King, who forthwith set them at Liberty. Whereupon Heasten gave Oath of Amity and Hostages to the King; he in requital, whether freely, or by Agreement, a Sum of Money. Nevertheless without regard of Faith given, while Alfred was busied about Exeter, joyning with the other Danish Army, he built another Castle in Essex at Shoberie, thence marching Westward by the Thames, aided with Northumbrian and East-Anglish Danes, they came at length to Severn, pillaging all in their way. But, Ethred, Ethelm, and Ethelnoth, the King's Captains, with united Forces † pitch'd nigh to them at Buttington, on the Severn Bank in Montgomery-shire, the River running between, and there many Weeks attended; the King mean while blocking up the Danes, who besieg'd Exeter, having eaten part of their Horses, the rest urg'd with Hunger broke forth to their Fellows, who lay encamp'd on the East-side of the River, and were all there discomfited, with some Loss of valiant Men on the King's Party; the rest fled back to Essex and their Fortress there. Then Laf, one of their Leaders, gather'd before Winter a great Army of Northumbrian and East-Anglish Danes, who leaving their Money, Ships and Wives with the East-Angles, and marching Day and Night, sat down before a City in the West call'd [g] Wirheal near to Chester, and took it e're they could be overtaken. The English after two Days Siege, hopeless to dislodge them, wasted the Country round to cut off from them all Provision, and departed. Soon after which, next 895. Year the Danes no longer able to hold Wirheal, Sax. An. destitute of Victuals, enter'd North-Wales; thence laden with Spoils, part return'd into Northumberland, others to the East-Angles as far as Essex, Mercey. where they seiz'd on a small Island call'd Mereseg. And here again the Annals record them to besiege Exeter, but without Coherence of Sence or Story. Others relate to this purpose, that returning by Sea from the Siege of Exeter, Sim. Dun. Florent. and in their way landing on the Coast of Sussex, they of Chichester sallied out, and slew of them many Hundreds, taking also some of their Ships. The same Year they who possess'd Mereseg, intending to winter thereabout, drew up their Ships, some into the Thames, others into the River Lee, and on the Bank thereof built a Castle twenty Miles from London; to assault which the Londoners aided with other Forces march'd out the Summer following, but were soon put to flight, losing four of the King's Captains. Hun- 896. tingdon writes quite the contrary, that these four Sax. An. were Danish Captains, and the overthrow theirs: But little Credit is to be plac'd in Huntingdon single. For the King thereupon with his Forces, lay encamp'd nearer the City, that the Danes might not infest them in time of Harvest; in the mean time, subtlely devising to turn Lee Stream several ways; whereby the Danish Bottoms were left on dry Ground: Which they soon perceiving march'd over Land to Quatbrig [h] on the Severn, built a Fortress and winter'd there; while their Ships left in Lee, were either broken or brought away by the Londoners; but their Wives and Children they had left in Safety with the East-Angles. The next Year was pestilent,

But the King causing to be built others twice as long as usually were built, and some of sixty or seventy Oars higher, swifter and steddier than such as were in use before either with Danes or Frisons, his own Invention, some of these he sent out against six Danish Pirates, who had done much harm in the Isle of Wight and Parts adjoyning. The Bickering was doubtful and intricate, part on the Water, part on the Sands; not without Loss of some Eminent Men on the English side. The Pirates at length were either slain or taken, two of them stranded; the Men brought to Winchester, where the King then was, were executed by his Command; one of them escap'd to the East-Angles, her Men much wounded: The same Year not fewer than twenty of their Ships perish'd on the South Coast with all their Men. And Rollo the Dane or Norman landing here, as Mat. West. writes, though not in what part of the Island, after an unsuccessful Fight against those Forces which first oppos'd him, sail'd into France, and conquer'd the Country, since that time called Normandy. This is the Sum of what pass'd in three Years against the Danes, returning out of France, set down so perplexedly by the Saxon Annalist, ill-gifted with Utterance, as with much ado can be understood sometimes what is spoken, whether meant of the Danes or of the Saxons. After which troublesome time, Alfred enjoying three Years of Peace, by him spent, as his manner was, not idly or voluptuously, but in all vertuous Employments both of Mind and Body, becoming a Prince of his Renown, ended his Days in the Year 900, the 51 of his Age, the 30th of his Reign, and was buried Regally at Winchester; he was born * at a Place call'd † Wanading in Berkshire, his Mother Osburga the Daughter of Oslac the King's Cup-bearer, a [a] Goth by Nation, and of Noble Descent. He was of Person comelier than all his Brethren, of pleasing Tongue and graceful Behaviour, ready Wit and Memory; yet through the Fondness of his Parents towards him, had not been taught to read till the twelfth Year of his Age; but the great Desire of Learning which was in him, soon appear'd, by his conning of Saxon Poems Day and Night, which with great Attention he heard by others repeated. He was besides, excellent at Hunting, and the new Art then of Hawking, but more exemplary in Devotion, having collected into a Book certain Prayers and Psalms, which he carried ever with him in his Bosom to use on all Occasions. He thirsted after all Liberal Knowledge, and oft complain'd that in his Youth he had no Teachers, in his middle Age so little Vacancy from Wars, and the Cares of his Kingdom; yet leisure he found sometimes, not only to learn much himself, but to communicate thereof what he could to his People, by translating Books out of Latin into English, Orosius, Boethius, Beda's History, and others, permitted none unlearn'd to bear Office, either in Court or Common-wealth; at twenty Years of Age not yet Reigning, he took to Wife Egelswitha the Daughter of Ethelred a Mercian Earl. The Extremities which befel him in the sixth of his Reign, Neothan Abbot told him, were justly come upon him for neglecting in his younger Days the Complaints of such as injur'd and oppress'd repair'd to him, as then second Person in the Kingdom for Redress; which Neglect were it such indeed, were yet excusable in a Youth, through Jollity of Mind, unwilling perhaps to be detain'd long with sad and sorrowful Narrations; but from the time of his undertaking Regal Charge, no Man more patient in hearing Causes, more inquisitive in examining, more exact in doing Justice, and providing good Laws, which are yet extant; more severe in puniihing unjust Judges or obstinate Offenders. Thieves especially and Robbers, to the Terrour of whom in cross ways were hung upon a high Post certain Chains of Gold, as it were daring any one to take them thence; so that Justice seem'd in his Days not to flourish only, but to triumph: No Man than he more frugal of two precious things in Man's Life, his Time and his Revenue; no Man wiser in the Disposal of both. His Time, the Day and Night he distributed by the burning of certain Tapours into three equal Portions: The one was for Devotion, the other for publick or private Affairs, the third for bodily Refreshment: How each Hour past, he was put in mind by one who had that Office. His whole Annual Revenue, which his first Care was should be justly his own, he divided into two equal Parts; the first he imploy'd to secular Uses, and subdivided those into three, the first to pay his Soldiers, Houshold Servants and Guard, of which divided into three Bands, one attended Monthly by turn; the second was to pay his Architects and Workmen, whom he had got together of several Nations; for he was also an Elegant Builder; above the Custom and Conceit of Englishmen in those Days: The third he had in Readiness to relieve or honour Strangers according to their Worth, who came from all Parts to see him, and to live under him. The other equal Part of his Yearly Wealth he dedicated to Religious Uses, those of four sorts; the first to relieve the Poor, the second to Building and Maintenance of two Monasteries, the third of a School, where he had perswaded the Sons of many Noblemen to study Sacred Knowledge and Liberal Arts, [b] some say at Oxford; the fourth was for the Relief of Foreign Churches, as far as India to the Shrine of St. Thomas, sending thither Sigelm Bishop of Sherburn, who both return'd safe, and brought with him many rich Gems and Spices; Gifts also, and a Letter he receiv'd from the Patriarch of Jerusalem, sent many to Rome, and for them receiv'd Reliques. Thus far, and much more might be said of his Noble Mind, which render'd him the Mirror of Princes; his Body was diseas'd in his Youth with a great Soreness in the Siege, and that ceasing of it self, with another inward Pain of unknown Cause, which held him by frequent Fits to his dying Day; yet not disinabl'd to sustain those many glorious Labours of his Life both in Peace and War.

EDWARD the Elder.

Malmsb. Hunting.

EDward the Son of Alfred succeeded, in Learning not equal, in Power and Extent of Dominion, surpassing his Father. The beginning of his Reign had much Disturbance by Ethelwald

[a] A Saxon Lord descended from Withgar first Prince of the Isle of Wight.
[b] The Truth of it is so clearly made out by several Authors, that he had no reason to mention it so suspiciously.

A. D. 901. an ambitious young Man, Son of the King's Uncle, or Cosin German, or Brother, for his Genealogy is variously deliver'd. He vainly avouching to have equal Right with Edward of Succession to the Crown, possess'd himself of Winburne in Dorset, and another Town diversly nam'd, giving out that there he would live or die; but encompass'd with the King's Forces at Badburie, a Place nigh, his Heart failing him, he stole out by Night, and fled to the Danish Army beyond Humber. The King sent after him, but not overtaking, found his Wife in the Town, whom he had married out of a Nunnery, and com-

Sax. An. the Danes there to fall into the King's Territory, who marching with him as far as Crecklad, and passing the Thames there, wasted as far beyond as they durst venture, and laden with Spoils return'd home. The King with his Powers making Speed after them, between the [b] Dike and Ouse, suppos'd to be Suffolk and Cambridgeshire, as far as the Fenns Northward, laid waste all before him. Thence intending to return, he commanding that all his Army should follow him close without delay; but the Kentish Men, though often call'd upon, lagging behind, the Danish Army prevented them, and joyn'd Battel with the King: Where Duke Sigulf and Earl Sigelm, with many other of the Nobles were slain; on the Danes part, Eoric their King, and Ethelwald the Author of this War, with others of high Note, and of them greater Number, but with great Ruine on both sides; yet the Danes kept in their Power the burying of their slain. Whatever followed upon this Conflict, which

Sax. An. by whomsoever broken; for at the end thereof King Edward raising great Forces out of West-Sex, and Mercia, sent them against the Danes beyond Humber; where staying five Weeks, they made great Spoil and Slaughter. The King offer'd them Terms of Peace, but they rejecting

Sax. An. rendring no less Hostility than they had suffer'd; but at Tetnal in Staffordshire, saith Florent, were by the English in a set Battel otherthrown. King Edward then in Kent, had got together of Ships about a Hundred Sail, others gone Southward, came back and met him. The Danes now supposing that his main Forces were upon the Sea, took Liberty to rove and plunder up and down, as hope of Prey led them, beyond Severn. The Ethelwerd. King guessing what might imbolden them, sent before him the lightest of his Army to entertain them; then following with the rest, set upon
Cambridge. them in their return over Cantbrig in Gloucestershire, and slew many Thousands, among whom Ecwils, Hasden, and Hinguar their Kings, and many other harsh Names in Huntingdon; the Place also of this Fight is variously written by Ethelwerd and Florent, call'd Wodensfield. Danes from Leister and Northampton, falling into Oxfordshire, committed much Rapine, and in some Towns thereof great Slaughter; while another Party wasting Hertfordshire, met with other Fortune; for the Country-people inur'd now to such kind of Incursions, joyning stoutly together, fell upon the Spoilers, recover'd their own Goods, with some Booty from their Enemies. About the same time Elfled the King's Sister sent her Army of Mercians into Wales, who routed the Hunting.

The King with his Army sat not far off, securing from the South of Severn to Avon; so that openly they durst not, by Night they twice ventur'd to land; but found such welcome, that few of them came back; the rest anchor'd by a small Island where many of them famish'd; then sailing to a Place call'd [f] Deomed, they cross'd into Ireland. The King with his Army went to Buckingham, staid there a Month, and built two Castles or Forts on either Bank of Ouse e're his departing, and Turkitel a Danish Leader, with those of Bedford and Northampton, yielded him Subjection. ther City in the Annals call'd Wigingmere. Mean while the Danes of Leister and Northampton-shire; not liking perhaps to be Neighboured with strong Towns, laid Siege to Torchester, but they within, repelling the Assault one whole Day till Supplies came, quitted the Siege by Night; and pursu'd close by the besieged, between Birnwood [a] and Ailsbury were surpriz'd, many of them made Prisoners, and much of their Baggage lost. Other of the Danes at Huntingdon, aided from the East-Angles, finding that Castle not commodious, left it, and built another at Temsford, judging that Place more opportune from whence to make their Excursions; and soon after went forth with design to assail Bedford: But the Garrison issuing out, slew a great part of them, the rest fled. After this, a great Army of them gather'd out of Mercia and the East-Angles, came and besieg'd the City call'd Wigingamere a whole Day; but finding it defended stoutly by them within, thence also departed, driving away much of their Cattel: Whereupon the English, from Towns and Cities round about joyning Forces, laid Siege to the Town and Castle of Temsford, and by Assault took both; slew their King with Toglea a Duke, and Mannan his Son an Earl, with all the rest there found; who chose to die rather than yield. Encourag'd by this, the Men of Kent, Surrey, and part of Essex, enterprize the Siege of Colchester, nor gave over till they won it, sacking the Town, and putting to Sword all the Danes therein, except some who escap'd over the Wall. To the Succour of these, a great number of Danes inhabiting Ports and other Towns in the East-Angles, united their Forces; but coming too late, as in Revenge beleaguer'd Maldon; but that Town also timely reliev'd, they departed, not only frustrate of their Design, but so hotly pursu'd, that many Thousands of them lost their Lives in the Flight. Forthwith King Edward, with his West-Saxons, went to Passham upon Ouse, there to guard the Passage, while others were building a Stone Wall about Torchester; to him the Earl Thurfert, and other Lord Danes, with their Army thereabout as far as Weolud, came and submitted. Whereat the King's Soldiers joyfully cry'd out to be dismiss'd home: Therefore with another part of them he enter'd Huntingdon, and repair'd it, where Breaches had been made; all the People thereabout returning to Obedience. The like was done at Colnchester by the next remove of his Army, after which both East and West-Angles, and the Danish Forces among them, yielded to the King, swearing Allegiance to him both by Sea and Land: The Army also of Danes at Grantbrig, surrendring themselves took the same Oath. The Summer following he came with his Army to Stamford, built a Castle there on the South-side of the River, where all the People of those Quarters acknowledg'd him Supream. During his abode there, Elfled his Sister a Martial Woman, who after her Husband's Death would no more marry, but gave her self to Publick Affairs, repairing and fortifying many Towns, warring sometimes, dy'd at Tamworth the chief Seat of Mercia, whereof by Gift of Alfred her Father, she was Lady or Queen; whereby that whole Nation became obedient to King Edward, as did also North-Wales, with Howel, Cledaucus, and Jeothwell their Kings. Thence passing to Nottingham, he enter'd and repair'd the Town, plac'd there part English, part Danes, and receiv'd Fealty from all in Mercia of either Nation. The next Autumn, coming with his Army into Cheshire, he built and fortify'd Thelwel; and while he staid there, call'd another Army out of Mercia, which he sent to repair and fortifie [b] Manchester. About Mid-summer following, he march'd again to Nottingham, built a Town over-against it on the South-side of that River, and with a Bridge joyn'd them both; thence journeyed to a Place call'd Bedecanwillan in Pictland; there also built and fenc'd a City on the Borders, where the King of Scots did him Honour as to his Sovereign, together with the whole Scotish Nation; the like did Reginald and the Son of Eadulf, Danish Princes, with all the Northumbrians, both English and Danes. The King also of a People thereabout call'd Streatgledwalli (the North-Welch, as Cambden thinks, of Strat-Cluid in Denbigh-shire, perhaps rather the British of Cumberland) did him Homage, and not undeserv'd. For Buchanan himself confesses, that this King Edward, with a small number of Men compar'd to his Enemies, overthrew in a great Battel, the whole United Power both of Scots and Danes, slew most of the Scotish Nobility, and forc'd Malcolmb, whom Constantine the Scotish King had made General, and design'd Heir of his Crown, to save himself by flight, sore wounded. Of the English, he makes Athelstan the Son of Edward Chief Leader; and so far seems to confound Times and Actions, as to make this Battel the same with that fought by Athelstan, about twenty four Years after at Bruneford, against Anlaf and Constantine, whereof hereafter. But here Buchanan takes occasion to inveigh against the English Writers, upbraiding them with Ignorance, who affirm Athelstan to have been Supream King of Britain, Constantine the Scotish King with others to have held of him; and denies that in the Annals of Marianus Scotus, any mention is to be found thereof; which I shall not stand much to contradict, for in Marianus, whether by Sirname or by Nation Scotus, will be found as little mention of any other Scotish Affairs, till the time of King Dunchad slain by Machetad, or Mackbeth, in the Year 1040. which gives Cause of Suspicion, that the Affairs of Scotland before that time were so obscure as to be unknown to their own Country-man, who liv'd and wrote his Chronicle not long after. But King Edward thus nobly doing, and thus honour'd, the Year following dy'd at Farendon; a Builder and Restorer even in War, not a Destroyer of his Land. He had by several Wives many Children; his Eldest Daughter Edgith, he gave in Marriage to Charles King of France, Grand-child of Charles the Bald above mention'd; of the rest in Place convenient. His Laws are yet to be seen. He was buried at Winchester, in the Monastery by Alfred his Father. And a few Days after him dy'd * Ethelwerd his Eldest Son, the Heir of his Crown. He had the whole Island in Subjection, yet so as petty Kings reign'd under him. In Northumberland, after Ecbert whom the Danes had set up, and the Northumbrians yet unruly under their Yoke, at the end of six Years had expell'd, one Ricsig was set up King, and

ATHELSTAN.

926. Athelstan next in Age to Etbelward his Brother, who deceas'd untimely few Days before, though born of a Concubine, yet for the great Appearance of many Vertues in him, and his Brethren being yet under Age, was exalted to the Throne [a], at Kingstone upon Thames, and by his Father's last Will, saith Malmsbury, yet not without some Opposition of one Alfred and his Accomplices; who not liking he should reign, had conspir'd to seize on him after his Father's Death, and to put out his Eyes. But the Conspiratours discover'd, and Alfred denying the Plot, was sent to Rome, to assert his Innocence before the Pope; where taking his Oath on the Altar, he fell down immediately, and carried out by his Servants, three Days after dy'd. Mean while beyond Humber, the Danes, though much aw'd were not idle. Inguald, one of their Kings, took Possession of York. Sitric, who some Years before had slain Niel his Brother, by force took Davenport in Cheshire; and however he defended these Doings, grew so considerable, that Athelstan with great Solemnity gave him his Sister Edgith to Wife: But he enjoy'd her not long, dying e're the Year's end, nor his Sons Anlaf and Guthfert the Kingdom, driven out the next

927. Year by Athelstan; not unjustly saith Huntingdon, as being first Raisers of the War. Simeon calls him Gudfrid a British King, whom Athelstan this Year drove out of his Kingdom; and perhaps they were both one, the Name and Time not much differing, the Place only mistaken. Malmsbury differs in the Name also, calling him Aldulf a certain Rebel. Them also I wish as much mistaken, who write that Athelstan, jealous of his younger Brother Edwin's towardly Vertues, lest added to the Right of Birth, they might some time or other call in question his illegitimate Precedence, caus'd him to be drown'd in the Sea; expos'd, some say, with one Servant in a rotten Bark, without Sail or Oar; where the Youth far off Land, and in rough Weather despairing, threw himself over-board; the Servant more patient, got to Land † and reported the Success. But this Malmsbury confesses to be sung in old Songs, not read in warrantable Authors: And Huntingdon speaks as of a sad Accident to Athelstan, that he lost his Brother Edwin by Sea; far the more credible, in that Athelstan, as is written by all, tenderly lov'd, and bred up the rest of his Brethren, of whom he had no less Cause to be jealous. And the Year

934. following he prosper'd better than from so foul a Fact, passing into Scotland with great Puissance, both by Sea and Land, and chasing his Enemies before him, by Land as far as Dunfeoder, and Wertermore, by Sea as far as Cathness. The Cause of this Expedition, saith Malmsbury, was to demand Gudfert the Son of Sitric, thither fled, though not deny'd at length by Constantine, who with Eugenius King of Cumberland, at a Place call'd Dacor or Dacre in that Shire, surrender'd himself and each his Kingdom to Athelstan, who brought back with him for Hostage the Son of Constantine. But Gudfert escaping in the mean while out of Scotland, and Constantine exasperated by this Invasion, perswaded Anlaf the other Son of Sitric then fled into Ireland, others write Anlaf King of Ireland and the Isles, his Son-in-Law, with 615 Ships, and the King of Cumberland with other Forces, to his Aid. This within four Years effected, they enter'd England by Humber, and fought with Athelstan at a Place call'd Weondune, others term it Brunanburg, others Bruneford, which Ingulf places beyond Humber, Cambden in Glendale of Northumberland on the Scotch Borders; the bloodiest Fight, say Authors, that ever this Island saw, to describe which, the Saxon Annalist wont to be sober and succinct, whether the same or another Writer, now labouring under the Weight of his Argument, and over-charg'd, runs on a sudden into such [b] extravagant Fancies and Metaphors, as bear him quite beside the Scope of being understood. Huntingdon, though himself peccant enough in this kind, transcribes him word for word as a Pastime to his Readers. I shall only sum up what I can attain, in usual Language. The Battel was fought eagerly from Morning till Night; some fell of King Edward's old Army, try'd in many a Battel before; but on the other side great Multitudes, the rest fled to their Ships. Five Kings, and seven of Anlaf's Chief Captains were slain on the Place, with Froda a Norman Leader; Constantine escap'd home, but lost his Son in the Fight, if I understand my Author; Anlaf by Sea to Dublin, with a small remainder of his great Host. Malmsbury relates this War, adding many Circumstances after this manner. That Anlaf joyning with Constantine and the whole Power of Scotland, besides those which he brought with him out of Ireland, came on far Southwards, till Athelstan who had retir'd on set purpose to be the surer of his Enemies, enclosed from all Succour and Retreat, met him at Bruneford. Anlaf perceiving the Valour and Resolution of Athelstan, and mistrusting his own Forces though numerous, resolv'd first to spy in what Posture his Enemies lay: And imitating perhaps what he heard attempted by King Alfred the Age before, in the Habit of a Musician, got access by his Lute and Voice to the King's Tent, there playing both the Minstrel and the Spy: Then towards Evening dismiss'd, he was observ'd by one who had been his Soldier and well knew him, viewing earnestly the King's Tent, and what Approaches lay about it, then in the Twilight to depart. The Soldier forthwith acquaints the King, and by him blamed for letting go his Enemy, answer'd, that he had given first his Military Oath to Anlaf, whom if he had betray'd, the King might suspect him of like treasonous Mind towards himself; which to disprove, he advis'd him to remove his Tent a good distance off; and so done, it happen'd that a Bishop with his Retinue coming that Night to the Army, pitch'd his Tent in the same Place, from whence the King had remov'd. Anlaf coming by Night, as he had design'd to assault the Camp, and especially the King's Tent, finding there the Bishop in stead, slew him with all his Followers. Athelstan took the Alarm, and as it seems, was not found so unprovided, but that

A. D. 938. the Day now appearing, he put his Men in order, and maintain'd the Fight till Evening; wherein Conſtantine himſelf was ſlain with five other King's, and twelve Earls, the Annals were content with ſeven, in the reſt not diſagreeing. Ingulf Abbot of Croyland, from the Authority of Turketul a principal Leader in this Battel, relates it more at large to this effect: That Athelſtan, above a Mile diſtant from the Place where Execution was done upon the Biſhop and his Supplies, allarm'd at the Noiſe, came down by break of Day, upon Anlaf and his Army, overwatch'd and wearied now with the Slaughter they had made, and ſomething out of order, yet in two main Battels. The King therefore in like manner dividing, led the one part, conſiſting moſt of Weſt-Saxons, againſt Anlaf with his Danes and Iriſh, committing the other to his Chancellor Turketul, with the Mercians and Londoners againſt Conſtantine and his Scots. The Shower of Arrows and Darts over-paſs'd, both Battels attack'd each other with a cloſe and terrible Engagement, for a long ſpace neither ſide giving Ground. Till the Chancellor Turketul a Man of great Stature and Strength, taking with him a few Londoners of ſelect Valour, and Singin who led the Worſterſhire Men, a Captain of undaunted Courage, broke into the thickeſt, making his way firſt through the Picts and Orkeners, then through the Cumbrians and Scots, and came at length where Conſtantine himſelf fought, unhors'd him, and us'd all means to take him alive; but the Scots valiantly defending their King, and laying load upon Turketul, which the Goodneſs of his Armour well endur'd, he had yet been beaten down, had not Singin his faithful Second at the ſame time ſlain Conſtantine; which once known, Anlaf and the whole Army betook them to flight, whereof a huge Multitude fell by the Sword. This Turketul not long after leaving Worldly Affairs, became Abbot of Croyland, which at his own Coſt he had repair'd from Daniſh Ruins, and left there this Memorial of his former Actions. Athelſtan with his Brother Edmund victorious, thence turning into Wales, with much more eaſe vanquiſh'd Ludwal the King, and poſſeſt his Land. But Malmſbury writes, that commiſerating humane Chance, as he diſplac'd, ſo he reſtor'd both him and Conſtantine to their Regal State; for the ſurrender of King Conſtantine hath been above ſpoken of. However the Welch did him Homage at the City of Hereford, and covenanted Yearly Payment of Gold 20 Pound, of Silver 300, of Oxen 25 thouſand, beſides Hunting Dogs and Hawks. He alſo took Exeter from the Corniſh Britains, who till that time had equal Right there with the Engliſh, and bounded them with the River Tamar, as the other Britiſh with Wey. Thus dreaded of his Enemies, and renown'd far and near, three Years after he dy'd at Gloſter, and was buried with many Trophies at Malmſbury, where he had caus'd to be laid his two Coſin Germans, Elwin and Ethelſtan, both ſlain in the Battel againſt Anlaf. He was thirty Years old at his coming to the Crown, mature in Wiſdom from his Childhood, comely of Perſon and Behaviour; ſo that Alfred his Grandfather in Bleſſing him was wont to pray he might live to have the Kingdom, and put him yet a Child into Soldiers Habit. He had his Breeding in the Court of Elfled his Aunt, of whoſe Vertues more than Female we have related, ſufficient to evince that his Mother, though ſaid to be no wedded Wife, was yet ſuch of Parentage and Worth, as the Royal Line diſdain'd not, though the Song went in Malmſbury's Days (for it ſeems he refus'd not the Authority of Ballads for want of better) that his Mother was a Farmer's Daughter, but of excellent Feature; who dreamt one Night ſhe brought forth a Moon that ſhould enlighten the whole Land: Which the King's Nurſe hearing of, took her home and bred up Courtly; that the King coming one Day to viſit his Nurſe, ſaw there this Damſel, lik'd her, and by earneſt Suit prevailing, had by her this famous Athelſtan, a bounteous, juſt and affable King, as Malmſbury ſets him forth; nor leſs honour'd abroad by Foreign Kings. who ſought his Friendſhip by great Gifts or Affinity; that Harold King of Noricum ſent him a Ship, whoſe Prow was of Gold, Sails Purple, and other Golden things, the more to be wonder'd at, ſent from Noricum, whether meant Norway or Bavaria, the one place ſo far from ſuch Superfluity of Wealth, the other from all Sea: The Embaſſadors were Helgrim and Offrid, who found the King at York. His Siſters he gave in Marriage to greateſt Princes, Elgif to Otho Son of Henry the Emperour, Egdith to a certain Duke about the Alpes, Edgiv to Ludwic King of Aquitain, ſprung of Charles the Great, Ethilda to Hugo King of France, who ſent Aldulf Son of Baldwin, Earl of Flanders, to obtain her. From all theſe great Suitors, eſpecially from the Emperour and King of France came rich Preſents, Horſes of excellent Breed, gorgeous Trappings and Armour, Reliques, Jewels, Odors, Veſſels of Onyx, and other precious things, which I leave Poetically deſcrib'd in Malmſbury, taken, as he confeſſes, out of an old Verſifier, ſome of whoſe Verſes he recites. The only Blemiſh left upon him, was the expoſing of his Brother Edwin, who diſavow'd by Oath the Treaſon whereof he was accus'd, and implor'd an equal hearing. But theſe were Songs, as before hath been ſaid, which add alſo that Athelſtan, his Anger over, ſoon repented of the Fact, and put to Death his Cup-bearer, who had induc'd him to ſuſpect and expoſe his Brother, put in mind by a word falling from the Cup-bearer's own Mouth, who ſlipping one Day as he bore the King's Cup, and recovering himſelf on the other Leg, ſaid aloud, fatally as to him it proved, one Brother helps the other. Which words the King laying to Heart, and pondering how ill he had done to make away his Brother, aveng'd himſelf firſt on the Adviſer of that Fact, took on him ſeven Years Penance, and as Mat. Weſt. ſaith, built two Monaſteries for the Soul of his Brother. His Laws are extant among the Laws of other Saxon Kings to this Day.

EDMUND.

A. D. 942. Sax. An. EDmund not above eighteen Years old ſucceeded his Brother Athelſtan, in Courage not inferiour. For in the ſecond of his Reign he freed Mercia of the Danes that remain'd there, and took from them the Cities of Lincoln, Nottingham, Stamford, Darby, and Leiſter, where they were plac'd by King Edward, but it ſeems gave not good Proof of their Fidelity. Simeon writes that Anlaf ſetting forth from York, and having waſted Southward as far as Northampton, was met by Edmund at Leiſter; but that e're the Battels joyn'd, Peace was made between them by Odo and Wulſtan the two Arch-biſhops, with Converſion of Anlaf; for the ſame Year Edmund receiv'd at the Font-ſtone this or another Anlaf, as ſaith Huntingdon, not him ſpoken of before, who dy'd this Year (ſo uncertain they are in the Story of theſe Times alſo) and held Reginald another King of the Northumbers, while the Biſhop

A. D. 942. Biſhop confirm'd him: Their Limits were divided North and South by Watling-ſtreet. But ſpiritual Kindred little avail'd to keep Peace between them, whoever gave the Cauſe; for we read him two Years after driving Anlaf (whom 944. the Annals now firſt call the Son of Sitric) and Sax. An. Sutlfrid Son of Reginald out of Northumberland, taking the whole Country into Subjection. Edmund the next Year harraſs'd Cumberland, then 945. gave it to Malcolm King of Scots, thereby bound Sax. An. to aſſiſt him in his Wars, both by Sea and Land; Mat. Weſt. adds that in this Action Edmund had the Aid of Leolin Prince of North-Wales, againſt Dummail the Cumbrian King, him depriving of his Kingdom, and his two Sons of their Sight [a]. 946. But the Year after, he himſelf by ſtrange Acci- Sax. An. Cambden. Fuckle Church. dent came to an untimely Death, feaſting with his Nobles on St. Auſtin's Day at Puckle-kerke in Gloſterſhire, to celebrate the Memory of his firſt converting the Saxons. He ſpy'd Leof a noted Thief, whom he had baniſh'd, ſitting among his Gueſts; whereat tranſported with too much Vehemence of Spirit, though in a juſt Cauſe, riſing from the Table he ran upon the Thief, and catching his Hair, pull'd him to the Ground. The Thief who doubted from ſuch handling no leſs than his Death intended, thought to die not unreveng'd; and with a ſhort Dagger ſtruck the King, who ſtill laid at him, and little expected ſuch Aſſaſſination, mortally into the Breaſt. The Matter was done in a Moment, e're Men ſet at Table could turn them, or imagine at firſt what the ſtir meant, till perceiving the King deadly wounded, they flew upon the Murtherer and hew'd him to pieces; who like a wild Beaſt at abbay, ſeeing himſelf ſurrounded, deſperately laid about him, wounding ſome in his fall. The King was buried at Glaſton, whereof Dunſtan was then Abbot, his Laws yet remain to be ſeen among the Laws of other Saxon Kings.

EDRED.

948. E*Dred* the third Brother of Athelſtan, the Sons of Edmund being yet but Children, next reign'd, not degenerating from his worthy Predeceſſors, and crown'd at Kingſton. Northumber- The Scots do Homage to Edred. land he throughly ſubdu'd, the Scots without Refuſal ſwore him Allegiance; yet the Northumbrians, ever of doubtful Faith, ſoon after choſe to themſelves one Eric, a Dane. Huntingdon ſtill haunts us with this Anlaf (of whom we gladly would have been rid) and will have him before Eric recall'd once more and reign four 950. Years, then again put to his ſhifts. But Edred Sim. Dun. entring into Northumberland, and with Spoils returning, Eric the King fell upon his Rear. Edred turning about, both ſhook off the Enemy, and prepar'd to make a ſecond Inroad: Which the Hoveden. Northumbrians dreading rejected Eric, ſlew Amancus the Son of Anlaf, and with many Preſents appeaſing Edred, ſubmitted again to his Government; nor from that time had Kings, but were govern'd by Earls, of whom Oſulf was the firſt. 953. About this time Wulſtan Arch-biſhop of York, Sim. Dun. accus'd to have ſlain certain Men of Thetford, in revenge of their Abbot whom the Townſ-men had ſlain, was committed by the King to cloſe Cuſtody; but ſoon after enlarg'd, was reſtor'd to his Place. Malmſbury writes that his Crime was to have conniv'd at the Revolt of his Countrymen: But King Edred two Years after ſick- A. ## EDWI.

Ethelwerd. E*Dwi* the Son of Edmund now come to Age, after his Uncle Edred's Death took on him the Government, and was crown'd at Kingſton. His lovely Perſon ſirnamed him the Fair, his Actions are diverſly reported, by Huntingdon not thought illaudable. But Malmſbury and ſuch as follow him write far otherwiſe, that he married Mat. Weſt. or kept as Concubine, his near Kinſwoman, ſome ſay both her and her Daughter; ſo inordinately given to his Pleaſure, that on the very Day of his Coronation, he abruptly withdrew himſelf from the Company of his Peers, whether in Banquet or Conſultation, to ſit wantoning in the Chamber with this Algiva, ſo was her Name, who had ſuch Power over him. Whereat his Barons offended, ſent Biſhop Dunſtan, the boldeſt among them, to requeſt his return: He going to the Chamber, not only interrupted his Dalliance and rebuk'd the Lady, but taking him by the hand, between Force and Perſwaſion 956. brought him back to his Nobles. The King highly diſpleas'd, and inſtigated perhaps by her who was ſo prevalent with him, not long after ſent Dunſtan into Baniſhment, caus'd his Monaſtery to be rifl'd, and became an Enemy to all Monks. Whereupon Odo Arch-biſhop of Canterbury pronounc'd a Separation or Divorce of the King from Algiva. But that which moſt incited William of Malmſbury againſt him, he gave that Monaſtery to be dwelt in by Secular Prieſts, or, to uſe his own Phraſe, made it a Stable of Clerks; at length theſe Affronts done to the Church were ſo reſented by the People, that the Mercians and Northumbrians revolted from him, and ſet up Hoveden. Edgar his Brother, leaving to Edwi the Weſt-Sax- 957. ons only, bounded by the River Thames; with Sax. An. Grief whereof, as is thought, he ſoon after end- 958. ed his Days, and was buried at Wincheſter. Mean Mat. Weſt. while Elfſin Biſhop of that Place after the Death of Odo, aſcending by Simony to the Chair of Canterbury, and going to Rome the ſame Year for his Pall, was frozen to Death in the Alps.

EDGAR.

959. E*Dgar* by his Brother's Death now King of all England at ſixteen Years of Age, called Malmſb. home Dunſtan out of Flanders, where he liv'd in Exile. This King had no War all his Reign; yet always well prepar'd for War, govern'd the Kingdom in great Peace, Honour and Proſperity, gaining thence the Sirname of Peaceable, much extoll'd for Juſtice, Clemency, and all Kingly Vertues, the more, ye may be ſure, by Monks, Mat. Weſt. for his building ſo many Monaſteries; as ſome write, every Year one: For he much favour'd the Monks againſt ſecular Prieſts, who in the time of Edwi had got Poſſeſſion in moſt of their Covents. His Care and Wiſdom was great in guarding the Coaſt round with ſtout Ships, to the number of three thouſand ſix hundred, Mat. Weſt. reckons them four thouſand eight hundred, divided into four Squadrons, to ſail to and fro about the four quarters of the Land meeting

Thus he kept out wisely the force of Strangers, and prevented Foreign War; but by their too frequent resort hither in time of Peace, and his too much favouring them, he let in their Vices unaware. Thence the People, saith Malmsbury, learnt of the Outlandish Saxons Rudeness, of the Flemish Daintiness and Softness, of the Danes Drunkenness; though I doubt these Vices are as naturally home-bred here as in any of those Countries. Yet in the Winter and Spring-time he usually rode the Circuit as a Judge Itinerant through all his Provinces, to see Justice well administred, and the poor not oppress'd. Thieves and Robbers he routed almost out of the Land, and wild Beasts of Prey altogether; enjoyning
961. Ludwal King of Wales to pay the Yearly Tribute of three hundred Wolves, which he did for two Years together, till the third Year no more were to be found, nor ever after; but his Laws may be read yet extant. Whatever was the Cause he was not crown'd till the 30th of his
973. Age, but then with great Splendour and Magnificence at the City of Bath, in the Feast of Pentecost[a]. Sax. Ann. Ingulf. This Year dy'd Swarling a Monk of Croyland, in the 142 Year of his Age, and another
974. soon after him in the 115th in that Fenny and Sax. An. Watrish Air, the more remarkable. King Edgar the next Year went to Chester, and summoning to his Court there all the Kings that held of him, took Homage of them: Their Names are ‖ Kened King of Scots, Malcolm of Cumberland. Maccuse of the Isles, five of Wales, Dusval, Huwal, Grifith, Jacob, Judethil, these he had in such awe, that going one Day into a Gally, he caus'd them to take each Man his Oar, and row him down the River Dee, while he himself sat at the Stern: Which might be, done in Merriment easily obey'd; if with a serious Brow, discover'd rather Vain-Glory, and insulting Haughtiness, than Moderation of Mind. And that he did it seriously triumphing, appears by his Words then utter'd, That his Successors might then glory to be Kings of England, when they had such Honour done them. And perhaps the Divine Power was displeas'd with him for taking too much Honour to himself; since we read
975. that the Year following he was taken out of this Life by Sickness in the heighth of his Glory and the prime of his Age, buried at Glaston Abby. The same Year, as Mat. West. relates, he gave to Kened the Scotish King, many rich Presents, and the whole Country of Laudian, or Lothien, to hold of him on condition that he and his Successors should repair to the English Court at high Festivals when the King sat crown'd; gave him also many lodging Places by the way, which till the Days of Henry the second were still held by the Kings of Scotland. He was of Stature not tall, of Body slender, yet so well made, that in Strength he chose to contend with such as were thought strongest, and dislik'd nothing more than that they should spare him for Respect or Fear to hurt him. Kened King of Scots then in the Court of Edgar, sitting one Day at Table was heard to say jestingly among his Servants, He wonder'd how so many Provinces could be held in Subjection by such a little dapper Man: His Words were brought to the King's Ear; he sends for Kened as about some private Business, and in Talk drawing him forth to a secret Place, takes from under his Garment two Swords which he had brought with him, gave one of them to Kened; and now saith he, It shall be try'd which ought to be the Subject; for it is shameful for a King to boast at Table, and shrink in Fight. Kened much abash'd fell presently at his Feet, and besought him to pardon what he had simply spoken, no way intended to his Dishonour or Disparagement: Wherewith the King was satisfied. Cambden in his Description of Ireland, cites a Charter of King Edgar, wherein it appears, he had in Subjection all the Kingdoms of the Isles as far as Norway, and had subdu'd the greatest part of Ireland, with the City of Dublin: But of this other Writers make no mention. In his Youth having heard of Elfrida, Daughter to Ordgar Duke of Devonshire, much commended for her Beauty, he sent Earl Athelwold, whose Loyalty he trusted most, to see her; intending, if she were found such as answer'd report, to demand her in Marriage. He at the first view taken with her Presence, disloyally, as it often happens in such Employments, began to sue for himself; and with consent of her Parents obtain'd her. Returning therefore with scarce an ordinary Commendation of her Feature, he easily took off the King's Mind, soon diverted another way. But the matter coming to light how Athelwold had forestall'd the King, and Elfrida's Beauty more and more spoken of, the King now heated not only with a Relapse of Love, but with a deep Sense of the Abuse, yet dissembling his Disturbance, pleasantly told the Earl, what Day he meant to come and visit him and his fair Wife. The Earl seemingly assur'd his Welcome, but in the mean while acquainting his Wife, earnestly advis'd her to deform her self, what she might, either in Dress or otherwise, lest the King, whose amorous Inclination was not unknown, should chance to be attracted. She who by this time was not ignorant, how Athelwold had step'd between her and the King, against his coming Arrays her self richly, using whatever Art she could devise might render her the more amiable; and it took effect. For the King inflam'd with her Love, the more for that he had been so long defrauded and robbed of her, resolved not only to recover his intercepted Right, but to punish the Interloper of his destin'd Spouse, and appointing with him as was usual, a Day of Hunting, drawn aside in a Forest, now call'd Harewood, smote him through with a Dart. Some censure this Act as cruel and tyrannical, but consider'd well, it may be judg'd more favourably, and that no Man of sensible Spirit, but in his Place, without extraordinary Perfection, would have done the like: For next to Life, what worse Treason could have been committed against him? It chanc'd that the Earl's base Son coming by upon the Fact, the King sternly ask'd him, How he lik'd this Game; he submisly answering, That Whatsoever pleas'd the King, must not displease him; the King return'd to his wonted Temper, took an Affection to the Youth, and ever after highly favour'd him, making amends in the Son for what he had done to the Father. Elfrida forthwith he took to Wife, who to expiate her former Husband's Death, though therein she had no hand, cover'd the Place of his Bloodshed with a Monastery of Nuns to sing over him. Another Fault is laid to his Charge, ‖ King Edgar row'd down the Dee by Keneth King of Scotland, Malcolm King of Cumberland, Maccuse King of Man and the Isles, and Five Irish and Welsh Kings.

A. D. 975. no way excuſable, that he took a Virgin Wilfrida by force out of the Nunnery, where ſhe was plac'd by her Friends to avoid his Purſuit, and kept her as his Concubine; but liv'd not obſtinately in the Offence; for ſharply reprov'd by Dunſtan, he ſubmitted to ſeven Years Penance, and for that time to want his Coronation: But why he had it not before, is left unwritten. Another Story there goes of Edgar, fitter for a Novel than a Hiſtory; but as I find it in Malmſbury, ſo I relate it. While he was yet unmarried, in his Youth he abſtain'd not from Women, and coming on a Day to Andover, caus'd a Duke's Daughter there dwelling, reported rare of Beauty, to be brought to him. The Mother not daring flatly to deny, yet abhorring that her Daughter ſhould be ſo deflowr'd, at fit time of Night ſent in her Attire, one of her waiting Maids; a Maid it ſeems not unhandſome nor unwitty; who ſupply'd the Place of her young Lady. Night paſs'd, the Maid going to riſe, but Day-light ſcarce yet appearing, was by the King ask'd why ſhe made ſuch haſte, ſhe anſwer'd, to do the Work which her Lady had ſet her; at which the King wondring, and with much ado ſtaying her to unfold the Riddle, for he took her to be the Duke's Daughter, ſhe falling at his Feet beſought him, that ſince at the Command of her Lady ſhe came to his Bed, and was enjoy'd by him, he would be pleas'd in Recompence to ſet her free from the hard Service of her Miſtreſs. The King a while ſtanding in a ſtudy whether he had beſt be angry or not, at length turning all to a Jeſt, took the Maid away with him, advanc'd her above her Lady, lov'd her, and accompanied with her only, till he married Elfrida. Theſe only are his faults upon Record, rather to be wonder'd how they were ſo few, and ſo ſoon left, he coming at ſixteen to the Licence of a Scepter; and that his Vertues were ſo many and ſo mature, he dying before the Age wherein Wiſdom can in others attain to any Ripeneſs: However with him dy'd all the Saxon Glory. From henceforth nothing is to be heard of but their decline and ruin under a double Conqueſt, and the Cauſes foregoing; which, not to blur or taint the Praiſes of their former Actions and Liberty well defended, ſhall ſtand ſeverally related, and will be more than long enough for another Book. # THE History of ENGLAND,

By Mr. JOHN MILTON. Book VI.

EDWARD the Younger.

Florent. Sim. Dun.

Edward the Eldeſt Son of Edgar by Egelfleda his firſt Wife, the Daughter of Duke Ordmer, was according to Right and his Father's Will, plac'd in the Throne; Elfrida his ſecond Wife, and her Faction only repining, who labour'd to have had her Son Ethelred, a Child of ſeven Years, preferr'd before him; that ſhe under that Pretence might have rul'd all. Mean while Comets were ſeen in Heaven, portending not Famine only, which follow'd the next Year, but the troubl'd State of the whole Realm not long after to enſue. The Troubles begun in Edwin's Days, between Monks and Secular Prieſts, now reviv'd and drew on either ſide many of the Nobles into Parties. For Elſere Duke of the Mercians, with many other Peers, corrupted as is ſaid with Gifts, drove the Monks out of thoſe Monaſteries where Edgar had plac'd them, and in their ſtead put Secular Prieſts with their Wives. But Ethelwin Duke of Eaſt-Angles, with his Brother Elfwold, and Earl Britnoth oppos'd them, and gathering an Army defended the Abbies of Eaſt-Angles from ſuch Intruders. To appeaſe theſe Tumults, a Synod was call'd at Winchester, and nothing there concluded, a General Council both of Nobles and Prelates, was held at Caln in Wiltſhire, where while the diſpute was hot, but chiefly againſt Dunſtan, the room wherein they ſat fell upon their Heads, killing ſome, maiming others, Dunſtan only eſcaping upon a Beam that fell not, and the King abſent by reaſon of his tender Age. This Accident quieted the Controverſie, and brought both Parts to hold with Dunſtan and the Monks. Mean while the King addicted to a Religious Life, and of a mild Spirit, ſimply permitted all things to the ambitious Will of his Stepmother and her Son Ethelred: To whom ſhe diſpleas'd that the Name only of King was wanting, practis'd thenceforth to remove King Edward out of the way; which in this manner ſhe brought about. Edward on a Day wearied with hunting, thirſty and alone, while his Attendance follow'd the Dogs, hearing that Ethelred and his Mother lodg'd at Corveſgate (Corfe Caſtle, ſaith Cambden, in the Iſle of Purbeck) innocently went thither. She with all ſhew of Kindneſs welcoming him, commanded Drink to be brought forth, for it ſeems he lighted not from his Horſe; and while he was drinking, caus'd one of her Servants, privately before inſtructed, to ſtab him with a Poignard. The poor Youth who little expected ſuch Unkindneſs there, turning ſpeedily the Reins, fled bleeding; till through 978

A. D. 978. Loss of Blood falling from his Horse, and expiring, yet held with one Foot in the Stirrop, he was dragg'd along the way, trac'd by his Blood, and buried without Honour at Werham, having reigned about three Years: But the Place of his Malmsb. Burial not long after grew famous for Miracles. After which by Duke Elfer (who, as Malmsbury saith, had a hand in his Death) he was Royally interr'd at Skepton, or Shaftsbury. The Murdress Elfrida at length repenting spent the residue of her Days in Sorrow and great Penance.

ETHELRED.

979. Malmsb. Ethelred second Son of Edgar by Elfrida, (for Edmund dy'd a Child) his Brother Edward wickedly remov'd, was now next in Right to succeed, and accordingly crown'd at Kingstone: Reported by some, fair of Visage, comely of Person, elegant of Behaviour; but the Event Florent. will shew, that with many sluggish and ignoble Sim. Dun. Vices he quickly sham'd his out-side; born and prolong'd a fatal Mischief of the People, and the Ruine of his Country; whereof he gave early Signs from his first Infancy, bewraying the Font and Water while the Bishop was baptizing him: Whereat Dunstan much troubl'd, for he stood by and saw it, to them next him broke into these words, By God and God's Mother this Boy will prove a Sluggard. Another thing is writen of him in his Childhood, which argu'd no bad Nature, that hearing of his Brother Edward's cruel Death, he made loud Lamentation; but his furious Mother offended therewith, and having no Rod at hand, beat him so with great Wax Candles, that he hated the Sight of them ever after. Dunstan though unwilling set the Crown upon his Head; but at the same time foretold openly, as is reported, the great Evils that were to come Sim. Dun. upon him and the Land, in Avengement of his Brother's innocent Blood. And about the same time, one Midnight, a Cloud sometimes bloody, sometimes fiery, was seen over all England; and 982. within three Years the Danish Tempest, which Malmsb. had long surceast, revolv'd again upon this Island. To the more ample relating whereof, the Danish History, at least their latest and diligentest Historian, as neither from the first landing of Danes, in the Reign of West-Saxon Birthric, so now again from first to last, contributes nothing; busied more than enough to make out the bare Names and Successions of their uncertain Kings, and their small Actions at home: Unless out of him I should transcribe what he takes, and I better may, from our own Annals; the surer, and the sadder Witnesses of their Doings here, not Glorious, as they vainly boast, but most in- Eadmer. humanly Barbarous. For the Danes well under- Florent. standing, that England had now a slothful King to their Wish, first landing at Southampton from seven great Ships, took the Town, spoiled the Country, and carried away with them great Pil- Hved. lage; nor was Devonshire and Cornwall uninfested on the Shoar; Pirates of Norway also harried the Coast of West-Chester: And to add a worse Cala- Sim. Dun. Hved. mity, the City of London was burnt, casually or not, is not written. It chanc'd four Years af- 986. ter, that Ethelred besieg'd Rochester, some way Malmsb. Ingulf. or other offended by the Bishop thereof. Dunstan not approving the Cause, sent to warn him that he provoke not St. Andrew the Patron of that City, nor wast his Lands; an old Craft of the Clergy to secure their Church-Lands, by entailing them on some Saint; the King not hearkning, Dunstan on this condition that the Siege might be rais'd, sent him a hundred Pound, the Money was accepted and the Siege dissolv'd. Dunstan reprehending his Avarice, sent him again this word, Because thou hast respected Money more than Religion, the Evils which I foretold shall the sooner come upon thee; but not in my Days, for so God hath spoken. The next Year was calamitous, bringing strange 987. Fluxes upon Men, and Murrain upon Cattel. Malmsb. Dunstan the Year following dy'd, a strenuous 988. Bishop, zealous without dread of Person, and Malm.b. for ought appears, the best of many Ages, if he busied not himself too much in secular Affairs. He was Chaplain at first to King Athelstan, and Edmund who succeeded, much imploy'd in Court Affairs, till envied by some who laid many things to his Charge, he was by Edmund forbidden the Court, but by the earnest Mediation, saith Ingulf, of Turkitel the Chancellour, receiv'd at length to Favour, and made Abbot of Glaston[b], lastly by Edgar and the general Vote, Archbishop of Canterbury. Not long after his Death, the Danes, arriving in Devonshire were met by Goda Lieutenant of that Country, and Strenwold a valiant Leader, who put back the Danes, but with Loss of their own Lives. The third Year 991. following, under the Conduct of Justin and Guth- Sim. Dun. mund the Son of Steytan, they landed and spoil'd Ipswich, fought with Brithwith Duke of the East-Angles about Maldon, where they slew him; the Slaughter else had been equal on both sides. These and the like Depredations on every side, the English not able to resist, by Counsel of Siric then Arch-bishop of Canterbury, and two Dukes, Ethelward and Alfric; it was thought best for the present to buy that with Silver which they could not gain with their Iron: And ten thousand Pound was paid to the Danes for Tribute Peace. Which for a while contented; but taught first paid to them the ready way how easiest to come by the Danes. more. The next Year but one they took by Storm and rifl'd Bebbanburgh an ancient City nigh Durham: Sailing thence into the Mouth of 993. Humber, they wasted both sides thereof, York- Sim. Dun. shire and Lindsey, burning and destroying all before them. Against these went out three Noblemen, Frena, Fritbegist, and Godwin, but being all Danes by the Father's side, willingly began Flight, and forsook their own Forces betray'd to the Enemy. No less Treachery was at Sea; Florent. for Alfric the Son of Elfer Duke of Mercia, whom Huntingd. the King for some Offence had banish'd, but now recall'd, sent from London with a Fleet to surprize the Danes, in some Place of Disadvantage, gave them over-night Intelligence thereof, then fled to them himself; which his Fleet, saith Florent, perceiving, pursu'd, took the Ship, but miss'd of his Person; the Londoners by chance grapling with the East-Angles made them fewer, saith my Author, by many thousands. Others 994. say, that by this notice of Alfric, the Danes not Sim. Dun. only escap'd, but with a great Fleet set upon the English, took many of their Ships, and in Triumph brought them up the Thames, intending to besiege London: For Anlaf King of Norway, and Swane of Denmark, at the head of these, came with ninety four Gallies. The King for this Treason of Alfric, put out his Son's Eyes; but the Londoners both by Land and Water, so valiantly resisted their Besieges, that they were forc'd in one Day with great Loss to give over.

[a] This seems to be a Monkish Fable, copy'd from the Story of Constantine the VI[th] Emperour of Constantinople, who is said to have done so, and was thence called Copronymus.

But

A. D. 994. But what they could not on the City, they wreck'd themſelves on the Countries round about, waſting with Sword and Fire all Eſſex, Kent, and Suſſex. Thence horſing their Foot, diffus'd far wider their outragious Incurſions, without Mercy either to Sex or Age. The ſlothful King inſtead of Warlike Oppoſition in the Field, ſends Embaſſadors to treat about another Payment; the Sum promis'd was now 16000; till which paid, the Danes winter'd at Southampton; Ethelred inviting Anlaf to come and viſit him at Andover: Where he was Royally entertain'd, ſome ſay baptiz'd, or confirm'd, adopted Son by the King, and diſmiſs'd, with great Preſents, promiſing by Oath to depart, and moleſt the Kingdom no more; which he perform'd, but the Calamity ended not ſo, for after ſome Intermiſſion of their Rage for three Years, the other Navy of Danes ſailing about to the Weſt, enter'd Severn, and waſted one while South-Wales, then Cornwall and Devonſhire, till at length they winter'd about Taviſtoc. For it were an endleſs Work to relate how they wallow'd up and down to every particular Place, and to repeat as oft what Devaſtations they wrought, what Deſolations left behind them, eaſie to be imagin'd. In Sum, the next Year they afflicted Dorſetſhire, Hamſhire, and the Iſle of Wight; by the Engliſh many Reſolutions were taken, many Armies rais'd, but either betray'd by the Falſhood, or diſcourag'd by the Weakneſs of their Leaders, they were put to rout, or diſbanded themſelves. For Soldiers moſt commonly are as their Commanders, without much odds of Valour in one Nation or other, only as they are more or leſs wiſely diſciplin'd and conducted. The following Year brought them back upon Kent, where they enter'd Medway, and beſieg'd Rocheſter; but the Kentiſh Men aſſembling, gave them a ſharp Encounter, yet that ſuffic'd not to hinder them from doing as they had done in other Places. Againſt theſe Depopulations, the King leavied an Army; but the unskilful Leaders not knowing what to do with it when they had it, did but drive out time, burthening and impoveriſhing the People, conſuming the publick Treaſure, and more emboldening the Enemy, than if they had ſat quiet at home. What Cauſe mov'd the Danes next Year to paſs into Normandy, is not recorded; but that they return'd thence more outragious than before. Mean while the King, to make ſome Diverſion, undertakes an Expedition both by Land and Sea into Cumberland, where the Danes were moſt planted; there and in the Iſle of Man, or as Cambden ſaith, Angleſey, imitating his Enemies in ſpoiling and unpeopling; the Danes from Normandy arriving in the River Ex, laid ſiege to Exeter; but the Citizens, as thoſe of London, valourouſly defending themſelves, they wreck'd their Anger, as before, on the Villages round about. The Country People of Somerſet and Devonſhire aſſembling themſelves at [a] Penho, ſhew'd their readineſs, but wanted a Head; and beſides, being then but few in number, were eaſily put to flight; the Enemy plundering all at Will, with loaded Spoils paſs'd into the Iſle of Wight; from whence all Dorſetſhire, and Hamſhire, felt again their Fury. The Saxon Annals write, that before their coming to Exeter, the Hamſhire Men had a bickering with them, wherein Ethelward the King's General was ſlain, adding other things hardly to be underſtood, and in one ancient Copy; ſo end. Ethelred, whom no Adverſity could awake from his ſoft and ſluggiſh Life, ſtill coming by the worſe at fighting, by the Advice of his Peers not unlike himſelf, ſends one of his gay Courtiers, though looking loftily, to ſtoop baſely and propoſe a third Tribute to the Danes: They willingly kearken, but the Sum is enhanc'd now to twenty four thouſand Pound, and paid; the Danes thereupon abſtaining from Hoſtility. But the King to ſtrengthen his Houſe by ſome Potent Affinity, marries Emma, whom the Saxons call Elgiva, Daughter of Richard Duke of Normandy. With him Ethelred formerly had War or no good Correſpondence, as appears by a Letter of Pope John the 15th, who made Peace between them about eleven Years before; puft up now with his ſuppos'd acceſs of Strength by this Affinity, he caus'd the Danes all over England, though now living peaceably, in one Day perfidiouſly to be maſſacred, both Men, Women and Children; ſending private Letters to every Town and City, whereby they might be ready all at the ſame Hour; which till the appointed time (being the 9th of July) was conceal'd with great Silence, and perform'd with much Unanimity; ſo generally hated were the Danes. Mat. Weſt. writes, that this Execution upon the Danes was ten Years after; that Huna one of Ethelred's Chief Captains, complaining of the Daniſh Inſolencies in time of Peace, their Pride, their raviſhing of Matrons and Virgins, incited the King to this Maſſacre, which in the Madneſs of Rage made no difference of innocent or nocent. Among theſe, Gunhildis the Siſter of Swane was not ſpar'd, though much deſerving not Pity only, but all Protection: She with her Huſband Earl Palingus, coming to live in England, and receiving Chriſtianity, had her Huſband and young Song ſlain before her Face, her ſelf then beheaded; foretelling and denouncing that her Blood would coſt England dear. Some ſay this was done by the Traytor Edric, to whoſe Cuſtody ſhe was committed; but the Maſſacre was ſome Years before Edric's Advancement; and if it were done by him afterward, it ſeems to contradict the private Correſpondence which he was thought to hold with the Danes. For Swane breathing Revenge, haſted the next Year into England, and by the Treaſon or Negligence of Count Hugh, whom Emma had recommended to the Government of Devonſhire, ſack'd the City of Exeter, her Wall from Eaſt to Weſt-gate, broken down: After this waſting Wiltſhire, the People of that County, and of Hamſhire, came together in great Numbers with Reſolution ſtoutly to oppoſe him, but Alfric their General, whoſe Son's Eyes the King had lately put out, madly thinking to revenge himſelf on the King, by ruining his own Country, when he ſhould have order'd his Battel, the Enemy being at hand, feign'd himſelf taken with a Vomiting; whereby his Army in great Diſcontent, deſtitute of a Commander, turn'd from the Enemy; who ſtreight took Wilton and [b] Saliſbury, carrying the Pillage thereof to his Ships. Thence the next Year landing on the Coaſt of Norfolk, he waſted the Country [c], and ſet Norwich on fire; Ulfketel Duke of the Eaſt-Angles, a Man of great Valour, not having ſpace to gather his Forces, after Conſultation had, thought it beſt to make Peace with the Dane, which he breaking within three Weeks, iſſued ſilently out of his Ships, came to Thetford, ſtaid there a Night, and in the Mor-

Nor did the Danes come off without great Slaughter of their own; confeſſing that they never met in England with ſo rough a Charge. The next Year, whom War could not, a great Famine drove Swane out of the Land. But the Summer following, another great Fleet of Danes enter'd the Port of Sandwich, thence pour'd out over all Kent and Suſſex, made Prey of what they found. The King levying an Army out of Mercia, and the Weſt-Saxons, took on him for once the Manhood to go out and face them; but they who held it ſafer to live by Rapine, than to hazard a Battel, ſhifting lightly from Place to Place, fruſtrated the ſlow Motions of a heavy Camp, following their wonted Courſe of Robbery, then running to their Ships. Thus all Autumn they wearied out the King's Army, which gone home to winter, they carried all their Pillage to the Iſle of Wight, and there ſtaid till Chriſtmas; at which time the King being in Shropſhire, and but ill imploy'd (for by the Procurement of Edric, he caus'd, as is thought, Alfhelm a Noble Duke, treacherouſly to be ſlain, and the Eyes of his two Sons to be put out) they came forth again, over-running Hamſhire, and Barkſhire, as far as Reading and Wallingford: Thence to Aſhdune, and other Places thereabout, neither known nor of tolerable Pronunciation; and returning by another way, found many of the People in Arms by the River Kenet; but making their way through, they got ſafe with vaſt Booty to their Ships. The King and his Courtiers wearied out with their laſt Summer's jaunt after the nimble Danes to no purpoſe, which by Proof they found too toilſome for their ſoft Bones, more us'd to Beds and Couches, had recourſe to their laſt and only Remedy, their Coffers; and ſend now the fourth time to buy a diſhonourable Peace, every time ſtill dearer, not to be had now under thirty ſix thouſand Pound (for the Danes knew how to milk ſuch eaſie Kine) in Name of Tribute and Expences: Which out of the People over all England, already half begger'd, was extorted and paid. About the ſame time Ethelred advanc'd Edric, ſirnam'd Streon, from obſcure Condition to be Duke of Mercia, and marry Edgitha the King's Daughter. The Cauſe of his Advancement, Florent of Worſter, and Mat. Weſt. attribute to his great Wealth, gotten by fine Policies and a plauſible Tongue: He prov'd a main Acceſſory to the Ruine of England, as his Actions will ſoon declare. Ethelred the next Year ſomewhat rouſing himſelf, ordain'd that every three hundred and ten Hides (a Hide is ſo much Land as one Plow can ſufficiently till) ſhould ſet out a Ship or Gally, and every nine Hides find a Corſlet and Head-piece: New Ships in every Port were builded, victual'd, fraught with ſtout Mariners and Soldiers, and appointed to meet all at Sandwich. A Man might now think that all would go well, when ſuddenly a new Miſchief ſprung up, Diſſention among the great ones; which brought all this Diligence to as little Succeſs as at other times before. Bithric the Brother of Edric, falſly accus'd Wulnoth a great Officer ſet over the South-Saxons, who fearing the Potency of his Enemies, with twenty Ships got to Sea, and practis'd Piracy on the Coaſt. Againſt whom, reported to be in a Place where he might be eaſily ſurpriz'd, Bithric ſets forth with eighty Ships, all which driven back by a Tempeſt, and wrack'd upon the Shoar, were burnt ſoon after by Wulnoth. Diſhearten'd with this Misfortune, the King returns to London; the reſt of his Navy after him; and all this great Preparation to nothing. Whereupon Turkill, a Daniſh Earl, came with a Navy to the Iſle of Tanet, and in Auguſt a far greater, led by Heming and Ilaf joyn'd with him. Thence coaſting to Sandwich, and landed, they went onward and began to aſſault Canterbury, but the Citizens and Eaſt Kentiſh Men, coming to Compoſition with them for three thouſand Pound, they departed thence to the Iſle of Wight, robbing and burning by the way. Againſt theſe the King levies an Army through all the Land, and in ſeveral Quarters places them nigh the Sea, but ſo unskilfully or unſucceſsfully, that the Danes were not thereby hinder'd from exerciſing their wonted Robberies. It happen'd that the Danes one Day were gone up into the Country, far from their Ships, the King having notice thereof, thought to intercept them in their return; his Men were reſolute to overcome or die, Time and Place advantagious; but where Courage and Fortune was not wanting, there wanted Loyalty among them. Edric with ſubtle Arguments that had a ſhew of deep Policy, diſputed and perſwaded the Simplicity of his Fellow Counſellors, that it would be beſt conſulted at that time to let the Danes paſs without Ambuſh or Interception. The Danes where they expected Danger, finding none, paſs'd on with great Joy and Booty to their Ships. After this, ſailing about Kent, they lay that Winter in the Thames, forcing Kent and Eſſex to Contribution, oft-times attempting the City of London, but repuls'd as oft to their great Loſs. Spring begun, leaving their Ships, they paſs'd through [a] Chiltern Wood into Oxfordſhire, burnt the City, and thence returning with divided Forces waſted on both ſides the Thames; but hearing, that an Army from London was march'd out againſt them, they on the North-ſide, paſſing the River at Stanes, join'd with them on the South into one Body, and, enrich'd with great Spoils, came back through Surrey to their Ships; which all the Lent-time they repair'd. After Eaſter, ſailing to the Eaſt-Angles they arriv'd at Ipſwich, and came to a Place call'd Ringmere, where they heard that Ulfketel with his Forces lay, who with a ſharp Encounter ſoon entertain'd them; but his Men at length giving back, through the Subtlety of a Daniſh Servant among them who began the Flight, loſt the Field, though the Men of Cambridgeſhire ſtood to it valiantly. In this Battel Ethelſtan the King's Son-in-Law, with many other Noblemen, was ſlain; whereby the Danes without more Reſiſtance, three Months together had the ſpoiling of thoſe Countries and all the Fenns, burnt Thetford and Grantbrig, or Cambridge; thence to a Hilly Place not far off, called by Huntingdon Baleſham, by Cambden Gogmagog Hills, and the Villages thereabout they turn'd their Fury, ſlaying all they met ſave one Man, who getting up into a Steeple, is ſaid to have defended himſelf againſt the whole Daniſh Army. They therefore ſo leaving him, their Foot by Sea, their Horſe by Land through Eſſex, return'd back laden to their Ships left in the

Yet here they ceas'd not, for the next Year repeating the ſame Cruelties on both ſides the Thames, one way as far as Huntingdon, the other as far as Wiltſhire and Southampton, ſollicited again by the King for Peace, and receiving their Demands both of Tribute and Contribution, they ſlighted their Faith; and in the beginning of September laid ſiege to Canterbury. On the 20th Day, by the Treachery of Almere the Arch-deacon, they took part of it and burnt it, committing all ſorts of Maſſacre as a Sport: Some they threw over the Wall, others into the Fire, hung ſome by the privy Members, Infants pulled from their Mothers Breaſts, were either toſs'd on Spears, or Carts drawn over them; Matrons and Virgins *Eadmer. Early the next Year before Eaſter, while Ethelred and his Peers were aſſembl'd at London, to raiſe now the fifth Tribute amounting to forty eight thouſand Eadmer. Pound, the Danes at Canterbury propoſe to the Arch-biſhop, who had been now ſeven Months their Priſoner, Life and Liberty, if he pay them three thouſand Pound; which he refuſing as not able of himſelf, and not willing to extort it from his Tenants, is permitted till the next Sunday to conſider; then hal'd before their Council, of whom Turkill was Chief, and ſtill refuſing, they riſe moſt of them being drunk, and beat him with the blunt ſide of their Axes, then thruſt forth deliver him to be pelted with Stones; till one Thrum a converted Dane, pittying him half dead, to put him out of Pain, with a pious Impiety, at one Stroke of his Ax on the Head diſpatch'd him [a]. His Body was carried to London, and there buried, thence afterward remov'd to Canterbury. By this time the Tribute paid and Peace ſo often violated ſworn again by the Danes, they diſpers'd their Fleet; forty five of them, and Turkill their Chief ſtaid at London with the King, ſwore him Allegiance to defend his Land againſt all Strangers, on condition only to be fed and cloath'd by him. But this voluntary Friendſhip of Turkill was thought to be deceitful, that ſtaying under this Pretence he

In July therefore of the next Year, King Swane arriving at Sandwich, made no ſtay there, but ſailing firſt to Humber, thence into Trent, landing and encamp'd at Gainſburrow: Whither without delay repair'd to him the Northumbrians, with Utbred their Earl; thoſe of Lindſey alſo, then thoſe of Fiſburg, and laſtly all on the North of Watling-ſtreet (which is a High-way from Eaſt to Weſt Sea) gave Oath and Hoſtages to obey him. From whom he commanded Horſes and Proviſion for his Army, taking with him beſides Bands and Companies of their choiceſt Men; and committing to his Son Canute the Care of his Fleet and Hoſtages; he marches towards the South Mercians, commanding his Soldiers to exerciſe all Acts of Hoſtility; with the Terrour whereof fully executed, he took in few Days the City of Oxford, then Wincheſter; thence tending to London, in his haſty Paſſage over the Thames, without ſeeking Bridge or Ford, loſt many of his Men. Nor was his Expedition againſt London proſperous; for aſſaying all means by Force or Wile to take the City, wherein the King then was, and Turkill with his Danes, he was ſtoutly beaten off as at other times. Thence back to Wallingford and Bath, directing his Courſe, after uſual Havock made, he ſat a while and refreſh'd his Army. There Ethelm an Earl of Devonſhire, and other great Officers in the Weſt yielded him Subjection. Theſe things flowing to his Wiſh, he betook him to his Navy, from that time ſtil'd and accounted King of England, if a Tyrant, ſaith Simeon, may be call'd a King. The Londoners alſo ſent him Hoſtages, and made their Peace, for they fear'd his Fury. Ethelred thus reduc'd to narrow Compaſs, ſent Emma his Queen, with his two Sons had by her, and all his Treaſure to Richard II. her Brother, Duke of Normandy; himſelf with the Daniſh Fleet abode ſome while at Greenwich, then ſailing to the Iſle of Wight, paſs'd after Chriſtmas into Normandy; where he was honourably receiv'd at Roan by the Duke, though known to have born himſelf churliſhly and proudly towards Emma his Siſter, beſides his diſſolute Company with other Women. Mean while Swane ceas'd not to exact almoſt inſupportable Tribute of the People, ſpoiling them when he liſted; beſides, the like did Turkill at Greenwich. The next Year beginning, Swane 1044. ſickens and dies [b]; ſome ſay terrifi'd by an ap- Sim. Dun. pearing Shape of St. Edmund arm'd, whoſe Church *Mat. After his Death the Daniſh Army and Fleet made his Son Canute their King; but the Nobility and States [c] of England ſent Meſſengers to Ethelred, declaring that they preferr'd none before their Native Sovereign, if he would promiſe to govern them better than he had done, and with more Clemency. Whereat the King rejoicing, ſends over his Son Edward with Embaſſadors to court both high and low, and win their Love, promiſing largely to be their mild and devoted Lord, to conſent in all things to their Will, follow their Counſel, and whatever had been done or ſpoken by any Man againſt him freely to pardon; if they would Loyally reſtore him to be their King. An Embaſſy of Lords is ſent to bring back the King honourably; he returns in Lent and is joyfully receiv'd of the People, marches with a ſtrong Army againſt Canute; who having got Horſes, and joyn'd with the Men of Lindſey, was preparing to make ſpoil in the Countries adjoyning; but by Ethelred unexpectedly coming upon him, was ſoon driven to his Ships, and his Confederates of Lindſey left to the Anger of their Countrymen; executed without Mercy by Fire and Sword. Canute in all haſt ſailing back to Sandwich, took the Hoſtages given to his Father from all Parts of England, and with ſlit Noſes, Ears crop'd, and Hands chop'd off, ſetting them aſhore, departed into Denmark. Yet the People were not diſburthen'd, for the King rais'd out of them thirty thouſand Pound to pay his Fleet of Danes at Greenwich. To theſe Evils the Sea in [a] October paſs'd his Bounds, overwhelming many Towns in England, and of their Inhabitants many thouſands. The Year following, an Aſſembly being at Oxford, Edric of Streon, having invited two Noblemen, Sigefertb and Morcar, the Sons of Earngrun of [b] Seav'nburg to his Lodging, ſecretly murther'd them: The King, for what Cauſe is unknown, ſeiz'd their Eſtates, and caus'd Algith the Wife of Sigefertb to be kept at Maidulfsburg, now Malmſbury; whom Edmund the Prince there married againſt his Father's Mind, then went and poſſeſs'd their Lands, making the People there ſubject to him. Mat. Weſt. ſaith, that theſe two were of the Danes, who had ſeated themſelves in Northumberland, ſlain by Edric under colour of Treaſon laid to their Charge. They who attended them without, tumulting at the Death of their Maſters, were beaten back; and driven into a Church, and defending themſelves were burnt there in the Steeple †. Mean while Canute returning from Denmark with a great Navy, two hundred Ships richly gilded and adorn'd, well fraught with Arms, and all Proviſion; and, which Encomium Emmæ mentions not, two other Kings, Lachman of Sweden, Olæv of Norway, arriv'd at Sandwich; and as the ſame Author then living writes, ſent out Spies to diſcover what Reſiſtance on Land was to be expected; who return'd with certain Report, that a great Army of Engliſh was in readineſs to oppoſe them. Turkill, who upon the Arrival of thoſe Daniſh Powers, kept Faith no longer with the Engliſh, but joyning now with Canute, as it were to reingratiate himſelf after his Revolt, whether real or complotted, counſell'd him (being yet young) not to land, but leave to him the Management of this firſt Battel; the King aſſented, and he with the Forces which he had brought, and part of thoſe which arriv'd with Canute, landing to their Wiſh encounter'd the Engliſh, though double in number, at a Place call'd [c] Scoraſtan, and was at firſt beaten back with much Loſs. But at length animating his Men with Rage only and Deſpair, obtain'd a clear Victory, which won him great Reward and Poſſeſſions from Canute. But of this Action no other Writer makes mention: From Sandwich therefore ſailing about to the River Frome, and there landing over all Dorſet, Somerſet, and Wiltſhire, he ſpread waſtful Hoſtility. The King lay then ſick at Caſham in this County; though it may ſeem ſtrange how he could lie ſick there in the midſt of his Enemies. Howbeit Edmund in one part, and Edric of Streon in another, rais'd Forces by themſelves; but ſo ſoon as both Armies were united, the Traytor Edric being found to practice againſt the Life of Edmund, he remov'd with his Army from him; whereof the Enemy took great Advantage. Edric eaſily enticing the forty Ships of Danes to ſide with him, revolted to Canute, the Weſt-Saxons alſo gave Pledges and furniſhed him with Horſes. By which means the Year enſuing, he with Edric the Traytor, paſſing the Thames at Creclad, about Twelftide, enter'd into Mercia, and eſpecially Warwickſhire, depopulating all Places in their way. Againſt theſe, Prince Edmund, for his Hardineſs call'd Ironſide, gather'd an Army; but the Mercians refus'd to fight unleſs Ethelred with the Londoners came to aid them; and ſo every Man return'd home. After the Feſtival, Edmund gathering another Army, beſought his Father to come with the Londoners, and what Force beſides he was able; they came with great Strength gotten together, but being come, and in a hopeful way of good Succeſs, it was told the King, that unleſs he took the better heed, ſome of his own Forces would fall off and betray him. The King daunted with this perhaps cunning Whiſper of the Enemy, diſbanded his Army, returns to London. Edmund betook him into Northumberland, as ſome thought to raiſe freſh Forces; but he with Earl Uthred on the one ſide, and Canute with Edric on the other, did little elſe but waſte the Provinces; Canute to conquer them, Edmund to puniſh them who ſtood neuter; for which cauſe Stafford, Shropſhire, and Leſterſhire, felt heavily his hand; while Canute, who was ruining the more Southern Shires, at length march'd into Northumberland; which Edmund hearing diſmiſs'd his Forces, and came to London. Uthred the Earl haſted back to Northumberland, and finding no other Remedy, ſubmitted himſelf with all the Northumbrians, giving Hoſtages to Canute. Nevertheleſs by his Command or Connivance, and the hand of one Turebrand a Daniſh Lord; Uthred was ſlain, and Iric another Dane made Earl in his ſtead. This Uthred Son of Walteof, as Simeon writes, in his Treatiſe of the Siege of Durham, in his Youth obtain'd a great Victory againſt Malcolm Son of Kened King of Scots, who with the whole Power of his Kingdom was fallen into Northumberland, and laid ſiege to Durham. Walteof the old Earl unable to reſiſt, had ſecur'd himſelf in Bebbanburg, a ſtrong Town, but Uthred gathering an Army rais'd the Siege, ſlew moſt of the Scots, their King narrowly eſcaping, and with the Heads of their ſlain, fixt upon Poles, beſet round the Walls of Durham. The Year of this Exploit Simeon clears not, for in 969, and in the Reign of Ethelred as he affirms, it could not be. Canute by another way returning Southward, joyful of his Succeſs, before Eaſter came back with all the Army to his Fleet. About the * end of April enſuing, Ethelred after a long, troubleſome, and ill-govern'd Reign, ended his Days at London, and was buried in the Church of St. Paul.

EDMUND Ironside.

A. D. 1016. AFter the deceaſe of Ethelred, they of the Nobility who were then at London, together with the Citizens, choſe Edmund his Son (not by Emma, but a former Wife the Daughter of Earl Thored) in his Father's room; but the Arch-biſhops, Abbots, and many of the Nobles aſſembling together elected Canute; and coming to Southampton where he then remain'd, renounc'd before him all the Race of Ethelred, and ſwore him Fidelity: He alſo ſwore to them, in Matters both Religious and Secular, to be their faithful Lord. But Edmund with all ſpeed going to the Weſt-Saxons, was joyfully receiv'd of them as their King, and of many other Provinces by their Example. Mean while Canute about mid May came with his whole Fleet up the River to London; then cauſing a great Dike to be made on Surrey ſide, turn'd the Stream and drew his Ships thither Weſt of the Bridge; then begirting the City with a broad and deep Trench, aſſail'd it on every ſide; but repuls'd as before by the valourous Defendants, and in Deſpair of Succeſs at that time, leaving part of his Army for the Defence of his Ships, with the reſt ſped him to the Weſt-Saxons, e're Edmund could have time to aſſemble all his Powers: Who yet with ſuch as were at hand invoking Divine Aid, encounter'd the Danes at [a] Pen by Gillingham in Dorſetſhire, and put him to flight. After Midſummer, encreas'd with new Forces, [b] he met with him again at a Place call'd Sheraſtan, now [c] Sharſtan; but Edric, Almar, and Algar, with the Hampſhire and Wiltſhire Men, then ſiding with the Danes, he only maintain'd the Fight, obſtinately fought on both ſides, till Night and Wearineſs parted them. Day-light returning renew'd the Conflict; wherein the Danes appearing inferiour, Edric to diſhearten the Engliſh, cuts off the Head of one Oſmer, in Countenance and Hair ſomewhat reſembling the King, and holding it up, cries aloud to the Engliſh, That Edmund being ſlain and this his Head, it was time for them to flie; which Fallacy Edmund perceiving, and openly ſhewing himſelf to his Soldiers, by a Spear thrown at Edric, that miſſing him yet ſlew one next him, and through him another behind, they recover'd Heart, and lay ſore upon the Danes till Night parted them as before: For e're the third Morn, Canute ſenſible of his Loſs, march'd away by Stealth to his Ships at London, renewing there his Leagre. Some would have this Battel at Sheraſtan the ſame with that at [d] Scoraſtan before mention'd, but the Circumſtance of Time permits not that, having been before the landing of Canute, this a good while after, as by the Proceſs of things appears: From Sheraſtan, or Sharſtan, Edmund return'd to the Weſt-Saxons, whoſe Valour Edric fearing, leſt it might prevail againſt the Danes, ſought Pardon of his Revolt, and obtaining it ſwore Loyalty to the King, who now the third time coming with an Army from the Weſt-Saxons to London, rais'd the Siege, chaſing Canute and his Danes to their Ships. Then after two Days paſſing the Thames at Branford, and ſo coming on their Backs, kept them ſo turn'd, and obtain'd the Victory: Then returns again to his Weſt-Saxons, and Canute to his Siege, but ſtill in vain; riſing therefore thence, he enter'd with his Ships a River then call'd [e] Arenne; and from the Banks thereof waſted Mercia; thence their Horſe by Land, their Foot by Ship came to Medway. Edmund in the mean while, with multiplied Forces out of many Shires, croſſing again at Branford, came into Kent, ſeeking Canute; encounter'd him at Otford, and ſo defeated, that of his Horſe, they who eſcap'd fled to the Iſle of Sheppey; and a full Victory he had gain'd, had not Edric ſtill the Traytor by ſome Wile or other detain'd his Purſuit: And Edmund who never wanted Courage, here wanted Prudence to be ſo miſled, ever after forſaken of his wonted Fortune. Canute croſſing with his Army into Eſſex, thence waſted Mercia worſe than before, and with heavy Prey return'd to his Ships: Them Edmund with a collected Army purſuing, overtook at a Place call'd * Aſſandune, or Aſſeſhill, [f] now Aſhdown in Eſſex; the Battel on either ſide was fought with great Vehemence; but perfidious Edric perceiving the Victory to encline towards Edmund, with that part of the Army which was under him [g], fled, as he had promis'd Canute, and left the King over-match'd with Numbers: By which Deſertion the Engliſh were overthrown, Duke Alfric, Duke Godwin, and Ulfketel the valiant Duke of Eaſt-Angles, with a great part of the Nobility ſlain, ſo as the Engliſh of a long time had not receiv'd a greater Blow. Yet after a while Edmund not abſurdly call'd Ironſide, preparing to try again his Fortune in another Field, was hinder'd by Edric and others of his Faction, adviſing him to make Peace and divide the Kingdom with Canute. To which Edmund over-rul'd, a Treaty appointed, and Pledges mutually given, both Kings [h] met together at a Place call'd Deorhirſt in Glouſterſhire; Edmund on the Weſt-ſide of Severn, Canute on the Eaſt with their Armies, then both in Perſon wafted into an Iſland, at that time ca'l'd Olanege, [i] now Alney in the midſt of the River; ſwearing Amity and Brother-hood, they parted the Kingdom between them. Then interchanging Arms and the Habit they wore, aſſeſſing alſo what Pay ſhould be allotted to the Navy; they departed each his way. Concerning this Interview, and the Cauſe thereof, others write otherwiſe; Malmſbury, that Edmund grieving at the Loſs of ſo much Blood ſpilt for the Ambition only of two Men ſtriving who ſhould reign, of his own accord ſent to Canute, offering him ſingle Combat, to prevent in their own Cauſe the Effuſion of more blood than their own; that Canute though of Courage enough, yet not unwiſely doubting Weſt.* relates, That the Peers on every ſide wearied out with continual Warfare, and not refraining to affirm openly, that they two who expected to reign ſingly, had moſt Reaſon to fight ſingly, the Kings were content; the Iſland was their Liſts, the Combat Knightly; till Knute finding himſelf too weak, began to parle, which ended as is ſaid before. After which the Londoners bought their Peace of the Danes, and permitted them to winter in the City. But King Edmund about the Feaſt of St. Andrew, unexpectedly deceas'd at London, and was buried near to Edgar his Grand-father at Glaſton. The Cauſe of his ſo ſudden Death is uncertain; common Fame, ſaith Malmſbury, lays the Guilt thereof upon Edric, who to pleaſe Canute, allur'd with Promiſe of Reward two of the King's Privy-Chamber, though at firſt abhorring the Fact, to aſſaſſinate him at the Stool, by thruſting a ſharp Iron into his hinder Parts. Huntingdon, and Mat. Weſt. relate it done at Oxford by the Son of Edric, and ſomething vary in the manner, [b] not worth recital. Edmund dead, Canute meaning to reign ſole King of England, calls to him all the Dukes, Barons, and Biſhops of the Land, cunningly demanding of them who were Witneſſes what Agreement was made between him and Edmund dividing the Kingdom, whether the Sons and Brothers of Edmund were to govern the Weſt-Saxons after him, Canute living? They who underſtood his meaning, and fear'd to undergo his Anger, timorouſly anſwer'd, that Edmund they knew had left no part thereof to his Sons or Brethren, living or dying; but that he intended Canute ſhould be their Guardian, till they came to Age of reigning. Simeon affirms, that for Fear or Hope of Reward they atteſted what was not true: Notwithſtanding which he put many of them to death not long after.

CANUTE, or KNUTE.

1017. Sim. Dun. Sax. An. The firſt Daniſh King of England 570 Years after the Saxon Invaſion.

Canute having thus ſounded the Nobility, and by them underſtood, receiv'd their Oath of Fealty, they the Pledge of his bare Hand, and Oath from the Daniſh Nobles; whereupon the Houſe of Edmund was renounc'd, and Canute crown'd. Then they enacted, That Edwi, Brother of Edmund, a Prince of great Hope, ſhould be baniſh'd the Realm. But Canute not thinking himſelf ſecure while Edwi liv'd, conſulted with Edric how to make him away; who told him of one Ethelward a decay'd Nobleman, likelieſt to do the Work. Ethelward ſent for, and tempted by the King in private, with largeſt Rewards, but abhorring in his Mind the Deed, promis'd to do it when he ſaw his Opportunity; and ſo ſtill deferr'd it. But Edwi afterwards, receiv'd into Favour as a Snare, was by him or ſome other of his falſe Friends, Canute contriving it, the ſame Year ſlain [c]. Edric alſo counſel'd him to diſpatch Edward and Edmund, the Sons [d] of Ironſide; but the King doubting that the Fact would ſeem too foul done in England, ſent them to the King of Sweden, with like intent; but he diſdaining the Office, ſent them for better Safety to Solomon King of Hungary; where Edmund at length dy'd, but Edward married Agatha Daughter to Henry the German Emperour. A Digreſſion in the Laws of Edward Confeſſor under the Title of Lex Noricorum ſaith, that this Edward for fear of Canute, fled of his own accord to Maleſclot King of the Rugians, who receiv'd him honourably, and of that Country gave him a Wife. Canute ſettl'd in his Throne, divided the Government of his Kingdom into four parts; the Weſt-Saxons to himſelf, the Eaſt-Angles to Earl Turkill, the Mercians to Edric, the Northumbrians to Eric; then made Peace with all Princes round about him, and his former Wife being dead, in July married Emma the Widow of King Ethelred. The Chriſtmas following was an ill Feaſt to Edric, of whoſe Treaſon, the King having now made uſe as much as ſerv'd his turn, and fearing himſelf to be the next betray'd, caus'd him to be ſlain at London in the Palace, thrown over the City Wall, and there to lie unburied; the Head of Edric fix'd on a Pole, he commanded to be ſet on the higheſt Tower of London, as in a double Sence he had promis'd him, for the Murther of King Edmund to exalt him above all the Peers of England. Huntingdon, Malmſbury, and Mat. Weſt. write, that ſuſpecting the King's Intention to degrade him from his Mercian Dukedom, and upbraiding him with his Merits, the King enrag'd, caus'd him to be ſtrangl'd in the Room, and out at a Window thrown into the Thames. Another writes, that Eric at the King's Command ſtruck off his Head. Other great Men though without Fault, as Duke Norman the Son of Leofwin, Ethelward Son of Duke Agelmar, [e] he put to death at the ſame time, jealous of their Power or Familiarity with Edric: And notwithſtanding Peace, kept ſtill his Army; to maintain which, the next Year he ſquees'd out of the Engliſh, though now his Subjects, not his Enemies, ſeventy two, ſome ſay, eighty two thouſand Pound, beſides fifteen thouſand out of London [f]. Mean while great War aroſe at Carr, between Uthred Son of Waldef, Earl of Northumberland, and Malcolm Son of Kened King of Scots, with whom held Eugenius King of Lothian. But here Simeon the Relater ſeems to have committed ſome Miſtake, having ſlain Uthred by Canute two Years before, and ſet Eric in his Place: Eric therefore it muſt needs be, not Uthred, who manag'd this War againſt the Scots. About which time in a Convention of Danes [g] at Oxford, it was agreed on both Parties to keep the Laws of Edgar; Mat. Weſt. ſaith, of Edward the Elder. The next Year Canute ſail'd into Denmark, and there abode all Winter. Huntingdon and Mat. Weſt. ſay, he went thither to repreſs the Swedes, and that the Night before a Battel to be fought with them, Godwin ſtealing out of the Camp with his Engliſh, aſſaulted the Swedes, and had got the Victory

A. D. 1020. Victory e're Canute in the Morning knew of any Fight. For which bold Enterprize, though againſt Diſcipline, he had the Engliſh in more Eſteem ever after. In the Spring at his return into England, he held in the time of Eaſter a great Aſſembly at * Chirchebeſter, and the ſame Year was with Turkill the Dane at the Dedication of a Church by them built at Aſſendune †, in the Place of that great Victory which won him the Crown. But ſuſpecting his Greatneſs, the Year following baniſh'd him the Realm, and found occaſion to do the like by Eric the Northumbrian Earl upon the ſame Jealouſie [a]. Nor yet content with his Conqueſt of England, though now above ten Years enjoy'd, he paſs'd with fifty Ships into Norway, diſpoſſeſs'd Olave their King, and ſubdu'd the Land, firſt with great Sums of Money ſent the Year before to gain him a Party, then coming with an Army to compel the reſt [b]. 1029. Thence returning King of England, Denmark, and Norway, yet not ſecure in his Mind, under colour of an Embaſſy he ſent into Baniſhment Hacun a powerful Dane, who had married * the Daughter of his Siſter Gunildis, having conceiv'd ſome Suſpicion of his Practices againſt him: But ſuch Courſe was taken, that he never came back; either periſhing at Sea, or ſlain by Contrivance the next Year in Orkney. Canute therefore having thus eſtabliſh'd himſelf by Bloodſhed and Oppreſſion, to waſh away, as he thought, the Guilt thereof, ſailing again into Denmark, went thence to Rome, and offer'd there to St. Peter great Gifts of Gold and Silver, and other precious things; beſides the uſual Tribute of Romſcot, giving great Alms by the way, both thither and back again, freeing many Places of Cuſtom and Toll with great Expence, where Strangers were wont to pay, having vow'd great Amendment of Life at the Sepulchre of Peter and Paul, and to his whole People in a large [c] Letter written from Rome yet extant. At his return therefore he built and dedicated a Church to St. Edmund at Bury [d], whom his Anceſtors had ſlain, threw out the Secular Prieſts who had intruded there, and plac'd Monks in their ſtead; then going into Scotland, ſubdu'd and receiv'd Homage of Malcolm, and two other King's there, Melbeath, and Jermare. Three Years after having made [e] Swane his ſuppos'd Son by Algiva of Northampton, Duke Aiſhelm's Daughter (for others ſay the Son of a Prieſt whom Algiva, barren, had got ready at the time of her feigned Labour) King of Norway, and Hardecnute his Son by Emma, King of Denmark, and deſign'd Harold his Son † by Algiva of Northampton, King of England, dy'd at Shaftſbury, and was buried at Wincheſter in the old Monaſtery. This King, as appears, ended better than he began, for tho' he ſeems to have had no hand in the Death of Ironſide, but deteſted the Fact, and bringing the Murtherers, who came to him in hope of great Reward, forth among his Courtiers, as it were to receive Thanks, after they had openly related the manner of their killing him, deliver'd them to deſerved Puniſhment, yet he ſpar'd Edric whom he knew to be the prime Author of that deteſtible Fact; till willing to be rid of him, grown importune upon the Confidence of his Merits, and upbraided by him that he had firſt relinquiſh'd, then extinguiſh'd Edmund for his ſake; angry to be ſo upbraided, therefore ſaid he with a chang'd Countenance, Traytor to God and to me, thou ſhalt die; thine own Mouth accuſes thee to have ſlain thy Maſter my Confederate Brother, and the Lord's Anointed. Whereupon although preſent and private Execution was in Rage done upon Edric, yet he himſelf in cool Blood ſcrupl'd not to make away the Brother and Children of Edmund, who had better Right to be the Lord's Anointed here than himſelf. When he had obtain'd in England what he deſir'd, no wonder if he ſought the Love of his conquer'd Subjects for the Love of his own Quiet, the Maintainers of his Wealth and State, for his own Profit. For the like reaſon he is thought to have married Emma, and that Richard Duke of Normandy her Brother might the leſs care what became of Elfred and Edward, her Sons by King Ethelred. He commanded to be obſerv'd the Ancient Saxon Laws, call'd afterwards the Laws of Edward the Confeſſor, not that he made them, but ſtrictly obſerv'd them. His Letter from Rome profeſſes, if he had done aught amiſs in his Youth, through Negligence or want of due Temper, full Reſolution with the Help of God to make amends, by governing juſtly and piouſly for the future; charges and adjures all his Officers and Viſcounts, that neither for Fear of him, or Favour of any Perſon, or to enrich the King, they ſuffer Injuſtice to be done in the Land; commands his Treaſurers to pay all his Debts e're his return home, which was by Denmark, to compoſe Matters there; and what his Letter profeſs'd, he perform'd all his Life after. But it is a fond Conceit in many great ones, and pernicious in the end, to ceaſe from no Violence till they have attain'd the utmoſt of their Ambitions and Deſires; then to think God appeas'd by their ſeeking to bribe him with a Share however large of their ill-gotten Spoils, and then laſtly to grow zealous of doing Right, when they have no longer need to do Wrong. Howbeit Canute was Famous through Europe, and much honour'd of Conrade the Emperour then at Rome, with rich Gifts and many Grants of what he there demanded for the freeing of Paſſages from Toil and Cuſtom. I muſt not omit one remarkable Action done by him, as Huntingdon reports it, with great Scene of Circumſtance, and emphatical Expreſſion, to ſhew the ſmall Power of Kings in reſpect of God; which, unleſs to Court-Paraſites, needed no ſuch laborious Demonſtration. He caus'd his Royal Seat to be ſet on the Shoar, while the Tide was coming in; and with all the State that Royalty could put into his Countenance, ſaid thus to the Sea: Thou Sea belong'ſt to me, and the Land whereon I ſit is mine; nor hath any one unpuniſh'd reſiſted my Commands: I charge thee come no farther upon my Land, neither preſume to wet the Feet of thy Sovereign Lord. But the Sea, as before, [b] Bromton writes, That he was in a manner expell'd by his own Subjects, for his Weakneſs and Effeminacy: And returning a Year afterwards, the People roſe upon him and ſlew him. He was canoniz'd under the Title of King Olaf the Martyr.

Whereat the King quickly rising, wish'd all about him to behold and consider the weak and frivolous Power of a King, and that none indeed deserv'd the Name of a King, but he whose Eternal Laws both Heaven, Earth, and Sea obey. A Truth so evident of it self, as I said before, that unless to shame his Court Flatterers, who would not else be convinc'd, Canute needed not to have gone wet-shod home: The best is, from that time forth he never would wear a Crown, esteeming Earthly Royalty contemptible and vain.

HAROLD.

Florent. Bromton. Hunting. Mat. West. Encom. Em. HArold for his Swiftness sirnam'd Harefoot, the Son of Canute by Algiva of Northampton (though [a] some speak doubtfully as if she bore him not, but had him of a Shoo-maker's Wife, as Swane before of a Priest; others of a Maid-servant, to conceal her Barrenness) in a great Assembly at Oxford, was by Duke Leofric and the Mercians, with the [b] Londoners, according to his Father's Testament elected King; but without the Regal Habiliments, which Ælnot the Arch-bishop having in his Custody, refus'd to deliver up, but to the Sons of Emma, for which Harold ever after hated the Clergy; and (as the Clergy are wont thence to inferr) all Religion. Godwin Earl of Kent, and the West-Saxons with him, stood for Hardecnute. Malmsbury saith, that the Contest was between Dane and English; that the Danes and Londoners grown now in a manner Danish, were all for Hardecnute; but he being then in Denmark, Harold prevail'd, yet so as that the Kingdom should be divided between them; the West and South part reserv'd by Emma for Hardecnute, till his return. But Harold once advanc'd into the Throne, banish'd Emma his Mother-in-Law, seiz'd on his Father's Treasure at Winchester, and there remain'd. Emma not holding it safe to abide in Normandy 1036. while Duke William the Bastard was yet under Sim. Dun. Age, retir'd to Baldwin Earl of Flanders [c]. In the mean while Alfred and Edward Sons of Ethelred, accompanied with a small number of Norman Souldiers in a few Ships, coming to visit their Mother Emma not yet departed the Land, and perhaps to see how the People were inclin'd to restore them their Right; Elfred was sent for by the King then at London; but in his way met at Guilford by Earl Godwin, who with all seeming Friendship entertain'd him, was in the Night surpriz'd and made Prisoner, most of his Company put to various sorts of cruel Death, decimated twice over, then brought to London, was by the King sent bound to Ely, had his Eyes put out by the way, and deliver'd to the Monks there, dy'd soon after in their Custody. Malmsbury gives little Credit to this Story of Elfred, as not chronicl'd in his time, but rumour'd only. Which Emma however hearing, sent away her Son Edward, who by good hap accompanied not his Brother, with all speed into Normandy. But the Author of Encomium Emmæ, who seems plainly (though nameless) to have been some Monk, yet liv'd, and perhaps wrote within the same Year when these things were done; by his Relation differing from all others, much aggravates the Cruelty of Harold, that he not content to have practis'd in secret (for openly he durst not) against the Life of Emma, sought many treacherous ways to get her Son within his Power; and resolv'd at length to forge a Letter in the Name of their Mother, inviting them into England, the Copy of which Letter he produces written to this purpose. A. D. 1036.

EMma in Name only Queen, to her Sons Edward and Alfrid imparts Motherly Salutation. While we severally bewail the Death of our Lord the King, most dear Sons, and while daily ye are depriv'd more and more of the Kingdom your Inheritance; I admire what Counsel ye take, knowing that your intermitted delay, is a daily strengthening to the Reign of your Usurper, who incessantly goes about from Town to City, gaining the Chief Nobles to his Party, either by Gifts, Prayers, or Threats. But they had much rather one of you should reign over them, than to be held under the Power of him who now over-rules them. I entreat therefore that one of you come to me speedily, and privately; to receive from me wholsome Counsel, and to know how the Business which I intend shall be accomplish'd. By this Messenger present, send back what you determine. Farewel, as dear both as my own Heart. Encom. Em.

These Letters were sent to the Princes then in Normandy, by express Messengers, with Presents also as from their Mother; which they joyfully receiving, return word by the same Messengers, that one of them will be with her shortly; naming both the Time and Place. Alfrid therefore the younger (for so it was thought best) at the appointed time, with a few Ships and small numbers about him appearing on the Coast, no sooner came ashore but fell into the Snare of Earl Godwin, sent on purpose to betray him; as above was related. Emma greatly sorrowing for the Loss of her Son, thus cruelly made away, fled immediately with some of the Nobles her faithfullest Adherents into Flanders, had her dwelling assign'd at Burges by the Earl; where having remain'd about two Years, she was visi- 1039. ted out of Denmark by Hardecnute her Son; and Sim. Dun. he not long had remain'd with here there, when Harold in England, having done nothing the Hunting. while worth Memory, save the Taxing of every 1040. Port at eight Marks of Silver to sixteen Ships, Sim. Dun. dy'd at London, some say at Oxford, and was bu- Malmsb. ried at Winchester. After which, most of the Nobility, both Danes and English now agreeing, send Embassadors to Hardecnute still at Bruges with his Mother, entreating him to come and receive as his Right the Scepter, who before Midsummer came with sixty Ships, and many Souldiers out of Denmark.

HARDECNUTE.

HArdecnute receiv'd with Acclamation, and seated in the Throne, first call'd to mind the Injuries done to him or his Mother Emma in the time of Harold; sent Alfric Arch-bishop of York, Godwin and others, with Troud his Executioner to London, commanding them to dig up the Body of King Harold, and throw it into a Ditch; but by a second Order into the Thames. Whence taken up by a Fiſherman, and convey'd to a Church-yard in London, belonging to the Danes, it was interr'd again with honour. This done, he levied a ſore Tax, that eight Marks to every Rower, and twelve to every Officer in his Fleet, ſhould be paid throughout England[a]; by which time they who were ſo forward to call him over, had enough of him; for he, as they thought, had too much of theirs. After this he call'd to account Godwin Earl of Kent, and Leving Biſhop of Worceſter, about the Death of Elfred his half Brother, which Alfric the Archbiſhop laid to their Charge; the King depriv'd Leving of his Biſhoprick, and gave it to his Accuſer: But the Year following, pacify'd with a round Sum, reſtor'd it to Leving. Godwin made his Peace by a ſumptuous Preſent, a Gally with a guilded Stem bravely rigg'd, and eighty Soldiers in her, every one with Bracelets of Gold on each Arm, weighing ſixteen Ounces, Helmet, Corſlet, and Hilts of his Swords guilded; a Daniſh Curtax liſted with Gold or Silver hung on his left Shoulder, a Shield with Boſs and Nails guilded in his left Hand, in his right a Launce: Beſides this, he took his Oath before the King, that neither of his own Counſel or Will, but by the Command of Harold he had done what he did, to the putting out of Elfred's Eyes. The like Oath took moſt of the Nobility for themſelves, or in his behalf. The next Year, Hardecnute ſending his Houſecarles[b], ſo they call'd his Officers, to gather the Tribute impos'd; two of them, rigorous in their Office, were ſlain at Worceſter by the People; whereat the King enrag'd, ſent Leofric Duke of Mercia, and Seward of Northumberland[c], with great Forces and Commiſſion to ſlay the Citizens, rifle and burn the City, waſte the whole Province. Affrighted with ſuch News, all the People fled; the Countrymen whither they could, the Citizens to a ſmall Iſland in Severn, call'd Beverege, which they fortify'd and defended ſtoutly, till Peace was granted them, and freely to return home. But their City they found ſack'd and burnt; wherewith the King was appeas'd. This was commendable in him, however cruel to others, that towards his half Brethren, tho' Rivals of his Crown, he ſhew'd himſelf always tenderly affection'd; as now towards Edward, who without fear came to him out of Normandy, and with unfeigned kindneſs receiv'd, remain'd ſafely and honourably in his Court[d]. But Hardecnute the Year following, at a Feaſt wherein Oſgod, a great Daniſh Lord, gave his Daughter in Marriage at Lambeth, to Prudon, another potent Dane; in the midſt of his Mirth, ſound and healthful to ſight, while he was drinking fell down ſpeechleſs, and ſo dying, was buried at Winchester beſide his Father. He was it ſeems a great lover of good Cheer; ſitting at Table four times a day, with great variety of Diſhes, and ſuperfluity to all Comers. Whereas, ſaith Huntingdon, in our time Princes in their Houſes made but one Meal a day[e]. He gave his Siſter Gunildis, a Virgin of rare Beauty, in Marriage to Henry the Alman Emperor; and to ſend her forth pompouſly, all the Nobility contributed their Jewels and richeſt Ornaments. But it may ſeem a Wonder, that our Hiſtorians, if they deſerve that Name, ſhould, in a Matter ſo remarkable, and ſo near their own time, ſo much differ. Huntingdon relates, againſt the Credit of all other Records, that Hardecnute thus dead, the Engliſh rejoycing at this unexpected riddance of the Daniſh Yoke, ſent over to Elfrid the Eldeſt Son of Emma by King Ethelred, of whom we heard but now, that he dy'd Priſoner at Ely, ſent thither by Harold ſix Years before; that he came now out of Normandy, with a great number of Men, to receive the Crown; that Earl Godwin aiming to have his Daughter Queen of England, by marrying her to Edward a ſimple Youth, for he thought Elfred of a higher Spirit than to accept her, perſuaded the Nobles that Elfred had brought over too many Normans, had promis'd them Lands here, that it was not ſafe to ſuffer a Warlike and ſubtil Nation to take root in the Land, that theſe were to be ſo handled as none of them might dare for the future to flock hither, upon pretence of relation to the King; thereupon, by common conſent of the Nobles, both Elfred and his Company were dealt with as was above related; that they then ſent for Edward out of Normandy, with Hoſtages to be left there of their faithful Intentions to make him King, and their deſires not to bring over with him many Normans; that Edward, at their call, came then firſt out of Normandy; whereas all others agree, that he came voluntarily over to viſit Hardecnute, as is before ſaid, and was remaining in the Court at the time of his death. For Hardecnute dead, ſaith Malmſbury, Edward doubting greatly his own ſafety, determin'd to rely wholly on the Advice and Favour of Earl Godwin; deſiring therefore by Meſſengers to have private Speech with him, the Earl a while deliberated: At laſt aſſenting, Prince Edward came, and would have fallen at his Feet; but that not permitted, told him the danger wherein he thought himſelf at preſent, and in great perplexity beſought his help to convey him ſome whither out of the Land. Godwin ſoon apprehending the fair occaſion that now as it were prompted him how to advance himſelf and his Family, cheerfully exhorted him to remember himſelf the Son of Ethelred, the Grandchild of Edgar, right Heir to the Crown, at full Age; not to think of flying, but of reigning, which might eaſily be brought about, if he would follow his Counſel; then ſetting forth the Power and Authority which he had in England, promis'd it ſhould be all his to ſet him on his Throne, if he on his part would promiſe and ſwear to be for ever his Friend, to preſerve the Honour of his Houſe, and to marry his Daughter. Edward, as his neceſſity then was, conſented eaſily, and ſwore to whatever Godwin requir'd. An Aſſembly of States thereupon met at Gillingham, where Edward pleaded his Right; and by the powerful Influence of Godwin was accepted. Others, as Bromton, with no probability, write, that Godwin at this time was fled into Denmark, for what he had done to Elfred, return'd and ſubmitted himſelf to Edward then King, was by him charg'd openly with the Death of Elfred, and, not without much ado, by the interceſſion of Leofric, and other Peers, receiv'd at length into favour.

GLAD were the Engliſh deliver'd ſo unexpectedly from their Daniſh Maſters [a], and little thought how near another Conqueſt was hanging over them. Edward, the Eaſter following, Crown'd [b] at Winchester, the ſame Year accompanied with Earl Godwin, Leofric, and Siward, came again thither on a ſudden, and by their Counſel ſeiz'd on the Treaſure of his Mother Emma. The Cauſe alledg'd is, that ſhe was hard to him in the time of his Baniſhment; and indeed ſhe is ſaid not much to have lov'd Ethelred her former Huſband, and thereafter the Children by him; ſhe was moreover noted to be very covetous, hard to the Poor, and profuſe to Monaſteries. About this time alſo King Edward, according to promiſe, took to Wife Edith or Egith, Earl Godwin's Daughter, commended much for Beauty, Modeſty, and, beyond what is requiſite in a Woman, Learning. Ingulf, then a Youth, lodging in the Court with his Father, ſaw her oft, and coming from the School, was ſometimes met by her and pos'd, not in Grammer only, but in Logick. Edward, the next Year but one, made ready a ſtrong Navy at Sandwich againſt Magnus King of Norway, who threaten'd an Invaſion; had not Swane King of Denmark diverted him by a War at home to defend his own Land, not out of good will to Edward, as may be ſuppos'd, who at the ſame time expreſs'd none to the Danes, baniſhing Gunildis the Neece of Canute with her two Sons, and Oſgod, by ſirname Clapa, out of the Realm. Swane overpower'd by Magnus, ſent the next Year to entreat Aid of King Edward; Godwin gave counſel to ſend him fifty Ships fraught with Soldiers; but Leofric and the general Voice gainſaying, none were ſent [c]. The next Year Harold Harvager King of Norway ſending Ambaſſadors, made Peace with King Edward; but an Earthquake at Worceſter and Darby, Peſtilence and Famine in many places, much leſſen'd the Enjoyment thereof. The next Year Henry the Emperor diſpleas'd with Baldwin Earl of Flanders, had ſtraiten'd him with a great Army by Land; and ſending to King Edward, deſir'd him with his Ships to hinder what he might, his eſcape by Sea. The King therefore with a great Navy coming to Sandwich, there ſtaid till the Emperor came to an agreement with Earl Baldwin. Mean while, Swane Son of Earl Godwin, who not permitted to marry Edgiva the Abbeſs of Cheſter, by him deflour'd, had left the Land, came out of Denmark with eight Ships, feigning a deſire to return into the King's Favour; and Beorn his Couſin German, who commanded part of the King's Navy, promis'd to intercede that his Earldom might be reſtor'd him. Godwin therefore and Beorn with a few Ships, the reſt of the Fleet gone home, coming to Pevenſey, (but Godwin ſoon departing thence in purſuit of twenty nine Daniſh Ships, who had got much Booty on the Coaſt of Eſſex, and periſh'd by Tempeſt in their return) Swane with his Ships comes to Beorn at Pevenſey, guilefully requeſts him to ſail with him to Sandwich, and reconcile him to the King, as he had promis'd. Beorn miſtruſting no Evil where he intended Good, went with him in his Ship, attended by three only of his Servants. But Swane ſet upon barbarous Cruelty, not Reconciliation with the King, took Beorn, now in his power, and bound him; then coming to Dartmouth, ſlew and bury'd him in a deep Ditch. After which, the Men of Haſtings took ſix of his Ships, and brought them to the King at Sandwich; with the other two he eſcap'd into Flanders, there remaining, till Aldred Biſhop of Worceſter, by earneſt mediation, wrought his Peace with the King. About this time King Edward ſent to Pope Leo, deſiring Abſolution from a Vow, which he had made in his younger Years, to take a Journey to Rome, if God vouchſaf'd him to Reign in England; the Pope diſpenc'd with his Vow, but not without the Expence of his Journey given to the Poor, and a Monaſtery built or re-edify'd to St. Peter; who in a Viſion to a Monk, as is ſaid, choſe Weſtminſter, which King Edward thereupon rebuilding endow'd with large Privileges and Revenues. The ſame Year, ſaith Florent of Worceſter, certain Iriſh Pirates with thirty ſix Ships enter'd the Mouth of Severn, and with the Aid of Griffin Prince of South-Wales, did ſome hurt in thoſe parts: Then paſſing the River Wey, burnt Dunedham, and ſlew all the Inhabitants they found. Againſt whom Aldred Biſhop of Worceſter, with a few out of Gloceſter and Herefordſhire, went out in haſte: But Griffin, to whom the Welſh and Iriſh had privily ſent Meſſengers, came down upon the Engliſh with his whole Power by Night, and early in the Morning ſuddenly aſſaulting them, ſlew many, and put the reſt to flight. The next Year but one, King Edward remitted the Daniſh Tax, which had continu'd thirty eight Years heavy upon the Land, ſince Ethelred firſt paid it to the Danes, and what remain'd thereof in his Treaſury he ſent back to the Owners: But through imprudence laid the foundation of a far worſe Miſchief to the Engliſh; while ſtudying Gratitude to thoſe Normans [d], who to him in Exile had been helpful; he call'd them over to publick Offices here, whom better he might have repaid out of his private Purſe; by this means exaſperating either Nation one againſt the other, and making way by degrees to the Norman Conqueſt. Robert, a Monk of that Country, who had been ſerviceable to him there in time of need, he made Biſhop, firſt of London, then of Canterbury; William his Chaplain Biſhop of Dorcheſter. Then began the Engliſh to lay aſide their own Ancient Cuſtoms, and in many things to imitate French Manners, the great Peers to ſpeak French in their Houſes, in French to write their Bills and Letters, as a great piece of Gentility, aſham'd of their own: A preſage of their Subjection ſhortly to that People, whoſe Faſhions and Language they affected ſo ſlaviſhly: But that which gave beginning to many Troubles enſuing, happen'd this Year, and upon this Occaſion. Euſtace Earl of Boloign, Father of the famous

A. D. 1051.

Godfrey who won Jeruſalem from the Saracens, and Huſband to Goda the King's Siſter, having been to viſit King Edward, and returning by Canterbury to take Ship at Dover, one of his Harbingers inſolently ſeeking to lodge by Force in a Houſe there, provok'd ſo the Maſter thereof, as by chance or Heat of Anger to kill him. The Count with his whole Train going to the Houſe where his Servant had been kill'd, ſlew both the Slayer and eighteen more who defended him. But the Townſmen running to Arms, requited him with the Slaughter of twenty one more of his Servants, wounded moſt of the reſt; he himſelf with one or two hardly eſcaping, ran back with Clamour to the King; whom ſeconded by other Norman Courtiers, he ſtirr'd up to great Anger againſt the Citizens of Canterbury. Earl Godwin in haſt is ſent for, the Cauſe related and much aggravated by the King againſt that City, the Earl commanded to raiſe Forces, and uſe the Citizens thereof as Enemies. Godwin, ſorry to ſee Strangers more favour'd of the King than his Native People, anſwer'd, That it were better to ſummon firſt the Chief Men of the Town into the King's Court, to charge them with Sedition, where both Parties might be heard, that not found in fault they might be acquitted, if otherwiſe, by Fine or Loſs of Life might ſatisfie the King whoſe Peace they had broken, and the Count whom they had injur'd: Till this were done refuſing to proſecute with hoſtile Puniſhment them of his own Country unheard, whom his Office was rather to defend. The King diſpleaſed with his Refuſal, and not knowing how to compel him, appointed an Aſſembly of all the Peers to be held at Gloſter, where the Matter might be fully try'd; the Aſſembly was full and frequent according to Summons; but Godwin miſtruſting his own Cauſe, or the Violence of his Adverſaries; with his two Sons, Swane and Harold, and a great Power gathered out of his own and his Son's Earldoms, which contain'd moſt of the South-Eaſt and Weſt Parts of England, came no farther than Beverſtan, giving out that their Forces were to go againſt the Welſh, who intended an Irruption into Herefordſhire; and Swane under that Pretence lay with part of his Army thereabout. The Welſh underſtanding this Device, and with all Diligence clearing themſelves before the King, left Godwin detected of falſe Accuſation in great Hatred to all the Aſſembly. Leofric therefore and Siward Dukes of great Power, the former in Mercia, the other in all Parts beyond Humber, both ever faithful to the King, ſend privily with ſpeed to raiſe the Forces of their Provinces. Which Godwin not knowing, ſent boldly to King Edward, demanding Count Euſtace and his Followers, together with thoſe Boloignians, who as Simeon writes, held a Caſtle in the Juriſdiction of Canterbury. The King as then having but little Force at hand, entertain'd him a while with Treaties and Delays, till his ſummon'd Army drew nigh, then rejected his Demands. Godwin thus match'd, commanded his Sons not to begin Fight againſt the King; begun with, not to give ground. The King's Forces were the Flower of thoſe Counties whence they came, and eager to fall on: But Leofric and the wiſer ſort deteſting Civil War, brought the Matter to this Accord, That Hoſtages given on either ſide, the whole Cauſe ſhould be again debated at London. Thither the King and Lords coming with their Army, ſent to Godwin and his Son (who with their Powers were come as far as Southwark) commanding their Appearance unarm'd with only twelve Attendants, and that the reſt of their Souldiers they ſhould deliver over to the King. They to appear without Pledges before an adverſe Faction deny'd; but to diſmiſs their Souldiers refus'd not, nor in ought elſe to obey the King as far as might ſtand with Honour and the juſt regard of their Safety. This Anſwer not pleaſing the King, an Edict was preſently iſſu'd forth, That Godwin and his Sons within five Days depart the Land. He who perceiv'd now his Numbers to diminiſh, readily obey'd, and with his Wife and three Sons, Toſti, Swane, and Gyrtha, with as much Treaſure as their Ship could carry, embarking at [a] Thorney, ſail'd into Flanders to Earl Baldwin, whoſe Daughter Judith Toſti had married: For Wulnod his fourth Son was then Hoſtage to the King in Normandy; his other two, Harold and Leofwin, taking Ship at Briſtow, in a Veſſel that lay ready there belonging to Swane, paſs'd into Ireland. King Edward purſuing his Diſpleaſure, divorc'd his Wife Edith Earl Godwin's Daughter, ſending her deſpoil'd of all her Ornaments to Warewel with one waiting Maid, to be kept in Cuſtody by his Siſter the Abbeſs there. His Reaſon of ſo doing was as harſh as his Act, that ſhe only, while her neareſt Relations were in Baniſhment, might not, though innocent, enjoy Eaſe at home. After this, William Duke of Normandy with a great number of Followers coming into England, was by King Edward honourably entertain'd and led about the Cities, and Caſtles, as it were to ſhew him what e're long was to be his own (though at that time, ſaith Ingulf, no mention thereof paſs'd between them) then after ſome time of his abode here, preſented richly and diſmiſs'd, he return'd home. The next Year Queen Emma dy'd, and was buried at Wincheſter [b]. The Chronicle attributed to John Bromton a Yorkſhire Abbot [c], but rather of ſome nameleſs Author living under Edward the Third, or later, reports that the Year before, by Robert the Arch-biſhop ſhe was accus'd both of conſenting to the Death of her Son Alfred, and of preparing Poyſon for Edward alſo; laſtly, of too much Familiarity with Alwin Biſhop of Wincheſter; that to approve her Innocence, praying over-night to St. Swithun, ſhe offer'd to paſs blind-fold between certain Plow-ſhares red hot, according to the Ordalian Law, which without harm ſhe perform'd; that the King thereupon receiv'd her to Honour, and from her and the Biſhop, Penance for his Credulity; that the Archbiſhop aſham'd of his Accuſation fled out of England: Which beſides the Silence of Ancienter Authors (for the Biſhop fled not till a Year after) brings the whole Story into Suſpicion, in this more probable, if it can be prov'd, that in the Memory of this Deliverance from the Nine burning Plow-ſhares, Queen Emma gave to the Abbey of St. Swithune nine Mannors, and Biſhop Alwin other nine. About this time Griffin Prince of South-Wales waſted Herefordſhire; to oppoſe whom the People of that Country with many Normans, garriſon'd in the Caſtle of Hereford, went out in Arms, but were put to the worſe, many ſlain, and much Booty driven away by the Welſh. Soon after which, Harold and Leofwin, Sons of Godwin, coming into Severn with many Ships, in the Confines of Somerſet

King Edward on the other side made ready above sixty Ships at Sandwich well stor'd with Men and Provision, under the Conduct of Odo and Radulf two of his Norman Kindred, enjoyning them to find out Godwin, whom he heard to be at Sea. To quicken them, he himself lay on Ship-board, oft-times watch'd and sail'd up and down in search of those Pirates. But Godwin, whether in a Mist, or by other Accident, passing by them, arrived in another part of Kent, and dispersing secret Messengers abroad, by fair Words allured the Chief Men of Kent, Sussex, Surrey, and Essex to his Party; which News coming to the King's Fleet at Sandwich, they hasted to find him out; but missing of him again, came up without Effect to London. Godwin advertis'd of this, forthwith sail'd to the Isle of Wight; where at length his two Sons Harold and Leofwin finding him, with their united Navy lay on the Coast, forbearing other Hostility than to furnish themselves with fresh Victual from Land as they needed[a]. Thence as one Fleet they set forward to Sandwich, using all fair means, by the way to encrease their Numbers both of Mariners, and Souldiers. The King then at London, startl'd at these Tidings, gave speedy Order to raise Forces in all Parts, which had not revolted from him; but now too late, for Godwin within a few Days after with his Ships or Gallies came up the River Thames to Southwark, and till the Tide return'd had Conference with the Londoners; whom by fair Speeches, for he was held a good Speaker in those times, he brought to his bent. The Tide returning, and none upon the Bridge hindring, he row'd up in his Gallies along the South Bank; where his Land-army, now come to him, in array of Battel stood on the Shore, then turning toward the North-side of the River, where the King's Gallies lay in some Readiness, and Land-forces also not far off, he made shew as offering to fight; but they understood one another, and the Souldiers on either side soon declar'd their Resolution not to fight English against English. Thence coming to Treaty, the King and the Earl reconcil'd, both Armies were dissolv'd, Godwin and his Sons restor'd to their former Dignities, except Swane, who touch'd in Conscience for the Slaughter of Beorn his Kinsman, was gone barefoot to Jerusalem, and returning home, dy'd by Sickness or Saracens in Lycia; his Wife Edith, Godwin's Daughter, King Edward took to him again, dignify'd as before. Then were the Normans, who had done many unjust things under the King's Authority, and given him ill Counsel against his People, banish'd the Realm, some of them not blameable permitted to stay. Robert Arch-bishop of Canterbury, William of London, Ulf of Lincoln, all Normans, hardly escaping with their Followers, got to Sea. The Arch-bishop went with his Complaint to Rome; but returning, dy'd in Normandy at the same Monastery from whence he came. Osbern and Hugh surrender'd their Castles, and by Permission of Leofric pass'd through his Countries with their Normans to Macbeth King of Scotland. The Year following Rhese Brother to Griffin, Prince of South-Wales, who by Inrodes had done much Damage to the English, taken at Bulendun, was put to Death by the King's Appointment, and his Head brought to him at Gloster.

1053. Sim. Dun.

The same Year at Winchester on the second holy-day of Easter, Earl Godwin sitting with the King at Table, sunk down suddenly in his Seat as dead: His three Sons Harold, Tosti, and Gytha, forthwith carried him into the King's Chamber, hoping he might revive: But the Malady had so seiz'd him, that the 5th Day after he expir'd. The Normans who hated Godwin give out, saith Malmsbury, that mention happening to be made of Elfred, and the King thereat looking sowerly upon Godwin, he to vindicate himself, utter'd these Words, Thou O King, at every mention made of thy Brother Elfred, look'st frowningly upon me: But let God not suffer me to swallow this Morsel, if I be guilty of ought done against his Life or thy Advantage; that after these words, choak'd with the Morsel taken, he sunk down and recover'd not. His first Wife was the Sister of Canute, a Woman of much Infamy for the Trade she drove of buying up English Youths and Maids to sell in Denmark, whereof she made great Gain; but e're long was struck with Thunder, and dy'd. The Year ensuing, Siward Earl of Northumberland, with a great number of Horse and Foot, attended also by a strong Fleet at the King's Appointment, made an Expedition into Scotland, vanquish'd the Tyrant Macbeth, slaying many thousands of Scots, with those Normans that went thither, and plac'd [b] Malcolm Son of the Cumbrian King in his stead; yet not without loss of his own Son, and many other both English and Danes. Told of his Sons Death, he ask'd whether he receiv'd his Death's Wound before or behind? When it was answer'd before, I am glad, saith he; and should not else have thought him, though my Son, worthy of Burial. In the mean while King Edward being without Issue to succeed him, sent Aldred Bishop of Winchester with great Presents to the Emperor, entreating him to prevail with the King of Hungary, that Edward the remaining Son of his Brother Edmund Ironside, might be sent into England. Siward but one Year surviving his great Victory, dy'd at York; reported by Huntingdon a Man of Giant-like Stature, and by his own Demeanour at point of Death manifested, of a rough and meer souldierly Mind. For much disdaining to die in Bed by a Disease, not in the Field fighting with his Enemies, he caus'd himself compleatly armed, and weapon'd with Battel-ax and Shield to be set in a Chair, whether to fight with Death, if he could be so vain, or to meet him (when far other Weapons and Preparations were needful) in a Martial Bravery; but true Fortitude glories not in Feats of War, as they are such, but as they serve to end War soonest by a victorious Peace. His Earldom the King bestow'd on Tosti the Son of Earl Godwin: And soon after in a Convention held at London, banish'd without visible Cause, Huntingdon saith for Treason, Algar the Son of Leofric; who passing into Ireland, soon return'd with eighteen Ships to Griffin Prince of South-Wales, requesting his Aid against King Edward. He assembling his Powers, enter'd with him into Herefordshire; whom Radulf a timorous Captain, Son to the King's Sister, not by Eustace, but a former Husband, met two Miles distant from Hereford; and having horsed the English who knew better to fight on Foot, without stroke he with his French and Normans, beginning to flie, taught the English by his Example. Griffin and Algar following the Chase, slew many, wounded more, enter'd Hereford, slew seven Canons defending the Minster, burnt the Monastery and Reliques, then the City; killing some, leading captive others of the Citizens, return'd with

A. But the Enemy flying before him farther into the Country, leaving there the greater part of his Army with ſuch as had charge to fight, if occaſion were offer'd, with the reſt he return'd; and fortify'd Hereford with a Wall and Gates. Mean while, Griffin and Algar dreading the diligence of Harold, after many Meſſages to and fro, concluded a Peace with him. Algar diſcharging his Fleet with pay at Weſtcheſter, came to the King, and was reſtor'd to his Earldom. But Griffin, with breach of Faith, the next Year ſet upon Leofgar, the Biſhop of Hereford, and his Clerks, then at a place call'd Glaſtbrig, with Agelnoth Viſcount of the Shire, and ſlew them; but Leofric, Harold, and King Edward, by force, as is likelieſt, though it be not ſaid how, reduc'd him to Peace. The next Year, Edward Son of Edmund Ironſide, for whom his Uncle King Edward had ſent to the Emperor, came out of Hungary, deſign'd Succeſſor to the Crown; but within a few Days after his coming, dy'd at London, leaving behind him Edgar Atheling his Son, Margaret and Chriſtina his Daughters. About the ſame time alſo dy'd Earl Leofric in a good old Age, a Man of no leſs Virtue than Power in his time, Religious, Prudent and Faithful to his Country, happily wedded to Godiva[a], a Woman of great Praiſe. His Son Algar found leſs favour with King Edward, again baniſh'd after his Father's Death; but he again, by the Aid of Griffin, and Fleet from Norway, maugre the King, ſoon recover'd his Earldom. The next Year Malcolm King of Scots coming to viſit King Edward, was brought on his way by Toſti the Northumbrian Earl, to whom he ſwore Brotherhood: Yet the next Year but one, while Toſti was gone to Rome with Aldred Archbiſhop of York for his Pall, this ſworn Brother taking advantage of his abſence, roughly harraſs'd Northumberland. The Year paſſing to an end without other matter of moment, ſave the frequent Inrodes and Robberies of Griffin, whom no Bonds of Faith could reſtrain, King Edward ſent againſt him after Chriſtmas, Harold now Duke of Weſt-Saxons, with no great Body of Horſe from Gloſter, where he then kept his Court; whoſe coming heard of, Griffin not daring to abide, nor in any part of his Land holding himſelf ſecure, eſcap'd hardly by Sea, e're Harold coming to [b] Rudeland, burnt his Palace and Ships there, returning to Gloſter the ſame Day: But by the middle of May ſetting out with a Fleet from Briſtow, he ſail'd about the moſt part of Wales, and met by his Brother Toſti with many Troops of Horſe, as the King had appointed, began to waſte the Country; but the Welſh giving Pledges, yielded themſelves, promis'd to become tributary, and baniſh Griffin their Prince; who lurking ſomewhere, was the next Year taken and ſlain by Griffin Prince of North-Wales; his Head, with the Head and Tackle of his Ship, ſent to Harold, by him to the King, who of his Gentleneſs made Blechgent and Rithwallon or Rivallon, his two Brothers, Princes in his ſtead; they to Harold, in behalf of the King, ſwore Fealty and Tribute[c]. Yet the next Year, Harold having built a fair Houſe at a place call'd Portaſcith in Monmouthſhire, and ſtor'd it with Proviſion, that the King might lodge there in time of Hunting; Caradoc the Son of Griffin, ſlain the Year before, came with a number of Men, ſlew all he found there, and took away the Proviſion. Soon after which, the Northumbrians in a tumult at York, beſet the Palace of Toſti their Earl, ſlew more than two hundred of his Soldiers and Servants, pillaged his Treaſure, and put him to flie for his Life. The Cauſe of this Inſurrection they alledg'd to be, for that the Queen Edith had commanded in her Brother Toſti's behalf, Goſpatric a Nobleman of that Country to be treacherouſly ſlain in the King's Court; and that Toſti himſelf the Year before with like treachery had caus'd to be ſlain in his Chamber Gamel and Ulf, two other of their Noblemen, beſides his intolerable Exactions and Oppreſſions. Then in a manner the whole Country coming up to complain of their Grievances, met with Harold at Northampton, whom the King at Toſti's requeſt had ſent to pacifie the Northumbrians; but they laying open the Cruelty of his Government, and their own Birthright of Freedom[d], not to endure the Tyranny of any Governour whatſoever, with abſolute refuſal to admit him again, and Harold hearing Reaſon, all the Accomplices of Toſti were expell'd the Earldom. He himſelf baniſh'd the Realm, went into Flanders; Morcar the Son of Algar made Earl in his ſtead. Huntingdon tells another Cauſe of Toſti's Baniſhment, that one Day at Windſor, while Harold reach'd the Cup to King Edward, Toſti envying to ſee his younger Brother in greater favour than himſelf, could not forbear to run furiouſly upon him, catching hold of his Hair; the Scuffle was ſoon parted by other Attendants ruſhing between, and Toſti forbidden the Court. He with continu'd Fury riding to Hereford, where Harold had many Servants, preparing an Entertainment for the King, came to the Houſe and ſet upon them with his Followers; then lopping off Hands, Arms, Legs of ſome, Heads of others, threw them into Butts of Wine, Meath or Ale, which were laid in for the King's drinking: And at his going away charg'd them to ſend him this word, that of other freſh Meats he might bring with him to his Farm what he pleas'd, but of Souſe he ſhould find plenty provided ready for him; that for his barbarous Act the King pronounc'd him baniſh'd; that the Northumbrians taking advantage at the King's diſpleaſure and ſentence againſt him, roſe alſo to be reveng'd of his Cruelties done to themſelves; but this no way agrees, for why then ſhould Harold or the King ſo much labour with the Northumbrians to re-admit him, if he were a baniſh'd Man for his Crimes done before? About this time it happen'd, that Harold putting to Sea one Day for his pleaſure, in a Fiſher-Boat, from his Mannor at Boſeham in Suſſex, caught with a Tempeſt too far off Land, was carry'd into Normandy; and by the Earl of Pontiew, on whoſe Coaſt he was driven, at his own requeſt brought to Duke William; who entertaining him with great Courteſie, ſo far won him, as to promiſe the Duke by Oath of his own accord, not only the Caſtle of Dover, then in his tenure, but the Kingdom alſo after King Edward's Death to his utmoſt endeavour; thereupon be-

Others say, that King Edward himself, after the Death of Edward his Nephew, sent Harold thither, on purpose to acquaint Duke William with his Intention to bequeath him his Kingdom: But Malmsbury accounts the former Story to be the truer.

Leges Ed. Conf. Tit. Lex Noric. Ingulf writes, that King Edward now grown old, and perceiving Edgar his Nephew both in Body and Mind unfit to Govern, especially against the Pride and Insolence of Godwin's Sons, who would never obey him; Duke William on the other side of high Merit, and his Kinsman by the Mother, had sent Robert Archbishop of Canterbury to acquaint the Duke with his purpose, not long before Harold came thither. The former part may be true, that King Edward upon such Considerations had sent one or other; but Archbishop Robert was fled the Land, and dead many Years before. Eadmer and Simeon write, that Harold went of his own accord into Normandy, by the King's Permission or Connivance, to get free his Brother Wulnod and Nephew Hacun the Son of Swane, whom the King had taken Hostages of Godwin and sent into Normandy; that King Edward foretold Harold, his Journey thither would be to the detriment of all England, and his own Reproach; that Duke William then acquainted Harold, how Edward e're his coming to the Crown had promis'd, if he ever attain'd it, to leave Duke William Successor after him. Last of these Matthew Paris writes, that Harold to get free of Duke William, affirm'd his coming thither not to have been by accident or force of Tempest, but on set purpose, in that private manner to enter with him into secret Confederacy: So variously are these things reported.

1066. Sim. Dun. After this King Edward grew sickly, yet as he was able kept his Christmas at London, and was at the Dedication of St. Peter's Church in Westminster, which he had rebuilt; but on the Eve of Epiphany, or Twelfth-tide, deceas'd much lamented, and in the Church was Entomb'd. That he was harmless and simple, is conjectur'd by his words in anger to a Peasant, who had cross'd his Game, (for with Hunting and Hawking he was much delighted) By God and Gods Mother, said he, I shall do you as shrewd a turn, if I can: Observing that Law-Maxim the best of all his Successors, That the King of England can do no wrong. The softness of his Nature gave growth to Factions of those about him, Normans especially and English; these complaining, that Robert the Archbishop was a Sower of Dissention between the King and his People, a Traducer of the English; the other side, that Godwin and his Sons bore themselves arrogantly and proudly towards the King, usurping to themselves equal share in the Government; oft-times making

Huntingd. sport with his Simplicity, that thro' their Power in the Land they made no scruple to kill Men, of whose Inheritance they took a likeing, and so to take possession. The truth is, that Godwin and his Sons did many things boisterously and violently, much against the King's mind; which not able to resist, he had, as some say, his Wife Edith, Godwin's Daughter, in such aversation, as in Bed never to have touch'd her; whether for this Cause, or mistaken Chastity, not commendable; to enquire farther, is not material. His Laws held good and just, and long after desir'd by the English of their Norman Kings, are yet extant. He is said to be at Table not excessive, at Festivals nothing puft up with the costly Robes he wore, which his Queen with curious Art had woven for him in Gold. He was full of Almsdeeds, and exhorted the Monks to like Charity. He is said to be the first of English Kings that cur'd the Disease, call'd thence the King's Evil; yet Malmsbury blames them who attribute that Cure to his Royalty, not to his Sanctity; said also to have cur'd certain Blind Men with the Water wherein he had wash'd his Hands. A little before his Death, lying Speechless two Days, the third Day, after a deep Sleep, he was heard to pray, That if it were a true Vision, not an Illusion which he had seen, God would give him strength to utter it, otherwise not. Then he related how he had seen two devout Monks, whom he knew in Normandy, to have liv'd and dy'd well, who appearing, told him they were sent Messengers from God to foretel, that because the Great Ones of England, Dukes, Lords, Bishops, and Abbots, were not Ministers of God, but of the Devil, God had deliver'd the Land to their Enemies; and when he desir'd that he might reveal this Vision, to the end they might repent, it was answer'd, They neither will repent, neither will God pardon them. At this relation others trembling, Stigand the Simonious Archbishop, whom Edward much to blame had suffer'd many Years to sit Primate of the Church, is said to have laugh'd, as at the feavourish Dream of a doting Old Man; but the event prov'd it true.

A. D. 1066. King Edward the Confessor the first that cur'd the King's Evil.

HAROLD, Son of Earl Godwin.

Hoved. Florent. HA*rold*, whether by King Edward a little before his Death ordain'd Successor to the Crown, as Simeon of Durham, and others[a] affirm; or by the prevalence of his Faction, excluding Edgar the right Heir, Grandchild to Edmund Ironside, as Malmsbury and Huntingdon agree; no sooner was the Funeral of King Edward ended, but on the same Day was Elected and Crown'd King: And no sooner plac'd in the Throne, but began to frame himself by all manner of Compliances to gain Affection, endeavour'd to make good Laws, repeal'd bad, became a great Patron to Church and Churchmen, courteous and affable to all reputed Good, a hater of Evil-doers, charg'd all his Officers to punish Thieves, Robbers, and all Disturbers of the Peace, while he himself by Sea and Land labour'd in the defence of his Country: So good an Actor is Ambition. In the mean while a Blazing Star, seven Mornings together, about the end of April, was seen to stream terribly, not only over England, but other parts of the World; foretelling here, as was thought, the great Changes approaching: Plainlyest prognosticated by Elmer a Monk of Malmsbury, who could not foresee, when time was, the breaking of his own Legs for soaring too high. He in his Youth strangely aspiring, had made and fitted Wings to his Hands and Feet; with these on the top of a Tower, spread out to gather Air, he flew more than a Furlong; but the Wind being too high, came fluttering down, to the maiming of all his Limbs; yet so conceited of his Art, that he attributed the Cause of his Fall to the want of a Tail, as Birds have, which he forgot to make to his hinder parts. This Story, tho' seeming otherwise too light in the midst of a sad Narration, yet for the Strangeness thereof, I thought worthy enough the placing as I found it plac'd in my Author. But to digress no farther, Tosti the King's Brother coming from Flanders, full of Envy at his younger Brother's Advancement to the Crown, resolv'd what he might to trouble his Reign; forcing therefore them of Wight Isle to Contribution, he sail'd thence to Sandwich, committing Piracies on the Coaſt between. Harold then reſiding at London, with a great number of Ships drawn together, and of Horſe Troops by Land, prepares in Perſon for Sandwich: Whereof Toſti having notice, directs his Courſe with ſixty Ships towards Lindſey, taking with him all the Seamen he found, willing or unwilling: Where he burnt many Villages, and ſlew many of the Inhabitants; but Edwin the Mercian Duke, and Morcar his Brother, the Northumbrian Earl, with their Forces on either ſide, ſoon drove him out of the Country. Who thence betook him to Malcolm the Scottiſh King, and with him abode the whole Summer. About the ſame time Duke William ſending Embaſſadors to admoniſh Harold of his Promiſe and Oath, to aſſiſt him in his Plea to the Kingdom, he made anſwer, That by the Death of his Daughter betroth'd to him on that Condition, he was abſolv'd of his Oath, or not dead, he could not take her now an Outlandiſh Woman, without conſent of the Realm; that it was preſumptuouſly done, and not to be perſiſted in, if without Conſent or Knowledge of the States, he had ſworn away the Right of the Kingdom; that what he ſwore was to gain his Liberty, being in a manner then his Priſoner; that it was unreaſonable in the Duke to require or expect of him the foregoing of a Kingdom, conferr'd upon him with univerſal Favour and Acclamation of the People: To this flat Denial he added Contempt, ſending the Meſſengers back, ſaith Matthew Paris, on maim'd Horſes. The Duke thus contemptuouſly put off, addreſſes himſelf to the Pope, ſetting forth the Juſtice of his Cauſe, which Harold, whether through Haughtineſs of Mind, or Diſtruſt, or that the ways to Rome were ſtop'd, ſought not to do. Duke William, beſides the Promiſe and Oath of Harold, alledg'd that King Edward by the Advice of Seward, Godwin himſelf, and Stigand the Arch-biſhop, had given him the Right of Succeſſion, and had ſent him the Son and Nephew of Godwin, Pledges of the Gift; the Pope * ſent Duke William, after this Demonſtration of his Right, a conſecrated Banner. Whereupon he having with great Care and Choice got an Army of tall and ſtout Soldiers, under Captains of great Skill and mature Age, came in Auguſt to the Port of St. Valerie. Mean while Harold from London comes to Sandwich, there expecting his Navy; which alſo coming, he ſails to the Iſle of Wight; and having heard of Duke William's Preparations and Readineſs to invade him; kept good Watch on the Coaſt, and Foot Forces every where in fit Places to guard the Shoar. But e'er the middle of September, Proviſion failing when it was moſt needed, both Fleet and Army return home. When on a ſudden, Harold Harvager King of Norway, with a Navy of more than five hundred great Ships, (others leſſen them by two hundred, others augment them to a thouſand) appears at the Mouth of Tine; to whom Earl Toſti with his Ships came as was agreed between them; whence both uniting, ſet ſail with all ſpeed, and enter'd the River Humber. Thence turning into Ouſe, as far as Rical, landed; and won York by Aſſault. At theſe Tidings Harold with all his Power haſtes thitherward; but e'er his coming, Edwin and Morcar at Fulford by York, on the North-ſide of Ouſe, about the Feaſt of St. Matthew had given them Battel; ſucceſsfully at firſt, but over-born at length with Numbers; and forc'd to turn their backs, more of them periſh'd in the River, than in the Fight. The Norwegians taking with them five hundred Hoſtages out of York, and leaving there one hundred and fifty of their own, retir'd to their Ships. But the fifth Day after King Harold with a great and well appointed Army, coming to York, and at Stamford Bridge, or Battel Bidge on Darwent, aſſailing the Norwegians, after much Blood-ſhed on both ſides, cut off the greateſt part of them with Harfager their King, and Toſti his own Brother. But Olave the King's Son, and Paul Earl of Orkney, left with many Soldiers to guard the Ships, ſurrendring themſelves with Hoſtages, and Oath given never to return as Enemies, he ſuffer'd freely to depart with twenty Ships, and the ſmall Remnant of their Army. One Man of the Norwegians is not to be forgotten, who with incredible Valour keeping the Bridge a long Hour againſt the whole Engliſh Army, with his ſingle Reſiſtance delay'd their Victory; and ſcorning offer'd Life, till in the end no Man daring to grapple with him, either dreaded as too ſtrong, or contemned as one deſperate, he was at length ſhot dead with an Arrow; and by his fall open'd the Paſſage of purſuit to a compleat Victory. Wherewith Harold lifted up in Mind, and forgetting now his former ſhews of Popularity, defrauded his Soldiers of their due and well deſerved Share of the Spoils. While theſe things thus paſs'd in Northumberland, Duke William lay ſtill at St. Valerie; his Ships were ready, but the Wind ſerv'd not for many Days; which put the Soldiery into much Diſcouragement and Murmur, taking this for an unlucky Sign of their Succeſs; at laſt the Wind came favourable, the Duke firſt under ſail awaited the reſt at Anchor, till all coming forth, the whole Fleet of nine hundred Ships, with a proſperous Gale arriv'd at † Haſtings. At his going out of the Boat by a ſlip falling on his Hands, to correct the Omen, a Soldier ſtanding by ſaid aloud, that their Duke had taken Seiſin of England. Landed, he reſtrain'd his Army from Waſte and Spoil, ſaying, that they ought to ſpare what was their own. But theſe are things related of Alexander and Cæſar, and I doubt thence borrow'd by the Monks to inlay their Story. The Duke for fifteen Days after landing kept his Men quiet within the Camp, having taken the Caſtle of Haſtings, or built a Fortreſs there. Harold ſecure the while, and proud of his new Victory, thought all his Enemies now under foot: But ſitting jollily at Dinner, News is brought him, that Duke William of Normandy with a great Multitude of Horſe and Foot, Slingers and Archers, beſides other choice Auxiliaries which he had hir'd in France, was arriv'd at Pevenſey. Harold who had expected him all the Summer, but not ſo late in the Year as now it was, for it was October; with his Forces much diminiſh'd after two ſore Conflicts, and the departing of many others from him diſcontented, in great haſte marches to London. Thence not tarrying for Supplies which were on their way towards him, hurries into Suſſex (for he was always in haſte ſince the Day of his Coronation) and e'er the third part of his Army could be well put in order, finds the Duke about nine Mile from Haſtings, and now drawing nigh, ſent Spies before him to ſurvey the Strength and Number of his Enemies: Them, diſcover'd ſuch, the Duke cauſing to be led about, and after well fill'd with Meat and Drink ſent back. They not over-wiſe, brought word that the Duke's Army were moſt of them Prieſts; for they ſaw their Faces all over ſhaven; the Engliſh then uſing to let grow on their upper-lip large Muſtachio's, as did anciently the Britains. The King laughing, anſwer'd, That they were not Prieſts, but valiant and hardy Soldiers. Therefore ſaid Girtha his Brother, a Youth of noble Courage and Underſtanding above his Age, Forbear thou thy ſelf to fight, who art obnoxious to Duke William by Oath, let us unſworn undergo the Hazard of

A. D. 1066. Battel, who may justly fight in the Defence of our Country; thou reserved to fitter time, mayst either reunite us flying, or revenge us dead. The King not hearkning to this, lest it might seem to argue Fear in him, or a bad Cause, with like Resolution rejected the Offers of Duke William sent to him by a Monk before the Battel, with this only Answer hastily deliver'd, Let God judge between us. The Offers were these, That Harold would either lay down the Scepter, or hold it of him, or try his Title with him by single Combat in the Sight of both Armies, or refer it to the Pope. These rejected, both sides prepar'd to fight the next Morning, the English from singing and drinking all Night, the Normans from Confession of their Sins, and Communion of the Host. The English were in a strait disadvantagious Place [a], so that many discourag'd with their ill ordering, scarce having room where to stand, slip'd away before the Onset, the rest in close order with their Battel-Axes and Shields, made an impenetrable Squadron: The King himself with his Brothers on foot stood by the Royal Standard, wherein the Figure of a Man fighting was inwoven with Gold and precious Stones. The Norman Foot, most Bowmen, made the foremost Front, on either side Wings of Horse somewhat behind. The Duke arming, and his Corslet given him on the wrong side, said pleasantly, The Strength of my Dukedom will be turn'd now into a Kingdom. Then the whole Army singing the Song of Rowland, the Remembrance of whose Exploits might hearten them, imploring lastly Divine Help, the Battel began; and was fought sorely on either side; but the main Body of English Foot by no means would be broken, till the Duke causing his Men to feign Flight, drew them out with desire of pursuit into open Disorder, then turn'd suddenly upon them so routed by themselves, which wrought their Overthrow; yet so they dy'd not unmanfully, but turning oft upon their Enemies, by the Advantage of an upper Ground, beat them down by heaps, and fill'd up a great Ditch with their Carcasses. Thus hung the Victory wavering on either side, from the third Hour of Day to Evening; when Harold having maintain'd the Fight with unspeakable Courage and Personal Valour, shot into the Head with an Arrow, fell at length, and left his Soldiers without Heart longer to withstand the unwearied Enemy. With Harold fell also his two Brothers, Leofwin, and Girtha, with them the greatest part of the English Nobility. His Body lying dead, a Knight or Soldier wounding on the Thigh, was by the Duke presently turn'd out of Military Service. Of Normans and French were slain no small Number; the Duke himself also that Day not a little hazarded his Person, having had three choice Horses kill'd under him. Victory obtain'd, and his dead carefully buried, the English also by Permission, he sent the Body of Harold to his Mother without Ransom, though she offer'd very much to redeem it, which having receiv'd, she buried at Waltham, in a Church built there by Harold [b]. In the mean while, Edwin and Morcar, who had withdrawn themselves from Harold, hearing of his Death, came to London; sending Aldgith the Queen their Sister with all speed to West-Chester. Aldred Archbishop of York, and many of the Nobles, with the Londoners, would have set up Edgar the Right Heir, and prepar'd themselves to fight for him; but Morcar and Edwin not liking the Choice, who each of them expected to have been chosen before him, withdrew their Forces and returned home. Sim. Dun. Duke William contrary to his former Resolution, if Florent of Worster, and they who follow him say true, wasting, burning, and slaying all in his way, or rather, as saith Malmsbury, not in a Hostile but in Regal manner came up to London, met at Barcham by Edgar, with the Nobles, Bishops, Citizens, and at length Edwin and Morcar, who all submitted to him, gave Hostages, and swore Fidelity, he to them promis'd Peace and Defence; yet permitted his Men the while to burn and make prey. Coming to London with all his Army, he was on Christmas Day solemnly crown'd in the great Church at Westminster, by Aldred Arch-bishop of York, having first given his Oath at the Altar in Presence of all the People, to defend the Church, well govern the People, maintain Right Law; prohibit Rapine and unjust Judgment. Thus the English, while they agreed not about the Choice of their Native King, were constrain d to take the Yoke of an Outlandish Conquerour. With what Minds, and by what Course of Life they had fitted themselves for this Servitude, William of Malmsbury spares not to lay open. Not a few Years before the Normans came, the Clergy, though in Edward the Confessor's Days, had lost all good Literature and Religion, scarce able to read and understand their Latin Service: He was a Miracle to others who knew his Grammar. The Monks went clad in fine Stuffs, and made no difference what they eat; which though in it self no fault, yet to their Consciences was irrelligious. The great Men given to Gluttony and dissolute Life, made a Prey of the Common People, abusing their Daughters whom they had in Service, then turning them off to the Stews; the meaner sort tipling together Night and Day, spent all they had in Drunkenness, attended with other Vices which effeminate Mens Minds. Whence it came to pass, that carried on with Fury and Rashness more than any true Fortitude or Skill of War, they gave to William their Conquerour so easie a Conquest. Not but that some few of all sorts were much better among them; but such was the Generality. And as the long suffering of God permits bad Men to enjoy prosperous Days with the good, so his Severity oft-times exempts not good Men from their Share in evil Times with the bad.

The 14th of October, 1066.

If these were the Causes of such Misery and Thraldom to those our Ancestors, with what better Close can be concluded, than here in fit Season to remember this Age in the midst of her Security, to fear from like Vices without Amendment the Revolution of like Calamities.

A COLLECTION OF THE History of England:

CONTAINING

A Brief ACCOUNT of the moſt Remarkable AFFAIRS of STATE.

Compos'd by SAMUEL DANIEL, one of the Grooms of the Privy Chamber to Queen ANNE, Conſort to K. James I.

The Subject of the following Hiſtory fix'd.

WHEN I firſt entertain'd the ſetled Thoughts of Collecting the Principal Affairs of this Kingdom of England into One Body, I deſign'd to have taken my Beginning at the firſt Britiſh Kings, and have proceeded according to the common Liſt of their Succeſſion, relating the things which happen'd moſt Remarkable in their ſeveral Reigns; but not finding any [a] authentick Proof of their Deſcent, I laid aſide theſe Reſolutions, upon theſe Conſiderations, That a far leſs compaſs of Time, and better known to us, (viz. From William the Firſt, ſurnam'd the Baſtard) would better ſuit my Abilities, if not overmatch them; that it is vain Curioſity to ſearch farther into Antiquity, than we can get any good Information of, and of which we can have no Proof, and conſequently can reap no real Advantage by it. For the Beginnings of all People and Kingdoms are as difficult to be found out as the Heads of great Rivers; and if they could be known, would promote but very little either our Virtue or Reputation; ſince it is evident, that moſt of them owe their Original to Poverty, Robbery, and Oppreſſion; though Fabulous Writers (to magnifie their own Nations) have obtruded upon the Credulity of after-Ages ſtrange Relations of Heroical and Miraculous Beginnings: So that great States, as well as Men, are beſt worth ſeeing, when they are in their moſt flouriſhing Condition, as they are, and not as they firſt were. Beſides, it ſeems good to Divine Providence to check our over-inquiſitive Diſpoſitions, by leaving all things, of very great Antiquity, under irrecoverable Uncertainty, and ſo to bound our Searches within the compaſs of a few Ages; as if that were ſufficient, both for Example and Inſtruction. For had we indeed the particular Occurrences of all former Ages and Nations, they would rather burthen our Memories, than better our Underſtandings: The Actions and Manners of Men receiving little alteration by Time; Virtues and Vices being the ſame, though more or leſs in practice and vogue, according to the Goodneſs or Vicioufneſs of Governours: The Changes and Ruins of States proceeding from the ſame Cauſes, and the Methods of Affairs being carry'd on much in the ſame Courſe.

Britain firſt diſcover'd by the Romans.

But yet ſince the Hiſtory of thoſe Ages, which I have choſen for the Subject of this Collection, cannot be well underſtood without ſome knowledge of the Affairs of the precedent, I ſhall take a brief View of the State of this Nation from the time it became a Tributary Province to the Roman Empire, which is as far as the moſt Ancient Records we have can give us light; for before that time, England was not more remote in Situation, than it was from the Knowledge of the World. And from hence it was that Julius Cæſar, being but on the oppoſite Continent in Gaul, could get no perfect Information of the State of Britain by all the means he could uſe, unleſs by ſome Merchants (of whom he ſummon'd as many as he could) who inform'd him of ſome of the Coasts, but were ignorant of the State and Condition of the Inhabitants that dwelt in the Inland parts of the Isle, either being regardless of what concern'd not their Trade, or else being kept from any farther knowledge of it by the Britains, who were cautious of discovering their Condition to Strangers: However Cæsar, rather than want a [a] Pretence of invading, accus'd them of aiding his Enemies the Gauls secretly against him; and entring their Country, subdu'd some parts of it in the South; yet made so little progress towards an absolute Conquest, that he may rather be said to have shew'd it, than won it to the Roman Empire.

[a] Jeffrey of Monmouth's Liſt of the Regal Succeſſion from Brutus is very diſtinct and plain; but it hath ſo many Marks of pure Invention, either of himſelf, or the Authors from whom he pretends to tranſcribe them, that it is long ſince given up for a meer Romance by all our Learned Criticks in Engliſh Hiſtory; and particularly the Biſhop of St. Aſaph is of opinion, that the Grand Lye of all, which is the Story of Brutus, is nothing but a Forgery to make the Engliſh Kings as Nobly deſcended as the Kings of other Nations, by drawing them from the Trojans, according to the Humour of the Age he liv'd in. This Story of Brutus is reckon'd Fabulous by Sir William Temple, in his Introduction to the Hiſtory of England, p. 19.

The most ancient State of Britain.

What the State and Form of Government was among the Britains before this Invasion, the first and best Relation is from Cæsar himself, who tells us, That the Britains were divided into many [b] petty Kingdoms, and names four Kings of Kent: That perceiving themselves in great danger by the Romans, they by common consent chose Cassivellaun, or Cassibolin, to be their King, and have not only the Administration of all publick Affairs, but the supreme Command, as General in the War: That having receiv'd some Defeats, they yielded their Cities up to him, and sent Hostages in Confirmation of it. By which it appears, that the Government of the ancient Britains was not Monarchical, as some have asserted; but like the [c] Gauls (with whom they held a great Similitude, as well in Religion, as in their Manners and Language) was divided into many small Princedoms, without any Combination under one Head: After the same manner, as we have lately discover'd the People of America to be rul'd, and as most Countrys were at first govern'd; till either Ambition and Power forc'd, or Interest and Policy taught them to introduce new Modes and arbitrary Ways of ordering Nations. And this was the form of Government in Britain, Gaul or France, Spain, Germany, and all the West parts of Europe; till the Romans, having first subdu'd all Italy through the Divisions among themselves, which made them a Prey to their Enemies, became potent enough to ravish the Liberties of the other adjacent Nations from them: For the Kings of those times were no better than Generals in Wars, and had no other Jurisdiction over their People, but to conduct them for their Safety. So that this Assertion, That there was a Monarchy establish'd among the Britains long before other Nations, will never pass for truth, but with such Persons as understand little of true Antiquity, but model their Notion of it by the Constitutions of this present time. For had there indeed been an Absolute Monarch in these parts, under whose Conduct the Britains could have united their Forces against the common Invader, it is very probable they had never been conquer'd; since we find the Romans to have been sometimes very strangely foil'd by some petty Princes; and 'tis plain, that though [d] the Britains had not the Improvement of Letters, yet they wanted not many great Souls, who had a quick Sense of Honour and Greatness, and delighted in the boldest and bravest Attempts. But not being united in their publick Danger, they expos'd themselves to the common Enemy; who, often more by the Divisions of others, than by his own Power, became Master of the World.

So that with what probability the long Succession of Absolute Monarchs from [e] Brutus to Cassivellaun can be maintain'd, I am to seek; and therefore shall leave it to those, who are of more easie Faith: Adding only thus much to justifie my own Diffidence, That I cannot imagine how the Memory of those ancient Times could be preserv'd to Posterity, when it is almost certain, that they had not the Use of Letters in this Nation till the Romans brought them in. Indeed some report, That not only the Greek Tongue, but Schools of Learning were settled here long before the Romans arrival; which, had it been true, we should have had some mention of it in Cæsar's, or others Writings: Whereas now, on the contrary, we find that the Druids, who were the Ministers of Justice and Religion among the Britains, and the admired Philosophers of those Ages, committed not their Mysteries to Writing, but deliver'd them by Tradition; which sure they would not have done, had they had more certain ways of imparting them to their Nation. And Cornelius Tacitus tells us, That Agricola, Præfect of this Province under Domitian, caused the principal Men's Sons to be taught the Liberal Sciences; which the Britains could not have been ignorant of, had the Greek Learning been setled among them so many Ages before. Wherefore 'tis clear, that there was no other way of conveying the Transactions of former Ages but by Tradition; and how little that can be depended upon, all wise Men know.

The State of the Britains under the Romans.

As to the State of the Britains during their Subjection to the Romans, we find that they were govern'd by the Roman Præfects; or if they had any Kings of their own, they were tributary, and had no other Authority than what they had from the Emperor's Will, who, as Tacitus relates, made Kings but Instruments of more heavy Bondage and Slavery, speaking of Cogedunus, to whom Claudius gave certain Cities in Britain, under the Title of King. For when Cæsar had once got footing among them, and made part of their Country tributary, they would not venture to withstand the Roman Arms for the future, and recover their ancient Freedom; for tho' during the time of the Civil Wars at Rome, by which the Government there was chang'd from a Common-wealth to a Monarchy, they had twenty Years space given them to rid themselves of their Enemies, yet they patiently submitted; and as soon as Augustus had gotten the absolute Sovereignty, all the Princes and Cities of Britain came voluntarily with their Gifts and Tributes to profess their Subjection to him, and gain his

---

[a] The British Pearls, which were then of great Esteem in the World, were no small Motive to Cæsar to invade Britain. Dry Honour, without Gain, was not always the Inducement of the Roman Heroes to conquer the World. Rome her self lov'd a full Treasury, and her Great Men a full Purse.

[b] Ptolomy gives the Names of the several People and Kingdoms among the Old Britains before the Romans Invasion, which are exactly set down to us in the late Edition of Mr. Cambden's Britannia.

[c] The most probable Account of the first Original of the People of this Island, is, That they were some Colonies of Gauls, who transplanted themselves into Britain, when their own Country grew over-populous, which was usual in the long-liv'd Ages of Men, near the Creation and Flood.

[d] The Britains, through the continual Wars they had among themselves, were such expert Soldiers for those early Times, that Cæsar himself confesses, he learnt many Stratagems of War from them: So that had they had Union among themselves, Cæsar might have return'd without success.

[e] The Story of Brutus, which seems nothing but an Invention of the Britains to be even with the rest of the World in the Antiquity of their Descent; for 'twas then the Humour of the World to draw their Pedigree from the Trojans, is now utterly exploded.

Favour,

Favour, fearing leſt a new Governour ſhould make their Yoke heavier than it hath hitherto been; which conſiſted only in a very tolerable Tribute, which they were contented to bear with their Neighbours. After Auguſtus's Death, when the Corruptions of the Empire had cauſed miſerable Diſtractions in all Parts of the World, the Britains alſo falling into Factions among themſelves, and Diſcontents with their Roman Governours, with-held their Obedience, till Claudius obtain'd the Empire; who being an ambitious Prince, and deſirous of Glory, caſt his Eye upon Britain, as the moſt probable Place for him to gain his firſt Triumph in. Hither therefore he ſends P. Oſtorius Scapula, a great Warriour, to be Proprætor; who tho' he met with various Diſtractions, and a reſolute People hardly to be forc'd into Subjection, yet as an experienc'd Commander, who knew how much the firſt Attempts do uſually either daunt, or encourage an Enemy, contriv'd to fall upon them by Surprize, and where he had any Advantages, to uſe an affrighting Severity againſt them: But theſe Stratagems did not produce the wiſhed Effect; for [a] Caradocus (one of the Britiſh Kings) maintain'd War againſt him for nine Years together, and could not be maſtered by this brave General, till being betray'd by his own Nation, he came into his hands, and was with his Wife and Children carried to Rome to be led in Triumph.

Claudius after this, paſſed at Rome for the Conqueror of Britain, tho' that Iſland was not perfectly reduc'd to their Obedience, till a long time after: For the Britains, finding that their Diviſions were likely to betray them to the Romans, who would prove cruel Maſters, enter'd into a defenſive League againſt them upon this Occaſion. Praſutagus, King of the Iceni, a Rich and Potent Prince, dying, left Nero his Heir, with the Care of his Wife and his two Daughters; hoping by this Gift, to ſecure his Family and Nation from any Injury from the Romans, but it happen'd clear otherwiſe after his Death: For he was no ſooner dead, but the Roman Captains, as if his Kingdom had been left a Prey to them, ravag'd and plunder'd it; his Wife Boodicea was whipp'd, his Daughters raviſh'd, his Kindred treated as Captives, and his rich Subjects depriv'd of their Paternal Inheritance and Eſtates. This inhumane Uſage exaſperated the Britains ſo much againſt them, that they conſpired with the Trinobantes, and others, to recover their Liberty, and free themſelves from ſuch cruel Oppreſſors. Boodicea, the injured Queen, animated them in this Reſolution, and led them forward in their Deſign. And firſt they ſet upon the Veteran Soldiers, who lay in Garriſon at London, Verulam and Camalodunum, and having put them to flight, with their Captain Cerealis, they ſlew Seventy Thouſand of them. Suetonius, Governour of the Province, not diſcourag'd by this Loſs from maintaining his Station, rally'd all the Forces he could together, and haſten'd to engage them. The Britains were an hundred and twenty thouſand, under the Conduct of Boadicea, who together with their Wives, encourag'd them manfully to purſue the advantage, and rather die, than come under the Romans Tyranny. Suetonius on the other ſide was not wanting with the like advice: And ſo much the more, becauſe his Army was much inferiour in [b] Number to the Britains, tho' of experienc'd old Soldiers. This Battel was very ſharp, but the Victory in the iſſue fell to the Romans, who ſlew Eighty Thouſand Britains in the gaining of it. Boadicea eſcap'd their Fury, but poiſon'd her ſelf; chooſing to die, rather than ſee the miſerable Calamities which would certainly come upon her Country. After this Victory the Romans grievouſly oppreſs'd the Britains, who, tho' they often revolted, and upon every advantage that they could ſpy, ſtruggled to ſhake off their uneaſie Yoke; yet being over-power'd with Numbers, which were ſent againſt them almoſt from all parts of the Empire, were at laſt forc'd to yield, and undergo an unwilling Subjection, being under the curb of Fourteen Garriſons, and a ſtanding Army of near Thirty Thouſand Foot and Horſe.

The Miſeries of the Britains under the Romans.

[c] In this lamentable Condition of Slavery and Oppreſſion did the Britains remain, as long as the Romans had the Government of them; who, not contented to rob them of their Eſtates and Poſſeſſions at home, and involve them in cruel Bondage, conſtrain'd them to engage in their ambitious Quarrels abroad, and purchaſe them Glory with the loſs of their own Blood and Lives: And not only ſo, but being left to the arbitrary Power of their Governours, they were forc'd to aſſiſt them in their Rebellions: For after the Election of the Emperor fell into the hands of their Army, many Governours here having great Forces under their Command, were proclaim'd Cæſars, and ſet up for the whole Empire. Thus did Carauſius firſt, and after him Alectus, whom Conſtantius, who was Copartner with Maximianus in the Imperial Dignity, at his firſt coming into Britain conquer'd, by the auſpicious Arms of Aſclepiodorus Captain of his Life-guard. After this the [d] Caledonians and [e] Picts made their Inrodes into the Northern parts of Britain, and much infeſted the Inhabitants, diſturbing their Peace, and waſting their Lands; Conſtantius, who then was ſole Emperor of the Weſt, compaſſionating the Miſeries of his Subjects, as well as deſirous to ſecure his Dominions from the Spoil of theſe Barbarians, undertook a ſecond Journey into Britain, and had the good fortune to be Victorious againſt them, and drive them out of his Dominions; though he liv'd not to ſee the Peace that follow'd thereupon, dying ſoon after at York. Conſtantine his Son (afterwards ſurnamed the Great) was preſent at his Death, being upon notice of his Father's Sickneſs lately come out of Illyria, where he had been with Galerius warring againſt the Sarmatians. As ſoon as Conſtantius was dead, Conſtantine was immediately ſaluted Emperor of the Britains, which he ſo kindly

[a] Caractacus, or Caradocus, the valiant Champion for the Britiſh Liberties, was betray'd to the Romans by the treacherous Woman Carteſmandua, Queen of the Brigantes.

[b] Viz. Not much above Ten Thouſand.

[c] Agricola's good Temper and mild Government made their Subjection ſo tolerable, that by his Direction and Encouragement they were willing almoſt to turn Romans; learning their Oratory, Building, Gardening, and all other Arts of Peace and Quietneſs. But this was but a ſhort Breathing from their Miſeries; all their Comforts being remov'd with him by Domitian.

[d] The Caledonians, from Ciliddon, which ſignifies Borderers, were thoſe People that dwelt in the more Southern part of North-Britain, now call'd Scotland; and ſo border'd upon the Roman-Britain, now call'd England.

[e] The Picts ſeem to have been a ruder ſort of Britains, that would never yield to the Romans, but ſtill kept up their ancient Manners and Liberties; and were call'd Picts (about Three Hundred Years after Chriſt) by the Romans, becauſe they continu'd the old Britiſh Cuſtom of painting their Bodies. They dwelt in the North parts of North-Britain, and in probability are the Anceſtors of the Highlanders in Scotland.

reſented,

resented, that he ever after had a particular Esteem for them; and before he left them, put their Government into such a new Model, as was more easie and pleasant to them. After this we have no certain Information in what posture Affairs were among the Britains, till the Reign of Valentinian the Elder, who sent Theodosius (the Father of the Emperor of that Name) a Person eminent for his Heroick Exploits and good Fortune, into Britain to oppose the Incursions of the Picts, Saxons, [a] Scots, and [b] Attacotti, who like a destroying Deluge over-run the Country; Theodosius's Army was compos'd chiefly of Battavians and Herulians, hardy and stout Soldiers, who by the prudent conduct of their General, soon vanquish'd the rude Barbarians, and restor'd the miserable Inhabitants to their Properties and Ease: Which done, Theodosius left Britain, Civilis being sent to govern the Province, and Dulcitius the Army, Men both of great Name and Experience.

Maximus, General of the Roman Army in Britain, claims the Empire.

In these Wars with Theodosius was one Maximus, a Spaniard by Birth, but educated at Rome, by which he became so accomplish'd a Person, that he was made in the time of Valentinian the Younger the supreme Commander of the Army in Britain. This Man taking it ill, that Gratian had declar'd Theodosius Emperor, revolted from his Allegiance, and got himself proclaim'd Cæsar; and to establish himself in the Imperial Throne, transported the Flower of the Britains into Gaul, where by their help he brought over Gaul, Spain and Germany to his Party; and at length grew so powerful, that he in a set Battel conquer'd Gratian, and after by subtilty slew him, and forc'd Valentinian, his Brother and Copartner, to fly to Theodosius Emperor of the East for help, by whose assistance Valentinian recover'd his Right; Maximus, and great part of his Forces, being destroy'd at Aquileia. This Rebellious Expedition much dispeopled Britain, their ablest Youth and strongest Garrisons being taken out of it, which were all either slain with Maximus, or, as some relate, seated themselves in Armorica (now call'd Britain in France) which retains the British Language to this Day.

But this unfortunate Blow did not allay the factious Humour then got in among the Britains; for in the time of Honorius the Emperor, the Colony of Veterans, fearing the Invasion of the Vandals, revolted, and chose one Marcus Emperor, who not answering their Expectation, was slain by them, and one Gratian a Britain put in his place; but neither had he the luck to please them above four Months; wherefore, putting him to Death, they pitch'd upon Constantine, whose very Name seem'd to them to portend Good Fortune, though his Merit was not extraordinary. This Constantine following Maximus's steps, and gathering together all the remaining Forces of Britain, invaded several parts of the Western Empire, gave his Son Constans (a Monk) the Name of Augustus; and after many Rencounters with Honorius's Forces, was at length conquer'd; his whole Army brought out of Britain, being destroy'd, and himself executed at Arles. The British Nation being thus almost exhausted of its Strength, lay open to the Ravages of the Barbarians of the North, who observing this advantage, came down upon them in great Numbers, and by their Incursions reduc'd them to great Straights and Calamities; so that they were forc'd to implore the Aid of Aetius, then Præfect of the Gauls under Valentinian III. by all the Arts of moving Commiseration they could invent; sending their Ambassadors with torn Garments, and Dust on their Heads. Aetius, mov'd with their Petitions, did send them such Succours as soon routed their Enemy; and to secure them for the future, helped them to raise a Wall upon the Trench, which Adrian had cast up before from Sea to Sea; and so he left them. This Relief prov'd but of little worth; for the Barbarians no sooner heard of Aetius's departure, but they again assaulted the Britains afresh, beat down their Wall, and haras's'd the Country much worse than before. The Britains repeat their Suit to Aetius, but all in vain. The Emperors, and his own Safety requir'd of them a more vigorous defence than before, the Empire it self being in as great Hazard, and under as great Distractions as their Island. Wherefore being left to themselves to fall into the Hands of the Barbarians, and so the Government of the Romans, being unable to support it self, expir'd wholly in Britain, after they had held it Four Hundred Seventy Six Years, from the time that Julius Cæsar invaded it: In all which time we find only these seven British Kings to have reign'd, viz. [c] Theomantius, Cunobelinus, Guiderius, Arviragus, Marius, Coel; and lastly Lucius, who is highly celebrated by our Historians for bringing in the Christian Religion into this Nation. All the rest to Vortigern were Roman Governours.

The Roman Government expir'd in Britain.

A. C. 443.

Britain being thus first weaken'd, and at last deserted by the Romans, was left to provide for its own defence against its Invaders. The Inhabitants were in miserable Distractions among themselves, what to do in this sad Juncture. Many Kings they chose, but soon depos'd them. Vortigern, a Noble Britain, and Earl of Cornwall, was at last fix'd upon as their General against their Enemies; who either fearing [d] his own Deposition from the Government he had newly gotten, and desir'd the continuance of, or finding the Nation unable to grapple with its fierce and cruel Enemies, the Scots and Picts, sent for the Saxons out of Germany to assist him. 450.

The Description of the Saxons; their Imitation to Britain, and obtaining of it.

[e] The Saxons at this time possess'd the third part of Germany, and held all the Country between the Rivers Rhine and Elb, having on the North the Baltick-Sea and Ocean, on the South the Hyrcinian-Wood; and divided into two parts by the River Weser, viz. Eastphalia (as the Country on the East of the River Weser was anciently call'd) and Westphalia. They were govern'd by an Aristocracy of twelve Princes, who in times of War chose a General to lead and con-

[a] Scots were Inhabitants of Ireland, who came to assist the Picts against the Romans and Britains, their Subjects.

[b] Attacotti are not certainly known by Antiquaries: Some think them a Party of the Scots, who came out of Ireland; others, among whom is the Learned Bishop of Worcester, that they were the Wild-Britains, from Jerome, who says, they were a British People.

[c] Some of these Kings are fabulous; the Bishop of Worcester proves Arviragus, and so his two Sons, Marius and Coillus, to be the Invention of Jeffrey of Monmouth, who tells very pleasant Stories of the former of them, and thinks that none are certainly reckon'd such, but Prasutagus, Cogidunus, Caractacus, Togodumnus, and Galgacus, who are mention'd in the Roman History; his Conjecture of Lucius is set down before, Orig. Brit. p. 32, 34.

[d] By the Party of Aurelius Ambrosius; for whom, the Romans left in the Province stood very zealously to have him their Governour, and not a Britain, as Vortigern was.

[e] The Saxons were a very Warlike People, who dwelt on the nearest German-shoar, had kept the Romans themselves always upon their Guard, and had sometimes attack'd them in this Isle, which made Vortigern think these People most fit for his Assistants against the Picts and Scots.

duct their Army. Their Country was large, very Populous and Rich, furniſh'd with Shipping, (which at that time the Britains had not;) all which things, as they fitted them for any foreign Expedition, ſo they made them readily embrace Vortigern's Invitation; which they had no ſooner receiv'd, but they diſpatch'd away a conſiderable Body of Men into Britain, under the Command of Hengiſt and Horſa, two Brethren of the chiefeſt Blood and Nobility of the Saxons. The Saxons at firſt ſerved the Britains as Stipendiaries, and did them ſo good ſervice, that within a little time Britain was wholly freed from their troubleſome Enemies, and liv'd at peace: Vortigern allowing them the Iſle of Thanet for their Reſidence, kept them ſtill near him; which gave them an opportunity of better underſtanding the Nature of the Engliſh Soil, and Strength of the Britiſh People. Some time theſe two Nations liv'd in Amity and Friendſhip, but at length the Saxons ſeeing their Country large, their Soil fruitful, and the Inhabitants weak and unable to make any conſiderable Reſiſtance, firſt quarrel with Vortigern about their Pay, afterward get the whole Country of Kent made over to them by Covenant; with which not content, Hengiſt marries his Siſter to Vortigern, and under the ſhews of Friendſhip deſired all the Country beyond Humber, under this pretence, That the Saxons being well ſeated in thoſe parts, would ſecure the Britains againſt the Invaſions of the Scots and Picts. Vortigern eaſily granted this Petition, and Hengiſt immediately ſent for his Brother Otha and Son Ebuſa, with great Supplies, out of Saxony to people thoſe parts; who, glad to exchange their own Country for a much better, ſoon arriv'd; and ſo the Saxons became abſolute Maſters of all Kent and Northumberland, which then contain'd all the Country from Humber to Scotland.

And now the Saxons growing ſtrong and potent, by continual Acceſſes of their Countrymen to thoſe parts where they were ſeated, began to contemn their Maſters and Entertainers, and commit many Inſolencies upon them. The Britiſh Nobility, not able to bear their domineering Carriage, combined together againſt them; and firſt depoſing Vortigern, who had been the Cauſe of their Admiſſion, elected Vortimer his Son to be their King and Leader againſt them. This brave and valiant Prince maintain'd many Battels with them, and whilſt he liv'd (which was not long) protected his Country much from them; and after his Death Ambroſius the laſt of the Romans, and Arthur the Nobleſt of Britains, (who is ſaid in twelve ſet Battels to have encounter'd them, and either vanquiſh'd, or come off with an equal loſs in them all) kept them from their intended and deſired Uſurpation of the Britains Country and Eſtate. But at laſt, partly by the Politick Management of Hengiſt, who liv'd forty Years in Wars, and partly by Treachery[a], the Saxons prevail'd, and forc'd the Britains, almoſt conſum'd with long Wars, to fly into the Mountains and remote Deſarts of the Weſtern part[b] of the Iſle, leaving the whole Nation almoſt in the power and ſole diſpoſal of their Conquerors.

The Saxons being thus become Maſters of this Iſland, ſoon canton'd it out among themſelves; and other their Countrymen, who having news of their ſucceſs, came over to poſſeſs themſelves of the Britains Lands and Eſtates. Hengiſt retain'd his Kingdom of Kent, and Otha and Ebuſa ſtill held the Country between Humber and Scotland; Ella and his Sons conquer'd the South-Eaſt parts, and began the Kingdom of the South-Saxons, containing Suſſex and part of Surrey: Cerdick, and his Sons, landed at Portſmouth, and invaded the South and Weſt parts, and began the Kingdom of the Weſt-Saxons, which after contain'd the Countries of Hamtſhire, Barkſhire, Wiltſhire, Dorſetſhire, Somerſetſhire and Devonſhire: Near the ſame time Uffa invaded the North-Eaſt parts, and began the Kingdom of the Eaſt-Angles, containing Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgeſhire, and the Iſle of Ely: Erkenwin began the Kingdom of the Eaſt-Saxons, containing Eſſex, Middleſex, and a part of Hertfordſhire. The Outparts of the Iſle being thus diſtributed among the unjuſt Invaders, Cridda began the Kingdom of Mercia, or Middle-Angles, containing Lincolnſhire, Northamptonſhire, Huntingtonſhire, Rutlandſhire, Bedford, Buckingham, Oxfordſhire, Cheſhire, Darbyſhire, Nottingham, and Staffordſhire, with part of the Shires of Hereford and Hertford, Warwickſhire, Shropſhire, Lancaſhire, and Gloceſterſhire. But theſe Settlements were made not without great difficulty, and in no ſmall compaſs of time: The Britains making ſuch a vigorous Oppoſition to their Eſtabliſhment, that tho' indeed they were vanquiſh'd wholly at laſt, yet they enjoy'd little of the Britains Eſtates, but naked Land. For in theſe bloody Conteſts between the Proprietors and Invaders, all the Noble Buildings, Baths, Aquæducts, High-ways, and other Ornaments of Conveniency or Delight, which either the Romans, or the Britains in imitation of them, had built and raiſed, were utterly demoliſh'd, ſo that not the leaſt mark or footſteps of them is now left; but inſtead of them we find very frequent Entrenchments, Mounts, and Burroughs raiſed for Tombs and Defences upon all the wide Champions and high Hills almoſt of this Iſle, the indelible Proofs of the many Hazards and bloody Conflicts the Saxons underwent to get a peaceable Poſſeſſion of their Conqueſts in this Iſland; which at laſt they obtain'd, but with the Ruine and Deſtruction of the old Inhabitants.

The general Change of States at this time.

Nor was it the peculiar fate of Britain at this time to change its old Proprietors for new Lords; but this Nation only ſympathiz'd with the reſt of the World in the great Changes which Providence had then began to make, and ſoon after compleated. For there was ſcarcely any one Country or Province in the World, which did not about this time change its Bounds, Inhabitants, Cuſtoms, Language and Name. The Empire being firſt divided into two Parts, and thoſe broken into many Parties and Factions, which call'd in other Nations to their aſſiſtance, made way to the innumerable Changes that ſoon after follow'd. For the French and Burgundians diſpoſſeſs'd the Gauls, and gave the Name of France and Burgundy to their Province: The Gauls tranſplanted themſelves to the Coaſts of Spain, and fix'd their Habitation, not for Conveniency but Neceſſity, in ſuch places as they could by force obtain, which from them was after call'd Gallicia and Portugal: The Huns and Avari ſeiz'd upon upon Pannonia, and gave it the Name of Hungary: The Longobards, a People of Germany, who border'd upon the Saxons, enter'd Italy, got the greateſt part thereof, which after their own Name they call'd by the Name of Lombardy, as it remains to this Day: The Goths and Vandals miſerably-haraſs'd the reſt of the Empire, ſack'd Rome it ſelf; and after ſubdu'd, peopl'd and poſſeſs'd Spain. So that Britain was not ruin'd alone, but ſuffer'd in the common Deluge.

tants, puts on a new Face of Things: With its new Lords, it had new Laws and Government. Nothing was retain'd of the British Customs or Usages, as tho' they were resolv'd to have no marks left of so troublesome an Enemy as the Britains had been. Their Cities and Towns, Rivers, Hills and Mountains, because they could not demolish them, they gave them new Names. Britain it self was forbidden to be call'd by its ancient Name, but New-Saxony; and shortly after, either from the Angles, the greatest part of the Invaders, or from Hengist, their most eminent Commander call'd Engist-land, or England. The whole Nation at first they divided into Eight [a] Kingdoms, which continu'd till the Britains were quite expell'd their Country, under Caretius their King, who was driven over the Severn an Hundred Thirty Six Years after Hengist first came into England. But as soon as their common Enemy was remov'd, their Ambition stirring them up to enlarge their Dominions, they fell into Dissentions among themselves; and the strongest soon usurping the Dominions of the weaker, they were reduc'd to Seven Kingdoms, the Northumbrians enlarging themselves to the utmost bounds of their next Neighbours, so made one Kingdom of two. Nor did this Settlement hold long; for the West-Saxons took the Kingdom of the South-Saxons to their Dominion, and so they became Six, as they continu'd about Two Hundred and Fifty Years.

Saxon Government.

At their first Settlement, the Saxons, for an Hundred and Fifty Years, were govern'd by their own Laws, without any mixture of those of the Britains, or any other Nations. But when Augustine the Monk, commonly call'd the English Apostle, arriv'd here with forty others his Companions, sent hither by Pope Gregory the Great, and had converted Ethelbert King of Kent, and some other Persons of note; they soon after embrac'd the Christian Faith unanimously, and suffer'd their Laws and Rites to be modell'd according to the Ecclesiastical Constitutions. Their Kings, laying aside their warlike and rough Tempers, became humble and pious, conformable to the Genius of that Religion they had submitted themselves to; and their only Ambition was, who should raise the noblest and most numerous Monuments of Piety, which soon became visible in all parts of the Land: Divers of their Kings left their Temporal Dignities and Worldly Grandeur, to embrace an holy Retirement, and live a Monastick Life; as Ethelred and Kinred, Kings of Mercia; Offa, King of the East-Saxons, Kadwallo and Ina, Kings of the West-Saxons; Eadbert, King of the Northumbrians, and many others.

The Heptarchy reduc'd at last to two Kingdoms.

As to the Civil State of the Kingdom, tho' the Six Kingdoms held their own some Ages, yet at length the Kingdoms of Mercia and West-Saxons so far over-power'd the rest, that it lay between them, who should govern all. For Ina, a martial, wise, and religious Prince, governing the West-Saxons, advanc'd that Kingdom, by his Conquest of Kent and the South-Saxons, to so great an Eminency, that he was able to contend for a Supremacy with the King of Mercia, and that with doubtful Victory. But Offa, afterward King of Mercia, was in a fair way to have swallow'd up both the West-Saxons, and all the other Kingdoms: For while he liv'd, which was in the time of Charles the Great, (with whom he was Confederate) he was accounted the most potent King of the Nation: But the many Injuries he did to others, especially that barbarous Cruelty and Perfidiousness, which he was guilty of, in murthering Ethelbert King of the East-Angles, in his own House, when he came to him upon the publick Faith to court his Daughter, were so closely pursu'd by the Hand of Divine Justice, that tho' he dy'd in Peace, yet his Posterity never flourish'd, but every Day declin'd, till in the end they lost all. For Egbert, the Son of Ivegild, or Ingils, the Brother of Ina, having obtain'd the Kingdom of West-Saxons, laid the foundation of the Conquest of the rest; being a Prince, who from a private Station, wherein he had learned much Moderation, and inur'd himself to much Hardship, was raised to that Dignity by these means: Ina, his Great Uncle, having left the World and Kingdom, and dying without Issue, left the Succession involv'd in Troubles, and out of the direct Line, as he found it; and tho' we find a Succession of four Kings inheriting his Throne, viz. Ethelard, Sigibert, Kenwulf, and Brithric; yet they got it either by Election or Force, not by any Right of Descent. Brithric, the last of them, was sensible of the weakness of his Title, and therefore seeing the promising and towardly Disposition of Egbert, who by Blood was nearly related to the former Kings, he used all the Arts he could to destroy him; but Egbert perceiving his bloody Design, he fled to Offa King of Mercia, where finding his abode hazardous, because Brithric to strengthen himself had marry'd the Daughter of that King, he made his escape into France [b], and there remain'd till the Death of Brithric [c]; and then returning, obtain'd the Kingdom of the West-Saxons, and subdu'd Cornwall, then inhabited by the [d] Britains; and after invades Bernulph, who was newly possess'd of the Kingdom of Mercia, a State at that time, through the Interruption of the Royal Line, in a wavering condition. For Egfryde, the Son of Offa, enjoy'd his Kingdom but four Months; the Hand of Providence cutting him off for his Father's Cruelty, and left his Kingdom to Kenwolfe, a Kinsman in the sixth Descent, whose Son Kenelm, a Child of six Years old, was soon depriv'd of it by Quindred his Sister, who murther'd him to get into his Throne, but miss'd of her aim, the People electing Ceolulph her Uncle to it. Ceolulph enjoy'd not the Kingdom long, being expell'd out of it by Bernulph, who met with the same fortune from Egbert, who seizing on it made his Kingdom tributary to that of the West-Saxons, as he did afterwards those of the South and East-Saxons with the Kingdom of Northumberland: So that Egbert in a manner became an [e] absolute Monarch of the whole Country; tho' his Power

Egbert first Monarch of England.

A. D. 800.

[a] We generally account the first Settlement of the Saxons to be in an Heptarchy, or Seven Kingdoms, viz. The Kingdoms of Kent, South-Saxons, East-Saxons, East-Angles, West-Saxons, Mercia, and Northumberland; but those that count Eight, divided this last into the Kingdom of Deira, which lies on this side Humber, and Bernicia, which lies beyond Humber, between that River and Scotland.

[b] Charles the Great was then King of France, and finding Egbert dextrous and ingenious, he employ'd him in his Wars, and many other Affairs of his Government, whereby he was made a very accomplish'd Prince.

[c] Brithric was poison'd by Ethelberg his Wife; a Woman of that malicious Temper, that all she could not remove by Accusations, though false, she would poison; which designing to do to one of the King's Friends, the King himself drank of the Potion, and dy'd.

[d] But they are said to have held out so long against his Arms, viz. Fourteen Years, that he made a Law, that it should be Death for any Britain to pass over Offa's Ditch; thinking by this means to prevent any disturbance from them.

[e] Egbert was thus far an absolute Monarch of Britain, that all the Seven Kingdoms were either subdu'd by him, or tributary to him. The Danes disquieted his Reign indeed, but had no part of England their own.

was

was never compleat, nor his Peace firm, becauſe of the [a] Danes, who having got footing in this Nation in the Reign of Britbric, could never be driven out again, but created continual Troubles in the Reigns of himſelf and Succeſſors; till at length they raviſh'd the Sovereignty from the Saxons, and took it into their own hands.

An Account of the Original of the Danes.

The Danes were a People of Germany, near Neighbours to the Saxons, and of a Language and Manners not much differing from them, poſſeſſing beſides the Cimbrica Cherſoneſus (now call'd Denmark) all the Iſles adjoyning, lying in the Baltick Sea, and ſome time the Kingdom of Norway. A ſtrong, hardy and warlike Nation, having plenty of Shipping, and great numbers of People. Theſe Men perceiving the ſucceſs the Saxons had here, and how much better a Soil they inhabited than their own, were very deſirous to put in for a ſhare with them; to which Attempt they were encourag'd, not only from the Nakedneſs of the Coaſts, which every where almoſt lay open to Invaſion, but chiefly by the many Diviſions and Quarrels between their ſeveral Princes and Nations, which they foreſaw would much facilitate their entrance. The Saxons therefore had ſcarcely ended their troubleſome Wars with the Britains, and began to ſettle themſelves under a Monarchy, when the Danes, as if they were ſent to revenge the Cruelties they had done to the Britains, began to aſſault them with the ſame Diſturbances. It would be both uneaſie and tedious to the Reader, as well as difficult for me, to give a particular account of the many bloody Battels and Rencounters which happen'd between theſe two fierce Nations, while they ſcuffled for the abſolute Maſtery of this Kingdom, becauſe they are ſo confuſedly and diſorderly deliver'd by Writers; and therefore I ſhall ſpare my ſelf the pains, and the Reader the trouble of reading of them.

Ethelwolfe his Gifts to the Church and Rome.

After the Death of Egbert, [b] Ethelwolfe his Son ſucceeded him in his Kingdom, under the Title of King of the Weſt-Saxons only. He was a Prince more addicted to Devotion than Action; as is evident by his [c] Donation of the Tenth part of his whole Kingdom to the Service of God, and an Exemption of all Lands belonging to the Church from all Tribute and Regal Services: Beſides, he gave an Annuity of [d] three hundred Marks to be expended in pious Uſes at Rome, whither he went twice in Perſon, with his youngeſt Son Alfred, who was the chief Object of his Love, whom Pope Leo IV. anointed King at eleven Years old, as preſaging his future Greatneſs and Fortune. In his laſt Journey, and whole Year's ſtay at Rome, Ethelbald his eldeſt Son conſpir'd with the Nobility of the Weſt-Saxons to keep him out of his Kingdom, and deprive him utterly of his Government; which he ſo craftily manag'd, that notwithſtanding his People lov'd him extreamly well, yet he was brought to yield up the Kingdom of the Weſt-Saxons to Ethelbald, and retain only the Kingdom of the Eaſt-Angles (a ſmall Principality of far leſs Dignity) to himſelf. After this he liv'd two Years, and left his whole Kingdom to Ethelbald, who to his eternal Infamy marry'd his Father's Wife [e] Judith, Daughter of Charles the Bald King of France. He enjoy'd his ill-gottten Honour but two Years and a half; and then left it [f] to his Brother Ethelred, who held it indeed five Years, but in [g] continual War with the Danes, and dy'd of the Plague, and was bury'd at Winburn. After whom ALFRED, or ELFRED [h], a moſt incomparable Prince, who was made a King before he had a Kingdom, or any apparent Succeſſion to it, began his troubleſome Reign at two and twenty Years of Age, and in a Year wherein there were eight ſeveral Battels fought between the Saxons and Danes; which was ominous to him, for his Reign was but as it were one continu'd War, either with his Enemies, or his Peoples Vices. In the beginning of his Reign he was ſo powerfully aſſaulted by the [i] Danes, that he had almoſt loſt all, and was forc'd to yield up a part of his Kingdom (viz. the Country of the Eaſt-Angles and Northumberland) to Guthrum or Gurmund, the Commander of the Danes; whom, upon his Converſion to Chriſtianity and Baptiſm, he made his Confederate, and by free Gift confirm'd to him the Poſſeſſion of thoſe Dominions, which before he only uſurped. A. D. 872. Alfred's Wars.

But notwithſtanding his continual Engagements in War againſt his Enemies, yet he was not wanting to provide all things that were neceſſary for the well-being of his Nation; for he firſt of all collected the Laws of his Predeceſſors, and the other Kings of the Saxons, eſpecially thoſe of Offa King of Mercia, and Ethelbert the firſt Chriſtian King of the Engliſh, into one Body; and by the advice and conſent of his States then aſſembled, made choice of the beſt, abrogated the uſeleſs, and added others according to the neceſſity of the time. Then he provided for the Security of his People againſt the Robberies and Riots, to which the War with Foreigners had expos'd them, (for certain Men combining together to plunder both ſides, ſo infeſted the High-ways, that no Man could travel about his buſineſs without a Convoy, or Guard againſt them.) Alfred to remedy this great Diſorder, made a Diviſion of his Kingdom into Shires, Hundreds and Tythings, that every Engliſhman (for ſo the Saxons now generally call'd themſelves) living orderly, might be of ſome Hundred, or Tything, from which he was not to remove without Security; and out of which, if he were accuſed of any Crime, he was likewiſe to produce Sureties for his good Behaviour for the future; which if he could not find, he was forced to ſuffer the Penalty of the Law. If any Malefactor, before or after he had put in Sureties, eſcaped, all the Tything or Hundred were oblig'd to pay a Fine to the King, by which means he ſecured Travellers, and ſoon ſettled the Peace of the Country.

[f] Ethelbert his Elder Brother reign'd five Years before the Kingdom came to Ethelred. He had Troubles by the Danes, but eaſed himſelf by giving them Money.

[g] It is related, that this King in one Year fought nine Battels with the Danes, and in moſt came off Victor, ſaying one of their Kings, and ſeveral of their Great Men.

This King's Provision for Learning.

for Learning, made him much lament the want of it in himself; accounting it one of his greatest Misfortunes to be bred up in the ignorance of it, and to have his Kingdom so utterly destitute [a] of Learned Men, as it was, through the long continuance of the War with the Barbarians. To repair this defect, and raise the esteem of good Letters among his People [b], he sent into several parts for such as were grown famous for their Learning; whom, upon their arrival, he highly preferr'd, encourag'd them to teach others, and had them himself in great veneration: Rareness then setting a greater value upon lesser Attainments, than after Plenty did upon the greatest Perfections. Grimbald and Scotus were invited hither out of France, and Asserius Menevensis (who wrote his Life) out of Wales, and others [c] came from other parts. All the time he could spare from the important Concerns of a confused State, he spent in his Studies; by which he made no small progress in Learning, and deservedly bears the Honour of the first Learned Prince we had in England.

His own illiterate Education made him the more careful of that of his Children, for whom he provided the best and most diligent Masters; and by their Example encourag'd almost all the Nobility of the Kingdom to train up their Children in the same way. For the compleating of which Rudiments, he either raised or revived [d] publick Schools in several of the chief Cities of the Land. The Learning, which by his great diligence he had gain'd in his riper Years, he employ'd not for shew, or his own honour, but for the publick advantage, in translating the [e] best Authors into the vulgar Language; which it seems he labour'd much to adorn, and especially affected the Saxon Verses, which he was so Elegant a Composer of, that he gain'd the Name of a Poet to that of a King. The Natural Day, consisting of twenty four Hours, he divided into three parts, whereof he allotted eight to Prayer, Study and Writing, eight to the Care of his Body, in Eating, Exercise and Sleep, and the other eight to the Affairs of State; which spaces of Time, because he had no better Instrument to measure them by, he mark'd out by the burning of a great Wax Taper, distinguish'd into so many parts, which as soon as they were each of them burned, he had a Person who attended it to give him notice. His Revenues also he proportion'd into as good an Order, making his Liberality equal to all his other Expences; in which, that he might not be over-lavish, he took an exact account of all his Income, caused a general Survey of his Kingdom to be made, and had all the Branches of his Revenue to be register'd in a Book, which he kept in his Treasury at Winchester. In this regular course did he live, notwithstanding the various Changes of his Fortune, and the weak Habit of Body he lay under, and reign'd twenty seven Years; leaving his Son Edward, a noble and worthy Prince, his Successor.

EDWARD, [f] [Surnamed the Elder] tho' he was much inferiour to his Father in Learning, much excell'd him in Power, being a warlike, courageous and fortunate Prince: For he was absolute King of Mercia, and had the actual Possession of it, for which Alfred receiv'd only a certain Homage; and, as some Writers assure us, rul'd over the East-Angles and People of Northumberland; tho' we find by the Laws that he and Guthrum made by joint-consent, that they held the same Correspondence as his Father had. He conquer'd the Britains in Wales, and fortify'd and furnish'd with strong [g] Garrisons divers Towns in England, whose Situation made them fit to prevent the Incursions of the Danes, and was the whole twenty three Years that he reign'd in continual Wars, and in them very fortunate. And indeed his Father himself, and many of his Successors, during the Wars with the Danes, tho' they lost their Ease, yet made a much more valuable Purchase of Honour by it: For this National Calamity kept them in such continual Exercise, that they had no time to indulge themselves in Ease and Luxury; but were obliged thereby to be more [h] pious, just and careful in their Government: For otherwise it had been impossible for them to have held out so long against the Danes as they did, being a People of that Vigour and undaunted Courage, as no adverse Fortune could deter them, so as to let go the hold that they had gotten upon this Nation, who, if they had met with an unactive Prince for their Enemy, would soon have wrought themselves into the whole. And this was the Reason that the Succession of the Saxon Monarchy is something broken, the People being forc'd to choose a more able Prince, where the direct Line imposed a Minor, or unfit Person upon them; as in

Edward's Success against the Danes.

ATHELSTAN, or ETHELSTAN, who tho' he was an Illegitimate Son of King Edward, was yet preferr'd before his Lawful Son Edmund, who was under Age, and so unfit for a Kingdom in those difficult times, because he was grown to Man's Estate, and promis'd no small Advantages to the Nation from his Courage and Prudence. He was therefore Crown'd with as great Solemnity and Joy as any of his Ancestors, and by an unanimous Election made their King. His Conduct in his Government answer'd the Expectation the People had of him. He prov'd Couragious [i] against his Enemies, Just to his People, and Zealous for Religion; in which Noble Actions, having spent a Reign of sixteen Years, he dy'd as honourably as he liv'd, but without Issue. A. D. 924.

Athelstan's Courage and Virtues.

EDMUND his Brother succeeded him: A Prince equal to any of his Predecessors in his [k] Valour and Virtues, had he liv'd to have given a full proof of them. In the five Years he reign'd, so 940.

[a] It is said, that on the South-side of the Thames, the People of England were so illiterate, that few or none could read.

[b] He also made a Law, that all Freemen that had two Hides of Land should keep their Sons at School till fifteen Years old.

[c] Viz. Neoth, John of S. Davids, and Joannes Monachus, whom he plac'd in his School at Oxford, now University-College, as he did Scotus and Grimbald in another, now part of Brazen-nose College.

[d] He founded the University of Oxford, a School at Crikelade in Wiltshire for Greek, and Lechlade in Glocestershire for Latin. He built three Monasteries, viz. Etheling, Winchester and Shaftsbury, in one of which he was bury'd, viz. Winchester.

[f] He was Crown'd at Kingstone upon Thames, and is the first of our English Kings whom we read to have been Anointed at his Coronation, according to the Custom of the Jewish Kings.

[g] He erected Hereford-Castle, to curb the Rebellious Temper of the Welchmen, and Chester, Hereford, &c.

[h] An Instance of his pious Care was in repairing the University of Cambridge, burnt by the Danes, and restoring it to its Lustre.

[i] He conquer'd the Scots, and by the Prayers of John of Beverley, is said to have obtain'd a Sign, that the Scots ought to be subject to the English, which was this: He struck a Rock with his Sword, and cut a Yard deep into it; which is to be seen near the Castle of Dunbar at this Day, Radb. Hist. Wint. p. 211. He, among many other Victories over the Danes, in one more signal slew five Kings, twelve Captains, and almost all their Army; and so brought them to yield him a quiet Reign over all England. At the Conclusion of which Agreement, the single Combat of the famous Guy Earl of Warwick, and Colbrand the Danish Giant, is said to have decided all Differences, the Victory falling to the English Champion. Tho' this Story is suspected of Falshood.

[k] He is said to have recover'd Lincoln, Derby, Stafford, Leicester, from the Danes, and converted them to the Christian Faith.

fortunate were his Arms, that none of his Enemies could ſtand before him; but tho' he eſcaped in the midſt of Dangers, yet he met with his Death in his own Palace, being ſlain at a Feaſt in his own Houſe, by the hand of a baſe Aſſaſſin, in the midſt of his Nobles and People, who admir'd and lov'd him. He left two Sons, but being both too young to enter upon a Kingdom ſo full of Troubles,

EDRED his Brother was preferr'd before them both, who inheriting the Virtues and Bravery of his Anceſtors, maintain'd his Kingdom ſtoutly againſt the continual Inrodes of the Danes all his Reign, which laſted but ten Years; when dying, he left his Kingdom to

EDGAR, his Brother, a Prince of great Worth: He was indeed very Young when he came to his Throne, being but ſixteen Years old; but being of a pliable Diſpoſition, and willing to admit of Counſel, was, by the grave advice of his Biſhops, (who in thoſe Religious times had an abſolute ſway over the Hearts and Affections of moſt Men) ſo inſtructed in all the Methods and Rules of a good Government and Religion, that he became a moſt Heroical Prince, and admirable Governour.

His Navy built againſt the Pirates.

Among other his excellent Acts of Government, he provided a mighty Navy to ſecure his Coaſts from Invaſion, which as he gather'd from lamentable Examples (tho' late) would be the beſt way to keep the like Calamities out of this Nation for the future; which for ſome Ages paſt, and at that time did greatly diſturb and afflict it, not being expert in Sea-affairs. For when the Romans firſt conquer'd it, the Britains had no Shipping, but a few ſmall Boats made of Wicker, or Oſiers, cover'd with Hides; with which they could make no Oppoſition to the Romans, nor after to the Danes, who had very ſtrong Ships, as the Times then were, and therefore eaſily found a ſecure place to land on ſo naked Coaſts. Egbert indeed is ſaid to have provided a ſtrong Navy about the Year 840. and Alfred thirty or forty Years after is reported to have done the like: But their Ships being either conſum'd by the Enemy, or decay'd and loſt by diſuſe and neglect, Edgar builds a freſh Navy, and ſet out a Fleet of ſixteen hundred Sail, as ſome write, and others ſay * more; he divided it into four parts, appointing them their ſeveral Points to cruize at, thereby to ſecure his Coaſts from Pirates, and all foreign Enemies, himſelf every Year in part of his Navy, ſailing round the Iſle, of which he ſtil'd himſelf King.

* Three thouſand.

He was abſolute Monarch of England.

And that he might compleatly reduce the Nation to one Monarchy and Name, he ſtil'd himſelf King of Albion, as appears from the Charter granted by him to the Abby of Malmſbury in theſe words, Ego Edgarus totius Albionis Baſileus, nec non Maritimorum, ſeu Inſulanorum Regum circum-habitantium, &c. i.e. 'I Edgar King of all Albion, and of 'the Kings inhabiting the Iſles, and Sea-coaſts 'thereof, &c. For having firſt of all the Saxon Kings made Peace with the Danes, and granted them a quiet Settlement among his own People in all his Dominions, he had a Sovereign Rule over them: And Kenneth King of Scots did him homage, whether for Cumberland and Weſtmorland, given to that Crown by King Edmund his Father, or for his whole Kingdom, I cannot affirm; and five Kings of Wales did the like for their Country, coming all to him at his Court at Cardiffe: So that he ſeems the firſt abſolute Monarch of this Land.

He was ſtiled Pacificus.

[b] The general Peace which he enjoy'd through his whole Reign, procur'd him the honourable Title of Pacificus, and made his Kingdom, always a ſtranger before to ſo great a Bleſſing, very flouriſhing and proſperous during [c] his time, which was ſixteen Years. But it laſted little longer than his Reign; and, as if it had been made for him, as it was by him, was almoſt bury'd in his Grave. He dy'd young, viz. in the 32[d] Year of his Age, and left his Son Edward, a Child, to inherit his Throne; who, not being able to avoid the cruel deſigns which his Mother-in-law Elfrida had form'd to raiſe her Son Ethelred to his Dignity, fell a Sacrifice to her Ambition; and being ſo robb'd of his Earthly, was untimely tranſlated to a Celeſtial Crown: He was murther'd by her own Hand in her Houſe (Corfe-Caſtle) in the Iſle of Purbeck, as he was hunting, having loſt his Company, and coming thither to viſit her, and refreſh himſelf, tir'd with the Chaſe. 975. St. Edward.

ETHELRED, the Son of King Edgar, by his ſecond Wife Elfrida, having gotten the Crown by his Mother's Cruelty from his elder Brother, was put into the full Poſſeſſion of it by St. Dunſtan; who [d] againſt his Will crown'd him King of England. It is ſaid, that the Holy Man preaching the Sermon before his Coronation, prophetically foretold the Miſeries which ſhould follow his unjuſt Acquiſition, in theſe words; Quoniam aſpiraſti ad regnum per mortem fratris tui, &c. i. e. "Be- St. Dunſtan's Reproof of his Uſurpation.

For the new erected Monarchy thro' a Divine Curſe upon the Governour, fell immediately in pieces, and two Conqueſts by foreign Nations, within the ſpace of fifty Years followed. 978.

Danes freſh Aſſaults and Succeſs againſt the Engliſh.

The Danes, in the firſt place, being multiplied among themſelves, and having much ſtrengthen'd their Intereſts by marrying with the Engliſh in the late Peace, which they enjoyed twenty Years together, found themſelves in a better Condition to oppoſe them with good Succeſs than they had ever been; eſpecially obſerving that the Engliſh were unſatisfied with their King, diſaffected to [a] He hated the Monks, and is ſaid to have baniſh'd Dunſtan for reproving his Exceſſes: But we muſt beware how we believe Monkiſh Writers, when they write of their Enemies.

[b] In all his Reign no foreign Army diſquieted the Peace of this Nation.

[c] But in this Peace the Engliſh are ſaid to have learn'd ſuch exceſſive Drinking, that Edgar was forc'd to make a ſevere Law againſt Drinking, That no Man ſhould drink beyond certain Nicks or Marks made in their Pots for that end.

[d] S. Dunſtan would have had Edgith, the Siſter of Edward the Martyr, crown'd Queen.

his Government, and divided among themſelves, ſo that 'twas very improbable they could or would make any tolerable Reſiſtance. Wherefore that they might effect an abſolute Conqueſt of the Land, which they had ſo long attempted in vain, they invited their Country-men out of Denmark to come with all the Aſſiſtance they could poſſibly make for them; who thereupon came in ſuch great Multitudes, that they aſſaulted moſt of the Coaſts and parts of the Nation at once: So that the State was at a loſs how to ſuppreſs their Inſolencies. Ethelred encountred them with ſmall Forces once, and again, but to no purpoſe; and therefore was forced to buy his Peace at the Price of 10000 l. The Danes gladly accepted the Money, but never let the poor Engliſh enjoy their Purchaſe: For this Compoſition being too manifeſt a Proof of the Engliſh Weakneſs, and the Danes Strength, they every Year renewed their Invaſion on purpoſe to ſell their Peace; which they always did at a dearer Rate every Year than other. This produced the [a] firſt Tax that was ever laid upon the Engliſh, then known by the Name of Dane-gelt; which tho' it was very grievous to the People, yet was continued for many Ages after the Occaſion ceaſed: And in the end (tho' under other Names) became the uſual way of Supply for Princes Wants in time of War and Danger.

The firſt Tax which the Engliſh bore called Dane-gelt.

Ethelred, by his Gifts, was ſo far from eaſing his People of their Troubles, that he rather procured greater Expences. The Danes deſires of Money growing greater by their Receipts, inſomuch, that Swain King of Denmark, and Aulafe, or Anlafe King of Norway, thought it worth their while to go in Perſon upon an Expedition into England to return loaden with Treaſure, which accordingly they had: And Aulafe, who was a Prince of a milder Diſpoſition, was converted to Chriſtianity and baptized. Theſe heavy Burthens, and grievous Calamities, which the Engliſh ſuffer'd from Foreigners, were much increaſed by the Diſloyalties and Unfaithfulneſs of Ethelred's own Subjects; his principal Men, who were intruſted in the Defence of the Nation, proving the Betrayers of it, as it uſually happens to broken Fortunes, very few are faithful Friends to them. For when after the Example of Edgar his Father, he had provided a great Navy; Elfrick, the Admiral, is ſaid to have given Intelligence of their Strength and Deſign to the Danes, and ſo diſappointed the whole Intent of it. The Earls Fran, Frithigiſt, Godwin, and Turkettle, the Chief Commanders of the Army by Land, being ſecret Friends to the Danes, diſcourag'd their Men by Flight from the Battel they had begun, and ſo cauſed their Defeat. Edric, Duke of Mercia, who after theſe was created General of all the King's Forces; was ſo much the more infamous for his Diſloyalty, by how much the King repoſed the greater Truſt in him: For when he came to engage the Enemy, he feigned himſelf ſick, and left his Army to ſhift for themſelves; who fell into the Danes hands, and left the Country to be their Prey, for which he bore the Name of Falſe.

The Unfaithfulneſs of his Officers.

Wolnod, or Wilmot, a Nobleman of Suſſex; who was for his Miſdemeanour out-lawed and baniſhed by the King, infeſted the Coaſts with continual Robberies, having twenty Ships mann'd with Thieves and Pirates. The King ſent eighty Sail of his Ships to take him, which being firſt lamentably torn with a Tempeſt, were ſet upon by Wilmot, and being unable to reſiſt were all by him ſet on fire. This Perfidiouſneſs of the Nobility, tho' it might proceed from their Diſcontents, Emulations, or diſloyal Affections, yet is charged upon Ethelred's Pride and Vice, whom yet we find to have been more unfortunate than really weak; and had he had faithful Miniſters of his Affairs, might have gone in the foremoſt Rank of our Engliſh Worthies: For he neglected no Occaſion to make a brave Reſiſtance againſt his Enemies, and to that end made great Preparations both by Land and Sea, brought his Affairs many times to a great Ripeneſs; but thro' an unlucky Fate, that lay upon him, he never proved ſucceſsful. So that tho' indeed he was a Prince of good Deſigns and Arms, yet being unfortunate in his Actions, he bears a Name of Ignominy and Reproach, which all the deſperate Battels he fought [b], the good Conſtitutions of Government he made, and the great Proviſions which he on all occaſions made for his Kingdoms Safety, can never reſcue him from.

Ethelred of himſelf no bad Prince.

To the former Calamities were joyned Famine, and a great Mortality, with unuſual Inundations of the Rivers and Seas, as if God and Man had conſpired together to make this Nation as miſerable as the Sins of the Prince and People deſerved; and nothing would ſatisfie, but their utter Deſtruction.

While the Nation was ſtruggling with theſe heavy Judgments, Swain King of Denmark, to greaten the Load of their Afflictions, comes with a ſtrong Navy to raiſe new Sums of Money upon the Engliſh, oppreſſing the poor diſtreſſed People till he had a Sum of 48000 l. granted in an Aſſembly of the States at London, paid to him; by which means a Peace, or rather a Bargain of Slavery, was made between the two Nations, That they ſhould dwell quietly together, and enjoy their own Liberties and Properties without any Moleſtation, which was confirmed by ſolemn Oaths on both ſides, and Hoſtages delivered by the Engliſh. The Danes in this Agreement laid aſide open Hoſtilities indeed, but could not diſſemble their Thoughts, that they were Maſters; and therefore behaved themſelves with [c] great Inſolency to the Engliſh, committed many cloſe Outrages; offered many baſe Abuſes to the Wives and Daughters, not only of the meaner ſort, but of the Nobility themſelves; with many other intolerable Diſorders. Theſe things ſo exaſperated the Spirits of the Engliſh, that they reſolved upon a full Revenge. One Hune, a great Commander, and valiant Soldier of that time, being ſenſible of the Weakneſs of the Nation to right themſelves of ſuch Injuries, propounded a ſecret way of Revenge, by a ſudden and univerſal Maſſacre of the Danes in all parts of the Land. Ethelred approved the Motion, and advanced the

The Danes come for Engliſh Money.

A Maſſacre of the Danes.

[a] It is ſaid, That Edric, the Falſe Duke of Mercia, was the Cauſe and Adviſer of this Tax. The Peers, and among them Siricius, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, were the Promoters of the Compoſition with the Danes; but Edric to reimburſe his Maſter, deviſed the Impoſition upon the People, which tho' advantageous to himſelf, render'd him odious to the People, eſpecially after it was redoubled, and yet extorted from them, as it was ſhortly after.

[b] He was particularly careful of the due Execution of Juſtice, and made many good Laws for his Judges, injoyning them to do Juſtice, yet with Mercy; to accept no Man's Perſon, and take no Bribes: And was ſo ſtrict in the Obſervance of them, that having found one Walgeatus, a Judge, whom he particularly loved, to have broken his Laws, he depoſed him from his Office.

[c] The Danes every where treated the Engliſh no better than their Slaves; forcing them to labour, while they ſat at home with their Wives, and like Drones fed on the Honey, which by their indefatigable Induſtry the poor Engliſh had gathered. Nor were they herewith contented, but as an open Reproach of their Cowardice, the Danes required them to call them Lords; which for more Quietneſs ſake they yielded to.

Deſign

A. D. 1002. Design by giving his Orders for the Execution of it [On the Feast of S. Bricius, Nov. 13. 1002. this bloody Tragedy was acted] with so much implacable Fury and Cruelty, as evidently shewed the Rancour and inveterate Anger the English had conceived against them. Neither Temples, nor Altars, Supplications, nor any Bands of Alliance could save them from Slaughter; but where-ever they found the Danes, they immediately destroyed them. Gunhild, the Sister of Swain King of Denmark, who had shewed her self a continual Friend to the English, and by her Mediation procured them a Peace; yet being a Dane, could not escape their Fury, but was slain with [a] her Husband and Son. She being a Woman of a Masculine Courage, met her Death not with Fears, but Threats; telling the Murtherers, that her Blood should cost their Nation dear, and that a severe Revenge should be taken of them for her Death, as it after happened.

Swain revenges the Danes Deaths.

The News of this sad and bloody Fact was soon carried over to Swain King of Denmark, who as he resented it not with more Grief than Fury, so he made the speediest Preparations he could to revenge it; having now a just occasion to deal with the English with the utmost Rigour and Severity, who had first shewn him an Example of unmerciful Cruelty. The next Summer therefore (for sooner such an Expedition was not safe to be attempted) he sets forth for England with a great Navy, enter'd the Countty in the Western Parts, and after a most barbarous manner ravaged and spoiled it. The English not so couragious to maintain their Fact, as they had been to commit it, yielded up the Possession of their Country to him; chusing rather to submit, than stand the Hazard of a Victory. All the Nation became Swain's, except the City of London, which being strongly fortified, Ethelred held out against him, and made a noble Resistance; till he left them, and fled first into the Isle of Wight and after into Normandy, whither he had sent Emma his Queen with her two Sons, Edward and Alfrid, from the Rage of this Tempest. But within two Months after, he was again invited home by his own People upon the Death of Swain, who just when he was ready to have been crowned King of this Island, died; leaving his Son Canutus to succeed him in his Fortunes, and accomplish his intended Designs.

Swain's Death.

Ethelred expels Canutus, and gets to London.

Ethelred being returned home, was soon furnished with an Army; and setting upon Canutus, lying then at Lindsey with his Father's Ships, and English Hostages given his Father a little before, forced him to Sea: At which he being enraged, made about to Sandwich, where he first treated cruelly all such of Ethelred's Friends as he could get into his power, and then grievously mangling the Hostages, he sent them home, himself returning into his own Country with the Spoils which he and his Father had gotten, to make greater Preparations for the prosecution of his purpose the next Year. Ethelred in the mean time did not desist from pursuing the advantage he had got; and to weaken the Danes Power and Interest, he, in a General Assembly at Oxford, caused many of the Danish Nobility to be murther'd; among which was Sigifrith and Morchar, Earls of Northumberland, whom the false Earl Edric (who was never backward to be an Actor of Mischief on either side) having invited to a Banquet at his Lodgings, caused there to be kill'd, and their Followers with them; who, having defended themselves and Master as long as they could, fled into a Church, where they were consum'd in the Flames with the Building.

Canutus having strengthen'd himself with all the Forces he could raise at home, or procure of his Neighbours, with whom he was in League, return'd again to England within the Year; and landing at Sandwich, had all the West parts surrender'd up to him without resistance, who gave him Pledges for their Obedience, and furnish'd him with Horse and Armour. Ethelred lay very dangerously sick, and not being able to oppose the fierce Invader himself, sent his Son Edmund, surnamed Ironside, with a good Army against him. Edmund, a Prince full of Youth and Courage, and every ways fitted to have deliver'd his Country, had he liv'd in better Times, and among faithful People, joyfully march'd against Canute, to try his fortune; but in the way being inform'd, that Edric, the False had promised to betray his Father's Fleet to the Enemy, (which he soon after did, going over to them with forty Ships) and being deserted by Utred, one of his chief Commanders, he was obliged to retreat to London, the only place which retain'd their Loyalty to their King in his Misfortunes. Hither also Ethelred himself, having a little recover'd his Sickness, came with such small Forces as kept their Fidelity to him; but relapsing into his Distemper soon after his arrival, and tired with Troubles, dy'd, having reign'd thirty seven Years, and was bury'd in St. Paul's Church at London, behind the Quire.

Canutus invades England.

A. D. 1016. GANUTUS, after the Death of Ethelred, (whose long Reign shews, that the Unfortunate often have too long time allotted them, and the Fortunate too little) was by most of the Clergy and Nobility chosen King; only the City of London, with some of the Nobility there-abouts, elected Edmund, and furnish'd him with so good an Army, that through the couragious Brightness and Vigour of his Youth, (which is generally most fierce in the first Attempts) he had much the [b] better in three successive Battels, fought within three Months after he was made King; and had certainly gain'd a fourth at [c] Assdon or Essendon, had not the Disloyal Edric forsaken his Sovereign, and carry'd over his Party to the Enemy, who, in all probability, had receiv'd a deadly Blow without that assistance, and with it gain'd that fatal Victory, which prov'd the Conquest of England: For here Edmund lost the Flower of his Nobility, and best of his Soldiers, and among them Uchel the Heroick Earl of Essex; who being a Man of great Worth and Courage, stood up boldly in defence of his Country in the time of Swain, and gave proof that there were both Hope and Possibility of keeping out the Enemy, had not there wanted Union and Loyalty among them.

Edmund's single Combat with Canutus for the Kingdom, and their division of it.

From this Battel Edmund made his escape to Gloucester, to gather new Forces; and was not so utterly forsaken by the English (tho' London by the late Victory fell into the Enemy's hand) but that in a small time he gather'd another powerful Army, and resolv'd to try his Fortune once more with Canute, who was swollen with the great Thoughts of this Victory. Canutus, on the other side, as sollicitous to keep the advantage he had gotten, as he was lucky to get it, pursues after him, and overtakes him near the River Severn. Here, when both Armies were ready to joyn

Battel,

Battel, a Motion of Peace was made; or, in case that could not be accepted, a single Combat between the two Kings, to save Expence of Blood; for 'twas most just, that they who were to wear the Honour should decide the Quarrel, which was not likely to be ended, but with the utter extirpation of one of the Nations. A single Combat was consented to by both Kings; and in an Isle, surrounded by the Severn (now call'd Alney) in the sight of the Armies, did they fight for the Kingdom. The Combat was long and equal, but Edmund had the advantage both in Strength and Fortune; for he gave Canute a dangerous Wound, and much over-power'd him; which the Dane craftily concealing, made a proposition of Peace, and won Edmund to throw down his Arms, and come to this agreement, That they would live in perfect Love and Friendship one with another, and enjoy an [a] equal Division of the Kingdom: To confirm which Agreement, they not only mutually swore, but chang'd Cloaths and Arms, to shew the Unity of their Minds; as tho' Edmund were now become Canutus, and Canutus Edmund. A fatal and ignominious Exchange for so free and couragious a Prince, who not only made himself half a King by this Act, but expos'd himself to that Treachery of his Enemies, which he need not have fear'd from their strongest Armies. For in a few Days after this League, he was treacherously [b] slain at Oxford, some say by Duke Edrick, others by his Son, an Evil Egg of an Evil Bird; and so the Kingdom was wholly translated to Canutus; who, tho' he liked not Treason, nor approved of the Act of the Traitor, yet embraced willingly the Purchase of both. He reign'd scarce one whole Year, and left two Sons, Edward and Edmund, and one Daughter, Margaret, marry'd to Melcolm King of Scots.

Edmund Ironside and Canutus divide the Kingdom.

A. D. 1018. CANUTUS, the Son of Swain King of Denmark, having thus gotten the absolute Dominion of this Kingdom, govern'd it with greater Justice than he had obtain'd it; putting off his natural Roughness, and conforming to a more civil and smooth Conversation. And that the Nation might be sensible, that he resolv'd, now he was King of it, to study its advantage, he immediately [c] sent away his Navy, and dismissed his hired Soldiers to their own home, and cast himself wholly upon his People; believing, that his Kindness to his People would be a surer way for his Establishment, than the use of Force; which so pleased the Nobles, then assembled at London, that they consented to give him eighty three thousand Pounds in Silver to pay them off, and discharge them.

Canutus the Dane, King of England.

Canutus puts Edric to Death.

At his first Accession to the Crown, his Care was to rid himself as well of his false Friends, as of his avowed Enemies. Edric, who first came to salute him sole Monarch of England (as if he had told him, that he made him so) he order'd to be [d] beheaded, and his Head to be set upon the highest Pinnacle in the Tower of London; therein making good the Promise he gave him, when he brought him Edmund's Head, That he would advance his Head above all the Peers of the Kingdom. This just Punishment of Treason gave a wonderful Satisfaction to all the Nation, which rejoyced to see his Perfidiousness so well rewarded. After the same manner he, not long after, dealt with the two Earls, Turkill and Ericke, who being by him banish'd the Nation, and sent into Denmark, he caused to be Executed upon their arrival there.

His Cruelty to the Heirs of the English Crown.

But the Love of his People, and the good Opinion of Justice, which he had gotten by the former Actions, were again soon after lost by his Cruelty to the Royal Branches, Edmund and Edward the Sons, and [e] Edwin the Brother of King Edmund; whom in his Opinion being such Impediments to his Dignity, that his Crown could never sit fast, so long as they were alive, he sent to his Brother in Denmark to be murther'd: By which Privacy, tho' he thought to have escaped the Infamy of so foul a Fact at home, yet Suspicion alone soon raised him a general Odium among the People. But these young Princes met with kinder usage abroad, than they could have hoped for at home, under Canutus's jealous Eye; for their tender and innocent Years moved their intended Executioner to such Compassion, that he not only spar'd them himself, but convey'd them out of danger, by sending them to Solomon King of Hungary, to be educated in his Court; where afterwards Edward, who survived his Brother, was marry'd to Agatha, the Sister of that Queen, and Daughter to the Emperor Henry II. by whom he had two Sons, Edmund and Edgar, and as many Daughters, Margaret and Christian. Alfred and Edward, the Sons of King Ethelred by Emma, were preserved by Richard Duke of Normandy, their Uncle, and so were out of his reach.

Canutus's beneficial Acts to the Nation.

Canutus being thus rid of his Fears, tho', as he was sensible, with a little damage to his Reputation, set himself to recover his Honour again, by becoming a most eminent Benefactor to the Publick; and to that end employ'd all his Thoughts and Revenues to repair the Damages, which the Nation had suffer'd by the Wars, both in its Buildings and Laws. He erected several Churches and [f] Monasteries, and by his Patents endow'd them with plentiful Estates and Provisions, especially in or near those places, where he had obtain'd any signal Victories; that at once he might testifie his Devotion and Thankfulness to God. He made many [g] Ecclesiastical and Civil Laws, which he publish'd in the Language of that time: They are very full of pious Admonitions; which testifie not only the Piety as well as Justice of the King himself, but also that the best way in his opinion to have Laws observed, was to have them first approved in their Consciences. Among other things he inflicted [h] severe Punishment on all Intemperances of his People, and all Offences of ill

[f] He, by the advice of Emma his Queen, repair'd the old Monastery at Winchester, and adorn'd it with so much Gold, and Silver, and Jewels, that it was admir'd for the Riches of it. Particularly He is said to have given a Cross worth a Year's Revenue of the Crown. He built Bennit Abby in Norfolk, and St. Edmund's in Suffolk.

[g] These Laws, both Ecclesiastical and Civil, were not so much compos'd by him, as Edgar; but only were more firmly establish'd: They were the Saxon Laws, afterwards more fully enacted by Edward the Confessor, and from him call'd the Confessor's Laws; now for the more part extant in the Magna-Charta.

influence upon good Manners. Juſt he was in the higheſt degree, but not Cruel; few of his Laws being Sanguinary, according to the Cuſtom of thoſe Times, which, tho' rough and warlike, yet had a way of preſerving good Order in his Kingdom without the Effuſion of much Blood. For no Puniſhments were made capital, but treaſonable Conſpiracies; but all other Crimes were puniſh'd by Fines, Baniſhment, Slavery, or Impriſonment. One Example of his Clemency, among many, is worthy our notice. There was a Law then in force, That whoſoever had committed Theft, and the Goods were found in his Houſe, all his Family were made Slaves, even to the Child in the Cradle. This Law he abrogated, as moſt unjuſt; and enacted, Than only the Malefactor, and ſuch as aſſiſted him, ſhould ſuffer the Puniſhment; and that the Wife (unleſs the ſtollen Goods were found in her Cuſtody under Lock) ſhould not be guilty, or ſuffer for her Huſband's Offence. By theſe Laws, and other his good Actions, did this King ſo gain the Love and Affections of the People, that he made as abſolute a Conqueſt of their Hearts, as he had of their Country; and England thought it their Happineſs to be his People and Subjects. Nor did he ſuffer their Affections to cool, but increaſed them daily by many popular Actions; for he not only paid a ſingular Reverence and Honour to the Memory of the late King Edmund his Confederate, but ſeverely puniſh'd all thoſe that had any ſhare in murthering him. Then he marry'd the Wife of King Ethelred, Emma, (tho' his Bed was no great Honour to her, who had loſt her former Huſband by his Hands) by whoſe means he ſecured himſelf from any attempts of the Duke of Normandy for his Nephews, in regard that ſhe might have Iſſue by him, who by contract of Marriage were to ſucceed.

Canutus made King of Norway.

Scarce was this Monarch well eſtabliſh'd in his Kingdom over the Engliſh, but another offer'd it ſelf. The People of Norway contemning the weakneſs of their King, and conſpiring to depoſe him, broke out into Factions, and revolted. Canutus faſtens upon this opportunity, and partly by his great Strength, which he carry'd out of England, and partly by his Money and great Reputation, he ſo much prevail'd with the People as to chooſe him their King. And ſo he became the moſt Puiſſant and Renowned Prince in all theſe Parts of the World, being entitled, King of England, [a] Denmark and Norway. With his Power he enlarged his Magnificence, eſpecially towards the Church, which he ſought all Means to advance, either to appeaſe his own Conſcience, or ingratiate himſelf with his People; which at that time, being addicted to Religion, were much pleaſed with ſuch Acts of Devotion. And having enriched his Kingdom with many Acts of his pious Bounty, he undertakes a Journey to Rome to viſit the Sepulchres of St. Peter and St. Paul: All along the Way, he did [b] many Works of Charity, by freeing all Streights and Paſſages from Toll, which had uſually been exacted before of Travellers that paſſed that way. At Rome he gave many large Gifts to St. Peter's Church, and by his Mediation obtain'd, that the Saxon School, founded there by his Predeceſſors, Kings of England, ſhould be freed from all Impoſitions and Tributes for ever. What Entertainment he met at Rome from the Pope, Conradus the Emperor, and divers other Chriſtian Princes, he gives an account of to his Biſhops and Nobility, in a Letter written to them from thence; wherein he earneſtly exhorts them to take care in his abſence, that Juſtice be impartially adminiſter'd to all his Subjects, without any regard to his advantage or profit; for he would by no means have his Revenue enlarg'd by the Injuries of others. He alſo ſtraitly charges them, that the Dues which are owing either to the Church at home, or the See of Rome, be all paid, and diſcharg'd before his Return.

Thus did this great Prince, the mightieſt and moſt abſolute Monarch that ever yet had ſat on the Engliſh Throne, the Original of a new Line of Kings, and of a new Government, ſtrive to lay a good Foundation of a laſting Succeſſion in theſe Kingdoms, and by his good Deeds bring the Divine Favour upon his Poſterity. And who would have thought, but he might have been a Root of as long a Deſcent, as afterward the Norman was, having as numerous a Male-Iſſue, being better Belov'd, of greater Power and Virtues than he? But it was not in his Fate. He left ſeveral Sons, viz. Swain, Harold, Hardicanute; of which, tho two enter'd the Engliſh Succeſſion, yet they enjoy'd it but a little while: So that the Poſſeſſion, which Canutus had purchas'd at ſo great Expence of Blood and Labour, was loſt in a manner with him.

Canutus's Greatneſs, but want of Succeſſion.

HAROLD, the Son of Canutus, after his Father's Death, ſucceeded him in his Kingdom of England; being, as ſome ſay, made King by his Father's Appointment; but as others write, by the Election of the Daniſh Nobility in an Aſſembly at Oxford. Godwin, Earl of Kent, who was left Guardian (as he pretended) of the Queen and her Children, with moſt of the Engliſh Nobility, ſtood for Hardicanute the Son of Emma, or elſe Alfrid the Son of Ethelred, who is ſaid to have come out of Normandy upon the Death of Canutus to claim the Crown: But Harold, who had gotten Poſſeſſion of it, had ſo ſtrengthened himſelf againſt all Pretenders, that notwithſtanding this Oppoſition, he was proclaimed and [c] crowned King. The firſt act of his Reign was to ſeize the Treaſure of his Step-mother Queen Emma, whom he baniſhed out of his Realm; then he put out the Eyes of Alfrid her Son, who had been a Competitor with him for the Kingdom, and committed him to a loathſome Priſon, where he died. Earl Godwin is reported to have betrayed the young Prince into the King's hand. The Queen Emma fled to Baldwin Earl of Flanders, her Kinſman, where ſhe remained to the Death of Harold, who reigned but four Years; and then ſhe returned into England with her Son Hardicanute, who accidentally came out of Denmark to viſit her at Bruges [d]. Harold died without Children.

unnatural Revenge, in causing the Body of King Harold to be taken out of its Tomb, and having severed the Head from it, to be cast into the River Thames: Then he made a strict Enquiry after those who had been instrumental in the Death of Alfrid, his Brother by his Mother. Earl Godwin, and Livingus Bishop of Worcester, were accused of it. [Alfricus Arch-bishop of Canterbury] The Bishop was deprived of his See, but the Earl by a rich Present of a Ship of Gold, made his Protestations of Innocency to be easily credited by the King and the Nobility, among whom he had great Interest. The Bishop finding the Strength of Gold, by a Sum obtain'd his Bishoprick, and so that bloody Act was wholly imputed to the late King.

Not long after this, by the Instigation of Earl Godwin, he imposed a general Grievance on the whole Kingdom by a prodigal Gift, which he bestowed on his Fleet of Danes; ordering every Mariner to be paid eight Marks, and every Captain ten, which he raised upon the State; a Tax so heavy in those Days, that it caused a Tumult at Worcester, wherein [a] the Collectors were killed. Thus by his Vices and ill Actions, he was a Burthen to his Nation, and only an Ease by his short Reign; for he died in the second Year of his Reign at Lambeth, where he was celebrating a Marriage. He was thought to have been poison'd. With him ended the Government of the Danes in England (having continued twenty six Years only under the three last Kings) and so the Power, which no Force could withstand in England, expired of it self, and the Nation was left to chuse a King of their own, without Competition. There being one Son of Ethelred remaining alive, viz.

Edward the Son of Ethelred, crowned King of England.

EDWARD the CONFESSOR, the Son of Ethelred, by Emma his Queen, who by the provident Care of his Mother, was sent into Normandy to secure him from the Danish Force, was immediately sent for upon the Death of Hardicanute: And being [b] elected King by the general Consent of the Nation, was crowned at Winchester by Edsine Arch-bishop of Canterbury, An. 1042. being then about forty Years of Age. Godwin, Earl of Kent, was a Principal Agent in this Preferment: But for his own ends. The Kingdom (having dearly paid for the Admission of Strangers) made an Order, That he should not bring any Normans with him. The first publick Act he did, was, That he remitted the heavy Tribute called Danegelt, imposed by his Father, which amounted to 40000 l. a Year, and had been [c] paid for forty Years past. He caused a Body of the best, and most wholsome [d] Laws, to be collected out of those of the Mercians, West-Saxons, Danes, and Northumbrians, and to be written in Latin. He was indeed a Man very exemplary for his [e] Piety, but fit for no time, but those peaceable and quiet Times he lived in: For having been educated with the Nuns of Juniegas in Normandy, he scarce knew himself to be a Man, when he came into England, much less a King. And of this, some give us this notable Instance, That being very angry with a Country Fellow for disturbing his Game when he was a hunting; he said, I would punish thee were I able. And as if he had vowed Continency with the Nuns, with whom he was bred, he was so far from knowing other Women, that tho' he lived many Years in a formal Shew of Marriage with his Wife, yet after his Death she protested her self a Virgin.

Godwin marries his Daughter to the King.

The Easiness and Simplicity of the King was made a means of raising himself and Family to the highest pitch of Greatness by Earl Godwin; who first insinuating, that he was the chief Man that raised the King to his Crown, obtain'd that his Daughter should be accepted in Marriage by the King, by which the whole Nation in a manner came to be governed by the Earl. Syward, Earl of Northumberland, and Leofrick, Earl of Hereford, Men of Spirit and Greatness, took notice of his aspiring Ambition, and seeing him so much for himself, stood up the more for the King. This Emulation proved advantageous to the Nation; for as Godwin sought to greaten himself by the Conquest of Wales for the King; which his Son Harold, Earl of the West-Saxons, effected, by vanquishing the two Welsh Kings, Ris and Griffith; so Syward deprived Macbeth, the Scotish Usurper, of his Life and Crown, and restored Melcolm to his just Right. Robert, Arch-bishop of Canterbury, a Norman, much in Favour with the King, was also Godwin's Enemy: So that not only he missed of his present Designs, but thro' the Sagaciousness of his Enemies, his future Aims were discovered, which they made manifest to the King upon this Occasion.

A Disturbance at Dover.

Eustathius, Earl of Bullogne, who had married Goda the King's Sister, having been at Court to visit the King; and in his return again to France, his Harbinger, who was sent before to provide him and his Retinue Lodgings at Dover, behaving himself rudely and insultingly to a Citizen, was slain by him. The Earl after arriving with his Company, pursues the Person and slew him, with eighteen more. The City being alarm'd at this piece of Revenge, took Arms, and slew twenty two of the Earl's Servants: At this, the Earl hastens to the King, complains of the Citizens Rudeness, and so aggravates the Matter, that Earl Godwin was immediately commanded with a sufficient Force to go down to Dover, and chastise them for this Insolency. The Earl knowing, that this Sentence proceeded from the Information of one side only, advised the King first to send for some of the Chief of the Citizens to answer the Charge, and according to their Defence, to proceed. This wholsome Counsel was interpreted by his Enemies, as if the Earl favoured the King's Enemies, and designed to make himself popular: And they so far possess'd the King of it, that he began then to have a Suspicion of his Affection to him, and at length looked upon him as aiming at his Crown; wherefore not long after, the Earl was summoned to a Parliament at Gloucester, but neither he, nor any of his Sons would appear: But suspecting, that his Enemies had some ill Designs against him, he raised some Forces, [c] By all the Subjects of England, except the Clergy, who thro' the Piety of those Times were exempted from all Taxes, which since have been doubled upon them.

[d] These Laws are for the most part the common Laws of England, now in use; so called, because they are such Usages and Practices, as by long Experience have been found for the common Good of this Nation: Among these Laws he enacted, That no Person should be molested or troubled with any Law-suits upon certain Festivals: And that Criminals flying to the Church for Safety, should be protected and apprehended by none but the Bishop and his Ministers. With many other excellent Laws.

[e] His Piety was so acceptable to God, as well as remarkable among his Subjects, that God gave him a Power of healing Diseases miraculously; and from him it is, that the miraculous Gift of healing the Disease from thence called the King's-Evil, is derived to the Christian Kings of England, tho' common to the Kings of France with them, and by as good a Title.

under a Pretence of suppressing the Welsh, who at that time made no Disturbance. Whereupon the Parliament removed to London, and there summoned him again to appear, and dismissing his Forces to come to them, with twelve Men only, he returned them this Answer, That he should be content to dismiss his Forces, do any thing the King would command him, provided it were with Safety of his Life and Honour; but to attend upon them without a sufficient Guard, he was satisfied was for neither. The Parliament having received this Answer, knew no other way to rid themselves of him, but to command him to depart the Realm within five Days, which he did; and with his Sons Swain, Tosto, and Girth, sailed into Flanders, where Tosto married the Daughter of Earl Baldwin V. Harold his eldest Son fled into Ireland. The King puts away his Queen, that she might share in the Disgrace of her Family, and Misfortunes of her Kindred; tho' according to the Description which is given by the Writers of those Times of her, she was most undeserving of that Punishment: For they say, she was a Lady of great Worth and rare Parts, very learned and beautiful, and of as fair a Mind as Body. Earl Godwin, in his Exile (while the Normans and his Enemies had the King's Favour) fell to Piracy; disturbed and plundered the Coasts, and ventured up to London by the River: Where being so popular, that no Forces would oppose him, he was admitted to such a Peace as he would make; which being such, as if not directly, yet in the end would tend to the Ruine of the French and his other Enemies, they thought it their best Course to forsake the Court and Kingdom, but carried with them such a true Notion of the Kingdom's Weakness, thro' the Distractions of the People, and Factions of great Men, as a little after gave them Encouragement to attempt the Conquest of it.

Earl Godwin banished.

Earl Godwin being again restored to his Country, and in great Credit with the King, made use of his Interest and Authority to gratifie his own revengeful Temper, and injure others. Robert, Arch-bishop of Canterbury, and his Normans, he caused to be banished, and did many Acts of Injustice to the People; which did so blacken those peaceable Times, and disaffect the People to the King, that they accounted him among the worst of Governours, who tho' he did no ill himself, yet suffered his Authority to be abused by those that did. The Queen Emma had her share of Trouble in this Reign, suffering much both in her Estate and good Name, thro' Godwin's Hatred to her. Her grand Accusation was, That she had kept Company too familiarly with Alwyne, Bishop of Winchester, and by her scandalous Behaviour disgraced the Royal Line; for which she was deprived of her [a] Riches and Estate, and imprisoned. The Queen, to vindicate her Innocency, was contented to undergo the severe Tryal of [b] Fire-Ordeal (which was to pass blindfold with her bare Feet over nine Plow-shares, made red hot, and laid at even distance one by another) which she safely performed, and by it recovered her Fame and Honour with the King and Nobles of the Land, who were all Spectators of this miraculous Act: But Earl Godwin's [c] Death put an end to farther Trouble by his Means.

Edward having now reigned near twenty Years, and being pretty well advanced in Age, and being without Issue, began to think upon his [d] Succession, and to secure that in his own Line, sent for his Nephew, Edward called the Out-law, out of Hungary, with his Children. They lived some time in his Court; but Edward died before him, leaving only one Son. Edgar, surnamed Atheling, whom he had by his Wife Agatha, Daughter to the Emperor Henry II. who being very young and bred a Stranger, which are really no just Bar to Right, was neglected at the Death of his Uncle, the pious King Edward, which happened An. 1065. when he had reigned twenty four Years. His Body was interred in the Church of Westminster, which he had newly founded, and his Throne disposed out of his Line to Harold.

A. D. 1065.

HAROLD, the Son of Earl Godwin, the next Day after Edward's Death, was raised to the Regal Dignity, and made King; whether by any Title he derived from the Danish Kings, by his Mother, (who was the Sister of Swain, King of Denmark) or by mere Election of the Nobility, it is not easy to determine: But it seems, that the Circumstances of the Times were such, as necessarily required, that the Scepter should be put into the hands of such a Person as was best able to undergo the Burthen of War, and the other great Troubles the Nation was likely to fall into, thro' the [e] various Claims, then put in both by the Dane and Norman for the English Crown; and none could be fitter for it in such a Juncture than Harold, who was judged on all hands the most eminent Man of the Kingdom, both for his Deserts and great Alliance with the Nobility of this Kingdom, both by his own Pedigree and his Wife's; who was Algith, the Sister of Edwin and Morchar, the Earls of Yorkshire and Chester. Neither did he deceive the Expectations of the Nation in electing him; for he took the best Methods to govern the Kingdom well, and made such Provisions for the Safety of the Nation, as the most active and politick Prince could do: And had he had but a favourable Fortune, and faithful and courageous Subjects to second his brave Actions, the Attempts of the Enemies of the Kingdom had been in vain; but the approaching Danger so terrified the Nation, that the Terrour robbed them at once of their Courage and Diligence.

Harold Son of Earl Godwin made King of England.

The first that gave his Reign any Disturbance was his own Brother Tosto; who in the time of King Edward, being entrusted with the Government of Northumberland, behaved himself with such Pride and Cruelty to the People, that he was banished the Kingdom. Being in Normandy, when his Brother obtain'd the Crown of England, with William Duke of that Country, whose Wife's

[a] It is said, that Edward as soon as he came to the Throne, depriv'd Emma of all her Estate; only ordering her a necessary Maintenance, for her Cruelty to him in his Adversity, in denying him whatever he asked of her.

[b] The Sentence in such Cases was, That the Person guilty was to walk with the whole Weight of her Body and bare Feet upon the nine Plow-shares red hot, and if she were not burnt she was judged innocent; if she were, she suffer'd farther Punishment: And this was the Sentence pronounc'd upon the Queen, and Tryal she went through, though this Historian seems to understand it otherwise.

[c] It is said, That Earl Godwin's Death was thus: Being at a Banquet with the King, he suspected by some Reflection the King made on him, that he thought him guilty of the Death of his Brother Alfred; and to clear himself of it, he wished that the next Morsel might choak him if he was any Cause of it. The King, we are told, blessed the Morsel, and he eating was choaked.

[d] This makes the Story, that Edward gave the Crown to William Duke of Normandy, very improbable.

Bayerische Staatsbibliothek München BIBLIOTECA REGIA MONACENSIS

Sister he had marry'd, he was easily instigated through Hatred to his Brother to invade England; and being furnished with a Fleet and Men, he first assaults the Isle of Wight, and then fell upon the Coasts of Kent, where he plunder'd some of the Inhabitants, but was soon driven off by the King's Navy: Whereupon he withdrew from thence into the North parts, and attempting to land, was so warmly received by Morcar and Edwin, the Earls of Yorkshire and Chester, that they forced him to fly, tho' with loss to themselves. Tosto seeing all his endeavours in vain, and being unwilling to return to Normandy with nothing but ill News, repairs to the King of Scots, to beg his Assistance, but received a Denial; by which he was reduced almost to Despair. In his return he met with Harold, surnamed [a] Harfager, King of Norway, who having conquer'd the Orcades, was coming with three hundred Ships to invade England, to whom Tosto joyn'd himself, and encourag'd the Attempt. They landed at Tinmouth, and breaking through the faint Opposition they met with in those parts, which were unprovided to encounter an Enemy, march'd into the heart of the Country without any loss[b]. Near Stamford, Harold met them with a strong Army, and after a long and eager Battel obtain'd a remarkable Victory; slaying, besides the two Captains, Harfager and Tosto, the greatest part and worthiest Men of their Army.

The Duke of Normandy invades England, and conquers it.

William, Duke of Normandy, not discourag'd by the Misfortune of Tosto, was resolved not to give over his Claim of the Crown of England, which he [c] pretended was given him by the last Will of King Edward his Kinsman; and therefore, notwithstanding this ill success, provided a great Navy, and strong Army, to make a second Attempt. He landed at Pemsey, not far from Hastings, in Sussex. Harold remained yet in the North; but upon the News of William's arrival, hasted with all the Forces he had into the South. At London he met with a Messenger from William, who came to demand his Kingdom. Harold could scarcely hear the Message with patience; but checking his Passion, he charged him to depart out of his Country: And immediately mustering his Army near London, he march'd against the Invader. About seven Miles from Hastings was the Controversie decided between Harold and his Competitor, William Duke of Normandy; upon whom, tho' Fortune cast the Victory, yet never Battel was more bravely fought on the part of the English; who, rather than fall under the Slavery of the Normans, dy'd 69074 upon the Spot, few or none escaping. Strange it is indeed, that so great a Kingdom, as England was at that time, should at one Blow, by so small a Nation as the Normans were, be quite subdu'd, so that it could never make any considerable Resistance against the Conqueror. But the Causes and Reasons are very apparent to any that consider the Circumstances of Things, and Nature of the People: For besides the Divisions that were among the Nobility at that very instant, when Danger was so near them, that nothing but the closest Union could save them, the People of the Nation in general, by living long secure from any Enemy in peaceable Times, were grown unexperienced and negligent in Arms, and generally render'd weak and effeminate by Luxury and Idleness; the Clergy grown Licentious and Illiterate; the Nobility given to Gluttonny, Whoredom and Oppression; the Commonalty addicted to Drunkenness and Disorder. And 'tis said, that in the last Action of Harold at Stamford, he lost his bravest Men; and the rest were discontented, because Harold retained the [d] Spoil to himself: So that he came to this Battel with many raw undisciplin'd Soldiers, and a discontented Army, which was an occasion of this lamentable Loss. Besides, the Normans had a peculiar way of Fighting with long Bows, with which the English being wholly unacquainted, were chiefly overthrown. And yet their own Writers report, how that the main Body of the English Army (consisting of Bills, their chief and ancient Weapon) held so close together in one Body, that no Force could dissolve them, till the Normans (making a shew of Flight) drew them into Disorder, and so got the Day.

Causes of the Norman Conquest.

The Body of Harold being obtain'd of the Conqueror, by the Request of his Mother, who sent two [e] Monks of Waltham-Abby to beg it of him [f], was after much search found among the Heaps of dead Bodies, and bury'd in the same Abby which he had himself built. He was a very unfortunate Prince; his Reign was full of Miseries and Troubles; he Ruled but little, but lost all. He left four Sons, Godwin, Edmund, Magnus, and Wolfe. The two Eldest fled away after this Battel into Ireland, and from thence made some Attempts upon the Western Coasts of England, but to little purpose. With this King ended the Saxon Line, after it had been in England five hundred Years, from the first coming of Hengist, and his Settlement here. And from the Commencement of the Norman Race do I intend to begin my History.

[a] Harold Harfager claim'd the Crown of England as his Right by Canutus. He is said to have been slain by Harold's own hand.

[b] Harold's Army being to pass over a Bridge, to encounter his Enemies, one Norwegian kept the Bridge a considerable while against his whole Army, and slew forty Men before they could get free passage over it.

[c] That it was but a meer Pretence, appears from the most serious words which he spake upon his Death-Bed, concerning his Right to the English Crown: 'Twas not an Hereditary Right that put me in Possession of this Honour; but by a desperate Engagement, and much Bloodshed, I wrested it from the Perjur'd King, Harold; and having slain, or put to flight all his Abettors, made my self Master of it.

[d] It seems, it was the Custom of the English in their Wars to give the most considerable and valuable part of their Booty to their Captains, and leave the rest to their Soldiers; which Harold, through Covetousness, or perhaps Necessity, at that time seizing upon, gave a Discontent to his Soldiers, when he had most use of them.

[e] They are said to be Osegod and Ailricke.

[f] She offer'd him its weight in Gold for the Body, which Duke William refus'd.

KING WILLIAM the CONQUEROUR

THE LIFE and REIGN OF WILLIAM I.

A. D. 1066.

The State of England by the Norman Conquest.

BY the Conquest of England by William Duke of Normandy, there was so great a Change made of the ancient Laws, Customs, Language, Writing, Forms of Battels, Buildings, yea every thing but [a] Religion; that there cannot be a fitter Period of History, than to begin with his Entrance upon the Government: For with a new Race of Kings, England put on a new Face of Affairs, and was so much changed, as if it had been metamorphiz'd into another Kingdom. It grew more victorious abroad, and refin'd at home. The Danes indeed united it under one Form of Government, and made it the most terrible of all the Kingdoms of the North: For whereas before, for five Hundred Years, it was busied at home in civil Wars and Factions. Canutus, by his Mildness, brought it to submit to him as their Head; and employing their victorious Arms abroad, brought the Kingdom of Norway into Subjection to him: But the Normans coming upon them, enlarged their Dominions beyond the Seas, and added the goodly Provinces of the South † to their Command. Nor did they less improve things at home; for they brought in greater Civility into common Converse, antiquated their old Custom of intemperate drinking, and instead of their Roughness and Excesses, implanted Temperance and a generous Desire of Reputation and Honour. Now the English began to dispise their little homely Cottages, and to build themselves stately Houses, magnificent Churches and Monasteries, to provide neat and good Furniture, and to erect Castles and Towers after the Norman Fashion. They no longer hunt in common, as they did before, but they inclosed Parks for their private Pleasures: And in fine, they took up all the Norman Fashions and Habits; and tho' there was a greater Mixture of many Nations, than ever before, yet they all so eagerly complied with the Norman way of living, either thro' Fear or Novelty, that they immediately seemed but one. The Saxon Language in the general still remained; but was soon mixed so much with the French (all the Terms of Building, Hunting, Handicrafts, Cloathing, and War, with the Names of all such Instruments and Weapons as were used in them, being wholly in that Language, and the Character of the Letters alted to the Roman and French) that the Tongue seemed quite changed, and exactly conformed to the new Scheme of things, and is now hardly to be known. But that we may know both the Man and the Nation which subdued us, I will look back a little upon the Original of both, and give you this Account of them.

The Norman Manner and Fashions imitated by the English.

An Account of the Original of the Normans.

The [b] Normans were a People which came out of Norway and Denmark, and consequently of the same Manners and Fashions with those Northern Countries: Which thro' their promiscuous Use of Venery, without any ties of lawful Marriage, produced such great Abundance of People, that they were forced frequently to arm out great Numbers of them to seek themselves such Habitations as they could by War and Violence obtain. Such a Colony was sent out in the time of King Alfred, under the Command of one Rollo, or Roul, a great Captain among them. These Adventurers having left their own Country, first landed in England (which always lay open to Invaders) and hoped to have found good Entertainment there: But contrary to their Expectation, meeting with fierce Opposition, they were content to leave them with a small Booty of Cattel, which they had got from them, and use their Forces another way. From hence Rollo sailed against Rambalt, Duke of Friesland, and Reignier, Duke of Chaumont and Hainalt, with whom he had many sharp Contests, and did much Mischief in their Country; but not being able to gain a Place of Settlement, he passed along the Coast of France, and entring the Mouth of the River Seine, ravaged the Country up as high as Roven; where the People having not long before been miserably afflicted by Hasting, or Hading (another of these Danish Invaders) were extreamly affrighted at the Approach of a new Army: Insomuch, that the Arch-bishop of Roven, by the Instigation of the People, offered him the Obedience of that City, and the adjoyning Country thereabout, upon condition that he would defend them, and administer Justice according to the Laws of Christ, and Customs of the Country: For Charles the Simple, who was then King of France, not being able to protect them against this Invasion, because his Forces were employed

[a] Yet our Historians say, That some Novelties in Religion came into the English Church by this Conquest; for the English before, had the Scriptures read in their Churches in a known Tongue, preferr'd the Original Hebrew before the Latin Version; had no Prayers for the dead, or for the Pardon of Sins, or the Relaxation of the Pains of such as were thought to be in Purgatory, which they believ'd not; worshipp'd not Saints, tho' they had an honourable Memory of them; had the Communion in both Kinds; the contrary to which Doctrines crept in by the Norman Conquest.

[b] North-men, being the Flower of the Swedes, Danes and Norwegians, Northern Nations. These People infested the Coasts of England, France, Ireland, and Holland, with Piracies so much in the Times of Charles the Great, that it was made a Petition in the Publick Litanies to deliver them from the Normans. From the Rage of the Normans, Good Lord, deliver us.

againſt the Enemies of his Crown, was obliged to ſuffer them to ſettle in that Place; and in a ſhort time, he grew ſo powerful, that he attempted the Conqueſt of Paris it ſelf, and notably foil'd the French Captains in ſeveral Skirmiſhes: So that Charles was forced to come to an Agreement with him, and yield up the whole Country of Neuſtria to him, which from the Normans was called Normandy. Rollo being thus gotten into the peaceable Poſſeſſion of a Dukedom for himſelf, and a convenient Habitation for his Normans; began to eſtabliſh Laws, and ſettle ſo well a formed Government, that he made his Name ever after in great Honour and Reverence among his People, and laid a Foundation of a firm Succeſſion for his Poſterity. Not long after he had thus ſet things in order, he was converted to Chriſtianity; and being baptized, received the Name of Robert from his God-father Robert, Brother of Eudes, late King of France, who then was a Competitor with Charles for the Crown; who is ſaid to have aſſiſted Rollo underhand in his Attempts upon France, tho' afterward he alledged it as a Crime againſt Charles, that he had given away his Country, and favoured Strangers. From Rollo deſcended ſix Dukes of Normandy in a direct Line, who reigned an hundred and twenty Years, viz. William I. Richard I. Richard II. who had two Sons Richard and Robert, who ruled ſucceſſively.

The Norman Dukes in their Succeſſion.

Robert, the laſt of them, having ruled eight Years, either out of Devotion, or to expiate ſome [a] ſecret Sin, which lay heavy upon his Conſcience, took up a Reſolution to viſit the Holy Sepulchre: And that he might ſet all things in order for his Departure, aſſembled all his Nobility to acquaint them with it. They diſſuaded him much from it, not only becauſe he had no Children; but becauſe Alain, Earl of Britain, and the Earl of Burgundy, were already in Conteſt about the Succeſſion to his Dutchy: So that upon his Death or Departure, their Country was like to become a Seat of War, and a Prey to Ambition, which they thought he was bound in Conſcience by all means he could to prevent. The Duke not at all removed from his Intention, deſired them to reſt contented; telling them, 'That 'he had a Son, which tho' not begot in lawful 'Marriage, he did not doubt but he was his own 'Child, and that he would inveſt him in his 'Dutchy, as his Heir before he left them; and 'deſired, that they would acknowledge him 'ſuch, and ſubmit to him as their Prince. The 'Earl of Britain, (ſaith he) notwithſtanding his 'Competition for my Throne, yet ſuch is my 'Confidence in him, I will make him his Go'vernour, and Preſident of Normandy, and the 'King of France his Guardian; and ſo I will 'leave him to God and your Loyalty. Soon after the Biſhops and Barons did their Homage to the young Prince, named William, who was the ſixth Duke of Normandy after Rollo, being begotten by Duke Robert on Arlet, a beautiful Virgin, but of mean Degree, in the City of Falaiſe. After this, the Duke delivering the Child to Henry the Firſt, King of France, with his own hand, and cauſing him to do him Homage for his Dutchy, committed him to his Royal Faith, and ſo enter'd upon his intended Journey; at the end of which, as ſoon almoſt as he came, he died [b]. William, his Son and Succeſſor, being thus left at nine Years old, became ſubject to all the Afflictions and Calamities of Minors, the Nobles of Normandy fell into great Factions and Quarrels; which while the chief Officers thought to allay by his Preſence (having obtain'd him by much Entreaty from the King of France) they increaſed. For preſently upon his coming among them, there followed the murthering and poiſoning of their Governours, Intruſions into Offices, ſupplanting and ſurprizing his Perſon, by the Nobility, who were proud and haughty, not able to endure the Precedency and Greatneſs one of another.

William made Duke of Normandy.

But theſe Troubles about his Perſon, were far leſs than ſeveral others, which he was forced to encounter in the Defence of his Right to the Succeſſion; which being ſtained with his illegitimate Blood and Birth, render'd him obnoxious to the Conteſts which better Claims might commence. And of theſe, the firſt that appeared againſt him was Roger de Freſney, a Perſon of great Worth and much Experience in Military Affairs, having been a Captain in the Wars againſt the Saracens in Spain: He brought a fair Pedigree from Rollo, to juſtifie his Claim to the Dutchy, and by feaſting the Nobility of the Normans, got a great Intereſt among them. Hereupon he begins to urge it to them, That it was a great Wrong and Injury to the Poſterity of Rollo, who had gotten the Dukedom by his Valour and Courage, to have a Baſtard to be preferred before him, who was a Legitimate Deſcendant from him; and no leſs Diſgrace to ſo brave a People as the Normans were, to ſuffer themſelves to be ſo govern'd; eſpecially ſince they had others, who in a direct Line were come from their former Dukes, Rollo, William, and Richard, and no leſs worthy of that Dignity, than their preſent Prince. By theſe means he had got a conſiderable Party, and being impatient of delay, brought his Claim ſoon to be decided in a Field Battel. Roger de Beaumont headed the young Prince's Forces againſt this Competitor, and by his Conduct gained ſo compleat a Victory, that all Fear from him was utterly extinguiſhed; himſelf, two Brethren, and the greateſt part of his Army being ſlain. This Action ſo advanced the Reputation of the Duke, that the King of France began to be jealous of his riſing Power; and therefore (contrary to his Truſt repoſed in him by Robert) he firſt takes from him the Caſtle of Thuilliers and demoliſhed it; pretending ſome Wrongs and Injuries to be done by the Garriſon that lay there to his Subjects, and then openly aſſiſted his Baſe-born Uncle, William Earl of Arques, againſt him; lending him a powerful Army to vindicate his Claim to the Dukedom, tho' he came off in it with as great a Loſs as Diſhonour. For Count Guiffard, the Duke's General, drew the French into ſuch an Ambuſh by a Stratagem, that he deſtroyed the whole Army, and left but few to relate their Misfortune at Paris, to the great Grief of that King; and Arques being conquer'd by the young Duke, not yet ſeventeen Years old, fled to ſeek his Fortune with Euſtace Earl of Bullogne, where he found but cold Entertainment, Favour generally changing with Mens Fortune, and few regarding Men overthrown. Theſe Enemies being ſubdued, a greater Danger ſucceeds by a private Conſpiracy. There lived with Duke William a young Lord of his own Age, named Guy Son of Regnault Earl of Burgogne, and Alix Daughter to Richard II. Duke of Normandy; who being ſenſible of his Title to the Dukedom, was perſuaded by ſome ſtirring Spirits to endeavour to obtain

Several Competitors with William, for the Dukedom of Normandy.

[a] He is ſaid to have poiſon'd his Brother Richard, and tho' he had a Natural Affection for his illegitimate Son William, yet 'tis not improbable; but that his Sin, which he committed in begetting him on Arlet the Daughter of a Skinner of Falaiſe, might trouble his Conſcience; and to expiate for theſe Sins, he reſolv'd upon this Pilgrimage, a thing much us'd in his time.

it, which they told him was by right his, and uſurped by the Baſtard. Theſe Admonitions kindled the young Man's Ambition, which to gratifie he had a now lucky Opportunity; for having lately compoſed a Quarrel between two of the greateſt Lords of Normandy, Viſcount Neel and the Earl of Beſſin, with much Prudence and Caution he had gain'd the Love and Friendſhip of both Parties, with ſome Diſguſt to Duke William, who ſeemed to diſdain them by not taking notice of it. Theſe he eaſily brought to joyn with him in a Conſpiracy to murther the Duke ſuddenly, and by Surprize; which probably they had done, had they not been diſcovered by a Fool, who not being excluded their Conſultations, becauſe he was thought not to have Wit enough to take notice of it, went at Midnight to diſcover the Plot to Duke William; who obſerving the Fright the Fool was in, and conſidering what Prudence it was to avoid Dangers in the leaſt ſuſpected, immediately took Horſe and fled to Falaiſe. The Conſpirators not diſcouraged, tho' they were a little diſappointed, purſue him; and tho' they could not overtake him, yet they raiſed ſo ſtrong a Faction of all ſorts of People, that he was forced to leave his own Dominions, and fly to the King of France to beg his Aid and Aſſiſtance againſt them. His Requeſt was not eaſily obtained, becauſe that King was afraid of his growing Greatneſs; but the Duke putting him in mind of the faithful Services his Father had done him; That he himſelf was his Homager, and held his Crown under him, and could fly to none ſo properly as him for help againſt his mutinous Nobility; That this Rebellion, if not repreſſed, would be of dangerous Conſequence to his own Kingdom, with many other Arguments to ſhew the Importance and Neceſſity of a Relief, ſo prevailed with the King, that he was contented to go in Perſon with a powerful Army againſt the Conſpirators, whom they found in the Valley of Dunes, ready to encounter them; and ſo there began a Battel with equal Reſolution on both ſides. In this Fight one Guilleſon, Uncle to Viſcount Neel by his Mother, forced his Horſe into the Battallion of French, and ſtruck the King from his Horſe with his Lance; and tho' he himſelf was diſmounted by Count St. Paul, and his Horſe ſlain by Caſtillon, who came to reſcue the King from the Danger he was in; yet he made his Eſcape out of the Preſs, and fled into Apulia, with divers others. The King being incenſed with this Blow, ſpared not to avenge himſelf on his Enemies, and Duke William was not inferiour to him in any daring Attempt. The Victory was a long time wavering; till Ralf de Teſſon, to gain the Duke's Favour, betrayed the Army of the Conſpirators, and ſo they were conquer'd. Divers of them, whoſe Hearts were too great to yield, fled over the Mountains into Italy to Robert Guiſcard, their Country-man, who of a private Gentleman, became Supreme Lord of Apulia, Calabria, and Sicily; and had he lived, was in a fair way to have been Emperor of Conſtantinople; but dying left his Dominion in Italy to Roger his ſecond Son, Beaumont his eldeſt being then engaged in the Holy Wars, where he became Prince of Antioch. To this Guiſcard theſe rebellious Normans were very welcome, and none more than Guilleſon, for the late deſperate Attempt he made upon the French King; becauſe as he ſought to increaſe his Army by entertaining them, ſo he was moſt pleaſed with the braveſt Men. Guy de Burgogne having eſcaped the Fight, fortified his Caſtles of Briorn and Vernouille, but in the end was forced to ſurrender them and himſelf to the Duke's Mercy; who dealt ſo favourably with him in ſparing his Life, and allowing him a Penſion, that many others ſubmitted themſelves to him, and thereby ſecured their Lordſhips and Eſtates, but he demoliſhed their Caſtles to ſecure their Obedience.

William annoy'd by foreign Enemies.

William having thus ſettled his own Dominions in Peace, had but little Enjoyment of it before a foreign Enemy gave him a Diſquiet. Jeoffrey Martel Earl of Anjou, making War upon the People of Poictou, encroached upon the Neighbouring States; and among others ſeized upon Alenzon, Dampfront, and Paiſſais, Cities belonging to the Dutchy of Normandy. William, who was always for getting and never for loſing, immediately leavies an Army, and firſt recovers Alenzon, where (becauſe the beſieged ſcornfully reproached him for his Mother and Place of Nativity; crying out, when they ſaw him, La Pel, La Pel, i. e. a Skin, a Skin, in reference to the Skinners of Falaiſe, of whom his Mother's Father was one) he uſed them with great Cruelty: Then he laid ſiege to Dampfront, and hearing that Count Martel was coming with great Forces to relieve it, he ſent Roger de Montgomery, with two other Knights, with this Meſſage to the Earl; That if he came to victual Dampfront, he ſhould find him Porter to keep him out. Whereunto the Duke returned this Anſwer; Tell the Duke, to morrow by break of Day, he ſhall have me there on a White Horſe ready to give him Battel, and will enter Dampfront, if I can; and that he may know me, I ſhall have a Shield of Or, without any Device. Roger replies, Sir, You may ſpare the pains; the Duke will be here ready to meet you on a Bay Horſe, with a Streamer of Taffata on the top of his Lance to wipe your Face: And then they parted. The Earl made all the Preparations for next day he could; and in the Morning, as he was ordering his Army for Battel, News was brought him that Dampfront was taken: Upon which he immediately departs, and in his Paſſage homeward, was in a narrow Streight ſet upon by Viſcount Neel, and great part of his Army cut off; by which good Service that Earl regained the Duke's Favour, and kept it ever after. Dampfront being taken, the Duke with his Engines and Forces removed to Hambriers, a Frontier Town of Count Martel's, and by the way (had he not diſcovered it himſelf) had been utterly deſtroyed by an Ambuſh, which coſt him a great many brave Men to get himſelf free of; at which he was ſo enraged, that he ruſhed himſelf into the midſt of his Enemies, and making at Count Martel, beat him down with a Blow of his Sword, clave his Helmet in ſunder, and cut off one of his Ears, and yet eſcaped out of the Preſs; and in the iſſue utterly defeated the Anjovins. While he was thus buſied againſt his Enemies abroad, another Conſpiracy was formed againſt him at home, by William Guelan Earl of Mortaigne, who was deſcended from Richard the Second, and William Earl of Eu and Montreul, a Branch from the Family of William, Brother of the ſaid Richard, and Eſſelin, Counteſs of Montreul. The firſt was only vehemently ſuſpected, the other was proved guilty; and being baniſhed, his Eſtate was ſeized, his Earldom of Mortaigne was given to Robert, and that of Eu to Odo (after Biſhop of Bayeux) both his [a] Brethren by his Mother. These Assaults from abroad, these Scorns and Conspiracies at home, he pass'd through before he was two and twenty Years of Age; and thus his Enemies made him, whom they sought to undo. And now, having dispers'd all outward and visible signs of Enmity both at home and abroad, he dare not promise himself Safety; but to secure himself, and strengthen his Kingdom against all ill Practices for the future, he summon'd a Parliament of Prelates, Barons, and Gentlemen, and caused them to take an Oath of Allegiance to him, and raze their Castles; which done, he marry'd Mathilda, Daughter of Baldwin V. Earl of Flanders; yet not without some ensuing trouble. For his Uncle Mauger, Archbishop of Roan, excommunicated him for marrying within the degrees of Consanguinity, which were forbidden by the Church, Mathilda being the Daughter of Eleanor, his Father's Sister: To expiate for which Offence, by a Dispensation from Pope Victor, he was enjoyn'd to build an Hospital for blind People, and two Abbies, one for Men, and the other for Women; which he did at Caen in Normandy.

Duke William's Marriage.

The success which William had against his Enemies on all sides, made him so formidable to the neighbouring Princes, that France it self began to be very jealous of his growing Power; and having naturally no Love for the Normans (whom in scorn they call'd Trewans) incited their King, who himself was forward enough to repress a Person grown so much more powerful than the other Princes of his Dominions, to find out some pretence of Quarrel with him. This was an easie matter to do, where their Dominions had so near Confines; and therefore in the first place he accuses him of having done many Wrongs and Injuries to his Subjects bordering on his Dukedom; and particularly, he resented his late oppressing of Count Martel: And that his Cause might look the more plausible, he alledged, "That it con" cerned him in Honour and Justice to have that " Province, which held of his Crown, to be go-
" vern'd by a Prince of lawful Blood, according " to the Christian Doctrine, and Laws Ecclesia" stical; and therefore resolved to depose Duke
" William, and settle a Legitimate Prince. Hereupon he raised two powerful Armies, gather'd from all parts of his Kingdom, and sent them against him; the one by the River Sein, and the other by the Country of Bessin; that his Dukedom being encompassed on all sides, he might not possibly escape. The Duke in the mean time was not unmindful of his own defence against so Potent an Enemy, and having gather'd a good Army, divided it into two parts; with the one he sent out his Brother Odo Earl of Eu, Walter Guifford Earl of Longuevile, and others, into the Country of Caux; and with the other part he went himself towards Eureux, intending to oppose the King of France, who was at Mante. The Cattel, and all other portable Provisions, he caused to be removed out of the flat Country into the Cities and Castles, not only to furnish themselves, but incommode the Enemy. The French Army march'd on towards them from Beauvais to Mortimer, where, finding the Country stor'd with all manner of Provisions, they staid that Night, and feasted themselves with plenty of Good Cheer; thinking that the Norman Army was with their Duke at Eureux. Otho, who commanded the Army in Caux, having intelligence of the French Army's Dissoluteness and Security, made use of that opportunity to oppress them; and marching all the Night, fell upon them about break of Day with that suddenness and fury, that they slew near three parts of them, being in all forty thousand, took many Prisoners, and among them several Persons of Note, and put the rest to flight, leaving their Horses and Baggage to the Normans. This Defeat caused the King to return home in Anger and Rage; but upon cooler Thoughts, he desisted from Revenge: And upon the delivery of the captiv'd French, agreed to a Peace with the Duke, and restor'd to him the Castle of Thuilliers, which in his Minority he had taken from him. Count Martel, tho' very much disheartned by the loss of the French Army, yet did not desist from making some Attempts to recover the Towns the Duke had taken from him; but found that it was to no purpose without a greater Army than he had, or could raise, the Normans being so powerful. Wherefore the next Spring, he went to importune the King of France to assist him against the Duke, telling him, That the Normans were grown so insolent by the Victory they had stollen, not gotten fairly of the French, that there was no living by them; that they made the French ever since the Subject of their Sports and Songs, as if the King of France, through the loss of a few Men, was quite retired, and had rather stick to a dishonourable Peace, than appear again in the Field against them. These Importunities, and the Relation of the Abuses and Reproaches of the Normans, so prevailed with the French King, that he raised another Army, much bigger than the former, in which were three Dukes, and twelve Earls; and notwithstanding he had so lately made a solemn Peace with the Duke, and confirm'd it with an Oath, yet he enter'd Normandy in Harvest-time, over-ran and ravag'd all the Country along the Coast to Bessin; from whence he march'd to Bayeux and Caen, designing to pass the River Dive at Verneville, and destroy the Countries of Auge, Lysieux, and Roumois, as far as Rouen. Coming to the River, he found the Causway leading to it long, and the Bridge narrow; and therefore, that he might get over safely, he sent over his Van-guard first, and to secure his Rear-guard, commanded by the Duke of Berry, he himself stays behind at Caen, till his People and their Carriages were pass'd over. Duke William all this while was employ'd in fortifying and victualling his Towns, and particularly of Falaise, where he himself intended to reside. He had no Army in the Field, but a Running Camp, which he kept ready to take all Advantages. He was sensible of the Calamities of his People by the French, but had not Strength to oppose them, till he had some advantageous Offer, which he was resolv'd not to neglect. And long it was not before he had one: Being inform'd of the Passage of the French Army over the Bridge on the Dive, wherefore marching all Night with ten thousand Men, in the Morning early he set upon the Rear-guard with so sudden a cry and fury, that they who were on the Causway hearing the Noise behind, thrust their Fellows forward to get over the Bridge, with so great a crowd and noise, that they broke it, and many were drowned in the River. They who were gotten over could not return to help the rest; nor the King, by reason of the Marshes on both sides, yield any Succours to his People, but was forced with Grief to behold the miserable Slaughter and Captivity of his People; among whom six Earls were taken, of which the banish'd Earl of Eu was one, who having gotten into the King's Favour, was created by him Count de Soissons. This ill success stuck so close to the French King's Heart, that he dy'd not long after with Grief; which render'd Duke William so formidable, that tho' many had Will, yet none had Courage to disturb his Peace for a long time after; which brought great Prosperity to Normandy.

Duke William's Actions in Peace.

Duke William enjoying Peace was not leſs active than he was in War, tho' in Works of a better nature: For now he employ'd his time in ordering his State and Government, and adorning his Country with ſumptuous and beautiful Buildings, erecting Churches and Monaſteries, and endowing them with large Eſtates. He had before built two Monaſteries at Caen, and now in theſe peaceable times he gather'd Reliques from all parts to furniſh them with, and built himſelf and Wife a Tomb in them. He alſo frequently feaſted his Nobility, and thoſe of them that he obſerved to be Men of Worth, and able to ſerve the State well, he preferr'd and rewarded; by which means he gained the Love and Affections of his Nobility, and People ſo generally, that they were all entirely his, and ready to do any thing he could command or deſire. In this ſerene part of his Life and Reign he made a Journey into England, to viſit [a] his Kinſman, King Edward, who in Conſideration of his Preſervation and Education in Normandy by Richard the Second (Grandfather to them both) gave him moſt Noble and Royal Entertainment. At this interview he ſhewed himſelf to the Engliſh, and without doubt took himſelf a ſharp aſpect of the State and Affairs of England: To be ſure ſo much was done by the King, or Harold in his Name, at this meeting, as gave the Duke ground to [b] claim the Kingdom by the Donation of Edward, after his Death: What it was, could not be found out exactly. It is certain, that Harold going into Normandy did make ſome Promiſes to the Duke, and confirm'd them with an Oath upon the Evangeliſts and the ſacred Reliques at Roven; and thereupon Adeliza, the Duke's Daughter, was affianced or betrothed to him, and Welnot his Brother left as a Pledge for the Performance: Which ſhews the matter was of great Importance, and perhaps might be concerning the Kingdom; but it was never pretended otherwiſe to be made over to him but by Will; and therefore theſe Promiſes of Harold's are thought only to aſſure him of his aſſiſtance in gaining the Kingdom. But, however this be, it is againſt the Law and Cuſtom of the Nation to diſpoſe of the Kingly Power by Will; and therefore, if any ſuch thing were, it was of no Validity. For the Crown of England is held not by a Paternal Right, but by the Law of the Realm, which allows no power of diſpoſing the Throne to its Kings, but admits the next lineal Heir to the Poſſeſſion of it: For every Succeſſor is not ſaid properly to be Heir of the King, but of the Kingdom, which makes him ſo, and can't be depriv'd by any Act of his Predeceſſor. Nor indeed did William afterward eſtabliſh his Right upon King Edward's Will, but ſet up that Pretence only to make way for his Arms, by which he intended to compaſs his deſires. As ſoon therefore as he heard of the Death of King Edward, and that Harold was choſen and crowned King, "he call'd together the States of "Normandy, and acquaints them with the Right "he had to the Crown of England; and ſollicited "them to contribute their utmoſt aſſiſtance for "the recovery of it, and the depoſition of [c] Ha-"rold, the perjur'd Uſurper of it. And to encourage them in the Attempt, he repreſented "to them how great probability there was of "ſucceſs; he had a numerous Party in the Nation "for him already; the People were under great "Diſtractions and Diviſions, which made them "weak and eaſie to be overcome, as he was in-"form'd by ſure Intelligence: And what Honour, "Wealth, and Greatneſs would it add to their Na-"tion, to be Maſters of ſuch a rich Kingdom as "England was, which they had now an opportu-"nity put into their hands to be, if they had but "that Wiſdom to make uſe of it. Theſe fair Speeches, tho' very plauſible and encouraging, yet induced very few to like the Undertaking; and thoſe only ſuch as had been long Soldiers, and had no Eſtates to uphold them in Peace, ſo that they would run any hazard to better their Fortunes: All the reſt were of different Opinions; ſome were for Peace, and thought it ſufficient for them to hold and defend their own Country, without running an hazard to conquer others, and theſe were generally the Richeſt ſort; others were willing to contribute toward the Charge, but yet ſo ſparingly as would little advance his deſign; others were ſo tired with Wars, that they were loth to begin the ſame Troubles afreſh. The Duke was a little diſcouraged at this oppoſition and faintneſs among his Subjects, but reſolved to try another method before he gave it over. Having found ſeveral of his Friends very forward in the Enterprize, and ſeemingly willing to venture all with him, he begins with them, and aſks them what they would contribute towards this Expedition? William Fitz-Auber made the firſt offer, promiſing him to furniſh out forty Ships with Men and Ammunition, the Biſhop of Bayeux forty, the Biſhop of Mans thirty; and ſo ſeveral others, according to, or rather beyond their Abilities. By theſe Perſons Examples he drew in the reſt of the Biſhops and Nobles, with whom he treated about it ſeverally to joyn in the deſign, and cauſed all the Sums contributed to be regiſter'd; by which means he at length raiſed ſuch an Emulation among his Subjects, as that they, who a little before would do nothing, grew now ambitious who ſhould do moſt. Nor was he ſo prevalent with his own Subjects only, but by his winning Perſuaſions and large Promiſes he engaged moſt of the greateſt Princes and Nobles of France to venture not only their Perſons but Eſtates with him, viz. Robert Fitz-Harveys Duke of Orleance, the Earls of Britain, Poictou, Pointhieu, Bologne, Mayne, Never, Hieſms, and Aumal, Seigniour de Tours, and even his mortal Enemy, Martel Earl of Anjou, was as forward as any. The King of France, whoſe Intereſt it had been to have cruſh'd this deſign, was a Minor, and under the care of Baldwin Earl of Flanders, whoſe Daughter the Duke had marry'd, and who would not hinder his deſign, if he could not farther it; yet to blind the young Prince and French Court, he promiſed to hold England, if he conquer'd it, in dependence upon the French King, as he did Normandy. The Pope, who was Alexander the II[d] at that time, he brought to applaud his Enterprize, by promiſing him[d] to hold it of

[a] King Edward and William were Kinſmen, but not in the degree which Mr. Daniel writes: For Emma, the Mother of King Edward, was not the Daughter of Richard the II[d] Duke of Normandy, but the Siſter; and ſo Richard the Second was not his Grandfather, but Uncle, which our Author expreſly mentions in the Life of Canutus.

[b] Some relate, that Edward, while he lived in Baniſhment in Normandy, made William a Promiſe of the next Reverſion of the Crown of England; others think he did it at this Viſit, being not likely to have Iſſue, and adopted him for his Heir. This William declared himſelf, as he march'd through Wallingford to London, That the Bounteous King Edward had by Adoption made him Heir to the Crown of England, and now God had by his Providence given it him. But in his Dying Speech he ſays, That the Royal Diadem, which none of his Predeceſſors wore, he got not by Right of Inheritance, but by Heavenly Grace.

[c] Harold, being a Priſoner in Normandy, had promis'd William upon Oath, that he might gain his Liberty, to ſecure him the Kingdom of England, if Edward dy'd without Heirs; and hereupon was affianced to Duke William's Daughter, which Promiſe he not performing, was accounted Perjur'd.

[d] That this was a meer Pretence, to procure the Concurrence of the Pope, appears from the Letter he wrote to Gregory the VII[th] this Pope's Succeſſor; wherein he diſowns, that he had ever any ſuch Intention to ſubmit his Kingdom to the Pope.

the Apoſtolick See, if he was ſucceſsful; whereupon the Pope ſent him a Conſecrated Banner, a Golden Agnus Dei, and one of St. Peter's Hairs. The Emperor Henry IV. alſo ſent him a conſiderable Body of Men, under the Command of a German Prince. And thus in eight Months time having collected a very numerous Army, not out of Normandy only, but out of France, Flanders, and Germany, ſufficient to proceed in his intended Expedition; he ſummon'd them to their Rendezvouz at St. Velery in Normandy, from whence he tranſported them into England in 896 Ships, as ſome write; Providence ordering ſuch a ſtrange Concurrence of Diſpoſitions to effect the wonderful Change it had decreed to be now made in England.

A. D. 1066. Duke William having had a victorious landing, and conquer'd Harold's Army at Haſtings, October 14. 1066. as is before ſpoken of in the Life of Harold, march'd directly without any oppoſition to London; where Edwin and Morchar, the Earls of Northumberland and Mercia, (two Brothers of great Honour and Dignity in the Kingdom) had done their utmoſt to excite the People to ſtand up in defence of their Liberties, and make Edgar Atheling, the next of the Royal Iſſue, who had Right to the Crown, King, to preſerve the Kingdom from Servitude and Conqueſt. Many of the Nobility had conſented to this Propoſition; but the Biſhops being averſe to it, and wavering, becauſe they had heard a good Character of the Duke's Piety and Bounty to the Church, and ſo doubted not of his Favour to their Function, ſo diſheartned the Nobility, and damped their Reſolutions, fearing leſt their backwardneſs ſhould make them fare the worſe, if through their Diviſions the Duke ſhould at laſt ſubdue them, that they alſo yielded to Neceſſity, and gave over all thoughts of Oppoſition; by which means the Commons being deſtitute of an Head, could not move but irregularly: So that [a] all degrees of Men being either corrupted with Hopes, or tranſported with Fear, their poor Country was left naked to the Will of a Stranger. Wherefore at his approach to London the Gates were ſet open, and the Archbiſhop Stigand, with the Biſhops his Brethren, the Nobility, Magiſtrates and People, joyfully received him with all outward Demonſtrations of Subjection, and Promiſes of Obedience: He at the ſame time returning all Aſſurances of a mild and good Government over them, and proteſting that he would rule with Juſtice and Equity. On Chriſtmaſs Day next following he was crowned King of England at Weſtminſter, by Aldred Archbiſhop of York, becauſe Stigand was not thought [b] Canonically inveſted in his See, altho' he was a great Promoter of this Alteration. At his Coronation, according to Cuſtom, the Biſhops and Barons of the Realm took their Oaths of Allegiance to him, obliging themſelves to be his true and loyal Subjects; and after, he alſo (being required to do it by the Archbiſhop of York) ſwore ſolemnly, ſtanding before the Altar of St. Peter, That he would govern all his People in his Dominion with Juſtice; That he would enact juſt Laws, and ſee that they be duly executed. Nor did he ever violate this his Oath by any arbitrary Actions, as an Abſolute Conqueror, but as a Regular Prince, conformed to the ancient Orders of the Realm, and was content to derive his Title to the Kingdom rather from King Edward's Will (tho' a weak and fictitious one) than from his Sword. And tho' he was in after-times ſtiled the Conqueror, yet it was rather done thro' flattery, than by his own deſire, as was evident from the whole courſe of his Government; for he introduced none of the Alterations, which followed after, by violence, but mildly and gently, by way of Reformation, as tho' the Changes aroſe from Neceſſity, not his own Will or Deſign; and he would aboliſh or innovate nothing that might be preſerved with advantage to his People. A. D. 1066.

In the Spring after his Coronation and Settlement, he found it neceſſary for him to go into Normandy, to ſettle Affairs there, and put the Government of that Country into ſuch a frame, as might not require his Preſence, or take him off from the management of his Kingdom of England, which would require all his Care. And for the better ſecurity of the Peace and Order of his new-gotten Kingdom, which he had reaſon to believe would not hold ſteady in their Subjection long, he took Hoſtages of the Engliſh for their Obedience, committed the Government of the Kingdom to his moſt truſty Friends, Odo his Brother Biſhop of Bayeux, and his Couſin Fitz-Auber, whom he had lately created Earl of Hereford, and took with him into Normandy all the chief Men of England, who were the moſt likely to head any Revolt, viz. Edgar Atheling, Stigand Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the two great Earls Edwin and Morcar, with many other Biſhops and Noblemen. And to lighten his Charge, and empty his Court, he took along with him all the French Princes who had been Partners with him in the Adventure, and others of the Normans, who were grown now unneceſſary to him, rewarding them for their Labour and Aſſiſtance, as far as his Treaſure would reach, and made up the reſt with fair Promiſes. During his abſence all that Summer, nothing was attempted againſt the Government, only Edric, ſurnamed the Forreſter, having obtained the help of the Welſh Kings, plunder'd and ſpoil'd the remote parts of the County of Hereford. All the other parts of the Kingdom were quiet; hoping, that ſince by their change of Governours they had found little or no alteration in their ancient Conſtitutions, their Laws and Liberties remaining the ſame as they were before, this Change wou'd prove rather for the Advantage than Inconvenience of England, by the addition of a new Province, and enlarging its Dominions beyond the Seas, eſpecially ſince the Normans were but a ſmall People, and liv'd in a plentiful and fruitful Country, large enough for themſelves; ſo that England was not, in all probability, likely much to be peſter'd with them. 1067. His Voyage into Normandy.

Having ſetled Affairs in Normandy, he return'd again into England towards Winter, where he met with a harder talk to compoſe things well, than what he had finiſhed. The Normans and others who had aſſiſted him in the hazardous adventure of getting the Engliſh Crown, were very big with Expectations of Rewards and Preferments, which he knew muſt be ſatisfy'd in ſome meaſure; and His return into England, and his Rewards of the Normans.

[a] Yet Stigand, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, is ſaid by Brompton to have refus'd to Crown him, becauſe he had no Title; and Frederick the Stout Abbot of St. Albans, a Saxon of the Royal Blood, fortify'd his Abby with Trees to reſiſt him, as though he would have fought againſt ſo great a Conqueror alone, ſaying, That if others had done their duty, the Duke of Normandy had not been here.

[b] Stigand had obtain'd the Arch-biſhoprick through Simony, and held it with the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter, contrary to the Canons: For which, as Simeon of Durham and Florence of Worceſter affirm, he then lay under the Pope's Diſpleaſure; and by the Pope's Legates, with the King's conſent, he was ſoon after depoſed.

[c] Odo, Biſhop of Bayeux, and Earl of Kent, by his ſevere Government, forced the Engliſh to rebel, and to invite over Euſtace Earl of Bologne to aſſiſt them. Euſtace prov'd unſucceſsful, and Edric the Forreſter roſe againſt the Normans in Wales; but on the King's Return the Welſh ſubmitted.

A. D. 1067. yet he thought it would very prejudicial to him to wrong his new Subjects (whom he desired to keep as easie as he could) to do it; for it was impossible for him to defend what he had got without them. This was a greater trouble to him than his Battel of Hastings, knowing what he gave the Normans must be either with the loss of the English Estates or Preferments. Wherefore he took this prudent method to satisfie all Parties: He resolv'd to put no Man out of their Places, nor deprive any Man of his Estate, unless any had forfeited them by revolting from their Obedience; which he made good, as appears by the Controversie between one Warren a Norman, and Sherburn of Sherburn-Castle in Norfolk; whose Castle the King had given to Warren, upon an Accusation of Treason brought against Sherburn: Yet when Sherburn made it evident to the King, That he never bore Arms against him; and pleaded, That he was his Subject as well as Warren, and held his Lands by that Law which he had establish'd among all his Subjects; The King gave his Judgment against Warren, and order'd, that Sherburn should peaceably enjoy his Lands: So that he contented himself with what Vacancies had happen'd, either by the Death of such as were kill'd in the Battel, or by the Flight of such as had left the Kingdom in discontent, or were with the Sons of Harold. These Men's Estates and Places he disposed to the Normans. And as for such Gentlemen as he design'd to prefer, but had no opportunity at present to do it, he setled them in the Abbies till he could provide for them; whereby he not only lessen'd his Charge at Court, and remov'd the Grievance of the People by a multitude of greedy Expectants; but he had a Guard upon the Clergy, who being of great Interest with the People, were most likely to create Disturbances.

The Nobility of England discontented.

But the English Nobility could not be contented with a bare Possession of their Estates and Honours, so long as they found so great an Eclipse of the Royal Favour towards them, by the Imposition of Norman Favourites, who growing more numerous every day, they concluded would in time turn them out of all. These Surmises and Fears produced a Conspiracy among them to fly, some into Scotland, others into Denmark, to try whether by the assistance of those Princes they could recover their lost Fortunes at home, and resettle themselves in their ancient Greatness; of these the chief was Edgar Atheling (call'd England's Darling, for the Love the People had generally for him) who with his Mother Agatha, and two Sisters, Margaret and Christiana, intending to retire into Hungary, their Native Country, were driven by contrary Winds into Scotland, where he was kindly received by Malcolm, then King of the Scots, partly because Malcolm had formerly known the Miseries of an Exile Condition, (in which he had been kindly entertain'd in the English Court) and partly because he fear'd the Power of the Conqueror of England might be dangerous to him: Whereupon he enter'd into a League with Edgar for the publick Safety, and marry'd his Sister Margaret[a], by which the Blood of the Saxon Kings was preserved, and at length united in the Norman Line in Henry II. and so became again English. To Edgar, now being in Scotland, came the Earls Edwin and Morcar, Hereward, Gospatrick, Siward, with several others[b]; and shortly after Stigand and Aldred Arch-bishops, with many of the Clergy. These Malecontents having gather'd an Army by the help of Malcolm enter'd those parts of England which lie on the North of Humber in the third Year of this King's Reign, and made a strong Essay towards the Recovery of their lost Country; but not being done before the Government was setled, they were so far from doing any good by their weak attempts, that they really gave him but a better occasion to settle himself firmly, and become at last, what at first he really was not, a Conqueror of England. For while all the Southern parts remain'd in peace under him, and he was in possession of their Estates, which he immediately dispos'd to the Normans, they did but force their Brethren to become their Enemies, and enable the Normans to ruine them. For the Earldom and Estate of Edwin in Yorkshire was given to Alain Earl of Britain, Kinsman to the Conqueror, the Archbishoprick of Canterbury was conferr'd on Lanfranc[c] Abbot of Caen, and that of York on Thomas his Chaplain; and all the rest, both of the Clergy and others, which were out of the Nation, had their Places in it supplied by the Normans.

Many Rebellions against King William, which he suppress'd.

Many Insurrections happen'd about this time. Two[d] of Harold's Sons landing with Forces in the West[e], made great havock among the People; and Githa, King Harold's Mother, being at Exeter, caused that City to rebel. At Oxford also there was a Commotion, but they were not able to stand long against the King's Power. The most prosperous and successful Invasion was by Edgar Atheling with his Lords out of Scotland, who enter'd England with a good Army, and encountering Robert Earl of Mortaigne, who was sent by the King to oppose their progress into the Nation, slew him with seven hundred Men at York. The King hearing of this defeat, took his Journey Northward with all expedition; but before he could arrive there, the Invaders had received a large addition to their Army from Swain King of Denmark, who had sent three hundred Ships to their assistance, under the Command of Harold and Canutus his two Sons; William first sets upon the Danes, and either by force, or corrupting their Commanders, made them useless; afterwards he fell upon the Lords Army, much weaken'd by the loss of their Confederates, and puts them to flight; and that the Country might not for the future harbour his Enemies, he laid it[f] waste all along between York and Durham, which are distant about sixty Miles. And the same methods he used on all the Coasts, where any fit places for Invaders to land were, and then return'd to London. After this Victory most of the Lords came in, and submitted themselves to the King upon the publick Faith before given them, and were conducted by [g]Fredericke, Abbot of St. Albans, to [f] In this furious Devastation, the King shew'd such a respect to John of Beverley, that all his Lands were spar'd: The rest of the Country was so wasted, that the People were forc'd to eat Cats and Dogs to support Life.

[g] Fredericke himself was a leading Man in this Revolt, having had all the Lands between Barnet and London-stone, which belonged to his Abby, seiz'd by the King; but it seems after this Victory he came in with the first, and was made use of to bring others to the King's Favour.

Barkamſted, where having retaken the Oath of Allegiance they were pardoned by the King, and promiſed a Reſtitution of his Favour; and the King himſelf to pacifie their unquiet Minds, took his Perſonal Oath again before Arch-biſhop Lanfranc and the Lords; That he would obſerve the ancient Laws of the Realm eſtabliſhed by his Royal Predeceſſors, the Kings of England, and eſpecially thoſe of Edward the Confeſſor [a]. By which means theſe turbulent Diſpoſitions were calmed for a while, but did not long continue ſo: For whether out of ſome new Hopes given them by Prince Edgar (who was ſtill in Scotland) or grown deſperate at the Non-performance of the King's Promiſe and Breach of Oath, or ſome other Reaſons, they brake out again. Earl Edwin going toward Scotland, was murthered by his own Men. The Lords Morcar and Hereward, got [b] into the Iſle of Ely, intending to fortifie it for their Winter Quarters; and to them Earl Syward, and the Biſhop of Durham out of Scotland, joyned them: But the King, who never gave time in growing Dangers, immediately beſet the Iſle; and having made a Bridge two Miles long to carry his Army over, ſurprized them ſo ſoon, that they all yielded themſelves to the King's Mercy, except Hereward, who marching with his People deſperately through the Fens, eſcaped and got into Scotland [c]. The reſt were ſent into ſeveral Priſons, where they died, or remained Priſoners during the King's Life. The Lords, who perſiſted Loyal upon this laſt Submiſſion, were received into Favour, and had honourable Employments beſtowed on them. Edric the Foreſter (who firſt rebelled in his Reign) was admitted into the greateſt Truſt about the King's Perſon. Goſpatric he made Earl of Northumberland, and ſent him General of his Army againſt the King of Scots, who plunder'd and had ſubdu'd Tiſdale, Cleveland, and Cumberland. Waltheof, Son of Earl Syward, was ſo highly eſteemed by him, as that he married him to his Neice Judith; tho' in the Northern Commotion he had been a Principal Actor, and in defending the City of York had cut off the Head of ſeveral Normans as they enter'd in at the Breach, to the Admiration of all. So great a Friend was he to Virtue, even in an Enemy.

A. D. 1071. Reg. 5.

King William went againſt Scotland. A. D. 1072.

Things being thus a little compoſed at home, the King obſerving that Scotland had been a continual Retreat for his Enemies, and in many of the Diſturbances he had in his Realm, afforded the Malecontents Aſſiſtance; and that Edgar Atheling reſided in that Court to obſerve all Advantages to diſpoſſeſs him of his Throne, he enter'd that Kingdom with a powerful Army, reſolving either to rid himſelf of thoſe his Enemies, or loſe his Life. Malcolm ſeeing the Danger he was in, and the Miſeries his Subjects were likely to endure in other Mens Quarrels, for which he was not like to receive any Satisfaction, made Overtures of Peace, which King William was willing to accept, having met with ſuch Difficulties in paſſing the Marſhes, as made his farther Enterprizes very diſcouraging. Wherefore entring into Articles with [d] Malcolm, That he ſhould enjoy the ſame Dominions [e], and in the ſame Bounds as formerly, that all Delinquents on both ſides ſhould be pardoned, they returned home.

Shortly after this Peace ſo lately made, Prince Edgar (whoſe long abode in the Scotiſh Court had made it become Engliſh almoſt; for by reaſon of the great reſort of the Engliſh thither, who were preferr'd there and intermarried with the Nobles of that Nation, the Language and Cuſtoms of England became much in Faſhion: And here 'tis ſaid the Titles of Duke, Earl, Baron, and Knight, were firſt began) came voluntarily in, and ſubmitted himſelf to the King, who was then in Normandy, and was reſtored to his Grace and Favour; inſomuch, that he allowed him [f] an Eſtate ſuitable to his Greatneſs, which Edgar was ſo grateful, as to recompenſe with a peaceable Behaviour ever after. This Submiſſion, tho' fortunate enough for the King, was thought very unſeaſonable and fooliſh in Edgar: For in the Abſence of the King, Roger Fitz-Auber [g] the young Earl of Hereford, contrary to the King's Command, married his Siſter to Ralph Waher, Earl of Norfolk and Suffolk; and at the ſolemnizing of it [h], the two Earls conſpired with Euſtace Earl of Bologne (who privately came over to the Nuptials) Earl Waltheof, and other Engliſh Lords, to call in the Danes, and by Force keep out the King from his Kingdom. This Conſpiracy was the more like to have taken effect, becauſe the King did not ſuſpect any ſuch Treachery; eſpecially from thoſe whom he had ſo greatly advanced. But Odo's watchful Eye, which obſerved every Motion of the Engliſh, as became his Place of the King's Vicegerent, ſoon ſpy'd the Deſign; and by the help of the Biſhop of Worceſter, and others, kept ſo ſtrict a Guard upon them, that they could never unite to perfect it, but perceiving themſelves diſcover'd, were forced to fly. Roger Fitz-Auber was taken, and ſome ſay executed, and ſo was Earl Waltheof [i]; though 'twas thought, he was the principal means of the Diſcovery: But ſuch was

He chang'd the Laws afterwards, and brought in the Norman; commanding them to be made uſe of almoſt through the whole Kingdom. The Daniſh Laws had prevail'd in the Counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridge, and he permitted them to be ſtill current there, becauſe they had more relation to his own than thoſe of the Saxons.

A. D. 1075. the ill Diſpoſition of the Times, that nothing could be thought a fit Remedy for the Diſeaſe, but ſuch a deſperate Cure [a]. The ſuppreſſing of the Plot at home did not free the King from the Inconveniences of the Confederates Power abroad, who were joyned with them to expel the King, as moſt of the Neighbouring Princes by their 1076. Actions did after ſhew. For the King of France defended Dole in Britain (a Caſtle of Ralph Waher's) againſt the King of England, and employed the Earl of Bologn to encourage the Conſpirators. The King of Denmark ſent a Navy of two hundred Sail under the Command of his Son Canutus, and others. Drone, King of Ireland, furniſhed Harold's Sons with ſixty five Ships: And Malcolm, and the Kings of Wales, were ready to lend their Aſſiſtance had there been occaſion. And though they were diſappointed, yet it put the State to very great Charge, the King being obliged for his own defence, to maintain (beſides his Normans) many Companies of French Soldiers, under the Command of Hugh the French King's Brother.

A. D. 1077. These were all the Wars which King William had within his Kingdom, ſaving that in the eleventh Year of his Reign he ſubdued Wales, and made the Kings thereof to do him Homage. The A. R. 11. Wars he was ingaged in abroad aroſe from his Son Robert, with whom he was forced to contend for his Dominions in France: For Robert, who was by his Father appointed his Deputy to govern the Dukedom of Normandy and County of Main in his abſence, was ſo much affected with the Glory of a Command, that he aſſumed to himſelf the ſupreme Government of the Province, cauſing the Barons to do him Homage as Duke and not as Deputy; and enter'd into a League with the King of France, who glad of this Opportunity to diſunite a People, grown too great for him, ſo fed the Ambition of the young Prince, and engaged him upon ſuch Profuſeneſs and Expence, that he was obliged to impoſe heavy Exactions upon his Subjects to ſupply his Extravagances; which though they got him the Name of Curtois, yet it raiſed ſuch Diſcontents among the Normans, that they preferred their Complaints of his ill Government and violent Exactions to his Father. The King hearing this, haſtes with his Forces into Normandy, deſigning to ſurprize his Son; but Robert having Intelligence of his coming, and being furniſhed with two thouſand Men by the 1079. King of France, lay in ambuſh in the way [b] through which he was to paſs, ſets upon him, put his Army to Flight, and in the purſuit happens to encounter with his Father, whom he unhors'd and wounded in the Arm with his Lance, before he knew who he was: But when by his Voice he diſcover'd 'twas his Father, he made haſt to remount him, humbly begging Pardon for his Offence. The King readily granted it, and upon Submiſſion for his Miſgovernment, took him to Rouen with him; and having ſetled him in his Charge again, he returned with his Son William (as ſoon as they were both cured of their Hurts receiv'd in the Fight) into England.

The King had not been long at home, but freſh Information was brought him, that Robert was fallen into his former Courſes, uſurping the abſolute Government of his Dukedom, and exacting great Taxes of the People; and to juſtifie his Actions pleaded, that his Father had promiſed him before the King of France, to make him their Duke, when he had conquered England. At which News the King being moved, thought not fit to give his Deſigns time to ripen, but made all the Preparations he could to return into Normandy. In his Paſſage, he was driven upon the Coaſts of Spain; but at length recovering Burdeaux, and landing with great Preparations, his Son Robert came immediately and ſubmitted the ſecond time. But the King thought it not ſafe to truſt him with the Government of Normandy again for the preſent, till he had taught him to obey better; and therefore taking him along with him home, employed him in his Wars [c] againſt Scotland, which began to annoy his Dominions, and then ſent him after ſome time again into Normandy to govern it; but joyning his youngeſt Son Henry [d] with him in the Charge and Power, and repoſing greateſt Truſt and Confidence in him. Theſe two Princes being a little ſetled in their Government, went to viſit the King of France at Conſtance, where they tarried ſome days. On a certain day after Dinner, Lewis the French King's eldeſt Son, and Prince Henry to recreate themſelves, play'd a Game at Cheſs, and Henry won ſo much of him, that Lewis in Anger call'd him the Son of a Baſtard, and threw the Cheſs-board in his Face: Henry hereby provok'd, ſnatch'd up the Cheſs-board, and ſtruck Lewis with that Force as drew Blood, and had killed him, had not Robert timely interpoſed between them. This petty Brangle between two hot Youths, not only enraged the People ſo much againſt the Norman Princes, that they hardly eſcaped their Fury by their ſwift riding; but it kindled a Quarrel between the two Kings, the Fathers, and was a Cauſe of the firſt War between the Engliſh and French. For preſently the King of France, joyning with Robert, who was as impatient of a Partner, as an Head, enter'd Normandy, and takes the City of Vernon. Whereupon the King of England, with his uſual Expedition invades France, and ſubdues the Countries of Zaintonge and Poicton, and ſo returned to Rouen. Robert made rebellious, as much or more by Inſtigation as Inclination, could not ſtand out againſt his Father, but goes the third time, and ſubmitting is reconciled to him. This was a great Diſappointment and Trouble to the King of France; nevertheleſs, being aſham'd to lay down his Arms diſhonourably, he ſummons King William to do him Homage for his Kingdom of England; but he replied, That he was ready to do it for his Dutchy of Normandy, but for England he would not, becauſe he had it of none but God and his Sword. But this would not ſatisfie the King of France, who ſought an Occaſion to quarrel, and therefore he invades Normandy again, and the King's other Territories; but with ſuch Loſs, as made him willing to conclude a Peace, which proved but ſhort. For the King of England being fallen into a Sickneſs through Labour, Age, and Corpulency, of which he lay ſome time at Rouen, the French King being young and luſty, ſporting

His Government in Peace.

Having given an Account of the Wars of this King, together with his Conduct and Succeſs in them, I ſhall ſhew what Courſe he took in ſet-ling the Kingdom, and eſtabliſhing a Govern-ment after he had ſuppreſſed the ſeveral Inva-ſions and Conſpiracies made againſt him in the North and other Parts of the Realm. It is cer-tain he was ſo fond of the Laws and Cuſtoms of his own Nation, that he began his Reign with them, and would certainly have aboliſhed all the Engliſh Laws and introduced the Norman, had not the Nobility and Commons looked upon it as a great Grievance; and by Petition beſought him in moſt humble manner, by the Oath he had taken at his Coronation, and by the Soul of S. Edward, from whom he had the Crown and Kingdom, and under whoſe Laws they were born and bred, That he would not make them ſo miſe-rable, nor be ſo ſevere to them, as to judge them by a Law they underſtood not. This earneſt Ad-dreſs had ſo great an effect upon the King, that he was pleaſed to confirm his former Promiſes by his Charter, and gave Commandment to his Judges, to ſee that the Laws of S. Edward be inviolably obſerved throughout his Kingdom. But notwith-ſtanding all this Compliance, and a ſeeming Con-firmation of the old Laws, which was alſo after done by the Charters of Henry I. and II. and King John; yet there followed ſo great an Innovation in the Laws and Government of England, that the People really had nothing of them but fair Promiſes. For the Body of the Common Law, with the whole Practice of it, came out of Nor-mandy, notwithſtanding all Objections that can be made to the contrary. And whereas before the Conqueſt, the Laws by which the Engliſh were govern'd were written in their own Tongue, and ſo eaſie to be underſtood by all; now they were tranſlated into Latin and French, and practis'd wholly in the Norman Form and Language, on purpoſe to make the People to learn that Speech for their defence, which otherwiſe they would not do. And tho' indeed the King labour'd all he could by other means, as well as that, to make the Nation uſe the French Language, viz. enjoyn-ing Children to be train'd up in no other Lan-guage, Grammars in Schools to be made in French, all Petitions and Buſineſs at Court in French, no Man regarded but he that ſpoke French; yet ſoon after his Death the whole Na-tion return'd to their old Engliſh, and nothing re-main'd of French but in the Law, which is at this day the only remaining Badge of the Norman Conqueſt. New Terms, new Conſtitutions, new Forms of Pleading, new Offices and Courts were introduced by the Normans; a People of more impatient and litigious Spirits than the Engliſh, who being much engag'd in War, judg'd it much better to ſpend their Peace in Devotion and good Fellowſhip, than by intricate and tedious Forms of Law make Peace it ſelf a Trouble, and a Con-troverſie about Property, as pernicious as the bloodieſt Battels. For the Laws of the Engliſh be-fore this were plain, brief and ſimple, without Intricacies and Perplexities; commanding, not diſputing; deciding, not confounding: Their Grants ſhort, but full, ſhewing them a clear mean-ing People, and of honeſt and good Intentions. As for their Tryals in Caſes Criminal, where ma-nifeſt Proof fail'd, they continu'd their ancient Cuſtom uſed among them before their Conver-ſion, to decide them by their Ordeal, i. e. a Right Doom, (for Or ſignifies Right, and deal a part or portion) "Of this ſort of Judgment they had two "kinds; Ordeal by Fire for the better ſort of "People, and Ordeal by Water for the meaner "ſort: That of Fire was to go Blindfold over cer-"tain Plowſhares, made red hot, and laid at un-"even diſtances one from another; that of Water "was either hot or cold, in the one to put their "naked Arms to the Elbow, and into the other "to be caſt headlong: According to their eſcape "or hurt they were judg'd; ſuch as were caſt "into Rivers, if they ſunk, they were judg'd In-"nocent; if not, Guilty, as ejected by the Ele-"ment. Theſe Tryals they call'd the Judgment "of God, and they were perform'd with ſolemn "Prayers. In ſome Caſes the Perſon accuſed was admitted to clear himſelf by receiving the Eu-chariſt, by his own Oath, or the Oaths of two or three credible Men; but this was allow'd only to Perſons of Note and Ability. The uſual Opinion among them being this: That Men of Ability had a greater regard of Honeſty. Beſides theſe, they had a Tryal of a Camp-fight, or Duel, (which the Lombards, a German Nation, introduced alſo into Italy) permitted by the Law in caſes of Safe-ty, Fame or Poſſeſſions. All theſe Tryals ſhew the Engliſh to be ignorant of any Forms of Law, and to have no Imperial or Pontificial Conſtitu-tions to determine Affairs by. But theſe ſorts of Judgments and Tryals had their period ſoon af-ter the Conqueſt. Thoſe of Fire and Water were at firſt diſuſed, and at laſt abrogated by the Pope, as a Pagan Invention, and an Impious Law; that of Combat out-liv'd the other, but very rarely ſuffer'd to be uſed. All Actions, both Criminal and Real, began to be wholly determin'd by the Verdict of twelve Men, according to the Cuſtom of Normandy, call'd an Enqueſt, where the ſame Cuſtom is uſed with the ſame Cautions to the Jurors, as among us at this day. Some indeed hold, that this manner of Tryal was in uſe in this Kingdom long before; and to prove their Opinion, alledge a Law of King Ethelred's, Father of the Confeſſor, wherein he requires his Subjects in their Gemotes or Conventions, monthly held in every Hundred, that twelve grave Men of free Condi-tion, ſhould, with the Greve, or chief Officer among them, ſwear upon the Evangeliſts to judge every Man's Cauſe aright. But theſe Men were to be Aſſeſſors with the Judge, and no Jurors, as the manner of the Normans was. And indeed had there been any ſuch Form, we ſhould have heard of it more in their Laws and Practice.

But whatever Alterations he made in other Matters, yet in thoſe Laws which had been made by the Saxons for the preſervation of the Peace, and for the good Order and Security of the King-dom (which are of the greateſt importance to Kings) he made no change, becauſe he found ſuch excellent Conſtitutions made by the wary Care of former Kings, that he had none ſo good, and bet-ter could hardly be invented by Man, eſpecially the Burrough-Law, whereby every Freeman of the Commonalty was ſurety for the Behaviour of each other, after this manner: The whole Kingdom was divided into Shires or Shares, and every Shire ſubdivided into Hundreds, every Hundred conſiſting of a conſiderable number of Burroughs, Villages or Tithings, each containing ten Houſeholders; of which, if any one committed any unlawful Actions, the other nine were to attach him, and bring him to puniſhment; if he fled, he was injoyn'd to appear within thirty one days; if in the mean time he were apprehended, he was to reſtore what he had taken away; otherwiſe the Head-Burrough or Tithing-Man was to take with him two of the ſame Village, and as many of the three next Villages adjoyning, (viz. the Tithing-Man, or Head, and two other principal Men) and before the Officers of their Hundred clear himſelf and the Village of the Fact, making good the Damage done by the Goods of the Malefactor; and if they were not ſufficient, the Burrough or Tithing muſt make up the reſt; and beſides take an Oath, that they have not been acceſſary to the Fact, and to bring the Offender to Juſtice, if they knew where he was, or could get him. Beſides, every Maſter of a Family was to be ſurety for all his Family; and if any Servant was call'd in queſtion, his Maſter was to make him anſwer it in the Hundred where he was accuſed; if he fled, the Maſter was to deliver up what Goods were left in his Cuſtody to the King: If he himſelf were accuſed of aiding his Servant, or to be privy to his flight, he was to clear himſelf by five Men, otherwiſe to forfeit all his Goods to the King, and his Man to be out-law'd. By theſe Tyes was the State ſo firmly joyn'd together, and the Order and Peace of the Kingdom ſo well ſecur'd, that no Society of Men in the World liv'd in greater Order and Peace. For after this Eſtabliſhment, not only all Thefts and Robberies, which were common before, were wholly ſuppreſs'd, but we never read of any popular Inſurrections; which doubtleſs was a great cauſe that the Normans had ſo ſpeedy a Settlement in England, more than the Romans or Saxons. By theſe Laws there was ſuch a ſtrict Guard put upon every Man's Behaviour, that no Man dare be guilty of any Treaſonable or Criminal Action, and ſo they could not make any conſiderable Reſiſtance againſt the Invader: Otherwiſe, 'tis probable, the Conqueſt of England had coſt the Normans as dear as it did the Romans, Saxons, or Danes. But King William executing the Engliſh Laws ſeverely, and withal depriving the Commonalty of all Weapons of War, forbidding all Night-meetings under grievous Penalties; injoyning every Man at [a] eight of the Clock in the Evening to put out his Fire, and go to his reſt; raiſing [b] divers Fortifications in ſeveral parts of the Kingdom to ſuppreſs all Commotions, and putting ſuch Perſons into all Places of Command and Judicature as he knew faithful to his Intereſts, made his Kingdom ſuch as he would have it.

The Saxon Burrough Law.

Alterations made by King William in the Engliſh Government.

As to the Judicial part of Government, he new modell'd it; and whereas the Biſhop and Aldermen were abſolute Judges in every Shire, and the Biſhop in many Caſes had a ſhare of the Fines impoſed for the King, the King ſtripp'd the Biſhops wholly of their Judicial Power, and confin'd them within their Province [c] to their own Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction and Care of Souls. The Aldermen's Right he took quite away; and whereas all Cauſes were to be determin'd before in their Gemotes, or monthly Conventions in every Hundred, he order'd, That four times in the Year on certain Days all Buſineſs ſhould be determin'd in ſuch Places as he ſhould appoint, by Judges conſtituted by him for that purpoſe, from whom, as from the Boſom of their Prince, all Perſons ſhould have Juſtice. What difference of Tenures he made in Men's Eſtates, is viſible from the knowledge of the old Engliſh Cuſtoms. The Saxons had only two kinds of Tenures, Boke-Land and Folk-Land; the one a Poſſeſſion by Writing, the other without: That by Writing was as Freehold, and by Charter, Hereditary with all Immunities, and this was chiefly for the Nobler ſort; that without Writing was to hold at the Will of the Lord, obliged to pay certain Rents and Services, and this was for the common People. Inheritances deſcended not to one Heir, but after the German faſhion, was equally divided among all the Children, which they call'd Land-ſkiften, i. e. Part-Land; a Cuſtom ſtill retain'd in ſome part of Kent, by the Name of Gavelkin, or Gif eal kin, which it is ſaid the People of that County gain'd from the Conqueror by this Stratagem. As the King was paſſing through their Country to Dover, the People (by the advice of Stigand Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Abbot Egelſin [d], who told them they would loſe all their ancient Laws and Liberties, and be involv'd in perpetual Slavery by the Conqueror) encompaſſed him on all ſides with Boughs in their Hands, to the great ſurprize as well as fear of the King, who expected no ſuch hoſtile Attempts. Out of the midſt of them came Stigand and Egelſin, and preſenting themſelves before the King, told him, That the Multitude ſurrounding him was the whole People of the Country gather'd together with Boughs in their Hands, as Olive-Branches, to procure Peace and Liberty, or elſe to entangle him in his Paſſage; reſolving to loſe their Lives, rather than their Freedom, which if he would ſecure to them they would ſubmit as good Subjects. The Conqueror ſeeing his Danger granted their Deſires, and promiſed them the continuance of their Cuſtoms and Liberties; which, if at firſt permitted, are now not better ſecured than to the reſt of the Kingdom. Thoſe Tenants, which were at the Will of their Lords, he multiplied, and made their Caſe more miſerable than before, till by their clamorous Petitions he was forced to relieve them. Their Caſe was this: All Perſons that were engag'd in any Rebellion, and were pardon'd with the enjoyment of Life, yet having their Eſtates taken from them, became Vaſſals unto thoſe Lords to whom their Eſtates were given; and if by their labour they attain'd any Portion of Ground, they held it only ſo long as it pleaſed their Lords, who often took it from them by Violence, and contrary to all Right. This the King redreſſed; and commanded, that whatſoever ſuch Perſons had attain'd to by their Labours, or gotten of their Lords by their good Services, or agreed for by any lawful Compact, they ſhould hold inviolably during their whole Lives.

for himself, to raise a sufficient Revenue for the Maintenance of his Crown and Dignity, which he judged could not well be done, but by an exact Knowledge of his Estate, and a general Survey of the Kingdom. King Alfred had given him a Precedent, but his Survey recorded in the Doom-book at Winchester was defective and imperfect; wherefore he having gotten a sufficient number of very skilful Men, and furnished them with a large Commission, sent them out into the Kingdom to take a particular Account of his own Possessions, and every Man's Estate else in the Kingdom, the Nature and Quality of their Lands, their Estates and Abilities, with the Descriptions, Bounds and Divisions of all the Shires and Hundreds; and this was drawn up into one Book, and brought into his Treasury, then newly called the Exchequer (as the supreme Court of Normandy was) whereas before it was termed Talée, and had the Name of Dome-book[a] (Liber Judiciarius) given it, a Record ready upon all Occasions for Taxes, or other Uses. All the Forests and Chases of the Kingdom he seized into his own hands, and exempted them from all Laws, but his own Pleasure; making them Retreats for Kings, to recreate himself in, and his Successors, and inflicting most severe Punishments upon any that should presume to destroy his Game: And that his Command might be the greater, he increased the Number of them in all Parts, and on the South-Coasts dispeopled the Country for thirty Miles together, and of old Habitations and ancient Estates; to the great damage of his People, made [b] a New Forest, as it is called to this Day; an Act which got him much Hatred among his People, yet used by his Successors (who chose to imitate his Tyranny rather than his Virtues) till it was remedied by the Charter of Forests, granted by Henry the Third. Soon after the general Survey of the Kingdom, he levied a Tax of 6 s. upon every Hide of Land throughout the Nation; and after some times exacted the old Tax, commonly called Dane-gelt, which was an Imposition of two Shillings upon every Hide or Plough-land, raised at first to bribe the Danes, and after continued for the ordinary Supply of the King's Occasions in War or Peace. He imposed also upon some of his Subjects a Tax then first called Escuage, which was a Sum of Money taken for [c] every Knight's Fee for Stipends and Donatives for Soldiers. But all these Taxes he levied but seldom; knowing, that Subjects never heartily love, however they may fear those Princes which are burthensome and chargeable to them. He had no Revenues by Fines and pecuniary Mulcts, unless such as arose by the Breach of his Forest Laws and for Murther, which he laid upon the People upon this Occasion. In the beginning of his Reign, the Hatred and Malice of the English towards the Normans was such, that if they found them alone in Woods or any remote Places they murthered them; and notwithstanding all the severe Courses the King could use, the Malefactors could not be discovered. Whereupon the King ordered, That the Hundred where any Norman was found dead, and the Murtherer not discover'd, should pay to the King 28 or 30 l. according to the Extent of it, that by this general Punishment he might deter particular Men, or hasten the Discovery of the guilty, by whom so many must suffer Damage. The Revenues which were paid by the Tenants of the Crown for the Provision of the King's Household, not in Money, but some in Wheat, Malt, Beefs; others in Mutton, Hay, and Oats, &c. was duly and exactly taken according to the Quality and Quantity of every Man's Lands throughout the whole Kingdom. Other Incomes than these there was none belonging to the Crown but what was raised by extraordinary Fines, and of those Cities and Castles where Husbandry was not used.

His Exactions of the Church.

From the Church he gat considerable Sums, but by Extortion rather than Justice, the Kingly Power never before extending so far, and therefore no Law or Precedent enabling him to do it. And the first thing he did in that kind was, he seized the Plate, Jewels and Treasure of all the Monasteries of England, pretending that the Rebels and their Assistants had conveyed their Riches into them as privileged Places, to defraud him of them. He made all the Bishopricks, and Monasteries also, that held Baronies (which before had been exempted from all secular Services) to contribute to his Wars, and other Necessities of State, which may be the Reason that in all the Histories of those Times, which were written by Church-men interested in them, he bears the Name of an Oppressor and cruel Exactor, with other Marks of Infamy; tho' if things were rightly weighed, the Nature and Necessity of his Affairs may be an Advocate for him, and in many things excuse him. He was indeed an excellent Prince, but the Name of Conqueror blasted the Appearance of all his Perfections; and though he had the Advantage of a long Reign, to blot out the Severities of his Entrance to the Crown out of Mens Memories, yet he could never gain the Affections of his People so heartily to him as his Sons did, who were much inferiour to him in real Worth.

His Council and Ministers of State.

How he was furnished with Ministers of State for the Management of the important Affairs of his Reign, though Time hath deprived us of a very exact Knowledge; yet 'tis not to be doubted, but that being a Man of good Judgment himself, he had able Persons employed under him: For weak Princes make bad Choices usually, but understanding Kings are always stored with able Ministers. The principal Persons entrusted by him were Odo Bishop of Bayeux and Earl of Kent, Lanfranc Archbishop of Canterbury, and William Fitz-Auber Earl of Hereford. Odo was his Vicegerent in his absence, and had the management of his Treasury. He was a Man of great Reach, and of an active Spirit; high indeed in the Favour of his Prince, and by his Place; but yet very ambitious, and aiming at greater things: For having gather'd a vast Treasure of Money by his Avarice, and so profitable an Office, he design'd to buy either the Popedom, or the Kingdom of England, after the Death of the King his Brother. The Popedom came first in his way, and to it he had strew'd his Path with Gold at Rome; but when Odo.

[a] There are several different Opinions why it was call'd Doomsday-Book; its first Name was the Rolls of Winton, because it was kept in the City of Winchester, and afterwards Doomsday-Book, i. e. Liber Judiciarius, or The Book of Judgment. The Author of the Black Book in the Exchequer supposes, That the Name of Doomsday was first given to this Book, because 'twas no more lawful to depart from what is in it, than from the Day of Doom; but Sir John Hayward thinks 'twas so call'd from Domus Dei, a Place in the Cathedral of Winchester, in which this Roll was kept.

[b] This Fact, which was done meerly to promote his Pleasure, was look'd upon by the Nation as one of the most intolerable and inexcusable pieces of Cruelty, that not only he himself, but ever any Prince did; for he destroyed thirty six Parish-Churches, with the Houses and Possessions of so many Townships, to make them Habitations for wild Beasts.

[c] Knights Fee was Lands given by a Prince to such as had well deserved of him in his Wars. These Donations were first used by the Romans, who at first gave them only for Term of Life, and after to them and their Heirs, and from the Romans they came in use in France and Britain. he was going, as he imagin'd, to take Poſſeſſion of it, the King ſtopp'd his Journey, and taking him from the midſt of a great Confluence of Noblemen and Gentry, who were to attend him thither, impriſon'd him; excuſing the Action to the Churchmen, by telling them, that he impriſon'd him not as Biſhop of Bayeux, but as Earl of Kent, an Officer accountable to him; but ſoon after releaſed him, becauſe being on his Death-Bed he would leave his Kingdom at Peace to his Son. But the Biſhop diſappointed his Intention, and became the Inſtrument of many Diſſentions among his Children, partly in Revenge for what he had ſuffer'd from their Father, and partly out of Envy to Lanfranc, whoſe Counſel in his greateſt Affairs the King chiefly uſed; and therefore meerly to oppoſe him he took the contrary courſes to him, and ſided with Duke Robert his Nephew; with whom (after having paſs'd many Changes of Fortune with him) he went to the Holy War, and dy'd at the Siege of Antioch. Lanfranc was a Man of as univerſal Goodneſs as Learning, born in Lombardy, but brought hither by a kind Providence to do England good; for tho' his Preferment by the King might ſeem to lay ſome Reſtraints upon him, and require a greater Obſervance, yet by his Gravity and Piety, he gat himſelf ſo great Reverence with the King, that he feared not to oppoſe Odo the King's Brother in his Encroachments upon the Church; yea, in all he could, ſo intervened between the Kingdom and the King, that he ſaved the Nation from many rigorous Exactions and ſevere Impoſitions. For [a] he that conquer'd all others was a Captive to Lanfranc's Goodneſs. He reform'd [b] the Irregularities of the Clergy, and introduc'd Gravity and Piety among them, according to the uſage of his Country, in this joyning in Alterations with his Maſter, tho' more for the beſt. And to raiſe Devotion among all ſorts, he did what poſſible he could to furniſh his Church with the moſt exquiſite Ornaments he could procure; he cauſed Religious Houſes to be built with greater Conveniency and State, and began the founding of Hoſpitals. Having long labour'd by indefatigable diligence to keep things in an even Courſe, during the Reign of the Conqueror; and after his Death, ſeeing his Succeſſor (who was eſtabliſh'd in his Throne by his means chiefly) to fail his Expectation, and foreſeeing by his long Experience the ill tendency of the preſent Management, he began (with his Friends) much to lament the tediouſneſs of Life, which he ſhortly after was remov'd out of by a gentle Sickneſs, which neither hinder'd his Speech nor Memory; a thing which he often deſir'd of God. William

William Fitz-Auber

Fitz-Auber, who (as is above mention'd) was a principal Counſellor and Inſtrument in the Invaſion of England, and for that end furniſh'd the King with forty Ships at his own Charge, was a Man of a great Eſtate, but of an Heart larger than any Riches could ſuffice. He was ſo liberal to Soldiers, that the King himſelf often check'd his Profuſeneſs; and ſo kind, that he made a Law, (for that Power the Noblemen of thoſe times had in their Provinces) that in the County of Hereford no Man of War or Soldier ſhould be fined for any Offence whatſoever above ſeven Shillings; whereas in other Countries, upon the leaſt Offence given their Lord, they were forced to pay twenty or twenty five Shillings. He was a moſt eminent Earl, a chief Counſellor in all State Affairs, both of England and Normandy, and always in higheſt Favour with the King; yet was not contented with theſe Honours, but through hopes of greater Riches and Command, went over into Flanders, where, by marrying Richeld the Widow of Baldwin VI. Duke of Flanders, he deſign'd to get into that Government in the Minority of Arnulph her Son: But Robert de Friſon his Uncle, who was call'd to govern by the People, becauſe of the Exactions of Richeld, kept ſo ſtrong poſſeſſion of that Dukedom, that Fitz-Auber was forced to recover it by the Sword, which before he had done he was by ſurprize ſlain. And indeed it was the Fate of the Conqueror to ſee moſt of thoſe Men, who had been the principal Actors in all his Fortunes, dead before him, as Beaumont, Montfort, Harcourt, Hugh de Gourney, Viſcount Neele, Hugh de Mortimer, Count de Vannes, &c. Himſelf laſt of all, having lain ſick a little time at Rouen, and diſpos'd of his Eſtate, dy'd in the ſeventy fourth Year of his Age, and one and twentieth Year of his Reign [c]. His Corps, tho' of ſo great a Monarch, is ſaid to have lain three Days quite neglected, his Servants minding more to provide for themſelves, than to attend upon him: At laſt his youngeſt Son Henry cauſed it to be convey'd to his Abby at Caen [d]. He was well attended to the Gates of the City; but there happening a Fire juſt at their entring into the Town, the Corps was again wholly deſerted, the Company all running to quench the Flames. After that was done, and the Body was carry'd to the Monaſtery, and ready to be bury'd, a Gentleman of Note [e] ſtands up, and with angry Countenance forbids his Burial in that place, claiming the Ground for his Inheritance, deſcended to him from his Anceſtors, but taken from him at the building of that Abby; appealing to Rou, their firſt Founder, for Juſtice; whereupon Henry was forced to compound with him for an Annual Rent. So hard was it for him [f], who had ſo large Dominions in his Life, to find a ſmall place for his Burial, which he could not get but by Purchaſe: Men eſteeming a living Dog more than a Dead Lyon, and moſt ready to trample upon thoſe dead, which they fear'd moſt when they were alive.

His Children.

He had a numerous Iſſue by Maud his Wife, viz. four Sons and ſix Daughters. To Robert his eldeſt Son he left the Dutchy of Normandy, to [g] William his third Son the Kingdom of England, and to Henry his youngeſt all his Treaſure, with an Annual Penſion to be paid him by his Brothers. Richard, who was his ſecond Son and his Darling, [a] Yet was not this King ſo blindly devoted either to Lanfranc's Wiſdom or Piety; for when Lanfranc labour'd much with him to ſwear Fealty to the Pope, as holding the Crown of England from him, tho' he look'd upon it as rather a piece of his Piety than Policy, yet he would never be induc'd to do it, becauſe, as he alledg'd, none of his Predeceſſors the Kings of England had ever done it. The Letter he wrote to the Pope on this occaſion is to be ſeen in Mr. Selden's Notes on Eadmerus. He was ſo jealous of his Power both in Spirituals as well as Temporals, that he would not ſuffer the Atchbiſhop to call a Synod without his Leave.

[b] And for this Reaſon 'tis very probable it was, that when Gregory the VII[th] impos'd Cœlibacy upon the Clergy of England, and commanded that none ſhould hear the Maſſes of any that were marry'd; Lanfranc was very moderate in putting the Injunction in practiſe, and would part none of the Clergy from their Wives, tho' he would ordain none that were marry'd; as judging, perhaps, that true Piety could hardly thrive, nor the Clergy ever become regularly good, if Marriage were ſtrictly forbidden.

[c] This Account of his Age is taken from Polydore Virgil, and is not true. William of Malmſbury ſays, 'twas in the 59th Year of his Age; Ordericus Vitalis, in his ſixty firſt Year; and Sir John Hayward, in his ſixty fourth.

[d] His Corps was abandon'd as ſoon as the Breath was out of his Body by all his Servants; and 'twas not his Son Henry that caus'd him to be convey'd to Caen, but William Archbiſhop of Roan: The Corps being firſt embalm'd at the Charge of one Herlwyn, a Country Knight.

[e] Anſelm Fitz Arthur. [f] Henry his youngeſt Son paid Fitz Arthur one Hundred Pounds for the Ground.

[g] In his Dying Speech he ſaid, He would conſtitute no Heir to the Realm of England, but would commend it to God; becauſe he poſſeſs'd not that Honour by Right of Inheritance, but by the Inſtinct of God, Effuſion of Blood, and Perjury of Harold. Yet he wiſh'd that his Son William, who had been ever obedient to him, might flouriſh in it; and to that end, he ſent him with a Letter to Lanfranc. He left Henry five thouſand Marks only. Ord. Vital.

a Prince of great Hope, was slain by a Stag as he was hunting in the New Forest in Hampshire; the first Instance how fatal that Place would prove to the Royal Family, which had been made out of the Estates, and by the Wrongs of so many: For not long after William Rufus was slain there also by an Arrow, and Richard the Son of Robert Duke of Normandy brake his Neck by a Fall there, very sad Allays to those Pleasures, which we take by other Mens Injuries, yet the deserved Rewards of Injustice and Oppression. His eldest Daughter Cicilia was made a Nun, Constance the second was married to Allayn Earl of Britain, Adela to Stephen Earl of Bloys, by whom among other Issue she had King Stephen. In her Age she became a Nun, according to the Devotion of those Times, in which the Persons of greatest Quality did not refuse a Retirement for Religion sake. Gundred the fourth Daughter was married to William de Warren Earl of Surrey, the other two Ela and Margaret, died before Marriage.

His Person.

He was of a proportionable Stature, comely Personage [a], and good Presence either riding, sitting, or standing, till by Age he grew corpulent and unweildy; of so healthy and strong a Constituion, that he never had any Sickness till a few Months before his Death. He had so great a Strength of Body, that very few could bend his Bow; and tho' he was above fifty Years old when he enter'd England, yet his Age had not in the least impaired him, as his Activity and indefatigable Labour in the Expedition proved. He was of an undaunted Courage, sagacious Wit and ripe Judgment, as his many Encounters with the French and Danes do evidently shew, who were a People more powerful both in Men and Shipping than himself; yet by his Policy and Bravery he was able to match, if not overmatch them both. His Devotion was very exemplary and admirable, as the Clergy of that time, who never loved him, do acknowledge. His great Mercy appeared in often pardoning and receiving into Favour those who had rebelled against him; and tho' he was troubled with so many Rebellions by the English Nobles, yet he never executed but one of them, and that was Waltheof, who had notoriously broke his Faith with him twice before; and those whom he kept Prisoners in Normandy as the Earls Morchar and Siward, with Wolfnoth, the Brother of Harold, and others, he (out of Compassion to them) releas'd a little before his Death. He was so far from Suspicion (a great sign of Magnanimity) that he allowed Edgar his Competitor for his Crown the Freedom of his Court, at his Desire furnished him out for the Holy War, where he behaved himself bravely, and got great Reputation by his Actions from the Emperors of Greece and Germany, which might have been accounted dangerous, because of his relation to the latter. He was a Benefactor to nine Abbies of Monks, and one of Nuns, founded by his Ancestors in Normandy; and during his Reign were founded either by his Encouragement, or Charge, seven Monasteries and six Nunneries in the same Province. With those Forts (as he said) he furnished Normandy, that they might fight against the World and Flesh. In England he founded one great Abby near the Place where he got the Victory over Harold, and in Memory of it, call'd it Battle-Abby; and two Nunneries, one at Hinching-Brook in Huntingdonshire, and the other at Armthwayt in Cumberland, besides many other publick Works. He was very magnificent in his Festival Entertainments, which he observed with great Solemnity and Ceremony, which naturally beget Reverence; keeping his Christmas at Gloceſter, his Easter at Winchester, and his Whitsuntide at Westminster, whither he then summoned all his Nobility, that Embassadors and Strangers might see his State and liberal Expences, and was always at those times very mild and obliging. These Ceremonies William Rufus kept up, but Henry laid them aside.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES in the Reign of William I.

IN the eleventh Year of his Reign, on the 27th of March, there was a general Earthquake in England, and in the Winter following a Frost, which continu'd from the 1st of November to the middle of April. On the 16th of the same Month a Comet appear'd about six in the Morning, in fine Weather.

In his 15th Year another Earthquake happen'd, the more terrible because it came with a hideous Noise; and in his 20th Year there fell such abundance of Rain, that the Floods were universal thro' the Kingdom; and the Springs rising in several Hills, so soften'd and decay'd the Foundations of them that they fell down, and some Villages were overwhelm'd in their Fall. Sir J. Hayward.

In the last Year of his Reign Holinshead reports, there was a burning Fever among the People, a Murrain among the Cattel, and at the same time Fowl, as Cocks, Hens, Geese, and Peacocks, fled from their Owners Yards to the Woods, and became wild. On the 7th of July, St. Paul's Church in London was burnt.

In his Reign William Bishop of Durham founded the University College in Oxford. The Use of the Long-Bow, which render'd the English Nation so famous afterwards, was brought first into England by this Prince.

The most Illustrious Persons in the Reign of William the Norman were

Waltheof Son of Siward, Earl of Northumberland; Edrick Sylvaticus, or the Forester; Edwin Earl of Mercia, and Earl Morchar, brave Englishmen, and zealous Assertors of their Liberty against the Normans; of whom the most famous were Roger de Breteuil Earl of Hereford; Ralph de Wayir Earl of Norfolk, and Roger Mowbray the Norman Earl of Northumberland.

Of Men of Learning: The most Eminent in his Time were

William of Poictiers the King's Chaplain; Hirman the Arch-deacon; Ingulph Abbot of Croyland in Lincolnshire; Osborn a Monk of Dover, who wrote the Life of Dunstan; Robert Bishop of Hereford; Folcard a Benedictine Monk, he wrote the Life of Sir John of Beverly; Arch-bishop Lanfranc, who, tho' a Lombard by Birth, was an Englishman by Affection, he wrote this King's Life. In his time also flourish'd Marianus Scotus, born in Ireland in the Year 1028. He wrote an English History and a general History of Europe interwoven with it, which he brought down to the Year 1083. He left Ireland Anno 1056. and went to Germany, where he became a Monk of St. Martin's Convent at Mentz, and died there Anno 1086.

KING WILLIAM THE II.nd

THE LIFE and REIGN OF WILLIAM II.

A. D. 1087. Reg. 1.

William Rufus made King of England.

WILLIAM the II[d], Son to the Conqueror, being with his Father at Rouen at his Death, had his desires so fix'd upon the Crown of England, that neglecting his Father's Funeral, he hasten'd with all speed thither, and [a] by the Mediation of Lanfranc, and his own large Bounty and Promises, obtain'd it [b], according to his Father's Will, whom by his dutiful Behaviour he had much endear'd to himself, especially after the Abdication of his eldest Son Robert. He was a Prince more Gallant than Good; and having been bred up to Warlike Actions, in which he was generally on the fortunate side, was rough and proud by Nature, and grew much more so by the addition of Sovereignty, which enabled him through the heat of Youth to do several irregular Acts, to his own eternal Dishonour, as well as the loss of his Subjects Love: Coming to the Crown not by Succession, and Right of Primogeniture, but by his Father's Will only, (for his elder Brother Robert was alive, and the Kingdom by Inheritance belong'd to him) he found it absolutely necessary to hold the Possession of it by the good-will of his Subjects, which he knew no better way to purchase than by large Promises of Favours and Kindness, and large Gifts to those that were more likely to be wrought upon to disturb it. His Subjects consisted of two sorts of People, Normans and English: The Normans were to be engag'd to him chiefly by Money; and therefore to gain them he went presently after his Coronation to Winchester, where his Father's Treasure [c] lay, and emptied it out all to them; by which profuse Liberality, tho' he gain'd the Love of many, yet he lost more than he won, his Fund being not large enough to content all, and made himself so poor ever after, that through meer necessity he was forc'd to be burthensome to his Subjects, and made use of many dishonourable ways of extorting Money from them. The English were to be secured by nothing so much as the Grant of their ancient Liberties; wherefore he gave them larger Promises than was suitable to his State and Dignity, which afterward failing in the performance of, he got himself more hatred than otherwise he would have had; yet he setled himself for the present, till Time discover'd that.

Robert Duke of Normany being settled in his Dutchy [d], which was the height of his Ambition in his Father's Life-time, was not contented with that only after his Death, but grudg'd to see himself a small Prince, and his younger Brother a potent King: Whereupon he contriv'd the speediest ways he could to recover his Inheritance, and ruine his Brother's Fortune in the beginning of it. He knew he had a strong Party for him in England, and his Uncle Odo, Roger de Montgomery, Earl of Shrewsbury, and some others of the Nobility, were at hand to encourage him to it: But he wanted Money for so great an Enterprize, which he had no other ways to raise so speedily, as by taking it of his younger Brother Henry, to whom his Father and Mother had left a great Treasure. Of him therefore by engaging the Country of Constantine, a Province in Normandy, he borrow'd such large Sums, as enabled him to levy a good Army for England. But William newly invested in his Crown, tho' well enough prepar'd for any Invasion, yet chose rather to purchase a present Peace (by the Mediation of the Nobility on both sides) till Time had better setled him in his Government, than to raise such Heats on both sides by a War as could not be easily allay'd; and so an Agreement was made, That William should hold the Kingdom of England during his Life, paying Robert three thousand Marks per Annum. Robert having thus compounded the Difference with his Brother William, turn'd his Forces upon his Brother Henry, by whose help he had rais'd them, and took the Country of Constantine from him, without paying the Money for which it was engag'd. This Injustice from Robert was very pleasing to William, who hearing of it upbraided Henry with the Gain of the Usury of that Money which he had lent to deprive him of his Crown. Henry being thus deserted by both his Brothers, and having no place to live in free from danger from them, he surprized the Castle of Mount S. Michael, and fortify'd it; getting assistance from Hugh Earl of Britain, who for his Money supply him with plenty of Soldiers out of Britain, who spoil'd and ravag'd the Countries of Constantine and Bessin.

Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, being return'd into England from his Imprisonment in Normandy, and restor'd to his Earldom of Kent, was not yet contented in so much an inferiour station to what he

A. D. 1088. Reg. 2.

[a] The Nobility were more inclin'd to Robert than William, but by Lanfranc's Piety and Persuasions were gain'd to fix at last upon William, and so he was crown'd by Lanfranc, Sept. 6. 1087.

[b] William the Second, surnam'd Rufus, or the Red, from his yellow Hair, was declar'd King on the 9th of September, and crown'd the 11th of October. Sir John Hayward.

[c] 'Tis said, the Treasure consisted of sixty thousand Pounds in Money, (a prodigious Sum in those Days) besides Jewels, Gold and Plate.

[d] Duke Robert was in Germany when his Father dy'd; and by his absence gave his Brother William time to settle himself in the Throne of England.

had formerly been in, but envy'd Lanfranc the Honour he had ſpoil'd him of, to be the only Man at the Helm, by whoſe Counſels all things were manag'd; and to recover it again, thought 'twould be the ſpeedieſt courſe to change the King. To this end he enter'd into a Plot with as many Norman Lords as he found inclineable to a Change, to ſet up Robert Duke of Normandy, and ſent for him to come over with ſpeed with all the Power he could bring out of Normandy. In the mean time theſe Conſpirators, to diſtract the King's Forces, and ſo leave Robert an eaſie entrance into the Kingdom, began in divers parts of the Nation to revolt from their Allegiance. Geoffrey Biſhop of Conſtance, with his Nephew Robert de Mowbray Earl of Northumberland, fortify'd Briſtol, and took in the Country round about; Robert de Bigod made a ſtrong Party in Norfolk; Hugh de Grandemenill gather'd Forces about Leiceſter; Robert de Mongomery, Earl of Shrewſbury, had a conſiderable Body of Welſhmen, and others thereabouts, with whom he ſet forward; and being accompanied with William Biſhop of Durham, Bernard de Newmarch, Roger Lacy and Ralph Mortimer, took Worceſter, and ſecured themſelves in it. Odo himſelf fortify'd the Caſtle of Rocheſter, and made good all the Coaſts of Kent. So that had Robert come with his Army out of Normandy, as they expected, and in the midſt of theſe Diſtractions purſu'd his Claim, he had infallibly got the Crown; but he ſtaying too long, gave the King time to confirm his Friends, undermine his Enemies, and ſtrengthen himſelf by the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, to whom having granted a releaſe from their former Tribute, eaſed them of their Grievances, and reſtored them to their ancient Freedom, in hunting in all his Woods and Foreſts; he made them ſo entirely his, and ſo ready to ſerve him, that he ſoon became powerful enough to vanquiſh all the Conſpirators; by which the Normans were convinc'd, that the Engliſh could eaſily have conquer'd them, had they had an Head to lead them againſt them. Mongomery came over to the King, and the reſt were ſoon repreſs'd. Odo's Faction in Kent was the ſtrongeſt, and the laſt conquer'd. The King coming with his Army againſt them, firſt attack'd the Caſtle of Tunbridge, and took it; then Pemſey, where Odo was, who was forc'd to yield it to the King, and promiſed that the like ſhould be done at Rocheſter, by Euſtace Earl of Bologne, and the Earl of Mortaigne, who held it out againſt him. But when he was brought thither to effect it, the Beſieged taking him in, detain'd him, and held out ſtoutly againſt the King's Forces, upon a falſe Information, that

Duke Robert was landed at Southampton; but at laſt were forced to reſign, and retire into France, and Odo was compelled to abjure the Kingdom [a]. The danger being thus blown over in England, William, to keep his Brother employ'd at home, and diſcourage him from all future attempts upon the Kingdom of England, tranſports an Army into Normandy to waſte and diſturb his Brother's Dominions. At his firſt Entrance he obtain'd S. Valery, and after Albemarle, with the whole Countries of Eu, Feſcamp, the Abbacy of Mount S. Michael, Cherburge, and other places. Robert in this diſtreſs ſeeks for aid from Philip King of France, and was promis'd it; but as he was marching towards Normandy with his Army, King William by Money ſo prevail'd with him to ſtand Neuter in the Quarrel, that he return'd without doing Robert any good; by which means he was forced to clap up a diſhonourable Peace upon theſe Articles, concluded between them at Cane in Normandy, viz. 1. That King William ſhould hold the County of Eu, Feſcamp, and other places, which he had bought, and were deliver'd unto him, by William Earl of Eu, and Stephen Earl of Aumerl, Siſter's Son to William the Firſt. 2. That he ſhould aſſiſt Robert to recover all thoſe Places which belong'd to his Father, and were taken away from his Dutchy. 3. That ſuch Normans as had forfeited their Eſtates in England, by joyning with Robert, ſhould be reſtor'd to them. 4. That the Surviver of either of them ſhould ſucceed to the Dominions both of England and Normandy.

1091. Reg. 4.

After the Concluſion of this Peace by the Mediation of the King of France, and while King William's Army remain'd in the Field, Robert deſired his aſſiſtance againſt his Brother Henry, who ſtill kept the Fort of Mount S. Michael, and defended himſelf in it. The two Brothers beſieg'd it forty Days, with little damage to either ſide. But King William himſelf, who walking one day on the Shoar by the Caſtle was ſo violently aſſaulted by three Perſons, who among others ſallied out of it, that his Horſe was kill'd, his Breaſtplate broken, and himſelf caſt on the Ground; being hardly able to defend himſelf, till his Men could come to his reſcue. In the end Henry was reduced to extream want of Drink and Water, altho' he had ſufficient quantities of other Proviſion in the Fort, and ſends to Duke Robert, whom he knew to be of the more mild and compaſſionate Temper, to permit him liberty to ſupply himſelf with them. Robert immediately ſends him a Tun of Wine, and grants him a Truce for one Day to furniſh himſelf with Water; which, when William underſtood, he was diſpleaſed. But Robert reply'd, That it was very Inhumane to deny a Brother Meat and Drink, who crav'd it; for if he periſh'd, they had no other Brother: Which words wrought ſo upon William, that not long after they ſent for Henry, and came to an agreement, That he ſhould hold the Country of Conſtantine in Mortgage till Robert had paid his Money [b]; for which a Day was appointed, when he was to receive it at Rouen. This Agreement King William farther'd, that he might draw as much Treaſure from Robert as he could, whom by this Voyage he had not only impoveriſh'd, but poſſeſs'd himſelf of a ſafe and continual Landing-place in part of his Dutchy, and cauſed him to baniſh out of Normandy Edgar Atheling, whom Robert kept in his Court to awe his Brother. Beſides, he ſo prevail'd with Robert, either by Promiſes of Money, or otherways, that he brought him with him into England, and carry'd him along with him in his Expedition againſt Malcolm King of Scots, who had invaded his Dominions in his abſence; but the Difference being adjuſted without Arms [c], they ſoon return'd. And Robert not long after went into Normandy again, much diſſatisfy'd at his Diſappointment by his Brother; and becauſe he had not Money to diſcharge his Brother's Debt, according to his Promiſe, he was reſolv'd to get a Diſcharge from it without; and meeting Henry at Rouen upon the day appointed, committed him to Priſon; and to get a Releaſe, forced him to renounce his Claim to the Country of Conſtantine, and ſwear to pretend no Title to any thing in Normandy. Henry having by this means got his Freedom, fled to Philip King of France, and complain'd of this groſs Injuſtice done him by his Brother; Philip gave him kind Entertainment, but he remain'd there not long, before a Knight of Normandy, named Hachard, undertaking to put him into the ſtrong Fort of Dampfront without the knowledge of his Brother Robert, convey'd him in diſguiſe out of that Court, and cauſed the Town and Caſtle to be reſign'd up to him; by which ſoon after he made himſelf Maſter of the Country of Paſſays, which lay about it, and a good part of Conſtantine, having the private aſſiſtance of his Brother William, Richard de Rivieres, and Roger de Mannevile. Duke Robert ſeeing Henry again ſet up againſt him, levies an Army to recover Dampfront; but finding that he was ſupported by his Brother the King of England, he enveighs againſt him, as falſe and perfidious to him, and they became more bitter Enemies than they had ever been before. William being incens'd at this, paſs'd over into Normandy with a great Army, but rather to terrrifie than fight his Brother, (for William, tho' he deſir'd to be great with the Sword, yet car'd not how little he made uſe of it, if he could obtain his ends by any other means.) Many ſmall Skirmiſhes paſs'd between them; but in the concluſion, a Peace was propounded, to which William ſeem'd very averſe, that he might obtain what Conditions he pleaſed, and ſent for greater Forces into England, as if he reſolv'd to continue the War; but Robert being deſerted by the King of France, was forced to accept of a Peace at home upon any terms; which being made up, William order'd that his Army which he had ſent for out of England, and was come to the Sea-ſide ready to embark [a], ſhould be diſbanded, and upon the Payment of ten Shillings a Man diſmiſſed to their homes; which being gladly comply'd with, he was enabled to diſcharge his Expences in Normandy, and fee the French King.

King William having by this arbitrary Peace with his Brother ſecur'd himſelf from all Troubles in Normandy, reſolv'd to turn his Arms upon two Enemies at home, the Scots and Welſh; intending to reſtrain the former from hurting him and ſubdue the other. Malcolm, King of Scots, had ſeveral times in the King's abſence in Normandy much depopulated and waſted the Northern Parts of England, and was again entred into the Engliſh Marches as far as Cheſter, deſtroying the Country all along. William haſted to oppoſe him, and after many Rencounters they were brought to an Enterview; both Kings being more willing to have a Peace than ſeek it. The two Kings met at Gloceſter, but William carrying himſelf at a great diſtance, and expecting to have his Demands granted in every Particular, made Malcolm not only leſs yielding, who before was content to have the Confines of both Kingdoms determined by the Primates of them; but being incenſed at the Diſdain which William had ſhewed to him, tho' a Sovereign Prince, as well now as before, went home; and raiſing a great Army enter'd Northumberland, reſolving to deſtroy that Country and go farther. Robert de Mowbray, Earl of that County, ſeeing his Territories ſo miſerably haraſs'd and depopulated, and being a ſtout and valiant Soldier, raiſed what Force he could to oppoſe him without the King's Order; but not being ſtrong enough to enter a pitch Battel with him, lay in ambuſh for him where he was to paſs, and fell upon him ſo fiercely and boldly, that he ſlew Malcolm himſelf and his eldeſt Son Edward [b], the Grief of whoſe Deaths ſoon after brought the good Queen Margaret to her End. After the Death of Malcolm, the Scots choſe Dufnald his Brother King, and drove all the Engliſh out of their Nation, which were come thither either to attend the Queen, or ſecure themſelves from the Conqueror, and were preferred by Malcolm. But King William, to bring the Kingdom into their Legal Succeſſion, and have a King which might be beholding to his Power, aſſiſted Edgar the ſecond Son to Malcolm (who had ſerved him in his Wars) to obtain the Crown due to him as Heir by Succeſſion to it, and at length expelled Dufnald; and the Nation received Edgar, but deſtroyed all the Men which he brought with him out of England, capitulating with him, that he ſhould never more entertain Engliſh or Normans in his Service.

A. D. 1094. Reg. 7.

Malcolm King of Scots ſlain; and his Brother choſen King.

The State of Scotland being ſetled according to his Mind, he next turned his Arms upon Wales; for which he could not want a juſt Occaſion, the Welſh being ever ſtruggling for their Liberty, and attempting a faint Revenge upon the Engliſh and Normans. He went himſelf in Perſon upon this Expedition, with a purpoſe of depopulating that Country, which was ſo troubleſome to him; but the Welſh flying ſome into Mountains, and others into the Iſle of Angleſey, avoided his Fury. The King ſent Hugh Earl of Shrewſbury, and Hugh Earl of Cheſter againſt the latter, who got the Iſle into their Power by Surprize, but uſed their Victory with horrid Cruelty and Barbarity; putting out the Eyes, and cutting off the Noſes, Hands and Arms of their poor Captives without Mercy, or Diſtinction of Age or Sex. But this Inhumanity was by a juſt Providence revenged upon Shrewſbury almoſt in the very Fact: For Magnus, Son of Olanus Son of Harold Harfager, who had lately taken the Iſles of Orkney, and was coming to land at Angleſey in his Paſſage that way on the Sea, being oppoſed by theſe Earls with that ſmall Force they had, wounded the Earl of Shrewſbury in the Eye with a Shot, and beat him into the Sea; ſo that he ſuffer'd a double Death for the unſpeakable Cruelties he had been guilty of to others [c]. This War being hardly finiſh'd, a Conſpiracy broke out in the Heart of the Kingdom, contriv'd by Robert Mowbray Earl of Northumberland, William D'Ou, and many others, whoſe Deſign was to have deſtroy'd the King, and raiſed Stephen Earl of Albemarle, his Aunt's Son, to the Crown. This Plot was greater Trouble than Danger to the King; for by his ſpeedy advance againſt them, and onſet upon them with the greateſt Strength of the Kingdom, which joyned with him to ſuppreſs them; he quaſh'd their Deſign, and got moſt of the Conſpirators into his Power, which he puniſhed with a Severity equal, if not beyond the Crime. The Earl he committed to the Caſtle of Windſor; William D'Ou, at a Council at Saliſbury, being overcome in a Duel (the Tryal then uſed in ſuch caſes) had his Eyes put out,

[a] King William the Second did not want more Forces than he had; but to raiſe Money, he levy'd twenty thouſand Engliſhmen, and commanded them to march to the Sea-ſide to be ſhipp'd for Normandy: When they came there, he caus'd Ralph his Treaſurer to offer them, that to ſave the Nation ſo many Men, and themſelves the Perils they were to run, as many of them as wou'd pay ten Shillings ſhou'd be diſcharg'd; upon which, they all paid down their Money and went home. *Mat. and his Privy Members cut off; William de Alveric, his Sewer, a Man of a goodly Perſonage and allied to him, was condemned to be hanged; tho' both in his Confeſſion to Oſmond the Biſhop [a], who was preſent, and to all the People as he paſs'd along to his Execution, he gave ſuch Proofs of his Innocency, that he was thought to have ſuffer'd wrongfully from the King, who was ſo anger'd by this Revolt, that he not only puniſhed the Actors with too much Severity, but retained an implacable Temper of Mind ever after.

1096. Reg. 9. The Holy War began, and how.

And certainly this ill Humour would have created him continual Diſturbances at home, had there not happen'd a very fortunate Juncture of Affairs, which not only eaſed him, but moſt of the Kingdoms of Europe, which were broken in pieces with Factions and Schiſms of their moſt troubleſome Members. Pope Urban being ſenſible of the lamentable Diſtraction of Chriſtendom, thought it the beſt Expedient to end them, to draw their Thoughts and Deſigns another way, and to that end called a Council at Clermont in Avergne [b]; where having propounded to the Princes and Biſhops aſſembled, the miſerable Condition of the Chriſtians at Jeruſalem under the Turks, he earneſtly exhorted them to joyn their Forces to recover the Holy Land out of the hands of the Infidels, telling them, 'That it 'was an Action not only juſt, but ſuch as would 'get them an indelible Honour in this World, 'as well as Eternal Glory in a future. This Motion being ſeconded with the earneſt Perſuaſions, and active Zeal of Peter the Hermit of Amiens; and meeting with a general Inclination to Religion, and ſuch Acts of Goodneſs, prevailed ſo much with all ſorts of the People, that none were accounted to be of any real Worth or Piety, which deſired to be excuſed from the Expedition: Inſomuch, that many great Princes paſſed away their whole Eſtates, and left their Kingdoms to engage in this noble Action; and all ſorts of People flocked ſo faſt to this Service, that in a little time they made up an Army of three hundred thouſand, or, as ſome ſay, ſeven hundred thouſand Men. Godfrey of Bouillon, Nephew and Heir to the Duke of Lorrain, a generous Prince, bred in the Wars of the Emperour Henry IV. was the firſt that offer'd himſelf to undertake this famous Voyage, whom his Brothers Euſtace and Baldwin were reſolved to accompany. Their Example invited Hugh le Grand, Count de Vermandois, Brother to Philip King of France, Robert Duke of Normandy, Robert Friſon Earl of Flanders, Stephen Earl of Blois, and Chartres Aimar Biſhop of Puy, William Biſhop of Orange, Raimund Earl of Tholouſe, Baldwin Earl of Hainault, Baldwin Earl of Rethel, and Garnier Earl of Gretz, Harpin Earl of Bourges, Iſoard Earl of Dy, Rambald Earl of Orange, Guillaum Count de Foreſts, Stephen Earl of Aumaul, Hugh Earl of S. Poll, Rotron Earl of Percbe, and ſome others, out of France, Germany, and the Countries adjoyning. Italy ſent Bohemond Duke of Apulia; and England, Beauchampe, with many others, whoſe Names are now loſt. Spain could afford none, becauſe they were greatly afflicted at that time with the Inroads of the Sarazens. theſe Princes and Noble Perſons ſold or engaged their Dominions and Poſſeſſions to furniſh themſelves out for this brave Attempt. Godfrey ſold the Dutchy of Bologne to Hubert Biſhop of Liege, and Metz to the Citizens. Baldwin his Brother ſold the Earldom of Verdon to Richard Biſhop of that Province, and Euſtace ſold all his Eſtate to the Church, Harpin Earl of Bourges ſold his Earldom to Philip King of France, and Robert mortgaged his Dutchy of Normandy, Earldom of Main, and all he had, to his Brother William King of England [c]. Thus did the Pope weaken not only the Empire, and eaſed the Church of that long Conteſt about Inveſtitures of Biſhops; but alſo mightily enriched the Eccleſiaſtical Perſons, who purchaſed moſt of the Temporalities, which the Undertakers left, and ſo became much greater than they had been before; eſpecially in France, and afterwards in England, when Richard the Firſt undertook the ſame Voyage. This War, notwithſtanding it was attended with infinite Hazards and Difficulties, Preſſures and Wants, was kept on foot almoſt three hundred Years, and by it were conſumed an infinite Treaſure, and moſt of the braveſt Men of theſe Weſtern Parts of the World, eſpecially in France; for in Italy and Germany the Pope kept many back by Diſpenſation, who were his Friends, and would elſe have gone, merely to maintain his Cauſe againſt the Emperor; who yet ſtruggled with him, but at laſt the Pope prevailed. The Zeal of theſe Chriſtian Princes was admirable, but did little or no good; for inſtead of driving the Enemy out of the Chriſtian Countries, they diſcover'd their own Weakneſs, and encourag'd the Infidels to make their Attempts upon Europe, of which ſince they have gained ſome of the faireſt Provinces.

A. D. 1097. Reg. 10.

William gets Normandy.

By this War William was rid of his elder Brother, and a troubleſome Competitor, had the Poſſeſſion of Normandy during his Reign, and became an abſolute Prince in both. But this want of an outward Enemy made him take Liberty to do many irregular and arbitrary things, whereby he loſt the Love of his People in general, and brought upon himſelf the Hatred both of the Clergy and Laity. For to raiſe this great Sum, which he had agreed to furniſh Robert with for his Journey into the Holy Land, he made uſe of the moſt rigorous and unjuſt ways of exacting Money of the People, ſeized upon the vacant Livings and Preferments of the Clergy, and kept them in his own hands to enjoy the Profits of them. After the Death of Lanfranc, he kept the Arch-biſhoprick of Canterbury vacant four Years, and had held it longer; but that falling ſick of a dangerous Diſtemper at Gloceſter, the Clergy in his Sickneſs convinc'd him ſo much of the Sinfulneſs of the Fact, that he vow'd that he would fill up all Vacancies if he recover'd, which indeed he did, but with ſome Unwillingneſs. Anſelm, an Italian born, but bred up in Normandy, was preferred to the See of Canterbury: But what through his own Stubbornneſs and the King's firm Adherence to his Regal Prerogative, he never enjoyed it quietly. For between them began the Controverſy about Inveſtitures of Biſhops, and other Privileges of the Church, which was ſo hotly maintained by his Succeſſors; and Anſelm not yielding to the King's Will, or rather Right, was forced to leave the Nation; and the King aſſum'd his Biſhoprick again, and took all the Profits of it, and after this became ſo arbitrary a Poſſeſſor of Church-Livings and Preferments, that he held in his hands at one time, beſide the See of Canterbury, the Biſhopricks of Winchester and Sarum, and eleven Abbies, of which he had all the Incomes. What he disposed of to others, fell usually to their Shares, who would give most [a] Money for them, and took Fines of Priests for Fornication. He vex'd Robert Bluet Bishop of Lincoln with Law-Suits, till he paid him 5000 l. And tho' he had much impoverish'd his Clergy, yet when he had laid this Tax upon them to pay his Brother, and they complain'd of Want, he answer'd them, That they had Shrines of Gold in their Churches, and for so holy a Work as this War against the Infidels was, they should not spare them [b]. He also took Money of the Jews, to cause such of them as were converted to Christianity to renounce it again, making greater benefit of their Apostacy than Conversion; wherein he discover'd something worse in his Nature than Covetousness, which is Atheism. Besides the Taxes which he impos'd upon the Laity, he set Informers to take notice of any small Irregularities committed by them, and inflicted severe Penalties upon them. And tho' these Actings were very odious and tyrannical, yet he wanted not some of great Name and Station to countenance them, as Ranulph Bishop of Durham, and some other Bishops, who suffer'd themselves to be corrupted, contrary to their Profession, to oppose the Clergy and awe the Laity. By these ill means he gather'd great Sums of Money, which he as lavishly expended, either in his Buildings, (which were the Castle upon Tine, the City of Carlisle, Westminster-Hall, and the Walls of the Tower of London) or else in his Prodigal Gifts to Strangers, as the King of France, and others, which brought him to extream want.

His Person and Courage.

He was of an indifferent Stature of Body, and well set, his Complexion was ruddy; and Hair inclining to yellow, whence he had his Name Rufus; he was bountiful to Soldiers, but austere to the Churchmen; he was of a rough and violent, but yet very couragious Spirit; of which we 1099. have this convincing Proof: As he was one day a hunting, a Messenger came in all haste out of Normandy, and told him how the City of Mans was surpriz'd and taken by Heli, Count de la Flesche, (who by his Wife pretended a Right to it, and was assisted by Fulke D'Angiers, the old Enemy of the Dukes of Normandy) but the Castle held out valiantly for him; yet, if it were not timely relieved, must surrender. The King immediately bid the Messenger return with all speed, and assure them in the Castle, that he would be with them in eight days, if Fortune hinder'd him not. And presently having inquir'd which way Mans lay of a Norman that stood by, rid directly towards the Sea-Coasts. His Attendants, tho' they admir'd his Resolution, yet advis'd him to stay a while to provide things necessary for the Journey, and a Force answerable to his design: But he reply'd, They that love me will follow me. Being arriv'd at Dartmouth, and desirous to go on Board a Ship ready to carry him over, the Master told him, That the Weather was so bad, and Sea so rough, his Passage would be very dangerous: But he said, Tush, set forward; I never yet hear'd of a King that was drowned. Whereupon the Master setting sail, he arriv'd at [c] Harfleu by break of Day, sends for his Captains and Men of War to attend him at Mans, and accordingly arriv'd there upon the Day appointed. Count de la Flesche, after his coming, was not able to hold out the Siege, but after some Skirmishes releas'd the City, and was himself taken by a Stratagem, and brought a Prisoner to Rouen. Here being brought into the King's Presence, the King jested upon him to his Face, as not having Courage or Policy enough to withstand him; at which being more enrag'd, than cast down, he said, That he was made a Prisoner more by Chance than Force; and that, were he at liberty again, he would leave the King but little Land on that side the Sea. The King hearing these words, instantly set him at liberty, and giving him a good Horse, bid him go and do his worst. Which brave Act had such an effect upon the Count, that he gave over all Opposition, and came soon after to a Peace with the King. After this Success, the King return'd home with great Jollity, feasted his Nobility magnificently in his new Hall [d] at Westminster, which was then lately finish'd, with which he found fault for being built too little; saying, That it was fitter for a Chamber, than a Hall for a King of England; and took a Platform to build it larger. After these Demonstrations of Joy were over, he spent some time in setling his publick Affairs, and then betook himself wholly to the Pleasure of Peace; and being a hunting with his Brother Henry in the New-Forest, Walter Tirrell a Norman [e], and his Kinsman, shooting at a Deer, (whether mistaking his Mark or not, is uncertain) shot him to the Heart [f], and so he immediately dy'd, in the thirteenth Year of his Reign, and the forty fourth of his Age. A Prince, who for the first two Years of his Reign, while either through Fear or Design he follow'd the wise Counsel of Lanfranc, behav'd himself as one of the best of Princes, and might have had an absolute Government of all his Subjects, if he had continu'd to seek it by endearing Acts; but seeking to establish it by Force, made both himself and People miserable.

[a] Yet that he approv'd not the Simoniacal Buyers of Church-Promotions, though his Necessities put him upon such sinister means and ways of raising Money, appears from this Instance: That the King having the Presidency of an Abby in his hands, which he resolv'd to dispose of, two Monks came to him, and bid him large Sums for it, striving to outvy each other in purchasing it; a third stood by, as an Attendant of him that should be preferr'd, the King asked him, What he wou'd give? To whom the Monk answer'd, Nothing, because I have vowed Poverty. This Answer pleas'd the King so well, that he presently gave it him; shewing, that tho' he let them have Promotions who bought them, yet he thought those deserv'd them best that would not purchase them.

[b] This King was not at all oblig'd to the Monks for the Character they gave of him, neither were they oblig'd to him for his Favour. He hated their Covetousness and Arrogance, and had more Religion, or less Superstition, than any of them; if what is said of him be true, that he should openly declare, He believ'd no Saint cou'd profit any one in the Lord's sight; and that neither he nor any wise Man would make Intercession either to Peter, or any other for help. Eadmerus, Hol. p. 27.

REMARKABLE

Remarkable Occurrences in the Reign of William II.

In his ſecond Year there happen'd a dreadful Earthquake through the whole Kingdom, which was follow'd by a great ſcarcity of Fruit, and ſo late a Harveſt, that Corn was not full ripe at the end of November. Sir J. Hayw. Hiſt. Will. II.

On the 5th of October, in the Year 1091. there fell a violent Storm in ſeveral parts of England, eſpecially at Winchelſcomb in Gloceſterſhire, where the Steeple of the Church was thrown down by Thunder and Lightning, and the Crucifix with the Image of the Virgin Mary was broken to pieces. The Hurricane was follow'd by a noiſome Stink. Holinſhead.

Sir John Hayward adds, That there was alſo a thick Smoke which darken'd the Sky.

On the 17th of the ſame Month there happen'd a Storm of Wind, which was then S. W. the ſame that blew in the late Tempeſt, ſo dreadful to the whole Nation; and yet this we are about to mention ſeems to have been more fatal in the City of London, where it threw down above five hundred Houſes, and blew off the Roof of Bow-Church in Cheapſide, by the fall of which two Men were kill'd. The top of the Steeple at Saliſbury, and many Houſes were blown down. Holinſhead.

Sir J. H. ſays, It threw down ſix hundred and ſix Houſes in London; and that ſome Beams of Bow-Church twenty eight Foot long were driven ſo deep into the Ground by it, that not above four Foot remain'd in ſight. The Tower of London was alſo much broken. He adds farther, The next Year Oſmund Biſhop of Salisbury finiſh'd the Cathedral Church of Old Sarum, and the Steeple was fir'd by Lightning the fifth Day after the Conſecration of the Church: Which, perhaps, gave occaſion to Holinſhead's ſaying, that the damage was done to Saliſbury Church at the ſame time that the Roof of Bow-Church was blown off.

The Year 1094. was very remarkable for the Number and Faſhion of gliding Stars, which ſeem'd to daſh together in manner of a Conflict. Sir. J. H. Holinſhead, who is very particular in his account of the Seaſons, Weather, Plagues and Famine, goes farther, and affirms, That there was this Year ſo great Mortality of Men and Beaſts in England and Normandy, that the Ground lay untill'd in many places, which caus'd a ſevere Dearth.

Griſly and hideous Sights were ſeen in England, as Hoſts of Men fighting in the Air, Stars falling from Heaven, and other ſuch Wonders. The Ignorance and Superſtition of thoſe Ages have, we ſuppoſe, heighten'd the Terror of the unuſual Accidents in the Phænomena of Nature: But we are not of the Opinion of thoſe, who think there is nothing uſeful or entertaining in an Accuont of ſuch extraordinary Events and Appearances, nor are they below the Dignity of Hiſtory.

In the Year 1095. the eighth of this King's Reign, a Comet appear'd for fifteen Days together, the Tail pointing to the Eaſt. And in this Year Peter the Hermit preach'd up the Cruſade againſt the Infidels.

In the laſt Year of his Reign the Sea overflow'd in divers parts of England and Scotland; many Villages, Caſtles and Towns, much People, and a vaſt number of Cattel were overwhelm'd. At the ſame time the Lands that belong'd to Godwin Earl of Kent, Father to King Harold, were overflown and cover'd with Sand; and ever after they were call'd Godwin's Sands, as at this day Goodwin by Corruption. The Heavens often ſeem'd to flame with Fire, and frightful Forms and Apparitions were ſeen in the Air.

In this Reign the Monaſtery of Bath was joyn'd to the See of Wells, by John Biſhop of that Dioceſs; and the Church of Coventry to the Biſhoprick of Cheſter, by Robert Biſhop of that See.

KING HENRY THE I.st

THE LIFE and REIGN OF HENRY I.

A. D. 1100. Reg. 1.

Henry the third Son of the Conqueror choſen King of England.

HENRY the youngeſt Son of William the Firſt, being preſent at his Brother's Death, and born in England (which contributed much to his Advancement) was elected [a] and crowned King within four days after his Brother's Deceaſe; it being reported, that Robert, who ſhould have ſucceeded William [b], was choſen King of Jeruſalem; and 'twas not probable, that he would leave that Kingdom to govern this. But however, leſt Robert's return from the Holy Wars (who was indeed in Apulia, and haſting home) ſhould ſhake the preſent Inclinations of all People to ſettle him in the Throne, Henry uſed all Expedition poſſible to ſettle himſelf in the Poſſeſſion of it, which accordingly he effected; and that he might ſecure himſelf the firm Allegiance of the People, he began his Government with Acts of Kindneſs and Benefit to them, being a Prince not only learned, as thoſe times were, from whence he was called Beau-Clerk [c], but alſo of a mild Diſpoſition and crafty Judgment; ſo that he knew how to make them good Subjects, after they had once made him their King. And to effect this, he firſt began with the Clergy, and all Vacancies in the Church, which his Brother through Covetouſneſs had reſerved to himſelf, he filled up with learned and pious Men; Anſelm he recalled from his Baniſhment, and reſtored him to the Arch-biſhoprick of Canterbury, and in general ſettled the Church in all the Privileges which had been taken from it by his Predeceſſours. The Laity he not only freed from the Oppreſſions and heavy Exactions they had long lain under, but puniſhed thoſe Men who had been forward Inſtruments of promoting them, which mightily pleaſed the People. And becauſe Ralph Biſhop of Durham, a Man who by his Cunning and fair Tongue had raiſed himſelf from a very mean Condition to great Preferments and higheſt Employments under the late King William, being his chief Counſellour, was generally looked upon as the only Perſon who put his Maſter upon theſe intolerable Exactions and Irregularities, and ſo was odious to all; he committed him to a ſtreight and loathſome Priſon. All diſſolute and vicious Perſons were expelled his Court, and the People were allowed to uſe their Lights again after the Cover-feu Bell had gone, which William had prohibited them to their great Diſcontent. Many other [d] good Laws and Orders he made for the Government of his Kingdom; and to make himſelf the more popular and beloved of the Engliſh, he married into the Royal Blood of England, by taking to Wife, Maud the Daughter of Margaret, the late Queen of Scots, Niece to Edward Atheling, and ſo deſcended from Edmund Ironſide; a Lady of admirable Virtues and Goodneſs, worthy of ſo good a Mother, yet hardly won from her Vow of Virginity to become a King's Wife [e].

Henry having thus ſecured his Intereſts in England, as much as poſſible, was ſcarce ſettled in his Regal Honour, but that Robert returned from the Holy Wars into Normandy, and was received with a general Applauſe by his Subjects there. The News of his Arrival much looſen'd the Affections of many from King Henry, eſpecially of the Norman Nobility; who either out of Conſcience, or Diſcontent, deſire Robert ſhould be their Governour. In the firſt Year Robert only threaten'd, but in the ſecond he arriv'd with a ſtrong Army at Portſmouth to recover his Right, and to him flock'd great Numbers of Henry's Subjects, eſpecially Normans; ſo that the Armies on both ſides were very powerful. But when the two Brothers met, and were to encounter each other, Propoſals of Peace by Henry's Craft, were made to Robert (who was a very tender hearted Man, and eaſily won to it, though very valiant) to ſave the Expence of Chriſtian Blood; and it was concluded upon theſe Terms, 'That ſince Henry was born after 'his Father had obtained the Crown of England, 'and ſo was the eldeſt Son of William as King, 'though he was the youngeſt of him as Duke, 'and was now inveſted in the Regal Dignity by 'the Conſent of the Kingdom, he ſhould enjoy

[b] Robert behav'd himſelf with ſuch Courage and Conduct in this Expedition againſt the Turks, that when the Chriſtians had taken Jeruſalem, and thought it neceſſary to prefer one of the Chriſtian Princes to be King of it; it was with general Conſent tender'd to Robert, but he having juſt before heard of his Brother William's Death refus'd that Dignity, and haſten'd homeward to aſſume his Kingdom of England. Our Hiſtorians generally think, that Robert croſs'd Providence by this Refuſal; for he not only loſt England but Normandy, and was unfortunate in all his Actions ever after.

[c] He was born, after his Father had been crown'd, at Selby in Lincolnſhire; he ſtudy'd at Cambridge.

[e] Maud, Daughter of Malcolm King of the Scots by Margaret, Siſter to Edgar Etheling and Daughter to Edward Son to Edmund Ironſide, was next in Deſcent from the Saxon Kings to the Inheritance of the Crown of England, Edgar dying without Iſſue; by her Marriage with King Henry the Saxon and Norman Lines were united together, both in Blood and Title to the Crown.

Henry's Conteſt with Anſelm.

Henry being thus freed from his greateſt Fear, and ſettled in his Throne by Right, began to ſtand up more ſtoutly in aſſerting his Prerogative againſt the [a] Oppoſition of Arch-biſhop Anſelm, who refuſed to conſecrate that Biſhop that the King had preferred; alledging it to be a Violation of the ſacred Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, lately decreed (at Rome) concerning this Buſineſs. The King not willing to forego his Due, ſends an Embaſſage to Pope Paſchal, to repreſent his Right to the Inveſtiture of Biſhops and Collation of Eccleſiaſtical Dignities, which he received from his Predeceſſors Kings of England, who never were moleſted in this Prerogative, but of late. Anſelm immediately follows the Embaſſadors to Rome, there to make good his Cauſe; which ſo anger'd the King, that he baniſh'd him the Kingdom, and took his Biſhoprick immediately into his hands. The Pope boldly vindicated the Power aſſumed by the Church, but in the end ſeeing the Reſolution of Henry, and knowing that it was not in his Power to conſtrain him (who was engaged with the Emperor and other Princes in a Conteſt of the ſame Nature) he reſolved to deal with him by Perſuaſions to draw him to his Will; and to that end, with kind Letters ſolicits him to relinquiſh his Claim and promiſes him moſt ſolemnly, that he would further him in any Matters concerning his State. The King conſidering the Propoſals, and having ſome Deſigns in hand, which he judged might be better effected by the Connivance of the Church, conſents to the Pope's Deſires, and became an Example to other Princes of yielding to him in the ſame caſe: So Anſelm was recall'd, and his Ambaſſadors return'd with large Preſents from the Pope.

A Rebellion againſt Henry.

While theſe things were in hand, and tranſacting at Rome, there burſt out a Rebellion at home, which as it tended to the Deſtruction of the Authors of it, ſo it brought the King more eaſily to his ends than otherwiſe he could have expected. Robert Beleſme, Earl of Shrewſbury, Son to Roger Mongomery (a fiery young Man) preſuming upon his great Strength and numerous Friends, fortified his Caſtles of Shrewſbury, Bridg-North, Tick-hill and Arundel, and combining with the Welſhmen, deny'd the Obedience and Subjection to the King. Henry enraged at their Attempt, gathers a ſtrong Army, and marches towards him; and within thirty days, partly by Force and partly by Promiſes, diſperſed all his Aſſociates, and took all his Caſtles, except that of Arundell, wherein were Beleſme himſelf with his Brother Arnulphus and Roger de Poytiers, which held out ſomething longer; but at length was forced to yield upon Condition, that they might retire ſafely into Normandy, which the King readily granted, ſeeing he loſt nothing but two or three troubleſome Men, which were better any where than at home. Their Departure made well for the King, for he immediately ſeized upon the Earl's Eſtate, which made a conſiderable Addition to his Revenues; and being come into Normandy, he made way for his obtaining that alſo. For as ſoon as he came thither, he enter'd into a Familiarity with one of like Condition and deſperate Fortunes with himſelf (an exiled Perſon) whoſe Inſolency had likewiſe ſtripp'd him of all his Eſtate in England, and much waſted that in Normandy, viz. William Earl of Mortaigne, Son of Robert half Brother to William the Firſt. Theſe two Earls, with their Adherents, committed many Outrages, aſſaulting the King's Caſtles, unjuſtly detaining the Eſtate of Richard Earl of Cheſter, a Minor, and the King's Ward, and ſpoiling ſeveral other parts of the Country; and tho' they were complain'd of to Duke Robert, yet no redreſs was made, the Duke being either paſt Action, or giving himſelf up to a Monkiſh Sluggiſhneſs. Henry therefore was appealed to by the Normans, who ſending for his Brother, reproved him ſharply for his Sluggiſhneſs; which Robert took ſo ill, that giving vent to former Diſcontents, he joyned with thoſe mutinous Earls, and reſolved upon a freſh Revenge upon his Brother. The King being troubled in Conſcience at the Foulneſs of a Quarrel with his own Brother, was very dubious what to do, till Pope Paſchal ſent him ſome Letters to perſuade him with all the Arguments of Wit and Invention to engage in this War, which he ſaid, would not be a civil Diſſention, but a noble and memorable Benefit to his Country. The Countenance and Approbation of the Pope put Reſolution and Alacrity into the King, and now he proceeds boldly not as againſt a Brother, but a moſt dangerous National Enemy, paſſes into Normandy with his Army; and after many Difficulties and Loſſes of many worthy Men in a great Battel near the Caſtle of Tenechbray [b], defeated his Enemies and won Normandy, on the ſame day by Computation (wherein forty Years before) Normandy had over-run England. Robert, who ſtood in a fair Poſſibility of two Crowns, was now deprived of his Dutchy, brought a Priſoner into England and committed to the Caſtle of Cardiffe; where to add to his Miſery, he had the Misfortune of a long Life, living after this Loſs twenty ſix Years not only in Confinement, but moſt of it in utter Blindneſs [c], his Eyes being put out ſoon after his Impriſonment for endeavouring to make an eſcape. He was a Prince of great Excellency and Valour, of which he gave ſo many Proofs in his Voyage into the Holy Land, that he had the ſecond Command in the Army, and was very nigh being elected King of Jeruſalem. But his Diſobedience to his Father, and his Profuſeneſs in his Expences, for which he ſold, or engaged his whole Dutchy, are great Stains to his Credit, and made him thought ſo unfit for Government, that his Brother Henry had the Commendation of moſt Men for taking it from him.

For, 1. He planted within the Body of their Country a Colony of Flemmings, who being admitted into the Nation by William, who marry'd their Country-woman, and used their assistance in subduing the Kingdom, and after allow'd them to dwell in Cumberland, had been routed from their Habitations, by the Sea breaking in upon them, and were become now burthensome Guests to the Kingdom, and much disturb the Natives. These People, who were both numerous and stout, he setled [a] among the Welsh, and so not only eased his own People of their Grievance, but also put a curb upon that People to keep them in awe; for they soon made room for themselves, and kept all the adjoyning Countries in fear of them. And then, 2. He took the chief Men's Sons in the Country for Hostages, and so forced them [b] to be quiet. As for France, he had no suspicion of Disturbance from them, because their King Philip gave himself up wholly to Ease and Luxury, and minded not Warlike Affairs, though his Son was thought to be of an active Temper, and might alter things when he came to the Crown. With the Earl of Flanders he had some difference, but it proceeded no farther than Words, which happen'd upon this occasion: The Conqueror in Recompence of the good Service which Baldwin V. Earl of Flanders had done him in his Expedition for England, gave him three hundred Marks per Annum, and continu'd it to his Son after him. This present Earl Robert was of a Collateral Line, but yet being grown indigent by the Holy Wars, in which he had engag'd himself, and finding that such a Sum had been paid to his Predecessors, demands it of King Henry as his due; but the King, who was very slow at parting with Money, sent him word, That it was not the Custom of the Kings of England to pay Tribute; if they had allow'd Pensions to any Persons that had deserv'd well of them, they were temporary, and ended with them. This Answer much displeas'd the Earl; and tho' he liv'd not to shew his hatred, yet his Son did it, by assisting William the Son of Robert in his attempts to recover the Dutchy of Normandy from King Henry. In this serene part of his Reign he setled his Affairs so firmly at home, that he never had any Disturbance among his Subjects after.

Flemmings setled in Wales.

1107. Reg. 8.

Henry's Quarrels with the King of France.

But the Changes of the World brought a mutation in Henry's Affairs abroad. For after the Death of Philip King of France, Lewis the Gross his Son succeeded him, and soon after his accession to the Crown began a Contest with him about the City of Gisors, which lies on the River Epre, and belong'd to his Dutchy of Normandy. Henry being a Politick Prince, and knowing that he had a powerful Monarch to grapple with, not only provided an Army to oppose his Enemy, but strengthen'd himself by good Alliances, which he had a favourable opportunity to do just at that Juncture. For there happen'd at that time a Quarrel between the Pope and the Emperor Henry V. whom tho' the Pope had encourag'd in a Rebellion against his Father Henry IV. and so had raised him to the Throne, (for he conquer'd his Father, and kept him in such straight Imprisonment, that he dy'd) yet he extorted so many Privileges of the Empire from him, that repenting of what he had done, because he was reproach'd for it by his States, he raised a mighty Army, and marching into Italy, constrain'd the Pope and his College to acknowledge the Rights of the Empire in that form as Adrian had done to Charles the Great, and Leo to Otho II. according to the Decree of the Council of Rome, and made him take an Oath of Fidelity between his Hands, as to the true and lawful Emperor. But the Pope, as soon as Henry was gone, call'd a Council, makes void this Acknowledgment, as done by Force, and shortly after deceas'd. Calixtus the Son of the Count of Burgogne succeeded him in the Papacy; and being a Frenchman call'd another Council at Reimes, where by an Ecclesiastical Decree Henry was declar'd an Enemy of the Church, and degraded of his Imperial Dignity. This made Henry the Emperor have a jealous Eye of Lewis, as a Favourer of his Enemies, who being most his Subjects, had pronounc'd such a Sentence against him; and to strengthen himself against a growing Party, desired a Marriage with Maud, the Daughter of Henry King of England, who was then an Infant of about five Years old. Besides this Enemy, Lewis had in his own Kingdom several of his Nobility about Paris, as the Counts of Crecy, Pissaux, Dimmiartini, Champaigne, and others, who presuming upon their Franchises within their own Seigniories, of which at that time there were many in France, would be absolute Lords, and not be under the awe of a Master. These Henry took under his Protection; and that Lewis might not move against him, but with near as much prejudice to himself, in his own Confines, as he could do to him, lent them assistance against their Sovereign. The Emperor, who being become his Son-in-Law, was easily sway'd by his Interest or Persuasions, he incensed to that degree, that he immediately raised a mighty Army to assault his Dominions, and joyn with Henry, who had made as great Preparations. This Storm hanging over the French King's Head, and almost unavoidable, much terrify'd him, and finding himself unable to grapple with such Enemies, he first deals with some of the German Princes, represents to them the Danger and Mischiefs of a War, undertaken upon a meer Suspicion, and in a Heat, without any just ground, and moves them to induce the Emperor, that they may first treat about it, before they began the War. The Princes prevail'd so far with the Emperor, as to send Ambassadors to signifie his Discontent; to whom the French King declar'd, That it was a great grief to him to see the two greatest Pillars of the Church (viz. the Pope and Emperor) at variance, because by it the Ruine of the whole would almost inevitably follow: That he was a Friend to them both, and would very gladly be a Mediator for Peace between them for the good of Christendom; but would not, nor ever had been any means to increase the Dissentions between them. This Answer so pacify'd the Emperor, who was glad to have a Mediator between the Pope and himself, that he laid aside the Thoughts of a War with him; and not long after, by his intercession, the Pope and Emperor came to an Agreement, which

[b] But it was only for the present; for in the fifteenth Year of his Reign they made several Inroads into England, two under Owen ap Cadogan, when they invaded the Possessions of Gilbert Strongbow Earl of Strygil; and two not long after under Griffith ap Conan, when they fell upon the Estate of Hugh Earl of Chester; which turbulent Humour so enrag'd Henry, that he vow'd utterly to root them out, yet upon their submission he pardon'd them.

A. D. 1108. Reg. 9. was ſealed at Wormes, to the Pope's advantage; for the Emperor yielded up his Right to Inveſtitures of Biſhops, and other Benefices, to him. The King of England was very much diſpleaſed at this Diſappointment, but however did not give over his Deſigns againſt Lewis, giving the greater ſupport to the Faction in Lewis's Kingdom, eſpecially to Theobald Count of Champaigne, who being ſtrengthen'd with his great Alliance to Stephen Earl of Blois, and Fulke Earl of Anjou, was moſt likely to make the boldeſt Oppoſition to the French King. Lewis on the other ſide endeavour'd as eagerly to undermine Henry's Power in Normandy, and to that end conſpir'd with William Earl of Flanders to reſtore William the Son of Robert Duke of Normandy to his Father's Dominions, to whom by Right the Inheritance belong'd. Many great and bloody Battels were fought between theſe two Princes, with the expence of much Blood and Treaſure; till at length, both being tired with the Fatigues of War, willingly came to conclude a Peace by the Mediation of the Earl of Anjou, whoſe Daughter William, King Henry's Son, was about to marry; and upon the Conſummation of the Peace was made Duke of Normandy, for which he did Homage to Lewis, and marry'd the Duke of Anjou's Daughter; and ſo France and Flanders became his Friends.

Peace made between King Henry and the French King.

1116. Reg. 17. But theſe Troubles were ſcarcely blown over, and this happy Concluſion made, but there follow'd ſuch a ſad Accident, as turn'd all the proſperous Succeſſes and Joys into Mourning. William, the only Son of Henry, who was but juſt ſetled in his Dukedom, a Prince of ſeventeen Years of Age, going into England a little time after his Father's departure, accompany'd by Richard his baſe Brother, Mary Counteſs of Perch his natural Siſter, Richard Earl of Cheſter, and his Wife, who was the King's Niece, and many other Perſons of Quality, and their Attendants, to the number of an hundred and forty, beſides fifty Mariners, ſetting out at Barbfleet, were all caſt away at Sea, only a Butcher eſcap'd. The Prince had recover'd a Cockboat, and was in poſſibility of being ſav'd; but being mov'd with the lamentable Cries of his Siſter, he went back to the ſinking Ship to take her in, where ſo many crowded with her into the Boat to ſave themſelves, that it ſank with its Load, and ſo all periſh'd in the Waters. What Reflection this heavy Judgment might cauſe in the King's Conſcience, is hard to know; but certainly it made ſuch Impreſſions of Grief upon his Mind, that he was never ſeen to laugh after: And tho' he made all the haſte he could to repair the Breach made in the Succeſſion, by marrying Adalicia[b], a young beautiful Lady, Daughter of the Duke of Lovain, and of the Houſe of Lorrain, yet the Loſs prov'd irreparable, for he never could have a Child by her.

Troubles caus'd to the King by the Prince's Death.

But the Death of Prince William created the King not only inward, but outward Troubles, by breaking his Alliances, and unſetling his Affairs in France and Flanders. Normandy it ſelf waver'd much in their Allegiance, many adhering to William his Nephew, to whom many more were in Conſcience inclin'd, than dare ſhew it. His great Confederates went over to the King of France. Fulke Earl of Anjou quarrell'd with him for his Daughter's Dower. Robert de Mallent his chief Counſellor, and a Man of great Truſt under him, fell from him, and conſpiring with Hugh Earl of Monfort, invaded and ſeized upon his Dutchy. But ſuch was his great diligence and working Head, that he ſoon reduced things into a quiet frame. The two Earls he took by ſurprize, and made them his Priſoners; and Death reſcu'd him from the Claims of the Duke of Anjou, who was a conſiderable Prince, as we may judge by the King's matching firſt his Son, and after his only Daughter, then an Empreſs, into his Family, as we ſhall preſently come to relate. The King of France continu'd his Oppoſition, and entertain'd William, Son of Robert Courtois, wherein all the danger lay; and firſt aids him in Perſon with great power to obtain the Earldom of Flanders, to which he had a fair Title by the defect of Iſſue in Earl Baldwin, who was ſlain in a Battel in France againſt King Henry. But William, as if he had been not only Heir of his Father's Dominions, but Misfortunes, being admitted to the Government, miſcarry'd in his management of it, was depoſed by his People, and at length ſlain in a Battel by them. And ſo ended the Family of Robert Curtoiſe.

A. D. 1116. Reg. 17. 1123. Reg. 25. 1126. Reg. 27.

While theſe things were tranſacting, News came to the King, that his Son-in-law Henry the Emperor was dead; whereupon he preſently ſent for his Daughter the Empreſs home, with intention to ſettle the Succeſſion of his Kingdom upon her; and for that purpoſe ſummon'd a Parliament[c], which met at Windſor, wherein an Oath was adminiſter'd to all the Lords of the Land, to be true to Her and her Heirs, and to acknowledge and obey them as the right Heirs to the Crown. This Oath was firſt taken by David King of Scots, Uncle to Maud, and Stephen Earl of Bollogne, and Mortain, the King's Nephew, on whom he had beſtow'd great Poſſeſſions in England, and advanced his Brother to the Biſhoprick of Winchester. And to make all ſecure, he had the ſame Oath impoſed in another Parliament[d] at Northampton. His next Care was to provide Heirs, and thereupon marry'd her to Jeffrey Plantaginet Earl of Anjou[e], by whom he liv'd to ſee her have two Sons. So that all things now ſeem'd ſetled and quiet, but only the King's own Dreams, which were ſaid to be very terrifying, and in which he would riſe, take his Sword, and act as if he were to defend himſelf from ſome Enemy; which ſhew'd, that his Conſcience was very uneaſie and fearful.

Sir John Hayward's Hiſt. of Hen. He made ſeveral Progreſſes into the moſt remote Parts of his Kingdom, to ſee how his Realm was ordered; and therefore, when he was in England, he kept no certain Reſidence, but celebrated the ſolemn Feſtivals in ſeveral Parts of his Kingdom, that all might enjoy his Company and ſhare in his good Cheer. He never would extort any Sums of Money arbitrarily from his People, but always raiſed ſuch Taxes as his Neceſſity required by the Conſent of his People; which he aſſembled [a] in Parliament firſt at Saliſbury, Anno Regni 15. conſiſting of three Eſtates, according to the Cuſtom of Normandy, as it continues to this day.

He kept indeed ſome Biſhopricks and Abbies void in his hand, as that of Canterbury five Years together.

His ways to raiſe Money.

By an Act of Parliament, Anno Regni 30. he was permitted to puniſh the Marriages and Incontinency of Prieſts; but for a certain Fine he allowed them to enjoy their Wives, which much diſpleaſed the Clergy, and hinder'd the Reformation intended. He changed the Puniſhments of Malefactors by diſmembring, into Pecuniary Mulcts. The Proviſions of his Houſe, which uſed to be paid in kind, he had rated and received that Money to ſupport his Charge, to the great Content of his People, and with the Conſent of his States.

His moſt eminent Counſellors were Roger Biſhop of Sarum and the Earl of Mallent, both Men of great Experience in the Affairs of the World. Roger was entruſted always as Viceroy, to govern the Kingdom in his abſence: He had managed his Money and other Houſhold Affairs, when he was a private Man and a poor Prince, with that Fidelity, that he put him into the greateſt Truſt when he was a King; which he diſcharged with Policy, Honeſty and Judgment. He had the Title of Juſtitiarius Angliæ Totius: Of his magnificent and noble Mind we have ſome Marks in the Remainders of Buildings erected by him, eſpecially in the Deviſes in Wiltſhire, where is the Ruines of a moſt noble Fabrick, built after the manner of the Romans. He built alſo the Caſtles of Malmſbury and Sherburn, two ſtrong and ſumptuous Fabricks; he repaired the Caſtle of Saliſbury, and new-wall'd it about, all which he lived to ſee taken from him and ſeized into the next King's hand, as things unfit for him either to raiſe or poſſeſs, and are now deformed Heaps of Rubbiſh. Beſides this, he walled in Old Saliſbury, and repaired the Church there.

A. D. 1134. Reg. 35.

Robert Earl of Mallent was the Son of Roger Beaumont, who of all the great Men that followed William the Firſt in his Civil Wars in Normandy, refuſed to attend him in his Expedition into England, though he was invited to it with large Promiſes, ſaying, 'The Inheritance left 'him by his Fathers was ſufficient to maintain 'his State at home; and he deſired not to thruſt 'himſelf into other Mens Poſſeſſions abroad. But his Son Robert was of another Mind, and had a mighty Eſtate in England and Normandy. He was a Man of good Judgment, and his Direction in moſt weighty Affairs of State was always uſed as moſt profitable. His Frugality, both in Apparel and Diet, was very exemplary, and much influenced others, being a Man of ſo great Note: But in the end he fell into Diſgrace (the uſual Fate of Grandure) being engaged in a Rebellion againſt his King, and died ſtripp'd of his Eſtate.

Robert Earl of Mallent.

Beſides theſe, he was ſerved with a Potent and Warlike Nobility, who by his Example were led to further his Deſigns in France for the Preſervation of his Dutchy of Normandy, whither he made his laſt Voyage in the thirty ſecond Year of his Reign. In his Paſſage there happened an exceeding great Eclipſe of the Sun, which was after interpreted as a Forerunner of his Death, which happened [b] ſhortly after in the thirty fifth Year of his Reign, and the ſixty ſeventh of his Age.

His Perſonage.

He was of a graceful Perſonage, quick-ſighted, brown Hair, and a cloſe-ſet Body, wherein was ſeated a Mind of ſolid Judgment and well-order'd Affections. He had a Taſte of Learning in his Youth, yet not much; but the very Reputation of it made Books in Faſhion, and many Learned Men flouriſhed in his time.

His Iſſue.

He had by his Wife Maud the Daughter of Malcolm the third King of Scotland, no other Children but Maud and William; but he is ſaid to have had ſeven Natural Sons, and as many Daughters, which ſhews his Incontinency [c]. Two of theſe Sons was afterward Men of Note, viz. Reynold Earl of Cornwall and Caſtlecomb, and Robert Earl of Gloceſter, a great Champion and Defender of his Siſter Maud the Empreſs. His Daughters were all married to Princes and Noblemen of France and England; and of them, as Writers ſay, came many Worthy Families.

[a] Before this time the Engliſh Kings order'd National Affairs by their own Edicts, and by the Officers and Governours of Counties, and had ſeldom any General Aſſemblies of the People, unleſs at a Coronation, or in Times of War. Their Parliaments were only Meetings of the Nobility, and Clergy uſually.

[b] He dy'd of a Surfeit of Lampreys at the Caſtle of Lyons, near Roan in Normandy. His Body was courſely Embalm'd, being ſtuff'd with Salt, and wrapp'd up in Ox-Hides; after which 'twas tranſported to England, and bury'd at Reading. In him the Male-Line of William the Norman was extinct.

[c] Sir John Hayward ſays he had twelve Illegitimate Children, who were of no great Note or Continuance.

Remarkable Occurrences in the Reign of Henry I.

In his 2d Year 1102. Glouceſter and Wincheſter were burnt. In his 4th a Comet appear'd, and four Circles were ſeen about the Sun. In his 7th another Comet was ſeen, and on Thurſday Night before two, full Moons appear'd, one in the Eaſt and the other in the Weſt. In his 10th a third Comet was ſeen, and an Earthquake happen'd in Shropſhire.

Sir John Hayward, Hiſt. Hen. I.

In his 11th Year the River Trent, near Nottingham, ceas'd to run its Courſe for four and twenty Hours, and ſo long the Channel was dry'd up. Hol. There was this Year a great Mortality of Men, a Murrain among Cattle, both Domeſtick and of the Field; the Fowls alſo periſh'd in Abundance. In his thirteenth Year Worceſter City, the Church, Caſtle, and many Citizens were burnt. A Pig was farrow'd with a Face like a Child, and the Water of the River Medway fail'd ſo much for many Miles in the midſt of the Channel, that the ſmalleſt Boats could not float, and the Thames was ſo low between the Tower and the Bridge, that many Men, Women and Children, waded it over a foot; which was occaſion'd, ſays our Author Sir John Hayward, by reaſon of a great Ebb in the Ocean, that laid the Sands bare ſeveral Miles from the Shoar, which continu'd ſo a whole day. The City and chief Monaſtery of Chicheſter were burnt, and there was much Rage and Violence of Weather with a Comet. Holinſhead adds, that the Comet appear'd in a ſtrange manner; it roſe in the Eaſt, and when it was advanc'd near the Mid-Heavens it kept not its Courſe forward, but ſeem'd to go backward, as if it had been retrograde; in December the Air appear'd red, as tho' it had burn'd. Moſt of theſe Accidents he places under the next Year, during which, almoſt all the Bridges in England being then built with Timber, were broken down by the Ice when it thaw'd after a ſevere Froſt. In his 16th Year, on the 1ſt of November, there fell a prodigious Storm of Hail, accompany'd with unuſual Claps of Thunder and Blaſts of Lightning. In December a great Earthquake happen'd, and the Colour of the Moon was chang'd into that of Blood. Holinſhead.

In his 17th Year the Cities of Bath and Peterborough were burnt. In his 20th Year there was an Earthquake in September. In his 22d the City of Glouceſter was burnt, and Lincoln the Year following. In his 30th Year Rocheſter was almoſt deſtroy'd by Fire, and London in his thirty ſecond. In the Year before he dy'd, being the 34th of his Reign, on the 2d of Auguſt, juſt as he was about to take Ship and ſail to Normandy, an Eclipſe of the Sun and Moon appear'd, at which time William of Malmſbury, who was then living, writes that he ſaw the Stars plainly about the Sun. This Eclipſe was follow'd by a terrible Earthquake: In which the ſame Author relates, the Houſe wherein he ſat was lifted up with a double remove, and at the third time ſetled again in the proper Place. Sir John Hayward.

Holinſhead tells us, 'twas the Houſe in which the King ſat; he adds, that Flames of Fire burſt out of certain Rifs of the Earth with ſuch Violence, that they cou'd not be quench'd by Water or otherwiſe.

In this Reign, Anno 1109. the Biſhoprick of Ely was founded. The firſt Biſhop of the Dioceſs being Harvey, Biſhop of Bangor. About this time the Marriage of Prieſts was ſtrictly forbidden in England, by a Synod at Weſtminſter, in which Anſelm Arch-biſhop of Canterbury preſided; it had been diſallow'd in a former Synod, Anno 1102. The Pope's Power was very low in England in the Reign of Hen. I. In whoſe time

The moſt Illuſtrious Captains were

Robert de Belleſme Earl of Shrewſbury, William Earl of Mortaigne the King's Nephew, and Reginald Earl of Cornwall. The moſt able Miniſters of State were Robert Earl of Mellent, Roger Biſhop of Saliſbury, and Richard de Ridvers. And the moſt Eminent Men of Learning

Eadmerus, who wrote the Hiſtory of the three Norman Kings to the Year 1122. Mr. Selden publiſh'd it. He was a Monk of Canterbury, Anſelm's Diſciple, and Arch-biſhop elect of St. Andrew's. Ordericus Vitalis, an Engliſhman, but a Monk of the Abby of St. Evroul in Normandy, William Gemitenſis Abbot of Jumiegue in that Dutchy, Alfred of Beverly, and Florence a Monk of Worceſter, who dy'd about the eighteenth Year of the Reign of Hen. I. He epitomiz'd, or as the Learned Biſhop of Carliſle is of Opinion, rather tranſcrib'd, Marianus Scotus. Eng. Hiſt. Libr. P. 1. p. 149.

THE LIFE and REIGN OF King STEPHEN.

A. D. 1035. Reg. 1.

THE Male-Iſſue of the Norman Line being extinct, and only a Daughter remaining, who was marry'd to a Frenchman, Stephen Earl of Bologne and Mortagne, Son of Stephen Earl of Blois, and Adela the Daughter of William I. was elected by the general conſent of the Kingdom, and within thirty days [a] after Henry's death crown'd King at Weſtminſter by William Corbell Archbiſhop of Canterbury. The chief of the Peers and Biſhops had engaged themſelves by Oath to accept Maud for their Queen after Henry's deceaſe; but when he was dead, and the Awe of his Power and Greatneſs removed, they found out many [b] ſhifts to evade their Oath, tho' none ſtrong enough to ſave them from Perjury. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury boldly alledg'd, (tho' he had firſt ſworn to the Succeſſion of Maud) That it was not fit that ſo many and great Peers ſhould be ſubject to a Woman; which others of his Party form'd into a Reaſon, That it not being a Cuſtom in any Chriſtian Kingdom, whoſe Kings are anointed, to admit Women to inherit the Crown, it was an unlawful Oath, and therefore had no obligation. Roger Biſhop of Saliſbury, one of the principal Men then in Counſel, gave this Reaſon why they were diſcharg'd from their Oath, That the King had marry'd his Daughter out of the Realm, without their conſent, and therefore they were not bound to receive her. His Right of Succeſſion was not pretended: Becauſe indeed he had no Right that way, having an Elder Brother, Theobald Earl of Blois, and there being others whoſe Claim by Deſcent was before him, particularly Maud's two Sons, if ſhe her ſelf were rejected for their ſlight Reaſons. But the main thing that prevail'd at that time to make Stephen King was this: That he was a Man, and had very great Poſſeſſions both in England and France; his elder Brother was a Prince of great Power, being Earl of Blois; and his younger Brother Biſhop of Winchester, the Pope's Legate in England, and of very great Intereſt with the Nobility, who at that time were chiefly guided by the Clergy. Beſides, Stephen himſelf was of a very comely and graceful Perſonage, very affable and courteous, of admirable Courage and Activity, which recommended him much to the Nobility. Theſe Reaſons drawn from Intereſt abroad and at home, being back'd partly with the Biſhop of Winchester's Perſuaſions and Friendſhip, and partly with the Conſideration, that by preferring one to the Crown whoſe Title was weak, they might better ſecure their ancient Liberties, than by any Perſon that ſhould come to it by a lineal Succeſſion, made them elect Stephen to be their King: And to ſecure themſelves of him, they cauſed him to take a private Oath before the Biſhop of Canterbury to confirm the ancient Liberties of the Church, and obliged his Brother to undertake for the performance of his ſolemn Promiſe made thus to them in the Preſence of God [c].

A. D. 1035. Reg. 1.

Stephen Earl of Bologne made King of England, and upon what Reaſons and Conditions.

Stephen being thus got into the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh Government, and ſo made Maſter of all the Treaſure which his Uncle had gather'd in many Years, which was the Sum of 100000 l. [d] of ready Caſh, beſides Plate and Jewels of ineſtimable value, after the Interment of Henry at Reading, call'd a Parliament, which aſſembled at Oxford, and therein reſtor'd the Clergy to all their former Liberties, and freed the Laity of all their Tributes, and other Grievances of which they complain'd; and confirming theſe Grants by his Charter, he took an Oath in the preſence of the whole Aſſembly to obſerve them. Whereupon the Biſhops and Peers ſwore Fealty to him, on this Condition, That he obſerved the Tenure of this Charter.

His firſt Parliament, and Actions in it.

And firſt after his Settlement in his Kingdom, he prepares for his own defence; being ſenſible, that what he had gotten could not be held long but by the Sword. And for this end he firſt gives a liberty to all Perſons that would to build Caſtles upon their own Land, to ſecure themſelves and the Nation from any Invaſion, which in a peaceable and unanimous Reign had been a good piece of Policy, but in a factious time, as it happen'd, was indeed dangerous to the Kingly Power, as he after found: Then, becauſe he knew nothing would be a greater ſecurity to him than firm Friends, he made all he could by creating new Lords, giving ſeveral Perſons large Eſtates, and ſparing no Coſt to make his Subjects of greateſt Intereſts faithful to him. Two ways he expected

[a] He was in Normandy when King Henry dy'd, and taking a light Ship at Whitſands made haſte to England; He arriv'd at London, and was elected King the 2d of December, by the Management and Intereſt of his Brother Henry, Biſhop of Winchester, and Abbot of Glaſſenbury, who had brought over the Archbiſhop of Canterbury to his Party, together with other Biſhops.

[b] Theſe Evaſions and Shifts were ridiculous to the more conſidering part of the Nation, tho' they ſerv'd the turn of the Politicians themſelves: Wherefore there was another more plauſible Reaſon given. Hugh Bygod, who came over with Stephen, and had been Steward to the late King Henry, depos'd before the Nobility and States, That King Henry upon his Death-Bed did give the Kingdom of England to his Nephew Stephen, becauſe his Daughter Maud had by her undutiful Behaviour alienated the Affections of the King from her. And this is ſaid to have generally prevail'd for Stephen's Eſtabliſhment.

[d] The ſame Author calls the Sum 100000 Marks.

A. D. 1136. Several Disturbances to his Government.

Disturbance to his Government, viz. from Scotland and France. David King of Scots began the Quarrel: He took himself oblig'd to restore his Niece the Empress Maud to her Right, not only upon the account of his near Relation to her, but the Oath he had taken in Henry's Days, and therefore first invades Stephen's Dominions. But Stephen, as if he had been prepared against all Opposition, was presently with him with a strong Army; which so deterr'd the Scots, that they came to a Composition with him to return home upon the Restitution of Cumberland to their King, and the Earldoms of Northumberland and Huntingdon to Prince Henry, the King of Scots Son, to whom in Right of his Mother Maud, the Daughter of Waltheof Earl of both, they belonged; which Stephen granting, a Peace was patch'd up for the present. Henry did Fealty to the King of England for his two Earldoms, and so they departed. At the King's return home, he met with a Revolt from some of his Nobility, of whom Baldwin de Redvers [a] was the Head, and the Welsh were very troublesome on the Borders. These Motions cost the King some time to allay, and were scarcely well appeased, but a new Occasion reviv'd them again: For King Stephen, with the violent Toils of War, fell very dangerously sick; so that it was reported he was dead, by which means his Friends began to fly from him and provide another Master, and his Enemies both at home and abroad to seize upon his Dominions. Hugh Bigott fortified himself in the Castle of Norwich, the Welsh plunder'd the Neighbouring English, the Earl of Anjou did also take this Opportunity to seize on his Wife's Right, and took certain Parts of Normandy, and made his Kingdom waver. Thus was his first Year spent in nothing but Battels, Invasions and Revolts, a sad Presage of the distracted and troublesome Reign he should have over an ill-gotten Kingdom, and a faithless People.

The King after some time recover'd, and to make the World know he was alive, passed immediately with his Forces into Normandy, and in a pitch'd Battel overcame the Earl of Anjou; but yet that he might secure himself from future Pretensions, he came to an Agreement with him, That upon his renouncing Maud's Claim to his Kingdom he would pay him five thousand Marks per Annum, and then made his Son Eustace Duke of Normandy, causing him to do Homage to the French King Lewis VII. for it, that thereby he might secure his Friendship. Theobald Earl of Blois, the King's eldest Brother, envying Stephen's Greatness, began to put in his Claim for his Possessions; which tho' Stephen little valued, yet to pacifie him, he agreed to allow him two thousand Marks per Annum. When the King had settled Affairs thus in Normandy, he returned again into England, and found the Scots at work again to disturb his Dominions; which while he was busied to defend, a strong Conspiracy against him broke out in the Body of his Realm. Robert Earl of Gloucester, base Son to Henry the First, a Man of great Spirit, indefatigable Industry, and great Judgment, surpriz'd the Castle of Bristol, and held it out against the King; and so in other Parts of the Kingdom did William Talbot the Castle of Hereford, Paynel the Castle of Ludlow, Lovel that of Cary, Moon that of Dunster, and many others [b]. The King counting an inward Enemy most dangerous, left the Prosecution of the War with the Scots to Thurstan Arch-bishop of York, as his Lieutenant; Walter Earl of Albemarle, William Peverell Earl of Nottingham, Walter and Gilbert Lacys, brave and valiant Commanders, and goes himself well attended to repress the Conspirators, which he did in one Expedition, and forced the Earl of Gloucester to fly to his Sister in Anjou. Nor had his Forces in the North less Success against the Scots, whom they routed and put to flight; and so Stephen, as Fortune's Favourite, was become victorious over all his apparent Enemies.

He demolishes the Castles he lately permitted to be built, and prohibits Building more.

Stephen having now gotten a little respite from his Enemies, began to consult with himself how he might ease himself of such troublesome Contests with his Subjects; and because he now found, that the Castles he had permitted his Nobility to build, were the greatest Impediments of his Peace at home, and the readiest Harbour of Rebels, he resolved to forbid that any should be built hereafter, and demolish some of the most dangerous lately erected; and to this end, call'd a great Council at Oxford. Here some of his Lords, who much envy'd the magnificent and stately Castles erected by the Clergy (whose Buildings both in Number and Strength much excelled those of the Nobility) but especially by the Bishop of Salisbury, who had built several great Castles at Salisbbury, the Devises, Shurburn, Malmsbury and Newarke; whisper'd into the King's Ear, who was very jealous and suspicious of such Designs, That these Fortresses were intended for the Reception of the Empress Maud and her Party; and by their Surmises so wrought upon the King's Fears, that he sent for the Bishop of Salisbury to Oxford. The Bishop foreseeing the Danger impending, would have excused himself from his Attendance upon the King, by reason of his great Age; but that Plea would not be allow'd, he must go. The Bishop therefore taking with him his Nephews Alexander Bishop of Lincoln, and Nigell Bishop of Ely, with a Retinue of well arm'd Men, went to Oxford; where at his first coming his Servants going to take them up Lodgings, happen'd into a Quarrel with the Servants of the Earl of Britain and kill'd one of them in the Fray, the Nephew of the Earl being dangerously wounded. This being brought to the King's Ears he calls for the Bishop, and demands Satisfaction for the Breach of Peace made by his Servants in his Court, which was this, That he should immediately yield up the Keys of all his Castles to him, as Pledges of his Fidelity. The Bishop refused to do it; whereupon he commanded the Bishops of Salisbury and Lincoln to be seiz'd upon, and kept under a Guard. The Bishop of Ely had made his escape, and got into the Castle of the Devises. The King presently took into his hands by force the Castles of Salisbury, Shyrburn, and Malmsbury; and after three days assault, that of the Devises was surrender'd to him, whither he sent the two Bishops Prisoners, and seiz'd the Bishop of Salisbury's Treasure, which amounted to forty thousand Marks.

1139. Reg. 5.

This Action of the King's being something arbitrary, and very unusual, was censur'd variously by the People of that time; some justified it, and pleaded, 'That the King had done very 'well in seizing upon those Castles: For 'tis 'very unfit, yea, it is against the Canons of the 'Church

A. D. 1139. Reg. 5.

'Church, that the Clergy who are Men of Religion, and ſhould make it their whole buſineſs to promote Peace, ſhould build Caſtles for War, eſpecially with Prejudice to the King and his Realm. But the Biſhop of Winchester, the Pope's Legate, being more zealous for his Function than his Brother, made a reſolute Oppoſition to it; ſaying, That if the Biſhops had done amiſs, they ought to have been judged not by the King, but by the Canons of the Church; and that they could not lawfully be depriv'd of their Eſtates and Poſſeſſions, but by a General Council: That the King had not done this out of any Zeal for Juſtice, but for his own private ends, taking away thoſe Caſtles which were built upon the Lands, and at the Charge of the Church, to put them into the hands of Laymen who were not well affected to Religion. And therefore, that this Controverſie might be examin'd by the Canons, he appointed a Council to be ſummon'd to ſit at Winchester, and gave the King himſelf a Citation to appear at it. When the Biſhops and Clergy were met, the Biſhop of Winchester read firſt the Commiſſion of his Legatine Power given him by Pope Innocent, and then in a Speech to the Aſſembly, ſhewed the great Indignity offer'd to the Church by impriſoning thoſe Biſhops, calling it an unjuſt and ſhameful Action in the King; who ſuffer'd himſelf to be led by ill Miniſters to do ſo great a piece of Injuſtice, a Violence againſt God, to deſpoil the Church of its Revenues and Poſſeſſions: And tells them, That ſince the King would yield to no Admonition, he had called them together in Council, to conſult what was to be done; and that for his part, neither the Love of the King, though he was his Brother, nor the Loſs of his Preferments, nor Danger of his Life, ſhould diſcourage him from putting in Execution what they ſhould decree. As ſoon as the Council was thus ſettled, the King ſtanding upon the Defence of the Fact, ſent certain Earls to them to know why he was ſummon'd thither. The Legate in mild Terms told them, 'That 'the King being ſubject to the Faith of Chriſt, 'ought not to take it ill if he were called to 'give an Account by Chriſt's Miniſters of ſuch 'an Action, as none but Infidels would be guil-'ty of, to impriſon Biſhops and deprive them 'of their Poſſeſſions; and that he ought to give 'an Account of his Action, and undergo a Ca-'nonical Judgment in reſpect to the Church, 'who had advanc'd him to the Crown; which 'if he would do, their Determination by the 'Help of God ſhould be ſuch, as neither the Ro-'man Church, King of France, nor Earl Theobald 'their Brother ſhould diſlike. This Anſwer the Earls, who were attended by one Alberic de Ver, an experienc'd Lawyer[a], brought to the King, and were again diſpatch'd back with this Reply from the King, which Alberic deliver'd to them in theſe Words; 'That Roger Biſhop of Saliſ-'bury had done many Injuries to the King; That 'he ſeldom came to Court; That his Servants, 'preſuming upon his Power, had affronted the 'Nephew, and miſuſed the Servants of the Earl 'of Britain, and Hervi de Lyons, a great Noble-'man, both Strangers, to the Diſgrace of the 'King and Diſcredit of the Realm; That the 'Biſhop of Lincoln, out of Hatred to the Earl 'of Britain, had encourag'd this Sedition; That 'the Biſhop of Saliſbury privately favoured the 'King's Enemies, as the King found by many 'Circumſtances, particularly becauſe he deny'd 'Quarters to the King's Forces in Malmſbury, 'and was generally looked upon as ſuch a Friend 'to the Empreſs, that if ſhe came he would re-'ſign his Caſtles to her; That the King did not 'arreſt the Biſhop as a Clergy-man, but as his 'Servant and Receiver of his Revenues; That 'the King took not his Caſtles from him by force, 'but the Biſhop reſign'd them to avoid the 'Calumny of a Tumult raiſed in his Court; 'That if the King found any Treaſure in the 'Caſtles, he looked upon it as deliver'd to him 'with them, through Fear for his Offences; 'That the Covenants between the King and Bi-'ſhop were ratified in the Preſence of ſeveral 'Witneſſes. To this Roger anſwer'd, That he 'was never any Servant to the King, nor ever 'receiv'd any of his Moneys, and threaten'd 'that if he could not have Juſtice done him by 'this Council, he would bring it to an higher 'Court. The Legate kept to his Moderation, and replied, 'That theſe Allegations againſt the 'Biſhops ought firſt to be examin'd in a Coun-'cil, whether they were true or no, before Sen-'tence had been given againſt them; and there-'fore the King ought (as is neceſſary in all judi-'cial Tryals) to reveſt the Biſhops in their for-'mer Eſtates, otherwiſe by the Law of Nations 'being diſſeiſed, they are not oblig'd to hold 'Plea. After a long Debate in the Counſel concerning this Cauſe, it was (upon a Motion) put off till the next day, that the Arch-biſhop of Roan, who was to act on the King's Part might be preſent, who deliver'd his Opinion thus; 'That if the Biſhop could prove by the Canons 'that they ought to have Caſtles, they ſhould 'hold them; but if not, they did ill to contend 'ſo eagerly for them. And were it ſo, yet in 'ſuſpicious Times they ought according to the 'manner of other Nations, to deliver up the 'Keys of all Fortreſſes to the King's Pleaſure, 'who is to protect all. But if it belongs not to 'the Clergy to have Caſtles, and if it were by 'the King's Indulgence permitted, they ought 'to deliver him the Keys. Alberic the Lawyer 'added, That the King had been informed, that 'the Biſhops were ſending ſome Perſons to Rome 'againſt him: But he ſaid, that he charg'd them 'not to preſume to do ſo leſt he prevented their 'return. Theſe Speeches put a ſtop to the Councils Proceedings, and cauſed the Biſhops to break up within a few days without bringing the Matter to any Concluſion. The Biſhops dare not excommunicate the King without the Pope's Conſent, which if they had gotten they feared the Sword: Wherefore the Legate and Arch-biſhop took another way of dealing with the King, viz. by Entreaties and Prayers, falling at his Feet in his Chamber, and begging of him, That he would in Commiſeration to the Church and his own Soul, as well as his Reputation, compoſe this Diſſention between the Kingdom and the Church. The King gave them a mild Anſwer, but would not part with any thing he had gotten. Shortly after theſe things, the Biſhop of Saliſbury died through Grief, unpitied; for he was a Man (in his latter Times) guilty of much Corruption, and of inſatiable Avarice; and though the King had been ſo kind and bountiful to him, as not only to prefer two of his Nephews, the one to be his Chancellor and the other his Treaſurer; but to ſay, The Biſhop ſhould be weary of aſking before he would be of granting, though he gave him half his Kingdom, yet he was deſervedly ſuſpected of favouring Maud, and had brought over all the Clergy; yea, and the Biſhop of Win- chester himself to a favourable Opinion of her, and to uphold her Title.

This Conteſt between the King and the Church, tho' the King ſeem'd perfectly Maſter, yet in the end prov'd fatal to him: For it open'd a Gap to let Maud the Empreſs into the Kingdom, who by the conduct of the Earl of Gloceſter was convey'd into the [a] Caſtle of Arundel, with a Train of no more than 150 Men, and had a Party raiſed by the ſaid Earl through all the Country, as far as Gloceſter, without any oppoſition; ſo great a Diſaffection was then among all ſorts to the King by this Quarrel with the Biſhops. The King indeed wanted not his wonted Activity in purſuing his Enemies, and to that end advanced towards the Empreſs upon the firſt News; but ſhe ſwearing to him, that ſhe came with no ill deſign into his Kingdom, but that all that belong'd to her ſhould behave themſelves orderly, and pay their due Allegiance to him; the King, too credulous, was ſo ſatisfy'd, that he cauſed her to be convey'd by the Legate [b] himſelf in an honourable manner to Briſtol, where ſhe was received with great reſpect; and continu'd ſo long, till by her Friends and her own courteous Viſits and Behaviour, ſhe had gotten an huge Party for her in the Nation; and from thence, when things were ripe for her deſign, convey'd her ſelf into Wallingford-Caſtle, and began to put forth her Claim to Stephen's

1140. Kingdom. Stephen delay'd not to retrieve his ſinking Fortunes, by laying Siege to it; but ſeeing ſo many Enemies ſtart up on every ſide, he thought all Oppoſition would be in vain, and therefore ſent his Brother the Legate, and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to Bath to treat about an agreement with her, but nothing was effected, and ſo both ſides return'd to make good their Parties. The King ſeeks to recover what he had loſt, and the Empreſs to get more. The King immediately takes his way into the North, to keep the Scots from entring in to aſſiſt her, and ſecure thoſe parts. The Earl of Cheſter, who had marry'd one of Gloceſter's Daughters, was in Poſſeſſion of the Caſtle of Lincoln; and tho' he had not declared himſelf againſt the King, yet the King not thinking it ſafe in his hands, beſieg'd it. The Earl finding himſelf over-power'd made his eſcape out of the Caſtle, and went to his Father-in-Law for aſſiſtance. The Earl of Gloceſter undertakes to raiſe the Siege, and marches towards the King with a great Army of Welſhmen and others, under his own, and Hugh Bygod, and Robert de Morley's command. The King at their approach was ready to engage them; and after their Armies were put in order, and the Captains had encourag'd their Men on both ſides, there began 1141. a ſore Battel, which held long dubious, till at length Stephen's gave back, and he himſelf being deſerted of all, and after long fighting left without Weapon to defend himſelf, was [c] taken, preſented to the Empreſs [d], and by her put into the Caſtle of Briſtol; but kept in an honourable manner, till his attempts to eſcape laid Fetters upon him.

Maud the Empreſs having the King in her power, and the Kingdom (as ſhe imagin'd) at her command, takes upon her the Majeſty of Queen of England, and by all winning methods endeavours to bring the Legate to admit her to the Kingdom, as Daughter and Heir of the late King, to whom the Realm had taken an Oath to accept her for their Sovereign in the Succeſſion; and ſo prevail'd, that a Parley was granted upon a Plain near Wincheſter, where, after the Empreſs had ſworn to the Legate, That all the grand Affairs of the Nation, and eſpecially the Donation of all Biſhopricks and Abbies, ſhould be wholly in his diſpoſal, if he (with the Church) would receive her as Queen of England, and pay her faithful Allegiance, as her Brother Robert Earl of Gloceſter, and Brian his Son, Marquiſs of Wallingford, Milo of Gloceſter (after Earl of Hereford) with many others, on her part had ſworn to do. The Biſhop with ſome few others received her readily as Queen [e] (tho' ſhe never came in general ſo to be acknowledged) and took an Oath of Fidelity to her, promiſing to keep his Oath ſo long as ſhe broke not her Covenant; and the next day was led with ſolemn Proceſſion into the Biſhop's Church at Wincheſter, by the Legate on the right hand, and Bernard Biſhop of St. David's on the left, and in the preſence of many other Biſhops, as Alexander Biſhop of Lincoln, Nigel Biſhop of Ely, Robert Biſhop of Bath, and Robert Biſhop of Worceſter, and many Abbots, had the Crown deliver'd to her. Within a few days after came down [f] the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Theobald, to the Empreſs, being united by the Legate, but would not do Fealty to her, as being a thing unworthy of his Perſon and Place, until he had conferr'd firſt with the King; which being obtain'd, he with ſeveral Biſhops and Laymen went to the King to Briſtol. In the mean time the Council broke up, and the Empreſs went to Oxford, her own City, to keep her Eaſter. Soon after Eaſter a Council of the Clergy was ſummon'd to meet at Wincheſter, where the firſt day the Legate had a private Conference with every Biſhop ſeverally, and afterward with every Abbot, and other Perſons that were to ſit in the Council. At the opening of the Council the Legate made a Speech, ſhewing them, 'That the end of their Meeting 'was to conſult for the Peace of their Country, 'which through the ſtruggling of two Parties was 'in apparent danger of Ruine. How flouriſhing 'the Kingdom was under the Reign of his Uncle 'Henry, who, to ſecure the Peace and Happineſs 'of the Kingdom, had ſworn both England and 'Normandy to continue his Daughter Maud in the 'Succeſſion: That after his deceaſe, his Daughter 'being in Normandy, and delaying to come over, 'it was thought neceſſary for the preſervation 'of the Peace of the Country to make his Brother King, upon his own becoming Surety, 'that he ſhould defend the Church, and ſettle 'good Laws. That his Brother having abuſed 'his Truſt, and ill managed his Government, '(which it griev'd him to think of, and repeat) 'in impriſoning the Biſhops, ſeizing on their Poſſeſſions, and by many other publick Miſdemeanours; God had ſhew'd his Judgments upon him, 'and let him fall into the hands of his Enemies; 'and tho' he could not but love his Brother, yet 'he muſt eſpouſe the Cauſe of the Immortal God. 'That therefore the Nation at this Juncture might 'not be without a Governour, he had called them 'together, by the Virtue of his Legantine Power, 'to elect and ordain a Prince, becauſe this Privilege belongs of right to the Clergy. And 'therefore, having invoked the divine Aid, we 'do elect for Queen of England[a], Maud, the 'Daughter of the peaceable, glorious, and incom- 'parable King Henry, and to her we promise our 'Faith and Allegiance. When all that were pre- sent had either openly given their Voice for her, or by their silence not contradicted it, the Legate added, 'That the Londoners, who in respect of the 'greatness of their City, were to be accounted 'among the chief Men of the Nation, were sum- 'mon'd, and he hoped would be present in the 'Council to morrow. The Londoners according to their Summons came, and being brought into the Council, said, 'That they were sent from the 'Commonalty of London[b], not to foment this 'civil Quarrel now on foot, but to beg that their 'King might be freed from Captivity. And with them did all the Barons in their Liberties joyn, earnestly petitioning the same of my Lord Legate, and all the Clergy there assembled. The Legate answer'd them at large, and verily loftily, as he did the day before, 'That the Londoners 'ought not to side with them who had deserted 'their King in the Battel, by which advice the 'Church had been dishonour'd, and who favour'd 'the Londoners only for their own gain. As soon as this Answer was given, one of Queen Maud's (King Stephen's Consort) Chaplains stood up, and deliver'd a Letter to the Legate, who having read it to himself, said aloud, 'That it was not fit it 'should be read publickly in an Assembly of so 'many Reverend and Religious Persons, because 'it contain'd Matters very blame-worthy. The Chaplain hearing this, and seeing the disappoint- ment of the Queen's design, like a faithful and zealous Servant, stood up and boldly read the Letter himself, which was to this effect: 'That the 'Queen earnestly entreated the Clergy there as- 'sembled, and particularly the Bishop of Win- 'chester, the Brother of her Lord, to restore him 'to his Kingdom, whom wicked Men, who were 'his Subjects, detain'd in Prison. To this the Legate answer'd as he had done to the Londoners; and the Council was so far from yielding to her Request, that many of the King's Party were excommunicated by them, and particularly William Martell, a chief Man with the King, who had displeased the Legate; and then the Council brake up. This Election had such an influence upon the Nation, that the greatest part submitted to the Empress Maud, and she seem'd in a fair way to become Mistress of the whole; her Brother Robert employing all his diligence and care in reforming Justice, restoring the Laws of England, promising a release of Taxes, and doing whatsoever he knew would please, and win the People to Obedience; and the Legate seconded him.

The Londoners come to the Council, and petition the King's Release.

But Maud's Interest was not so much promoted by her Friends among the People, as it was weaken'd by her own haughty and proud Carriage to her Subjects. The Londoners, who hoped to obtain whatever they begg'd of their new Queen, petition'd that the rigorous Laws of her Father might be abrogated, and King Edward's restored, but were deny'd with some sharpness: Whereupon they fell immediately to the King's side, (which in their Hearts they most affected) inveigh'd openly against her, and conspir'd to surprize her in their City; but she having had timely notice of it, made her escape (with David King of Scots, who came to visit her, and her Brother Robert) and got to Oxford, which was always true to her. The Legate himself also being deny'd his Request for his Nephew Eustace, that he might enjoy his Earldoms of Bolloigne and Mortaigne in Normandy, began to slacken his Affections to her, in which disgust Queen Maud, finding an opportunity to address her self to him, wrought so upon him by her Tears and Intreaties, with Promises of the King's Reformation, that she brought him to pity his Condition, and act like a Brother, and to absolve those of the King's Party, which he had lately excommunicated. The Earl of Glocester observing this sudden Change in the Empress's Affairs, bestirs himself all he could to recover the Legate's Affections to her; and to that end settles her in the Castle of Winchester with her Guards, from whence she sends for the Legate to come to her, but he first delay'd, and then openly deny'd. The Empress, much amaz'd at this Answer, call'd a Council of her best Friends about her, to advise what to do; but in the mean time, by the Legate's Information and Order, who was fled to her, Queen Maud, and the Lords of her Party, encompass the Town, and shut up all Conveyances of Provision to it: So that at last, after six weeks Siege, the Earl of Glocester was forced to remove the Empress to the Castle of the Devises; in which dangerous attempt, tho' she got safe away, yet the Earl himself was taken, and brought to Queen Maud, who rejoyced in nothing so much, as that she had now a Prisoner, who might, in the Empress's opinion, balance an Exchange for her Lord; which accordingly she caused immediately to be propounded, the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Legate being to be Prisoners till Robert was released. The Earl himself would not consent to the King's Release to gain his own Freedom; but at length, being perswaded by his Sister, he yielded to it: And Stephen being dismiss'd from his Imprisonment, left his Queen and Son Eustace Pledges, till Robert was also releas'd; which was done upon the King's coming to Winchester, where he was sollicited by the King with all promises of Preferment and Honour to forsake the Empress's Party; but when nothing would prevail, he was safely sent back to her; and so both Parties began afresh to renew their Quarrel with their restor'd Captains.

Soon after this great Change of Affairs, the Legate calls a Council at London, where the Pope's Letters, written to him in answer to the Briefs of both Parties sent to him a little before, were read openly; in which the Pope reproved him (tho' mildly) for his neglect in procuring his Brother's Release, and exhorts him to obtain his Liberty by all means Civil and Ecclesiastical. The King himself came to this Council, and complain'd, 'That his Sub- 'jects, to whom he had never deny'd Justice, had 'taken him, and by their reproachful and cruel 'usage almost destroy'd him. The Legate with great Eloquence labour'd to excuse his own Actions, alledging, 'That he did not voluntarily ac- 'cept the Empress, but through meer Compulsion 'and Fear; because upon the King's overthrow, 'while the Lords were either fled, or waited in 'suspence for the Event, she and her Party came 'upon the City of Winchester, and besieged it: 'That whatever Agreements he had made for 'the benefit of the Church, she had broken: That 'he was certainly inform'd, that she and her Par- 'ty had conspir'd against his Life and Dignity. 'But God in his Mercy had so order'd Affairs, 'contrary to her Desires and Intentions, that he 'had escaped her Attempts, and his Brother was 'deliver'd out of her hands. And therefore he, 'in the Name of God and the Pope, requir'd them 'with all their Power to assist the King, who was 'anointed by the consent of the People and Apo- 'stolick See, and to excommunicate all such as 'disturb'd the Peace, and were found Favourers 'of the Countess of Anjou. To this Speech of the

A. D. 1141. Reg. 7. Legate's, the Empreſs's Agent, who was preſent in the Council, made a bold Reply, charging the Legate to his Face, 'That he had given his Faith to 'the Empreſs: That he would paſs no Act there 'prejudicial to her Honour: That he had ſworn 'to her, that he would never aid his Brother with 'above twenty Soldiers: That her coming into 'England was occaſion'd by his Letters, by which 'he often ſollicited her to it: That he was the 'chief cauſe, that the King was taken and kept 'Priſoner. Theſe, and many more Reflections upon the Legate, did the Agent make; but the Legate ſeem'd not at all concern'd, nor would make any reply to them.

1142. Some few Months after the Enlargement of the King, both ſides remain'd without Action, but yet employ'd in contriving how to bring about their Deſigns moſt effectually and ſpeedily. The Empreſs remaining at the Caſtle of the Deviſes, reſolves by the advice of her Council to ſend over her Brother into Normandy to ſollicit her Huſband the Earl of Anjou to aſſiſt her with what Forces he was able. And the Earl, the better to ſecure her in his abſence, ſettled her in the Caſtle of Oxford, which was well fortify'd againſt all Aſſaults, and takes with him the Sons of the chief Noblemen that were about her, as Pledges of their Fidelity to her. Stephen having notice of this deſign, endeavours to ſtop his Paſſage; but not being able to do that, laid Siege to the Caſtle of Oxford as ſoon as he was gone, which held him employ'd till the Earl return'd. Jeffrey Earl of Anjou, being deſirous rather to have Normandy (of which he had gotten the greateſt part, and was in great hopes of the reſt) than to adventure for England, refuſed to go over in Perſon, but ſends a ſmall Army under his Son Henry's command, who was then but eleven Years old, that he might be acquainted with England, and be ſhew'd to the People, to try whether his Perſonal Preſence would move them to the Conſideration of his Right, which prov'd more ſerviceable than an Army. The Earl of Gloceſter being ſafely arriv'd with the young Prince, went towards Oxford; but the Empreſs had made her eſcape from thence in diſguiſe, and was got to Wallingford, where ſhe met her Son and Brother with great ſatisfaction.

1143. King Stephen in the mean time takes Oxford Caſtle, and hearing that his Enemy had received freſh Supplies from Anjou, endeavours to make all the Friends he could to increaſe his Power; but Money failing him, his Intereſt ſunk, eſpecially with his mercinary Lords, and others, which he had in great numbers out of Flanders, who fell to rifling Abbies, to the great diſhonour of the King. But the King's Party did not only fail him, but alſo the Empreſs's: The Earl of Gloceſter, the chief 1146. ſupport of her Title, dy'd within [a] two Years after his return to England, and ſhortly after Milo Earl of Hereford; which ſo diſcourag'd the Empreſs, that ſhe ſent her Son away into Anjou, and 1147. not long after follow'd her ſelf, being tired with the Bickerings and Conteſts of Parties, and leaving her Friends to defend what ſhe had gotten in England. But Henry being advanced now a little in Years, (viz. ſixteen Years old) and able to undergo the Fatigues of War, was impatient of a ſtay in his Father's Court, when he had ſome hopes of one of his own in England; and therefore went into 1149. England again with an Army of choice Soldiers, got into the North, where David King of Scots his Uncle, who had been put into Poſſeſſion of Northumberland by the Empreſs, was ready to joyn him. Stephen, hearing of his arrival, follows him with an Army to York, to ſecure that City, and hinder his Return; but tho' the firſt Motions of both ſides ſeem'd brave and adventurous, yet French-like, their Courage cool'd, and nothing was done by either ſide; Stephen returning home, and Henry not long after into Flanders, where he met that Fortune which ſet him on the Engliſh Throne. A. D. 1150.

Henry was ſcarcely arriv'd in Flanders, but his Father-in-Law [b] Jeffrey Duke of Anjou and Normandy dies, and leaves him Heir of both thoſe Dukedoms: Of which Dignity he had not been long poſſeſſed, but that he marry'd Eleanor, the only Daughter and Heir of William Duke of Guien, by whom he had the Poſſeſſion of thoſe large and rich Countries belonging to the Dutchy of Guien, and Earldom of Poictou. She had been the Wife of Lewis VII. King of France, and was with him in the Holy Wars; but being there accuſed to him of wanton and laſcivious Behaviour [c], he divorced her upon his return, and ſent her to her Friends with her whole Portion. But Henry conſidering how great an Addition her Patrimony would be to his Power, and how much her Treaſure would help forward his Deſigns, overlook'd the French King's Suſpicions, and marry'd her. This Match 1151.
enraged Lewis, becauſe he had made himſelf a formidable Enemy; and therefore to cruſh him in time, joyns with Stephen, and aſſiſts his Son Euſtace (to whom he marry'd his Daughter Conſtance) to recover Normandy, of which he had been poſſeſſed before his Father's Troubles; Stephen in the mean time recovering what he could from Maud's party in England. Henry being furniſh'd now with a ſufficient Power for his own defence, left his Friends in England to ſhift for themſelves awhile, and defends Normandy; which he did ſo well, that the King of France was forced to leave him; and Euſtace returning into England, dy'd 1152.
ſhortly after [d], being about eighteen Years of Age, and was bury'd at Feverſham; a Youth, tho' born to a Kingdom, yet he never lived to ſee any thing but the Calamities of it. In the time that Henry was buſied thus in Normandy, Stephen had gotten ground, and ſet down before Wallingford, a place of great importance, and almoſt impregnable, which yet he reduced to ſuch Extremities, that the Defendants were forced to ſend for Duke Henry to relieve them, who immediately, tho' in the midſt of Winter, came over to them with 1153.

1. That King Stephen ſhould remain King of England for his Life, and Henry enjoy his Dukedom of Normandy, as deſcended to him from his Mother, and be proclaim'd Heir apparent of the Kingdom of England, as Stephen's adopted Son.

Poſſeſſions

A. D. 1153. Reg. 17. Poſſeſſions all Eſtates belonging to the Crown, which had been either alienated by himſelf, or were uſurped by others in his time; and that ſuch Inheritance as had been unjuſtly taken from the right Owners ſince King Henry's time ſhould be reſtored to them.

4. That all the Caſtles which had been built by Stephen's Permiſſion (which were 1117) ſhould be demoliſhed.

There is a Charter of this Agreement in our Annals, which hath other Articles of Reſervation for the Eſtates of particular Perſons; as, for William, King Stephen's ſecond Son, that he ſhould enjoy all that his Father was poſſeſſed of before he was King of England; and for many other Perſons of Note.

A Peace being thus ſettled in England, Henry returns into Normandy, and there concludes a Peace with the King of France, at the Expence of twenty thouſand Marks. Stephen alſo betook himſelf wholly to repair the Ruins of the State, made a Progreſs into moſt parts of his Kingdom, to reform ſuch Irregularities as had ariſen by long 1154. War; and after his return call'd a Parliament at
Reg. 18. London, to conſult about the good of the Nation, and proper methods for eſtabliſhing of it. After the Parliament broke up, he went to Dover to meet the Earl of Flanders, who deſired a Conference with him; and immediately after his return, fell ſick, and dy'd[a] within a few days, and was bury'd in the Abby he founded at Feverſham, with the unfortunate Prince his Son, when he had Reign'd eighteen Years and ten Months. A. D. 1154. Reg. 18.

He was a Perſon ſo continually engag'd in War-like Affairs, that it is not poſſible to give his full Character, whom the World never knew in Peace. He was certainly a very valiant Prince and excellent Soldier, and wanted nothing but a clear Title to have made him one of the beſt of Princes. What his Government would have been in Peace, may be conjectured by a few Inſtances: He kept his Promiſe made to the States at his admiſſion to the Throne, concerning the Releaſe of their Taxes, and never had one Tax (ſo far as can be found) in his Reign. He was ſo mild and merciful to his Subjects, that tho' there were many Revolts and Rebellions againſt him, yet he never put any great Man to Death. And it is very obſervable, that tho' his Reign was full of Wars, yet there were more Abbies built in his time, than had been in an hundred Years before; which ſhews, that tho' his Times were troubleſome, they were not Irreligious and Atheiſtical.

He had by Maud his Wife, the Daughter of Euſtace Earl of Bolloigne, three Sons and two Daughters: Only one Son, viz. William Earl of Bolloigne, Surrey, and Mortaine; and one Daughter, viz. Mary, a Nun and Abbeſs of the Nunnery of Rumſey in Hampſhire[b], ſurviv'd the King. He had two Natural Sons, William, and Gervaſe made by the King Abbot of Weſtminſter, which place he enjoy'd twenty Years[c].

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES in the Reign of King Stephen.

ON the very day that he landed in England to put in for the Crown, as an Omen of his troubleſome Reign, there happen'd a mighty Tempeſt of Thunder, (horrible to hear) and terrible Blaſts of Lightning, which falling out in the Winter-ſeaſon was the more taken notice of.

In the 12th Year of his Reign the Jews at Norwich crucify'd a Chriſtian Child.

In his 14th Year there fell ſo much Rain in the Summer-ſeaſon, that it ſpoil'd the Corn; and a Famine follow'd it. On the 9th of December it began to freez, and the Froſt held till the 9th of February; in which time the Paſſage over the Thames for Man and Horſe was on the Ice. In this Reign there were built no fewer than 1115 Caſtles, which were to be demoliſh'd by the Articles of King Stephen's Treaty with Duke Henry, Son to Maud the Empreſs. Hol.

William of Malmſbury writes, that about the Year 1140. the Money of the Nation was ſo bad, that ſcarce one Shilling in ten was good. In the ſame Year, on the 21ſt of March early in the Morning, there was ſo great an Eclipſe of the Sun, that Men were forc'd to light Candles to eat their Meat by. And the above mention'd Author adds, Thoſe who ſat at the Table where he was, fear'd the return of the ancient Chaos, for ſeveral Stars were perceiv'd near the Sun.

THE LIFE and REIGN OF HENRY II. Surnam'd PLANTAGENET.

A. D. 1155. Henry Son of the Empress made King.

HENRY PLANTAGENET, (though at the Death of Stephen he was beyond the Seas, and a Frenchman by Birth, yet) was admitted to the Crown of England without any Oppoſition or Capitulation other than the uſual Oath. He was detain'd by contrary Winds from coming into England for ſix Weeks together [a], after Stephen's Death; but the Nation was ſo tired out with Civil Wars, and all Places ſo miſerably haraſs'd, that they choſe to wait for his coming, rather than provoke ſo powerful a Prince by the Election of another. So he was crown'd by Theobald Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, Dec. 20. 1154. in the twenty third Year of his Age. He was a Prince young, active, and powerful, and had all things that might have made him high and aſſuming; but he underſtood the Neceſſity of his own preſent Affairs, and the Intereſts of Princes ſo well, that he began his Reign with all ſuch publick Actions, as he knew would get and increaſe the Love of his Subjects, being ſenſible, that the King of France was ſo highly offended by his Match, that he would not overlook any Advantage he could get againſt him through the Diſaffection of his Subjects. And the firſt thing he did, was to to chuſe himſelf a Council, which he did out of the graveſt and moſt experienc'd Men of his Kingdom, who could beſt inform him in the State and Condition of the Nation. Then he call'd a Parliament at Wallingford, where he paſſed an Act, which was not more for his own Profit than for the Satisfaction of all his People; which was, To expel all Strangers out of the Land: For the People were greatly peſter'd with them at that time, by reaſon of the Wars, which drew Multitudes of them hither, eſpecially Flemings and Picards; whom King Stephen, after he found the Engliſh falſe and unfaithful to him, entertain'd and chiefly truſted, making William de Ipres Earl of Kent their Commander, who by Virtue of this Act was baniſh'd with the reſt of his Country-men, and his Lands ſeiz'd into the King's hand. After the Diſſolution of this Aſſembly, that he might be able to maintain his Royal Dignity without being burthenſome to his People (whoſe voluntary Contributions would afford him greater Supplies, if Neceſſity required, than ſevere Exactions) he look'd into the State and Condition of his Revenues, reform'd the Exchequer, and reſum'd thoſe Lands which had been alienated, or detain'd from the Crown; and though ſome of his great Lords reſolutely kept Poſſeſſion of what they had in their hands, as Hugh de Mortimer of his Caſtles of Cleabury, Wigmore and Bridge-North, and Roger Fitz-Milo Earl of Hereford of the City and Lands of Gloceſter; yet the King took them by force from them, as belonging to the Crown. As he did alſo the Caſtle of Scarborough from William Earl of Albemarle, and divers other Lands and Caſtles in Yorkſhire poſſeſs'd by private Men. Hugh Bigod reſign'd his Caſtles into the King's hands: But that which look'd worſt in theſe Actions, was his taking the Caſtle of Pemſey, City of Norwich, with other Towns and Caſtles from William Earl of Mortaine and Warren, the ſecond Son of King Stephen, contrary to his own poſitive Agreement with the ſaid King; alledging, that they were the Demeſns of the Crown, and could not be alienated from it, yet he ſuffer'd him to enjoy the Lands his Father held in England in the Reign of Henry I. Theſe things being diſpatch'd he went into the North, and [b] ſeiz'd upon Cumberland and Northumberland, with the Cities of Carliſle, Town of New-Caſtle, and Caſtle of Bamberge, which his Mother Maud had given to David King of Scots, or had anciently belong'd to the Crown of Scotland by the Donation of his Predeceſſors; ſaying, 'Twas not in the Power 'of any King to give away any part of his King-'dom: Yet he ſuffer'd Malcolm, the preſent King, to enjoy the Earldom of Huntington, which Stephen had given to Henry his Father, becauſe it could be of no Benefit to him, but at his Pleaſure; and he had a mind to keep him his Homager, to do him Services for that Earldom. The ſame Courſe he took to recover all Alienations from the Demeſns of the Dutchy of Normandy, forcing Theobald Duke of Blois to reſign two Caſtles, and Petroch Earl of Perch, the like Number to him. Theſe Revocations, which were done with Loſs to many Perſons, and contrary to the Grants of himſelf and Predeceſſors, might ſeem unjuſt, and in the beginning of his Government not ſafe: But becauſe the Kingdom receiv'd a great Advantage by it, and only ſome particular Perſons endamag'd, it was generally approved as a neceſſary and prudent Action; for if theſe Revenues had been ſtill kept from the Crown, he muſt have depended upon Taxes for

KING HENRY THE II.nd

A. D. 1155. Reg. 2. the Maintenance of his Royal Dignity, and so been a continual Burthen and Grievance to the Nation.

But tho' his arbitrary Actings with his Subjects might be excused, yet his taking the Earldom of Anjou from his Brother Jeffrey, contrary to his Father's Will and his own Oath, cannot be deny'd to be not only unjust, but against Nature and Conscience. For his Father Jeffrey, Duke of Anjou, desirous to leave some Estate to his youngest Son Jeffrey, order'd by his Will, That when Henry had recover'd and was settled in the Kingdom of England, his Son Jeffrey should have the County of Anjou; and in the mean time put him in Possession of the Castle and Towns of Chinou, Lodun, and Mirabel, that he might have a present Maintenance according to his Quality, and be in a case to recover the rest when it should become his. And lest his Son Henry should not perform this his Will, he caused certain Bishops and others of his Nobility to swear, That they would not suffer his Body to be interr'd, till Henry, who was then absent, had sworn to fulfil his Will. Henry, rather than his Father's Body should not be bury'd, took the Oath, but very unwillingly; but after he was possess'd of the Kingdom of England, and Jeffrey 1156. had thereupon enter'd upon the Earldom of Anjou, he went over into France, and not only took away from him the Earldom, but the other three Towns which were given him in his Father's Life, saying, That 'twas unreasonable that a forced Oath upon such an Occasion, should oblige him to part with his Birth-right, being all the Patrimony he had from his Father; for tho' indeed he had recover'd the Kingdom of England, that was neither by his Father's Labour or Right; and tho' his Brother was, and ought to be dear unto him, yet having Children of his own, he was to take care that all that was really his should descend to them: But yet he was contented to allow his Brother an honourable Pension for the Maintenance of his Honour, (viz. a 1000 l. of English Money, and 2000 l. of Anjovin Yearly) and he obtain'd of Pope Adrian IVth. (an Englishman by Birth) a Dispensation for the Oath he had made in that Case.

He takes Anjou from his Brother Jeffrey.

The first that gave Disturbance to his Peace, after his Accession to the Crown, were the Welsh under their valiant Captain Owen; who, according to their usual manner, always attempted 1157. Reg. 3. something towards their Country's Liberty in the beginning of every Prince's Reign, to try their Spirits and their own Fortune. Henry gather'd such a powerful Army to go against them, as if he meant to conquer all; but was in passing the narrow Streights between certain Mountains, so furiously assaulted by the Welsh, that he lost many of his Men, and among them some of his chief Captains, Eustace Fitz-John and Robert Curcy, and himself was thought to be kill'd; which being reported to the Army that follow'd, so discourag'd them, that Henry Earl of Essex cowardly forsook the King's Standard and fled: But the King soon made it appear that he was alive, by vanquishing the Army of his Enemies, and bringing them to submit to his Pleasure. After the Battel Robert de Monfort accused the Earl of Essex of Cowardice and Treachery, in leaving the Royal Standard, and in single Combat (which was the way of Tryal) overcame him[a], yet was the Earl pardon'd as to his Life; and being condemn'd to be a shorn Monk, was put into the Abby of Reading, and had his Lands seiz'd to the King's Use. After the Reduction of the Welsh all things continu'd peaceable for two or three Years, the Kingdom flourishing, and Affairs every where prosperous; the Queen also in that time brought forth three Sons, Henry, Richard, and Jeffrey; William his eldest Son (to whom he had caused the Nation to take an Oath of Fidelity) dy'd shortly after his Accession to the Crown; and so the same Oath was again repeated to Henry, and all things seem'd secure on this side the Sea. The King of France, who would gladly have put a stop to the King's Fortune, was kept from his Desires by Necessity, his Treasure being exhausted partly by his Journey into the Holy Land, and partly by the Pope's Exactions, who wrung great Sums from him, for his second Marriage with Constantia, King Alphonso's Daughter, which requiring a Dispensation, was dearly bought at Rome. So that all things concurr'd to enlarge the Power and Dominions of Henry, which he had a fresh Occasion to do at this time.

King of France quiet.

Henry had gotten Dominions almost round France, having in his Possession all Normandy, a great part of Britain by the Resignation of Nantz to him by Conan Duke of it; the Earldom of Main, Poitou, Tourane, Anjou, and Dutchy of Guien, and now he lays his Claim to the rich Earldom of Thoulouse upon this Title. William Duke of Acquitain (Grand-father of Queen Eleanor) marry'd the only Daughter and Heir of the Earl of Thoulouse, and going to the Holy Wars engag'd that Earldom to Raymond Earl of S. Gyles, and never return'd again to redeem it; and William his Son, Father of Queen Eleanor, either through want of Ability or Neglect, took no Care of the Redemption of it: So that the Earl of S. Gyles continuing in Possession of it 1158. while he liv'd, left it to his Son Raymond. Lewis Reg. 4. the French King, while he had Eleanor for his Queen, demanded the Restitution of the said Earldom, tendring him the Sum for which it was engaged. Raymond refuses to accept the Money, and resolves to keep his Possession of it as either bought or forfeited; but being sensible, that he was not able to contend with the King of France, he obtain'd a Peace with him, and marry'd his Sister Constance, the Widow of Prince Eustace, King Stephen's Son, and so confirm'd himself in the Possession. But King Henry after marrying Eleanor, came to be entitled to her Rights, and tendring the Sum disburs'd, as the King of France had done before him, requires the Earldom, but receiv'd the like Answer. Wherefore the King prepares to recover it, entring into a League with Raymond Earl of Barcelona, a Man of great Estate in those Parts, (to whose Daughter he covenanted to marry his second Son Richard, on condition that he should have the Inheritance of the Dukedom of Aquitain and Earldom of Poitou) and taking William Lord of Tanchrevill, who possess'd many Seigniories, into his Protection from the Injuries of the Earl of Tholouse; and having levy'd a great Army, went in Person against the City of Tholouse, being attended with Malcolm King of Scots; who coming to do him Homage for the Earldom of Huntington, and to claim other Places taken from his Crown, was persuaded by Henry's fair words and Promises to attend him in that Expedition. The Earl of Tholouse having notice of the King of England's Design, begg'd Assistance of his Brother-in-Law the French King, who came in Person with a strong Army to Tholouse, and was there before the King of England was arriv'd; so that he was prevented in his aim, which so vex'd him, that he fell to ſpoiling all the adjoyning Country, and took Cahors in Quercy [a], where he plac'd a ſtrong Garriſon to annoy the Tholouſians; then returning into Normandy, to augment his Army (where he conferr'd the Order of Knighthood upon King Malcolm at Tours) he enter'd into the Country of Beavoſin, where he deſtroy'd many Caſtles, and committed much Spoil; and having obtain'd the two ſtrong Caſtles of Rochfort and Monfort, of the Earl of Auranches, made the way between Paris and Orleance impaſſible. Theſe Annoyances had certainly raiſed hot Contentions between the two potent Kings of England and France, and cauſed the Effuſion of much Blood, had there not been ſet on foot a Propoſition of Peace; which was at length concluded with a Match between the Young Prince Henry, then not ſeven Years of Age, and Margaret the eldeſt Daughter of the King of France, ſcarce three Years old, who was deliver'd to Robert Duke of Newburgh, to be kept till ſhe was come to an Age fit to dwell with her Huſband [b]: Which Conjunction tho' it cemented the preſent Difference, yet many Ruptures happen'd between the Parents before they came together. The firſt of which was about the Caſtle of Giſors, and two other Caſtles ſtanding upon the River Eata in the Confines of Normandy, which was betray'd to Henry by the Knights Templars, to whom they were entruſted till the Marriage was conſummated. This coſt ſome Blood, and the French King perſecuted the Knights Templars for it, but King Henry receiv'd them.

The King being now free from all Employments abroad, began to turn his Thoughts upon his own Affairs at home; for being inform'd, that the Clergy of late Years had much incroach'd upon the Royal Prerogative, and enlarg'd their Juriſdiction beyond what was convenient for their Vocation and Function; he was ſoon awaken'd into a Suſpicion of it, and ſet himſelf to a ſtrict Examination of that Affair. He took notice of their Dealings with King Stephen and his Mother, how they excluded the one and admitted the other to the Crown as they pleaſed, and made ſuch Conditions with him as were moſt advantageous to themſelves; and tho' indeed they ratified his own Succeſſion, yet he might thank his Sword, the Juſtice of his Cauſe, and the ſtrong Party he had in the Kingdom rather than them, who ſhewed their Power indeed in doing of it, not their Affection; who had acted againſt him as long as they dar'd, and there was any hopes of Succeſs on the other ſide. He obſerv'd them to be always ready to lay hold of all Advantages to advance their own Intereſts, and ſaw little reaſon to depend upon them for the Preſervation of the Succeſſion of his Poſterity; and therefore thought it neceſſary to abate their Power as much as he could. This Reſolution was much confirm'd by the Accuſations which the Nobility brought againſt the Clergy, who alledg'd, That the Privileges of the Clergy had hinder'd the Royal Power from executing Juſtice in the Kingdom; for the Clergy holding their Dominion apart, and being free from any Authority but their own, many enormous Acts were committed by Clergy-men without any Redreſs to be had; and particularly the King was inform'd, that ſince the beginning of his Reign, which was but about ſix Years, there had been above an hundred Murthers committed within the Kingdom of England by Prieſts and Men in Holy Orders, and very few or none puniſh'd for the Facts (as by the Canons they ought to have been.) This Information haſten'd the King in this Affair, and he proceeded with all Speed to rectifie theſe Irregularites, which tended ſo much to his Diſhonour, as well as the Detriment of the Kingdom. Now the King had not long before (upon the Death of Theobald Arch-biſhop of Canterbury) preferr'd Thomas Beckett, a Creature and Servant of his own to that See [c]. He had before made him of Arch-Deacon of Canterbury, his Chancellour, and finding him faithful, diligent and wiſe, he employ'd him in all great Buſineſſes of State, and left the Education of his eldeſt Son Henry to him, and at laſt raiſed him to be the Head of the Church; all which Favours might be juſtly an Obligation upon him to be very complying with the reaſonable Deſires of the King, and very diligent to advance his Affairs. In the beginning of this Man's Promotion did the King venture upon this Reformation of the Clergy's Manners, and to retrench their Juriſdiction, which tho' it would neceſſarily prove of much Difficulty and Trouble, the Biſhop having from the firſt preaching of Chriſtianity in this Realm born a principal Sway in the State, and enjoy'd many great Privileges and Immunities by Law ſeparate from the Laity; yet he was not at all deterr'd, but as if it were the fitter for him, becauſe ſo hard, enters upon it, and to that end call'd a Parliament at Weſtminſter [d], and there propounded this Law to be enacted, 'That every Clergy-man, 'that ſhall be convicted of any heinous Crime, 'ſhall loſe the Privilege of the Church, and be 'deliver'd up to the Civil Magiſtrate to be pu-'niſh'd for their Offences, as all others of the 'King's Subjects were. For if after Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures, no civil Puniſhment ſhould be uſed, they would not have a ſufficient reſtraint upon them to keep them from doing Miſchief; ſince 'tis not probable, that ſuch Men would much value degrading and Loſs of Orders, whom the Conſcience of their Duty, or Dignity of their Office would not keep from ſuch Actions: The Arch-biſhop and his Suffragans, with the reſt of the Biſhops anſwer'd, 'That they could not con-'ſent to any ſuch Act, being againſt the Liber-'ties of the Church, which himſelf had ſworn to 'defend and maintain; and therefore they beſought him not to urge or inſiſt upon a Law, which was ſo much to the Prejudice of their Juriſdiction, and thoſe Immunities which they had enjoyed both under him and his Noble Progenitours. The King diſliking this Reply, aſked them, 'Whether they would ſubmit to 'the 'Laws and Cuſtoms which the Arch-biſhops and

Biſhops,

A. D. 1163. Reg. 9.

Biſhops, in the time of his Grandfather Henry I. did obſerve. They anſwer'd, They would; their Order, the Honour of God, and Right of the Church, in all things being kept harmleſs[a]. This Reſervation diſpleaſed the King more, who hereupon diſmiſſed the Parliament, and did nothing at that time. But gave not over his Endeavours to recover his Prerogative out of the Church's hands: And finding the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, of whom he had reaſon to expect a ready ſubmiſſion to his Deſires, becauſe of the many Favours he had received from him, was the chief Stickler againſt him; he was very much enraged at his Ingratitude, and reſolved to ſhew him, that he could pull down as well as advance.

The King's dealings with Becket for oppoſing him.

And therefore he firſt forbids him his Preſence, and takes from him all that he poſſibly could; then he countenances all his Enemies, and cauſes that things be carry'd againſt him in all Courts of the Kings. The Earl of Clare was ſupported in the Controverſie he had with him, about doing Homage for the Caſtle of Tunbridge, and prevail'd. In fine, nothing was left undone that could be thought moſt effectual to humble him. Beſides the King by politick Artifices breaks the Confederacy of the Biſhops with him, and gains firſt by his Obligingneſs the Archbiſhop of York (the ancient Competitor with Canterbury for Preeminence) and afterwards the Biſhops of Lincoln, Hereford, and others of the Prelates, who were the moſt leading Men, and ſeparates them from the Council and Company of Archbiſhop Becket.

This Controverſie between the Church and State, or rather between the King and Archbiſhop, made a great Noiſe in the World, and was ſoon brought to the Pope's Ear, who being deſirous to keep the King's Love, ſent Philip his Almoner, by the advice of the whole Conclave of Cardinals, to compoſe the Difference, and to charge the Archbiſhop to make Peace with his Maſter the King, by promiſing to obſerve his Laws, without Reſervations or Exceptions. The Archbiſhop ſeeing his Cauſe thus diſcountenanced at Rome, and being preſſed to a Compliance by many of his Friends of the Nobility, he went immediately to Woodſtock, and there promiſes the King, without any reſerves, to obſerve his Laws, as he required[b]. The King ſuppoſing, that by Archbiſhop Becket's promiſe all Oppoſition to his Deſign was laid aſide, calls a Parliament of the Biſhops and Nobility at Clarendon in Wiltſhire, where John of Oxford the King's Clerk was Preſident, who gave them a Charge from the King his Maſter, That they ſhould call to remembrance the Laws of his Grandfather Henry I. and commit them to Writing; which being done, he required the Archbiſhop and Biſhops to ſet their Hands and Seals to them, which they all did, but Archbiſhop Becket refuſed. The other Biſhops earneſtly perſuaded him to ſatisfie the King's deſires, not only in reſpect of the Danger which he would fall into through the King's Anger, but in regard to his Oath, which he had again taken there to obſerve the King's Laws without Reſervation. He thereupon deſires a Copy of the Writing, as if he would conſider better upon the ſeveral Heads of it; but taking it into his Hands, he turned to the Clergy, and ſaid, Brethren, ſtand faſt, you ſee the Malice of the King, and of whom we are to beware; but would not ſubſcribe it. And ſo this Aſſembly was diſmiſſed without doing any thing of Moment, as the King intended. Theſe Diſappointments, and this Perverſeneſs in the Archbiſhop, incenſed the King much the more againſt him, becauſe now he found that all the other Biſhops yielded to his pleaſure, and only Becket ſtood out. And therefore he proceeds by all means to vex and diſgrace him, and to advance his Rival, the Archbiſhop of York; and to that end ſent his Agents, John of Oxford and Jeffrey Riddle, his Clerks[c], to ſollicit the Pope to make him Legate over all England. But the Pope being before acquainted with the buſineſs refuſed to do it; yet at the Petition of the Agents he granted a Legation to the King himſelf, with a proviſo, That he ſhould do nothing to grieve the Archbiſhop of Canterbury; which the King reſented ſo highly, that he ſent them back again with his Grant. The Archbiſhop Becket afterward ſo repented of the Oath that he had taken at Clarendon, that he ſuſpended himſelf from the Service of the Altar, and did ſevere Penance for it, till he had obtained Abſolution from the Pope; which upon his own Information of his Caſe, was ſoon ſent him. Not long after this, as ſome write, he attempted to go out of the Kingdom, contrary to a Law made at Clarendon, whereby it was forbidden to the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, or any other Perſons, to depart out of the Realm without the King's Licenſe; which, altho' they obtain'd, yet they were notwithſtanding obliged to ſecure the King, and neither in their going, returning, or ſtaying there, to practiſe any thing prejudicial to his State or Perſon. But being by contrary Winds driven home again, he more exaſperated the King againſt him by this attempt.

A Parliament at Northampton againſt Becket.

The King, by the former Actions of the Archbiſhop, growing more ſevere againſt him, called a Parliament at Northampton to ratifie the Acts made at Clarendon. And here, to thwart him, the King's Horſes were placed in his Inn. At this Aſſembly he had a Caſe given againſt him, concerning a Manour which John the King's Marſhal contended at Law with him for; whereby he not only loſt the ſaid Manour, but was ſentenced to pay five hundred Marks, as Arrears, and was forced to pay it. He was alſo called to an account for all the Sums which he had received in the time of his Chancellorſhip upon the King's account, which amounted to thirty thouſand Pounds. The Archbiſhop refuſed to plead to this Charge, becauſe, he ſaid, he was diſcharged of thoſe Receipts by the Prince, Barons of the Exchequer, and Robert Lucy Chief Juſtice of England, in behalf of the King, before he was made Archbiſhop. But this Anſwer did not ſatisfie: The King was ſtill very urgent to have Judgment paſs againſt him for this, with other his late attempts, and diſobedience; and ſo he was commanded to attend his Cenſure the next day. The Morning before he was to appear, he celebrated early in the Morning with great Devotion the Maſs of St. Stephen the Protomartyr, which had in it theſe Words: Princes ſate and ſpake againſt me. From this Office he ſet forward (committing his Cauſe to God) to the Court, in his Stole, his black Canonical Hood, carrying the Croſs in his right Hand, and guiding his Horſe with his left. The People ſeeing him come in ſuch an unuſual manner, flock all about him, and he entring the great Chamber, ſat down amongſt them; the King being in his Privy-Chamber with his Council. The Biſhop of London was the firſt that came out to him, and he much blamed him for coming in that Garb to the Court, and offered to pull the Croſs out of his Hand; but the Archbiſhop held it ſo faſt, that he could not. The Biſhop of Winchester ſeeing it, ſaid to London: Brother, let him alone; he ought to bear the Croſs. London reply'd, You ſpeak, Brother, againſt the King, and it will be ill for you. After this came forth the Archbiſhop of York,

Then, turning his Speech to the Biſhops, who ſate as his Judges, he ſaid: 'You ſee how the World rageth 'againſt me, and the Enemy aſſails me; but that 'which grieves me moſt, is, That the Sons of my 'Mother combine againſt me: If I ſhould not 'reſent it, the Ages to come would record it to 'your diſgrace, that you left me alone in the 'Battel, and gave Sentence upon me, who am 'your Father, tho' never ſo great a Sinner. But 'I charge you, by Virtue of your Obedience, and 'under pain of Degrading, that you be not pre'ſent in any Court of Judicature, where either 'my Cauſe or Perſon ſhall be judged; and that 'if any Layman ſhall lay Hands on me, you im'mediately excommunicate him or them, as your 'Duty to your Father the Archbiſhop obliges 'you, who, whatever he ſuffers, will not deſert 'the Church's Cauſe, nor forſake the Flock com'mitted to him. Then were many great Accuſations of his Contempt and Diſobedience to the King brought againſt him, and Perjury proved upon him; which were ſo aggravated by the King's Council, that all preſent cry'd out unanimouſly, 'That he was one of the worſt of Traytors, who 'having been loaded ſo much with the King's 'Favours, had refuſed to pay him the Civil Ho'nour of a Subject, and to obſerve his Laws, as he 'had ſworn to do. The Archbiſhop hearing theſe things, appeal'd to the Pope. But the Biſhops complying with the Secular Power, renounced their Eccleſiaſtical Obedience to him, cited him to Rome, and condemned him as a Traytor and Perjured Perſon. Then the Earl of Leiceſter, being accompany'd with Reginald Earl of Cornwall, came to the Archbiſhop, and charged him in the King's Name to anſwer the Crimes objected againſt him, or elſe to hear his Sentence pronounced. 'Nay but Son Earl, ſaid he, hear thou me firſt: 'It is not unknown to your ſelf how faithfully 'I have ſerved the King, and that for my Fidelity he preferred me to this Dignity I now enjoy (God knows) againſt my Will. For I was 'conſcious of my own Infirmities, and was contented to take it upon me rather to pleaſe the 'King than God; and therefore doth God withdraw himſelf from me, and turns the King's heart 'againſt me. At my Election he freed me from 'all Court-Attendance and Slavery; and upon 'that account I am not bound to anſwer any de'fects in that kind, neither will I. As much as the 'Soul is more excellent than the Body, ſo much 'are ye bound to obey God and me before any 'Earthly Creature. Neither Law or Reaſon can 'juſtifie the Sons in the condemning of the Fa'thers. Wherefore I refuſe to ſtand either to the 'Judgment of the King, or any other Perſon, Ap'pealing to the Audience of the Pope, by whom 'alone I can be judged upon Earth, committing 'all I have to God's protection and his, and as 'under his Authority only I depart out of this 'place. And ſo he went out, and took his Horſe, yet not without ſome difficulties in paſſing, and many affronts from the King's Servants. But being gotten out of the Court, a great multitude of the common People (rejoycing to ſee him deliver'd) and divers of the Clergy convey'd him honourably to the Abby of St. Andrew's at Northampton, from whence he made his eſcape in diſguiſe, and under the Name of Dereman, into Flanders, and ſo got into France; where being out of the King's reach, and under the Pope's protection, he cauſed the Kingdom and King much trouble.

A. D. 1164. Reg. 10.

Immediately after the departure of the Archbiſhop, the King ſends over his Ambaſſadors, Gillebert Biſhop of London, and William Earl of Arundel, to the King of France, to intreat him not only to forbid the Archbiſhop his Kingdom, but to be a means to the Pope, that his Cauſe might not be favour'd by the Church, being ſo contumacious a Rebel againſt his Natural Prince. But the French King was ſo far from Complyance with his Requeſt, that he diſpatched Fryar Francis his Almoner privately to the Pope to beſeech him, as he tender'd the Honour of Holy Church, and the Safety of his Kingdom, to ſupport the Archbiſhop of Canterbury againſt the Tyrant of England. King Henry alſo ſent with all ſpeed Roger Archbiſhop of York, the Biſhops of London, Winchester, Chichester, and Exeter; Guido Rufus, Richard Ivechester [a], and John of Oxford, Clerks, William Earl of Arundel, Hugh de Gundevill, Bernard de S. Welleric, and Henry Fitz-Gerrard, to inform the Pope of the whole Affair, and prevent the ill effects of the Archbiſhop's Complaints. The Multitude, and the greatneſs of the Ambaſſadors, ſhewed the Importance of the Embaſſage, and the King's deſire to prevail. They found the Pope at the City of Sens, and [b] repreſented to him, how obſtinate and diſobedient the Archbiſhop had been to his Sovereign Lord the King of England; and that tho' he had ſworn to obey his Laws, yet he had wilfully oppoſed and broke them, and by his peeviſhneſs and obſtinacy was about to embroil the Church and Kingdom; And therefore they beſought him, as he tender'd the Peace of the Church of England, and deſir'd the Love of their Maſter, not to favour or credit a Man of that turbulent and obſtinate Diſpoſition. This Relation of the Difference little moved the Pope; which, when the Ambaſſadors perceived, they pray'd him to ſend two Legates into England to examine the buſineſs more fully, and in the mean time to admit no other relation of the matter but what they ſhould bring. But the Pope would not yield to their deſire, and ſo they departed much diſſatisfied. Within four Days after their departure came the Archbiſhop, and proſtrates himſelf at the Pope's Feet, preſents him with a Copy of the Laws, which the King call'd Leges Avitæ, i. e. his Grandfather's Laws; which being read before a Body of Cardinals, Clergy, and many others, the Pope condemned them for ever, and anathematized all ſuch as ſhould either obey or favour them. The Laws, which being among the Statutes of Clarendon, were ſo furiouſly oppoſed by the Archbiſhop, and ſo much offended the Clergy, were theſe, (as we find them ſet down in his own Letter to the Biſhop of London) 'That there

1165. Reg. 11.

The King, at the return of his Ambaſſadors from the Pope, finding that they had obtain'd no Favour with him, but that he was rather ſlighted and contemn'd by him, was highly diſpleaſed[a]; and that he might ſhew how much he reſented the Affront, and ſcorn'd his Authority, he put out a ſevere Edict both againſt the Pope and the Arch-biſhop, oppoſing his Secular to their Eccleſiaſtical Authority; and ordering,

The King's Edict againſt the Pope and all his Agents.

'That if any Perſon were apprehended, carry-'ing a Letter or other Inſtrument from the Pope 'or Arch-biſhop, containing any Interdict of the 'Chriſtian Religion in England, he ſhould be with-'out delay executed as a Traytor both to the King 'and Kingdom. That whatſoever Biſhop, Prieſt, 'Monk, or other Perſon in Holy Orders, Clerk 'or Lay-man, ſhould have or conceal any ſuch 'Letters; ſhall forfeit all their Lands, Goods 'and Chattels to the King, and be immediately 'baniſh'd the Nation, with all their Kindred. 'That no Clergy-man, Monk, or Lay-man, 'ſhould be permittted to paſs from Normandy 'to England without a Paſs-port from the Juſti-'ces there; nor from England to Normandy, or 'other Places beyond-ſea without the King's, 'upon Pain of Impriſonment if diſcover'd. That 'no Appeals to the Pope ſhould be allowed. 'That all Clergy-men, who had any Eſtates in 'England, ſhould return into the Kingdom with-'in three Months, under the Penalty of forfeit-'ing their Lands to the King. That Peter-pence 'ſhould be collected and ſequeſtred, till the King's 'Pleaſure was farther known. He alſo baniſh'd all the Archbiſhop's Kindred, without any Exception of Sex or Age, and openly renounc'd the Pope's Authority, declaring his Adherence to the Emperour's Party, who then was at Enmity with the preſent Pope Alexander the III. and vindicated the Election of Victor the V. who tho' elected by the far leſs Number of Cardinals, viz. (but four to twenty two) yet was thought a ſufficient Pretence of oppoſing the Pope, who was a declared Enemy to the Empire. Henry before this Quarrel between himſelf and the Arch-biſhop, had favour'd the Election of Alexander, with the King of France, and the other Chriſtian Princes of Europe, and had at Cocy upon the Loir ſhew'd him an extraordinary Reverence and Reſpect; but finding him ſo averſe to him in this Difference, he fell from him, renounc'd his Authority, declar'd for the Emperour; and to ſtrengthen himſelf by a firm Alliance with the German Princes, conſented to marry his Daughter Maud to the Duke of Saxony, at the Motion of Reginald Archbiſhop of Collen, who was ſent on purpoſe by the Emperour Frederick Barbaroſſa to ſolicit it, and entertain'd another Motion for a Marriage between another of his Daughters and the Emperour's Son: But all theſe things did the King little Service. The Emperour's Party was weak, the Pope's grew ſtronger and ſtronger every day; and the Pope being exaſperated by the King's Actions, was more earneſt in the Defence of the Arch-biſhop, whom he encourages to ſolicit and adjure the Clergy of England not to forſake their hold, but reſolutely maintain their Liberties and Privileges againſt the Invader of them, who ſought to confound the Prieſthood and Kingdom; and if they gave ground in the leaſt, would utterly ruine themſelves and the Church. Then he excommunicated all the King's principal Miniſters that adhered to the German Faction, or held Correſpondence with the Arch-biſhop of Collen; as John of Oxford, Richard Ivelbeſter, Richard de Lucy, Jaſcelin Baliol, Alan de Nevil, and with them all thoſe who had ſeized upon the Revenues and Goods of the See of Canterbury, which he call'd the Patrimony of the Crucifix, and Food of the Poor, viz. Ralph de Brock, Hugh S. Clare, and Thomas Fitz-Bernard. Thus was this unbloody War manag'd on both ſides; in which, tho' there were no Swords drawn, yet it created much Vexation and Trouble to both Parties.

While this Diſſention was on foot between the King and Pope, other publick Buſineſs happen'd, which kept the King employ'd. The Welſh[b] revolted, and could hardly be reduc'd to their Obedience: In the War with them he loſt many brave Men, and had himſelf been killed, had not Hubert S. Clare receiv'd the Arrow into his own Body, which he ſaw would prove mortal to his Maſter; yet was the King ſo ſenſible of his Danger, that he reveng'd his own ſuppos'd Death with a very cruel Treatment of his Enemies. From this Expedition he paſs'd into Normandy, where now his Buſineſs lay more than in England: And here, that he might ſhew he had not loſt his Chriſtian Diſpoſition by quarrelling with the Pope, he obtain'd of his Subjects in a publick Aſſembly call'd for that purpoſe, two Pence in the Pound of every Man's Lands and Goods for the Year 1167[c], and a Penny in the Pound for four Years after, for the Relief the poor Chriſtians in the Holy War; and carefully collecting it Yearly, ſent it to them. Then he gathered ſome Forces, and takes certain Caſtles in the County of Maine, and Marches of Britain from ſeveral factious Barons. In his abſence Matthew the Son of the Earl of Flanders (who had married the Lady Mary, Abbeſs of Ramſey, the Daughter of King Stephen) attempted an Invaſion, and moleſted the Coaſts of England, but to no purpoſe, the King being too powerful for ſo weak an Opponent. While he was in Normandy, Conan King of Brittaigne died[d], and left one only Daughter (which he had by his Wife Conſtance the King of Scots Daughter) to ſucceed him in his Earldom. The King of England being then upon the Confines of that Country, thought this a good Opportunity of enlarging his own Dominions; and therefore treating with the Guardians of the young Lady, and having gained the Nobility to conſent to a Marriage with his third Son Jeffrey, he in the end obtain'd his Deſires to his great Content. This happen'd in the thirteenth Year of his Reign; wherein, as ſome

After her Death Henry remained three Years in France, which he ſpent in Wars, partly to clear the Bounds of his own Dominions from the Uſurpation and Encroachments of his Neighbouring Lords, whom at length he brought into the Limits of his own Will, and partly to ſettle and reform the State of Brittaigne, which was much out of order, and all in a Mutiny at the late Match with his Son: But he ſoon appeaſed them, and kept his Chriſtmas at Nantz, where he feaſted all the Nobility of the Country, and by Favours obliged them to retain their Fidelity to his Son in his abſence [a].

He kept his Eaſter at Windſor, whither William King of Scots, who lately ſucceeded his Brother Malcolm in that Government, came with his younger Brother David to congratulate the King's happy Return into England, and put in his Claim for ſome Countries in the North, which he pretended were unjuſtly detain'd from him. Henry entertain'd him very civilly, and gave him a fair Anſwer to his Demands: But told him, 'He 'could do nothing in it without the Conſent of 'the Parliament, which if he would attend, he 'ſhould have Satisfaction. Which words raiſed the Expectations of that King, and made him often come into England, and once to attend Henry into France as his Brother had done, but without a proportionable Return to his Deſires.

Not long after the King's return home, his Controverſie with the Church again reviv'd, and a greater Storm than ever threaten'd him. The Pope himſelf was not very forward to proceed to any rigorous Courſe, but labour'd to pacifie the angry Arch-biſhop, by telling him, 'That it 'was an ill time to contend, the King being po-'tent and the Church already in Troubles; and therefore to heal the Sore, he writes to the Biſhop of London and Hereford, 'Requiring them 'to treat with the King, and earneſtly perſuade 'him to deſiſt from meddling with the Liberties 'of the Church, and to reſtore the Arch-biſhop 'to his See and Dignity. The Biſhops anſwer'd the Pope's Letter wiſely and gravely thus, 'We 'have (ſay they) deliver'd your Holineſs's Meſ-'ſage to our King, and earneſtly preſſed him to 'yield to your Deſires ſo far as was convenient 'for us to do to the Majeſty of a King; begging 'of him, that if he had done any thing contrary 'to Truth and Juſtice, that he would not perſiſt 'in his Errour; That he would not prohibit 'Men from viſiting the Churches at Rome, hin-'der Appeals, oppreſs the Church or Clergy, 'or ſuffer others to do it; That he would recal 'our Father the Arch-biſhop, &c. and perſiſt in 'all Acts of Piety, that ſo the God, by whom 'Kings reign might preſerve him in his Tem-'poral Kingdom, and give him an Eternal one 'in Heaven; That unleſs he would now hearken 'to your Holy Admonitions, you would wait 'no longer; adding this of our ſelves, That un-'leſs he amended his Errours, his Kingdom 'would not proſper or long flouriſh. The King received your Advice with many Thanks, great Comelineſs and Modeſty, and gave theſe Anſwers to every Point. '1. He proteſted, That he had 'not any Averſion to your Holineſs, nor purpo-'ſed to maintain any Oppoſition againſt you; 'but ſo long as he could enjoy your Fatherly 'Kindneſs, he would reverence you as a Father, 'and honour and protect the Church as a Mo-'ther: Nor would diſobey any of your Decrees, 'ſo long as his own Dignity and the Kingdom's 'Happineſs might be preſerved. And if of late 'he had not paid that Reſpect to you, which he 'was wont, 'twas becauſe his Ambaſſadors had 'met with ſuch unkind Denials of his Petitions, 'which he had reaſon to obtain, becauſe he had 'ſtood by you with ſo much Zeal and Power in 'your Neceſſity. 2. That he neither had, nor 'would ever hinder any from viſiting your Ho-'lineſs. But as for Appeals he challenges that 'Prerogative to himſelf by the ancient Cuſtom 'of England; That no Clergy-man, for any ci-'vil Cauſe, ſhall go out of the Realm till he 'had tried whether he can't obtain his Right by 'his Royal Authority and Juſtice at home, which 'if he can't do, he will not hinder him from ma-'king his Appeal to your Holineſs; and if in this 'he doth any way prejudice you, he is willing to 'amend it, as it ſhall be order'd by a General 'Council of the Kingdom; That as for the Empe-'rour, tho' he knew he was a Schiſmatick, yet he 'never underſtood that he was excommunicated; 'which if he be rightly inform'd of, or have 'made an unlawful League with him, he pro-'miſes to rectifie it at the Direction of the ſaid 'Aſſembly: That he never baniſh'd our Father the 'Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and that he was 'at his Liberty to return to his Church, provided 'his Majeſty be ſatisfied concerning his Com-'plaints, and that he will live in Obedience to his 'Laws: That if it can be proved, that any Church 'or Churchmen have been oppreſſed by himſelf or 'Officers, he will make Satisfaction, as ſhall be 'thought fit by the Eccleſiaſtical Council of the 'Kingdom. This (ſay they) is the Anſwer we 'have received from our Lord the King, and wiſh 'it had been more fully according to your Deſire; 'but theſe things we thought fit to make known 'to your Holineſs, that you may ſee what is 'like to be the Event of this Difference. The 'King ſtands up in Defence of his own Cauſe, 'ready to obey the Council and Judgment of the 'Church of England. Wherefore we have judg-'ed it convenient to beſeech your Highneſs to 'moderate your Zeal for God's Church for a time, 'and forbear to interdict or excommunicate our 'Churches, leſt both the King and his Subjects 'be irrevocably (which God forbid) deterr'd 'from their Obedience to the Holy See. And 'laſtly, they add, as a Diſſuaſive from rigorous 'Dealings with the King, That the skilful Chi-'rurgeon doth not immediately cut off the Mem-'ber that is unſound and diſeaſed, but uſes all 'means to heal it, and recover it to its proper 'Uſe; and ſo it is better for his Holineſs to la-'bour to pacifie the King, than by cutting off ſo 'noble a part of the Church of God to bring 'more Diſturbance into the ſame, which hath 'too much already: That tho' the King were 'ſtiff and reſolute, yet they doubted not but 'through God's Grace he might be won by Patience and Meekneſs. What tho' the Lord of Canterbury loſe his Goods, and remain in exile, 'yet 'tis better it ſhould be ſo, than that all England fall from their Obedience through your 'Severity? And tho' perhaps a Perſecution may 'not ſeparate us from you, yet there will not 'want Knees to bow to Baal, there will be enough 'to receive the Pall of Canterbury from the King's 'hands, and ſupply our Seats with all aſſurances 'of Obedience; and ſome there are that hope 'this Schiſm between you and the King will 'make way for their Preferments. By theſe Letters, which are the beſt pieces of Hiſtory in the World, we ſee the full ſtate of this Controverſie, and what it was that kept theſe two mighty Potentates from getting their Wills, and tho' they threaten'd loud, were really afraid one of another.

Hitherto the King ſtood ſafe, and might have continued ſo, had he not been ſuſpicious of more danger than he was really in; and ſo endeavouring to ſecure himſelf more than was neceſſary, he undermined his own Peace, leſſen'd his Authority, and embroyl'd his People. And this he did by aſſuming his eldeſt Son Henry into a Copartnerſhip in his Royal Dignity and Power. An Act without Precedent in this Kingdom, which 'tis hardly credible, that the Parliament, in ſuch diſcerning times, would have conſented to, if the King would have been contented with a denial. In compliance with which the young Prince was crown'd June 14. 1170. by Roger Archbiſhop of York, and received Homage from William King of Scots, David his Brother, and moſt of the Nobility of England. For what Reaſons the King did thus, whether out of meer kindneſs to his Son, or whether he feared the Clergy, with whom he then was at difference, might deprive his Poſterity of the Succeſſion, as they did his Mother Maud, (as is moſt probable by reaſon of this Juncture) yet certain it is he got himſelf two Enemies by it, viz. the French King, and his own Son. The French King threaten'd him with War, becauſe his Daughter was not crown'd with her Huſband, unleſs it were immediately done. Henry hereupon haſts into Normandy to ſecure his Dominions there, and leaves his Son in England, thinking thus to prevent or pacifie his angry Father-in-Law. His own Son, not content with a bare Title without Power, or a participation only in Government with his Father, who by being his Superiour, clouded his Glory, and nulled all his Authority [a], created him much Grief and Trouble, contriving all ways to make him no King, who had ſhew'd too much indulgence in creating him one; and forgetting the Duty of a Son, by being raiſed to an equal Power with his Father, who by his Actions found too late, That Crowns are not to be made over in truſt to any Perſons.

While the King remain'd in Normandy, it was effected by the mediation of the French King, Theobald Earl of Blois, and other great Biſhops, that the Archbiſhop of Canterbury (who had then been ſix Years in Baniſhment) ſhould be admitted to a Conference with the King; who did not unwillingly embrace the Propoſition, becauſe he found that a Quarrel with the Church in thoſe zealous Times would much prejudice his other temporal Affairs, and create him daily more potent Enemies, through the Pope's and Biſhops means. Their Meeting was at Montmirial, in the preſence of the King of France. And the Archbiſhop, at his entrance into the King's preſence, fell on his Knees at his Feet, and ſaid, 'He would 'leave the whole Matter in Controverſie to his 'Majeſty's Deciſion, Salvo honore Dei, i. e. God's 'Honour being ſav'd harmleſs. The King, who had been tired with this Reſervation, and ſeen the ill tendency of it, began to be in a Paſſion, and ſaid to the King of France, and others preſent, 'Whatever diſpleaſes this Man, he makes to be againſt 'God's Honour, and under that ſhew claims all 'that belongs to me. But that you may not think 'that I will be againſt any thing that is really for God's Honour or his Right, I declare, that 'whatever the greateſt and moſt holy of his Predeceſſors have done to the meaneſt of mine, I 'will condeſcend to undergo from him. This Anſwer, which was ſo much beyond the Expectation of all the Company, begat ſuch a good Opinion in them all to the King's Cauſe, that the King of France told the Archbiſhop plainly, 'That 'he could not ſtand upon any thing now reaſonably, unleſs he would be greater than the Saints, 'or St. Peter himſelf; and that if Peace were not 'now made, 'twas his fault only. The Archbiſhop reply'd to this effect, 'That as the Authority of Kings had grown up by degrees, ſo had 'that of the Church; which being by the Providence of God come to that pitch of Grandeur, 'he was not to follow the Example of any that 'had been faint-hearted, or too yielding in their 'places. The Church had riſen and increaſed 'by many Perſecutions, and he was to hold what 'it had ſo hardly gotten. Our Fathers (ſaid he) 'ſuffer'd all manner of Afflictions, becauſe they 'would not forſake the Name of Chriſt; and 'ſhall I, to gain the Favour of any Man living, 'loſe any thing that is for his honour. This proud and obſtinate Anſwer to ſo yielding a Proffer made by the King, ſo much diſtaſted the Hearers, that they look'd upon his Cauſe as nothing elſe but the effect of Pride and Arrogancy, not of true Zeal; and ſo the Meeting at that time concluded. Divers Meetings they had after this to debate about the ſame matters; one of the moſt concluſive was upon the Confines of Normandy, in the preſence of the ſame King of France, (who entertain'd the Archbiſhop all the while) where the King took the Archbiſhop apart, and talk'd with him a long time; twice they lighted from their Horſes, and twice remounted again; and twice the King held the Archbiſhop's Bridle, and then parted, both prepar'd for a Peace, but not concluding any. At laſt, by the mediation of the Archbiſhop of Rouen, the Controverſie was fully compoſed, and decided before the Earl of Blois at Amboys [b]. And thereupon the King ſent to Henry his Son in England in this manner: 'Know 'ye, that Thomas Archbiſhop of Canterbury hath 'made Peace with me, according to my Will; 'and therefore I charge you, that he and all his 'Relations be no more diſturbed, but that the 'Eſtates and Goods of him, and all ſuch as went 'out of England for his ſake, be reſtored to them 'in as full and ample manner as they enjoy'd 'them three Months before their going, &c. (Which ſhews that the ſupreme Command was lodg'd in the Father, and not in the Son.) Soon after this the Archbiſhop return'd into England, (yet not as one that had ſought, but forced a Peace) and therefore, as if he had gain'd Power to ſtrengthen his Reſolution by his Agreement with the King, he ſuſpends by the Pope's Bull the Archbiſhop of York from his Epiſcopal Function for crowning the young King within the Province of Canterbury, without his Leave, and againſt the Pope's Order, and without taking (according to the Cuſtom) the Cautionary Oath for the preſervation of the Liberties of the Church. He alſo ſuſpended in like manner by other Letters, which he brought with him, the Biſhops of London, Saliſbury, Oxford, Cheſter, Rocheſter, S. Aſaph, and Landaff, for aſſiſting at the Coronation, and defending the King's Cauſe againſt him, and by their Suſpenſion they were to remain depriv'd of their Office till they had given the Archbiſhop ſuch ſatisfaction as he required. The Biſhops, amazed at this terrible aſſault, had no other Refuge but the King, to whom they immediately fled into Normandy, and gave him an account of the Archbiſhop's Severity, and implacable Fury and Imperiouſneſs. The King hearing their Relation, was mov'd with extream Paſſion, and is ſaid with great Grief to have utter'd theſe words: 'In what a miſerable Condition am I, who can't 'be quiet in my own Kingdom for one only 'Prieſt! What is there no Man will rid me of 'this trouble? Some [a] ſay, that there were four Knights attending the King when he ſpake theſe words, viz. Sir Hugh Morvill, Sir William Tracy, Sir Richard Britton, and Sir Reginald Fitz-Urſe [b], who gueſſing at his Deſire, departed inſtantly into England to be the unfortunate Executioners of it; but others relate, that theſe four Gentlemen were ſent with a Commiſſion by the King, to treat with the Archbiſhop in this Affair. 1. To require him to take his Oath of Fidelity to the young King. 2. To reſtore the Biſhops he had deprived to the Execution of their Office. 3. To adviſe and command him to carry himſelf with much more Lenity and Moderation in his Place, that ſo the Church may have comfort, and the Kingdom peace, by his return. Theſe Men, zealous for their Prince, and arm'd with Authority, went to the Archbiſhop, and finding him peremptory and untractable, not anſwering their Humour, nor regarding their Maſter's Meſſage, were highly enrag'd, and threaten'd to commit him. The Archbiſhop, to ſecure himſelf, withdrew into the Cathedral Church, but to no purpoſe; for they arming themſelves entred in the Church, when he was at Divine Service with the Monks, and furiouſly reviling him as a Traytor, fell upon him with their Swords, gave him many Wounds, and at length ſtruck out his Brains, ſo that the Altar was ſprinkled with his Blood. The Archbiſhop in this Aſſault behav'd himſelf with great Courage, and paſſionately committed his own Soul [c], and the Church's Cauſe to God and his Saints; which, together with the Manner, Time, and Place of his Suffering, begat great Compaſſion towards him, and Abhorrence of the Fact. The unfortunate Gentlemen, tho' they effected a great piece of Service, yet dare not return to the King, either becauſe they had exceeded the Bounds of their Commiſſion, and ſo might juſtly fear his Diſpleaſure; or becauſe they knew he would not acknowledge it a Kindneſs, tho' he thought it a great one; but (after they had rifled the Archbiſhop's Palace) fled into ſeveral Countries [d] in the North, and dy'd all within four Years (as it is reported) miſerable Fugitives.

The Archbiſhop ſlain in the Cathedral of Canterbury

A. D. 1170. Reg. 16.

The Fame of the Archbiſhop Becket's Death ſoon ſpread into all parts of the Chriſtian World, and both Tongues and Pens fell all to work to aggravate and condemn it. The King of France himſelf informs the Pope of the whole matter, aggravating the Foulneſs of the Fact, and inciting him to Severity in puniſhing it: To unſheath St. Peter's Sword to revenge the Death of the Martyr of Canterbury, whoſe Blood cries out to all the Church, and whoſe Divine Glory was manifeſted already by Miracles. Theobald Earl of Blois, a great and grave Prince (elder Brother to King Stephen) repreſented to the Pope, 'That he was preſent 'when the Peace was made between the King of 'England and the bleſſed Martyr; That the King 'cheerfully confirm'd the Agreement, and granted the Archbiſhop power to uſe his Authority, 'as it pleaſed the Pope and him, againſt thoſe 'Biſhops, who had contrary to the Right and 'Dignity of the Church of Canterbury, preſum'd 'to ſet the new King upon the Throne. And this he would juſtifie upon his Oath, or otherwiſe. 'By this Peace (ſays he) was the Man of God 'brought under the King's Sword, the innocent 'Lamb ſlain upon the morrow after St. Innocent's 'Day, the juſt Blood ſhed at the Altar, where 'Chriſt's Blood is offer'd, by Court-Dogs, the 'King's domeſtick Servants, ſet on work to do 'this horrible Act; and then concludes with Admonitions of Revenge. But William Archbiſhop of Sens came with a loud Cry, as if he fear'd the Pope would overlook the Fact, and tells him, 'That all Power was given to his Apoſtleſhip 'both in Heaven and Earth, and God had appointed him to bind Kings in Chains, and Nobles in Links of Iron. He bids him obſerve 'how the Boar of the Wood had rooted up the 'Lord's Vineyard. And after he hath bitterly 'inveigh'd againſt the King, ſtirs him up to revenge that which is paſt, that he may provide 'for the future: What place ſhall be ſafe, if the 'Rage of Tyrants be ſuffer'd to fill the Sanctum Sanctorum with Blood, and Chriſt's Vicegerents 'be torn in pieces without puniſhment? Arm 'therefore, ſays he, all the Eccleſiaſtical Power 'you can, &c. The King of England, on the other ſide, proteſted his own Innocency, and ſolemnly avow'd, That he was as far from ordering or deſiring any ſuch deed to be done, as he was from doing it himſelf; and that he was heartily ſorry for it when he heard of it. He alſo employ'd the chief Men of his Kingdom, for Reputation, Learning and Judgment, to defend his Innocency to the Pope; but his Holineſs was ſo prepoſſeſſed by the ſiniſter Reports of others, that he deny'd his Ambaſſadors Audience, and the Cardinals refus'd all Conference with them; yet they were not ſo much diſcourag'd by this unkind uſage, but that they clear'd their Maſter's Honour by Apologies, Remonſtrances, and whatsoever Wit could devise; so that they kept off the highest Censure, tho' it was every day expected, and by gravely urging the Mischief that might fall upon the Church by too great Severity, so allay'd the first Heat, that they gave the King some hopes of a Pacification, till the Pope sent two Cardinals à Latere, Gratianus and Vivianus, into Normandy to interdict him and his Dominions, which exceedingly disturb'd him; but the King having gotten some notice of their coming and intention, appeals to the presence of the Pope upon their entrance, and so put off that trouble. And when he came into England again, to prevent the like, forbids all Brief-Carriers, of what Condition or Order soever, to pass the Seas, without giving good Security for their Behaviour to the King and Kingdom.

Hoveden*'s account, being excommunicated by the Pope, went to Rome for Abſolution; and were enjoyn'd to go to Jeruſalem, and to do Penance afterwards on the Black Mountain for Life.

The King's Expedition into Ireland, and Conquest of it.

But tho' the Controversie which the King had with the Church caused him much trouble, yet he omitted nothing which tended to the Advancement of his Kingdom, and Enlargement of his Dominions, which at this time he undertook by an Expedition into Ireland for the Conquest of it; and so much the rather, that at this time he might make himself formidable. He had had a like design at the beginning of his Reign, and to prepare his way to it without opposition, had obtain'd leave of Pope Adrian IV. to go on with it, under the pretence of reducing a Rude and Barbarous People from their Vicious Customs to the Faith and Truth of Christ, and upon promise of paying Peter-Pence to the Roman See. The Pope (who is always willing to give away what is not his own, to get something by it) readily granted the King's Petition, and sent his Ambassadors back with an Instrument of Concession in Writing to this effect: 'That it was a laudable and glori'ous thing for so magnificent a Prince to enlarge
'his Dominions for the Conversion of Souls, and 'Good of the Church. And then gives him power
'to invade the same, and to execute whatsoever
'should be to the Honour of God, and Good of 'the Country; with a Reservation of the Rights 'of the Church, and Peter-Pence promised; and 'concludes with an Exhortation to settle an holy
'and exemplary Clergy among them, &c. But the King at that time having other important Matters in hand, laid these Thoughts for the present aside, and did not resume them till a fair occasion offer'd it self of prosecuting it with success, which was thus given him: Dermot Macmurgh, one of the five Kings that then ruled Ireland, came to him into Aquitain to crave his Aid against Rodoricke the Great, call'd O-Conar Dun, King of Connaught, who aiming at the Dominion of the whole Country, had expell'd him out of his Dominions of Lemster. The King of England, glad of this opportunity of introducing his Forces into the Country, promised him assistance; and tho' he was a little detained by other Affairs of Importance, yet he gave him liberty to get as many of his Subjects as he would, to try their Fortunes with him. The occasion of the Quarrel between the two Irish Princes was very foul on Dermot's part, who had corrupted and stollen away the Wife of Rodoricke; and for that reason, with his Injustices to his People, (the common Causes of ruining and transferring Kingdoms) was by force of Arms driven out of his Dominions of Lemster; and being expell'd, he seeks to the King of England for help to recover his Right; and having obtained the former Grant of him, went into Wales, where he first prevail'd with Robert Fitz-Stephen, a Man of a desperate Fortune, but good Interest among the Welsh, by promises of great Riches and Reward; and afterward with Richard Earl of Pembroke, Chepstow, and Strigil, surnamed Strongbow, a Lord of great Courage and Worth, of large Possessions both in England and Normandy, and well followed, whom he won by a Contract of giving him his only Daughter in Marriage, and the Succession of the Kingdom of Lemster after him. Fitz-Stephens, with his half Brother Maurice Fitz-Gerard, passed over first with a small Force, and landed at a place call'd by the Irish Bagg-bun, which in English signifies Holy; and therefore look'd upon as an Omen of good Success: Whereof it retains the Memory to this day in this Rythm:

A. D. 1170. Reg. 16.

Fitz-Stephens first Conques Ireland.

At the head of Bagg and Bunn, Ireland was lost and wun.

The next day arrived Maurice Prindergast with two Ships full of armed Men, and Archers, to joyn with Fitz-Stephens, who made up together about four hundred Men. With this small Army they marched with Banners display'd to the City of Weisbford, in so strange a form and order, that the Irish, unacquainted with such an unusual form of War, and supposing them by their Front to be far more numerous than they were, were overcome with fear, and render'd up themselves to them, with their City of Weisbford, which Dermot gave to Robert Fitz-Stephens with the Country adjoyning, to encourage him, and raise the hopes of others. And here was the first Colony of the English settled in Ireland, which hath continu'd there ever since, retaining still our ancient Garb, and much of our Language, which is proper to that City, and the Country about it, call'd the Weisbford Speech. The next Year [a] they had a new Supply out of Wales; and after, upon news of their success, the Earl of Pembroke went over with two hundred armed Men, and a thousand other Soldiers, and landing at Waterford, takes the Town, which was then call'd Portblarge, and puts all the Inhabitants to the Sword, not only to terrifie others, but to make room for his own People. And here Dermot gave the Earl his Daughter Eva to Wife, with the Dowry of his Country, which after he had liv'd to undo by his Wickedness, he liv'd not long to see, but dy'd miserably, leaving nothing memorable but the infamous Name of Ningal, which signifies a Friend to Strangers, as a Brand of his unnatural Treachery to his own Country. The Earl, after he had gotten his Inheritance convey'd, and secured the places he had won, marches with his small Forces thro' the whole Island without resistance, Rodoricke the Great not daring to make good his Name, nor appear in opposition to him, but kept in the Wilds and strong Holds of Connaught, and never met the Enemy. So that he took Pledges of the Inhabitants to secure their Obedience as he pleased; and with very little labour possessed himself of Dublin, the head City of the Island. Thus did the Welsh first win the Kingdom of Ireland, and (which is most strange) without Battel; a thing scarce credible, that so populous a Country as Ireland was, and a Nation of that disposition, should not lift up any hands in their own defence; but it seems, tho' they had continual Wars almost among themselves, yet they had so little Armour and Discipline, that they were terrify'd with the Warlike Appearances of the English.

themſelves ſomething greater than Subjects; and therefore to ſtop their farther Proceedings, and gain the Glory of the Conqueſt of Ireland, he immediately declares that they had gone beyond their Commiſſion, and puts out his Proclamation, 'That no Veſſel ſhould carry any thing out 'of his Dominions into Ireland; That all his Sub-'jects there ſhould deſiſt from farther Attempts, 'and return home immediately, or elſe ſhould 'forfeit their Eſtates in England. And withal, ſends over William Fitz-Adelm and Robert Fitz-Bernard, with ſome Forces, to prepare the way for him; while he himſelf provided a Navy of four hundred Ships well furniſh'd with Men, and all Neceſſaries for the Expedition at Milford Haven; from whence he ſailed into Ireland, and arriv'd there eight Miles from Waterford on S. Luke's Eve, Anno 1172. being the third Year after Fitz-Stephen's Invaſion. At his firſt landing his Soldiers caught a White Hart, and preſented it to him as a Sign of his Victory. The next day he marched to Waterford, and ſtaid there fifteen days. While he remain'd here, the Kings of Corke, Limerick, Offery, Meth, and all of any Power in Ireland (except Roderick King of Connaught, who kept himſelf in the ſtrong Holds of his own Country) came and ſubmitted themſelves with all their Clergy to him, taking an Oath of Fidelity to him and his Succeſſors for ever; thus chuſing rather to unite with a Stranger in a common Subjection, than with one another to deliver themſelves from Slavery, becauſe they had lived long in Enmity. The King went from Waterford to Dublin, where he held a great Aſſembly of all the Kings, Lords Spiritual and Temporal of Ireland, to aſſure himſelf more fully of their Allegiance, and to reform and order all things in the State; which when he had done, he ſummon'd a Convocation of the Biſhops and Clergy at Caſſel (to whom he appointed a Chaplain of his own, and the Archdeacon of Landaffe to be Aſſiſtants) to reform the Affairs of the Church; for tho' the Iriſh had been Chriſtians long before, yet they were but a confuſed and diſorderly Church: And therefore it was ordain'd and decreed, 'That all Church-Lands 'ſhould be freed from the Exactions of Secular 'Men, and that for the future all Divine Things 'ſhould be order'd and us'd in every part of Ire-'land, according to the manner of the Church of 'England, it being fit (as the Canon ſaith) that 'as Ireland had by God's merciful Providence ob-'tain'd a Lord and King out of England, ſo alſo 'they ſhould receive from thence a better man-'ner of living than they had uſed before. The King having thus ſettled the Kingdom, kept his Chriſtmas at Dublin, where he feaſted all the Kings and great Men of the Country, gave Orders for the planting and fortifying of Garriſons where they were needful, made Hugh Lacy Juſtice of Ireland, and ſeated him in Dublin to defend it; granting him by his Charter, and his Heirs, the Country of Meth, to hold the ſame in Fee by the Service of an hundred Knights; to Robert Fitz-Bernard he left the keeping of the Towns of Waterford and Weiſbford (which he had taken from Fitz-Stephens) with a Charge to build Caſtles in them; and to humble Earl Strongbow, and level him with the reſt of his Subjects, he took from him all his Dependents and made them his. Thus in one Winter was the Kingdom of Ireland made ſubject to England, and a tolerable Settlement made, tho' it proved not very laſting; becauſe both this, and ſome ſucceeding Kings, had ſuch innumerable Diverſions that they could not attend to the full Eſtabliſhment of it.

His Reformation of Ireland.

A. D. 1172. Reg. 17.

On the Eaſter-Monday after he ſet ſail from Ireland into England again, but made a very ſhort ſtay there, becauſe he had appointed the Pope's Legates, Theodinus and Albertus, to meet them in Normandy, who were ſent by Pope Alexander (but in a milder way than formerly) to examine into the Murther of the late Archbiſhop Becket; wherefore taking with him the young King, he paſſed over thither. Four Months were ſpent in debating the Matter, and in Concluſion, the King taking an Oath upon the Holy Evangeliſts and Saints Reliques in the Preſence of his Son Henry, the Archbiſhop of Rouen, and the reſt of the Biſhops and Abbots of Normandy in the City of Auranches, That he neither had commanded, nor conſented to the ſaid Murther, cleared himſelf from the Charge brought againſt him for it: Yet becauſe he feared, that the Perſons who did murther him were moved to it either by his Paſſion or Words, he engag'd himſelf in Satisfaction for it to perform theſe following Articles. '1. Ne-'ver to forſake Pope Alexander, nor his Succeſ-'ſors, ſo long as they treated him as a Catholick 'King. 2. That he would freely allow Appeals 'to be made to the Pope in Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes, 'provided, That if any Man be ſuſpected of any 'ill Deſigns againſt the King or Nation, he ſhall 'put in Security before his Departure. 3. That 'he would for three Years go in Perſon to the 'Holy Wars, unleſs hinder'd by the Pope or his 'Succeſſors, or employ'd againſt the Sarazens in 'Spain. 4. That he ſhould put ſo much Money 'preſently into the Templars hands, as ſhould 'maintain two Hundred Men in the Holy War 'for one Year. 5. That he ſhould recal all that 'had ſuffer'd Baniſhment for the Archbiſhop, and 'reſtore his and their Poſſeſſions. 6. That he 'ſhould aboliſh all Cuſtoms which had been in-'troduc'd in his time, to the Prejudice of the 'Church. When the King had ſworn to the afore-ſaid Conceſſions, he made his Son Henry to ratifie the ſame by Oath, except ſuch as concern'd his own Perſon; and having ſet his Seal to them with the Cardinals, he deliver'd them to be kept in the Roman Church. Thus ended this tedious Controverſie, which made ſuch a Noiſe in the World, and Becket tho' he could not conquer the King while he lived, did it by his Death; having gained the Name of a Saint in Heaven by his Sufferings, and [a] a Shrine in the Church, to which his Sovereign Lord muſt bow himſelf and pray, or elſe be thought a worſe Enemy to him than ever: So that this obſtinate Archbiſhop was above his Will when alive, and over his Faith when dead. But how good a Man he was may appear by this, that forty eight Years after his Deceaſe, the Doctors of Paris diſputed whether he were damn'd or ſav'd; and one Roger, a Norman, maintain'd he had juſtly deſerv'd Death, for rebelling againſt his Sovereign, the Vicegerent of God. After the ending of this Affair, the King, that he might pacifie all Parties, and content the King of France, had his Son Henry crown'd again with his Wife Margaret [b].

Shortly after theſe things, the young King

[a] For Pope Alexander Canoniz'd him ſoon after this Agreement, and his Shrine was erected at Canterbury by his next Succeſſor but one Stephen Langton, at very great Expence and Charge; and he became ſo famous a Saint for Miracles (no leſs than 270 being ſaid to be done at his Shrine) that the Gifts at it Annually were computed worth 600 l. and the Viſitants in a Jubilee an hundred thouſand.

[b] In St. Swithin's Church in Wincheſter. This was done the 27th of Auguſt, before the ending of the Affair of Becket's Death; for the King purg'd himſelf of it at Auranches on the 27th of September following.

Henry

A. D. 1172. Reg. 18.

Young King Henry's Voyage to Paris, and the ill Effects of it.

Henry obtain'd leave of his Father to visit Paris, and his Father-in-Law the French King; where staying some time, he imbib'd those Instructions which kindled his Ambition, and overthrew his Obedience to his Father, being taught there, that to be a King was to have a Supreme Power, and be under none; which he soon put in Practice upon this Occasion. Henry the Father, who was always watchful to lay hold of every Opportunity of advancing his own Greatness and Power; took a Journey in Person to Auvergn, and so to Montferrat [a]; where he purchased a Match at the Price of five thousand Marks for his youngest Son John with Alice the eldest Daughter of Hubert, Earl of Mauriena and Lord of Piedmont and Savoy, with a Condition of having all those Countries, containing many Seigniories, Cities and Castles, after her Father's decease. The King of England also assured to his Son John the Castles of Chinon, Lodun, and Mirabel at Limoges, where he was come after the Conclusion of the Match. While he continu'd here, Raymond Earl of S. Gyles came to him to do him Homage for the Earldom of Tholouse to hold it of him, and his Son Richard Earl of Poictou by Hereditary Right, by the Service of coming unto them upon Summons, and remaining in their Service forty days at their own Charge; and if they detain'd him longer, to be allow'd reasonable Expences: As also to pay Yearly one hundred Marks of Silver, or ten Horses worth ten Marks a-piece. Prince Henry was displeased at his Father's Gift to his Brother John, and the King of France was afraid of his great Power, who now had gotten Dominions all round him: Wherefore observing the Prince's disgust, he put him upon requesting, and that with an Importunity that would not brook a Denial, either the Dutchy of Normandy, Earldom of Anjou or Kingdom of England for his Maintenance, and Exercise of his Kingly Power. The Prince being ambitious put up his Request, and because he was not presently gratified, escapes from his Father, and got to Paris, where he was joyfully receiv'd by the French King, who had no way else to prevent the over-growing Greatness of his Neighbour, but such an unnatural Division; and to strengthen the Breach, summons all the Princes of France, and all the Friends he could make to assist King Henry the Son against the Father, and made them swear, That they would either dispossess King Henry of his Kingdoms, or bring him to their Conditions. The young King likewise swears to them never to make Peace with his Father without their Consent; and to encourage his Assistants, he engag'd to give Philip Earl of Flanders a 1000 l. a Year, with the County of Kent, and Dover and Rochester Castles; to Matthew Earl of Bologne, the said Earl's Brother, Kerton Soake in Lindsey, the Earldom of Morton, with the Honour of Heize; to Theobald Earl of Blois [b] 200 l. a Year in Anjou, the Castle of Amboys, with all his Right in Tureine, which Grants he confirm'd under his Seal, with many others, to his Followers for their Service; to the King of Scots he granted all Northumberland as far as the River Tine, and to his Brother the Earldoms of Huntington and Cambridge [c]. Many discontented Lords both of England and Normandy, who hoped for new Advantages by Changes in State, and a broken Sovereignty, adhered to him; as Robert Earl of Leicester, Hugh Bigott, Hugh Earl of Chester, Roger Mowbray, &c. to whom he gave several large Promises of the Lion's Skin before he was dead. Queen Eleanor enrag'd for some Injuries done to her Bed [d], like a furious Alecto, blows up the Coals of War between the Father and Son; and persuading her two Sons, Richard and Jeffrey, to join in the Rebellion against their Father, made the Confederacy so strong, that the King was left destitute both of Friends and Subjects to defend his Right. Some faithful Ministers he had, yet those but very few; as William Earl of Mandevile, Hugh de Lacy, Hugh de Beauchamp, Humphrey Bohun, and some others: But his People forsook him so generally, that he was forced to hire twenty thousand [e] Brabansons (which were Mercinary Soldiers, commonly called Routs or Costerells) to maintain and hold his Kingdoms. This happen'd about the 20th Year of his Reign. The King having yet the Bowels of a Father toward his Rebellious Son, sought all ways to heal the Breach, offering him all convenient Allowances for his Estate, and advantageous Conditions of Peace; but all would not do, his Sword was drawn, and nothing would satisfie him but War; and therefore with the King of France his Forces he invades Normandy, and besieges Vernoul, a Place of great Strength and Importance. The King of Scots enters Northumberland, and makes great Havock there. Hugh de Lacy and Hugh de Beauchamp valiantly defended the Castle of Vernoul, and after a Month's Siege, the Citizens (being destitute of Provision) obtain a Truce of the King of France, and a Permission to send for Succours to their King, which if they could not obtain within three days, they would surrender their City, and in the mean time gave him Hostages; and on the other side, the King of France, Prince Henry, and divers other Lords and Bishops swore, That if they surrender'd the City at the day appointed, their Hostages should be restor'd, and no Harm be done to their City. King Henry the Father came with all the Forces he could gather just at the day appointed, and disposes his Army for Battel; but the King of France to avoid it, sends the Archbishop of Sens and Earl of Blois to procure a Parly, which was granted on the Morrow, but lost Vernoul; for the King of France neither came, nor sent to the Parly, but had admittance given him into the Town according to the Covenants, which contrary to his Oath he demolish'd, plunder'd, and taking Hostages remov'd his Camp, and left the King of England disappointed; who being inrag'd at it, pursu'd the flying Army, of which he got some Booty, enters Vernoul, and the next day took the Castle of Danvile, with many Prisoners. From hence he marched to Rouen, and there sent his Brabansons into Britain against Hugh Earl of Chester, and Ralph Fulgiers, who had gotten that whole Country into their Power; but being not able to withstand this Army of the King's in the Field, they with all the great Men of those Parts got into the Castle of Dole, and fortified themselves in it; but the King following in Person besieg'd and took it, and in it about eighty Lords, besides others of Note and Valour, by which Defeat the rest of the Country was brought to yield. By this Success the King's Enemies were so much discouraged, that they desired a Parly in order to a Peace, which was appointed between Guisors and Try. At this Treaty the King of England, tho' every way superiour, was so condescending to his Children for a Pacification sake, that he offer'd to his Son Henry half his Revenues of the Crown of England, with four convenient Castles; or if he had rather remain in Normandy, half the Revenues of that Dukedom, and the whole of the Earldom of Anjou, &c. To his Son Richard he offer'd half the Revenues of Aquitain, and four Castles in it. To Jeffrey the Earldom of Conon, which was to descend to him by his Wife. And if these things were not sufficient, he would submit to the Arbitration of the Archbishop of Tarento, and the Pope's Legates, to add any Allowance which they should in their Judgments think fit, reserving to himself his Royal Authority, and Administration of Justice. But all these fair Proposals did not satisfie: The King of France was for no Agreement, as is plain from the Indignities offer'd to the King at the Treaty; wherein 'tis said, that Robert Earl of Leicester reproached him to his Face, and attempted to draw his Sword at him. So the Meeting ended with quarrelling, and the Armies began their daily Bickerings, tho' the French had the worst. The Earl of Leicester with an Army gets over into England, where he was received by Hugh Bygot into the Castle of Fremingham. Richard de Lucy Chief Justice of England, and Humphry Bohun the King's Constable, being then upon the Borders of Scotland, and hearing of his arrival, made a Truce with the King of Scots, and hasten'd away with their Forces to St. Edmundsbury, where the Earls of Cornwall, Gloucester, and Arundel joyn'd with them; and so they went on to encounter the Earl of Leicester at Farnham[a], whose Army they defeated, killing ten thousand Flemmings, and taking himself, Wife, and several other great Men Prisoners, whom he sent to the King in Normandy. In the mean time the King himself was not idle, but daily got Castles and Forts from his Enemies, until Winter constrain'd him to make a Truce till Easter; which also the Bishop of Durham did with the King of Scots, for three thousand Marks of Silver, to be paid out of the Lands of the Barons of Northumberland.

1174. Reg. 20.

The Spring being come on, the Truce on all sides being expired, King Henry the Son, and Philip Earl of Flanders, are ready at Graveling with a great Army for England. The King of Scots also entred Northumberland, and sends his Brother David to relieve the small Remainders of the Earl of Leicester's Forces, which held the Town of Leicester, but too late; for Robert de Lucy and the Earl of Cornwall had taken and rased the Town, and seized Robert Mowbray coming to help those who held out in the Castle. King Henry the Father seeing his Son's Preparations for England, draws off his Forces from other Employments, and brings them down to Barbfleet, and so pass'd over to Southampton, with his Prisoners, Queen Eleanor, Margaret his Son Henry's Wife, and the Earls of Leicester and Chester; and from thence he went to Canterbury, to visit his own Martyr, and perform his Vows of Victory; and some write, that when he came in sight of the Church, he allighted from his Horse, and [b] went three Miles barefoot to it; the Stones which cut his Feet receiving bloody Tokens of his Devotion. But in recompence of this meritorious Action, they add, That the same day, when he departed from Canterbury, the King of Scots was conquer'd, and taken at Alnwicke by some Knights of Yorkshire, viz. Robert de Stutevile, Odonel de Humfreville, William de Vescy, Ralph de Glanville, Ralph de Tilly, and Bernard Baliol; and his Son Henry was by Tempests beat back again into France, where Lewis the King of France hearing of his Father's passage into England, and the taking of the King of Scots, call'd him to the Siege of Roan. Henry, after his fit of Devotion was over, being ready for business, soon quieted and settled the disorder'd State of his Nations. For he took the Castles of Huntington, Fremingham, Bungay, Durham, Norham, and Alverton; which Hugh Bygot and the Bishop of Durham resigned to him, upon his granting them his Favour and Pardon. Ralph Mowbray also yielded himself up with his Castle of Treske, Earl Ferrers resigned his Castles of Tutsbury, Duffield; one Ankstill, Mallery, and William Dive, Constables of the Earl of Leicester, the Castles of Leicester, Montsorill and Groby. So that within three Weeks all things were quiet without Arms. When the King had thus settled England, he being enforced with a thousand Welshmen, went with his Prisoners, the King of Scots, Earls of Leicester and Chester, and passes over into Normandy to relieve Roan. His Welshmen being first sent over the River Seine, made way through the French Camp by their Swords, and got into a Wood, without any loss, slaying an hundred of their Enemies; and so got into the City with the King's Forces, who open'd the Gates to provoke the French King to Battel, but in vain. For Lewis having sent away the weakest of his People before, follow'd after with the rest, by the permission of the King of England; of whom he got leave by the Archbishop of Sens, and Earl of Blois, to depart, under pretence of a Parly to be the next day, which he never perform'd. However the King of France seeing that all his Arts prov'd nothing advantageous, either to himself or his Confederates, he again sends the former Agents to the King of England with the same proffers of Peace, which was at last concluded [c] between him and his Sons, but upon harder Conditions than he had proffer'd at the former; and yet upon such as shew'd the Goodness of his Nature, and Love to his Children: His whole Proceedings in this War proving, that not his Will, but Necessity moved him to Action. At the signing of the Covenant of Peace, when his Son Henry would have done him Homage (which is a Personal Service) he refused it, because he was a King, but of his Sons Richard and Jeffrey he accepted it: Yet Henry, to free his Father from all scruple, swore Fealty to him as a Subject against all Men, in the presence of the Archbishop of Roan, Bishop of Bayeux, Earl of Mandevile, and many others of his Nobility. At the Conclusion of this Peace the Earl of Flanders yielded up to King Henry the Father his Son's Charter of Reward for his Assistance, and had another confirm'd to him for a Pension of a thousand Marks to be paid out of England yearly upon Condition of Homage, and to find the King of England five hundred Soldiers for the space of forty days upon Summons given him. This business being ended, the Kings (Father and Son) took their progress into all the Provinces on that side of the Sea, to visit and reform the Disorders of War, and settle all Affairs; and sent Richard into Aquitain, and Jeffrey into Britain for the same purpose, and settled them there with their Council to take care of their own.

The two Kings return into England, and reform things.

Shortly after the two Kings, Father and Son, return'd into England, where there was as great neceſſity of a Reformation of Government both in Church and State as there was in France. The King deſirous to compleat both, firſt had a Council of the Clergy call'd under Richard Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in which many Enormities of the Clergy were reform'd, as may be ſeen in the Canons of that Synod. The King ſupply'd all Vacancies, and gives to John Oxenford (his chief Miniſter) the Biſhoprick of Norwich. Then he took into his hands all the Caſtles he could ſeize, and among others the Tower of Briſtol, which was ſurrender'd to him by the Earl of Gloceſter, and was never in his hands before. The King alſo exacted certain Penalties of all, both Clerks and Laymen, who had in the time of the War done any Injuries to the King's Foreſts, for which he is accuſed of Injuſtice, becauſe Richard Lucy the King's Juſtice, had by the King's Warrant, diſcharg'd them for the ſame; but the gain, which ſuch Mulcts yielded him, made him the more ſevere. For after the Death of Alain de Nevill, who had been chief Juſtice of all the Foreſts of England, he divided them into ſeveral parts, appointing four Juſtices to overſee every one of them, whereof two were to be Clerks, and two Knights. And over all other Foreſters he conſtituted two of his own Servants to be the Gamekeepers, and gave them power to implead any, according to the Laws of the Foreſt.

The King of Scots does Homage, and ſeveral Parliaments call'd

The King being at York, there came to him William King of Scots, with almoſt all the Nobility, Abbots, and Biſhops of his Kingdom, and confirmed the Peace and final Agreement, which had been promiſed in his Impriſonment at Falaiſe in Normandy, before all the greateſt Perſonages of both Kingdoms, the Copy of which is in Roger Hovedon. A little after [a] a Council was held at Windſor, to which certain Iriſh Biſhops, and the Chancellor of Rodoricke King of Connaught came, who concluded a firm Agreement for their Maſter, doing Homage and Fealty, and obliging him to pay a Tribute of one ſufficient Hide of every ten Beaſts killed within his Kingdom, and thoſe Provinces that held of it. The ſame Year a Parliament was ſummon'd to meet at Nottingham, where, by the advice and conſent of his Nobles, he cauſed the Kingdom to be divided into ſix parts, and appointed for each of them three Juſtices, who were to travel from place to place to adminiſter Juſtice, cauſing them to take an Oath upon the holy Evangeliſts faithfully to obſerve, and cauſe to be obſerved by all his Majeſty's Engliſh Subjects, the Statutes made at Clarendon, and renew'd at Northampton, concerning Murther, Theft, Robbery, and Receivers of ſuch as were guilty of ſuch Crimes, Frauds, and Burning of Houſes; which Facts, if any were found guilty of by the Verdict of twelve Men, they were to paſs the Tryal of Water-Ordeal; whereby, if they were not acquitted, their puniſhment was the loſs of a Leg, or Baniſhment; it being held in that Age a more deterring Spectacle to ſee a miſerable Malefactor alive than dead, for as yet they did not ſhed Blood in thoſe caſes. And yet we find, that in this King's Reign one Gilbert Plimpton a Knight, being accuſed of a Rape, was condemned by Ranulph Glanville Chief Juſtice of England to be hang'd on a Gibbet; but before the Execution, it was diſcover'd, that Glanville did it out of a deſign of getting his Wife, a great Heireſs, for one Reinor Sheriff of Yorkſhire; and ſo by the Clamours of the People, and Authority of Baldwin Biſhop of Worceſter he was ſaved, till his Innocency was clear'd to the King, who thereupon ſtopped the Sentence. This Act of Injuſtice leaves a foul Blot upon the Memory of Glanville, though he was a chief Inſtrument in compoſing that Body of the Laws and Cuſtoms of England that paſs under his Name.

1177. Reg. 23.

The Charge given at the Aſſizes at this time conſiſted but of very few points, beſides the Felonies aforeſaid, and was eſpecially for taking Homage and Allegiance of the King's Subjects, demoliſhing Caſtles, ſecuring the King's Rights of his Crown and Exchequer. The multitude of Actions which aroſe in ſucceeding Ages proceeded from new Crimes, and increaſing of Laws and Conteſts, which were then but in the Cradle. This Year the King of Sicily ſent and craved to have the King's Daughter Joanna in Marriage; and Henry having taken the advice of his Parliament, which he call'd on purpoſe, granted his Requeſt; and ſhortly after ſent her to him, who honourably endow'd her with many Cities and Caſtles in his Iſle. But the great Match which the King had provided for his Son John, was at this time broken off by Death, and he was marry'd to the Daughter of William Earl of Gloceſter [b], by whom he was to have that Earldom. This William was the Son of the famous Duke of Gloceſter, who being natural Brother to Maud the Empreſs, ſo ſtrenuouſly aſſerted her Right. The ſame Year he marry'd [c] Eleanor, another of his Daughters, to Alphonſo King of Caſtile, and determin'd a Controverſie between him and his Uncle Sanctio King of Navarre, about the detaining of certain parts of each others Kingdom, he being choſen Arbitrator between them [d]. Likewiſe the Marriage between his Son Richard, and Alice the Daughter of the French King (who was truſted to his Care and Keeping) was again treated on, and urged by the Pope's Legates, to be conſummated upon pain of Interdiction [e]; but it was deferr'd, tho' both Kings entred into a perpetual League, both Offenſive and Defenſive, and vow'd an Expedition into the Holy Land together, which they never liv'd to perform.

The King of France in a dangerous Sickneſs of his Son Philip vow'd to viſit the Sepulchre of Thomas the Martyr of Canterbury, and by a Licenſe from the King of England, and promiſe of ſafe Conduct, perform'd the ſame with great Devotion, and gave rich Preſents, viz. Offering upon his Tomb a maſſy Cup of pure Gold, and giving and confirming to the Monks 3600 Sextaries of Wine yearly (a Sextary is two Gallons of Engliſh Meaſure) to be deliver'd to them at Poiſſi, at the French King's Charge, and beſides freed them from all Toll and Cuſtom for whatſoever they ſhould buy in his Kingdom. He ſtay'd in England three

[a] The King of the Scots came to York in Auguſt, 1175. By this Treaty Roxburgh, Berwick, Gedworth, Edenburgh, and Sterling Caſtles were deliver'd to King Henry. In this Charter of Peace, which is at large in Hoveden, 'tis expreſly mention'd, that the King of Scots did Homage to the King of England for all Scotland. The Council at Windſor was held about Michaelmas, 1175. The Council at Nottingham was held on the 25th of January, in the next Year 1176. They arriv'd about Whitſuntide, Anno 1176. *Rog. [b] The Earl of Gloceſter left all his Eſtate to John the King's youngeſt Son, on Condition he marry'd Hawiſe the Earl's youngeſt Daughter. Some Authors place this Marriage in the firſt Year of Richard III. Anno 1189. Her five eldeſt Siſters had Penſions allow'd them.

[c] Rad. de Diceto, and others, relate, That the Princeſs Eleanor, who was then but ſeven Years old, was marry'd to King Alphonſo in 1169.

[d] This Controverſie was debated and determin'd by the Great Council of the Nation, but the King had the Honour of it, and Judgment was not given till the next Year, 1177.

What Effect this Journey had upon the Recovery of the Son, 'tis eaſie to conjecture; but 'tis certain, that it wrought moſt upon the aged King, who was no ſooner come to S. Denis, but he was taken with a Palſie, and died of it within a few days; yet foreſeeing his Death, he cauſed his Son to be crown'd, tho' then but fifteen Years of Age, which was done at Reimes, Anno Dom. 1179.

The Duke of Saxony baniſh'd by the Emperour.

Henry Duke of Saxony, who had married Maud the King's Daughter, was expell'd from his Dutchy, and baniſh'd by the Emperour Fredericke for ſeven Years; becauſe he detain'd certain Revenues from the Archbiſhop of Cologne, which were payable to him out of Saxony, and refuſed to come to a Tryal about it at the Imperial Chamber, according to his Faith and Promiſe made to the Emperour: So that he was forced to come with his Wife and Children to his Father-in-Law the King of England for Aſſiſtance, and remain'd with him three Years, till the Archbiſhop of Cologne coming to viſit the Sepulchre of S. Thomas of Canterbury, the King ſo pacified the Archbiſhop, that he was reſtor'd to his Dutchy, and a Contract of Marriage made between Richard the King's Son and the Emperour's Daughter; which notwithſtanding the Pre-1180. contract made with Alice the French King's Daugh-
Reg. 26. ter, had been conſummated, had not Death prevented. King Henry alſo ſends his Son John to reſide in Ireland, thinking that the Majeſty of a Court, and Gallantry of his Attendants might both awe and civilize that rude Country; but he being accompanied with many young Men, who had more Wit than Judgment, did more Harm there than Good. For the jocoſe Courtiers ſcorning and deriding the Iriſh for their rude Habits and Faſhions ſo anger'd the Natives, that three of their moſt potent Kings, viz. of Limerick, Connaught, and Corke, fell into open Rebellion; for as Cambrenſis ſays, 'Tho' Barbarous Nations are 'ignorant of Honours, yet they affect to be ho-'nour'd above meaſure, and are quickly touch'd 'and incens'd with any Signs of Diſgrace and 'Contempt, but their Anger was ſoon al-'lay'd [a].

Henry enjoying now days of Peace, employ'd himſelf to find out all means poſſible to fill his Treaſury, and watched all Occaſions to enrich himſelf; and the firſt thing he attempted this way, was this. Roger Archbiſhop of York dy'd very rich, and in his Sickneſs diſpos'd of very great Sums by Will to godly Uſes; which as ſoon as the King had Intelligence of, he ſent Commiſſioners to ſeize them for his Uſe, becauſe as he alledg'd, he had acted againſt a Canon of his own making; which was, That it is againſt Law for any Eccleſiaſtical Perſon to diſpoſe of any thing by Will, unleſs before he were ſick. The Commiſſioners in Proſecution of their Office having found out, that Hugh Biſhop of Durham had receiv'd three hundred Marks of Silver of the Archbiſhop's Money to be beſtow'd in thoſe Uſes, demanded the ſame for the King; but the Biſhop ſaid, 'He 'had diſpoſed of the Money according to the 'Archbiſhop's Will to the Leprous, Blind and 'Lame, and in repairing Churches, Bridges and 'Hoſpitals; and if they would have the Money, 'they muſt take it of them: Which round Anſwer ſo diſpleaſed the King, that he ſeiz'd upon his Caſtle of Durham, and brought him into many Troubles. The King's Revenues (beſides his Demeſns and the Benefit of his Foreſts) were but A. D. 1180. ſmall in England, which caus'd him ſometimes to make bold with the Church, and keep the Bi-Reg. 26. ſhopricks and Benefices vacant, as he did that of Lincoln eighteen Years. He made a new Coin in England, and cry'd down the old, fining all the Corrupters of the Coin very heavily: And His Device to raiſe Horſe for his War. becauſe the Charge of Horſe and Armour was very burthenſome to him, to ſave his own Purſe he cauſed every Man's Lands and Eſtate to be rated for the furniſhing out of them. This Method he began to take firſt in his Dominions beyond Sea; where he order'd, 'That all that had 100 l. 'of Anjovin Money in Goods and Chattels, ſhould 'find an Horſe, and all Military Furniture belong-'ing to it; and all that had 40, 30, or 20 l. of 'Anjovin Money, ſhould find a Croſlet, Head-'piece, and Sword, or a Bow and Arrows, with 'a ſtrict Prohibition, That no Man ſhould ſell or 'pawn his Armour, but leave it when he died, 'to his next Heir: And this Conſtitution he eſtabliſh'd in England by the Conſent of his Parliament. The King of France and the Earl of Flanders, much liking his politick Invention, made the like Conſtitutions in their Country. But notwithſtanding all his Arts of getting and His great Expences. ſaving, he could hardly get much more than to 1181. ſupply his large Expences, which he was oblig'd Reg. 27. to be at in ſo large Dominions, for Entertainments, Penſions and Rewards, Buildings and Fortifications, beſides his extraordinary Diſburſements, which either for Honour or Policy he was forced to; for he was often fain to bribe the Pope's Legates, to make them favourable to him in the Buſineſs he had with the King of France, about ſending ſuch Supplies to the Holy War, as might be ſufficient, and for his Reputation. In the Year 1182. he reliev'd the Neceſſities of the Chriſtians at Jeruſalem with a Royal Bounty, giving them forty two thouſand Marks of Silver and five hundred Marks of Gold, which is in our Money 47333 l. 6 s. 8 d. And when Pope Lucius, being reduced to very great Streights by the People of Rome, deſired his Aſſiſtance, he 1182. ſent him a very great Sum of Gold and Silver, Reg. 28. which he levied of the Clergy, partly at their own Deſire: For when the Pope's Nuncio's came to deſire the ſame, they went to the King and adviſed him, 'That he ſhould ſupply his Wants, 'as he thought was convenient for his Honour, 'both for himſelf and them; becauſe it was bet-'ter that their King ſhould receive any Impoſi-'tion laid upon them than the Pope, leſt it 'ſhould be an ill Preſident, and beget a Cuſtom, 'which may prove of very great Detriment to 'the Kingdom.

The King and Sons fall out. The Peace made between the two Kings, the Father and Son, had now continu'd about eight 1183. Years, when a freſh Quarrel broke out between Reg. 29. them upon this Occaſion, as far as can be gather'd from the uncertain Relations of thoſe Times. In the 29th Year of his Reign he kept his Chriſtmas at Cane in Normandy, and feaſted moſt magnificently his Sons, Henry, Richard, and Jeffrey, with the Duke of Saxony, his Wife and Children, and all the Nobility of thoſe Parts. At this Meeting the King adviſed his Son Henry to take the Homages of his Brothers Richard Earl of Poictou, and Jeffrey Earl of Britain. Richard at firſt refuſed to do it, but upon Perſuaſion offer'd it, but was then refuſed: Whereupon he departed into Anjou from his Father's Court, to fortifie and furniſh his Caſtles there. The King his Brother follows him, being put upon it by the Barons of Poictou and Aquitain, who deserted Richard, as sensible [a] that he could not long hold his Dominions against his Brother's Power and better Title; and Jeffrey, Earl of Britain, joyned his Forces with the King his Brother. Richard being over-power'd, sent for Assistance to his Father, who immediately came into Poictou, not to make War, but constrain his three Sons to a Peace, with a powerful Army; by which he soon effected it, and brought them to swear Obedience to him, and to live in Peace one with another, which was ratified not long after at Mirabel, and the Barons of Poictou, and Aquitain at the Desire of Henry (who had sworn to defend them against his Brother Richard) included in it, and Richard made to promise them a Pardon for all Acts formerly committed, Jeffrey Earl of Britain being sent to bring them in to joyn in it. But the Barons, judging this Peace either not safe or unprofitable, were so far from complying, that they over-persuaded Jeffrey to assist them against his Father, and kept him with them. Henry the Son notwithstanding, still mediates for them with his Father and Brother, to receive them into Favour; and undertaking to bring them in, with his Brother Jeffrey, is permitted by his Father to go and treat with them at Limoges. The King himself, desirous to confer with his Sons and compose this Quarrel, came, as was agreed, another way: But they both met with an unwelcome Reception, the Father being in very great Danger of being shot twice [b]; and the Son not being able to prevail with them to submit after repeated Tenders of Pardon and Favour. This Obstinacy of the Barons so troubled the young King, that upon his return to his Father, he protested that he would renounce them, if they would not come and yield themselves to his Mercy; and as if he had resolv'd to forsake their Party, gave his Father fresh Assurances of his own firm Adherence to him, by delivering up to him his Horse and Armour. But he continued not in his Fidelity many days; for either thro' the Instigation of some disaffected Ministers about him, or else because he saw his Father intended a severe Revenge upon them, whom he had promised to secure, but he could not do it if he stay'd with him, he again enters into a League with them. But finding his Power to come far short of his Design, and despairing of Success, he burst out into an extravagant Passion before his Father, and falling down before S. Martial's Shrine, vow'd to take upon him the Cross, and give over all Worldly Business, and unless he would give him leave (without which he could not go) he would instantly kill himself. His Father being amaz'd at this sudden and strange Passion, first asked him, Whether any Discontent or Religious Zeal had induc'd him to make this Vow: The Son protests, That it was merely to obtain the Remission of those Sins he had committed against his Person. His Father much dissuaded him from this Purpose; but finding him very obstinate, and resolv'd after all the Arguments he could use, he said unto him, 'Son, God's 'Will be done, and your's: If you will go, I 'will take care to fit you out according to your 'Greatness and State. The Son (while his Father was pliable) besought him to deal mercifully with the Barons, who held out the Castle of Limoges against him; and by Importunity obtain'd it, upon condition, That they should give him Pledges for their Fidelity for the future, which they seem'd contented to do. But in the Performance of the Condition, some who were against this Peace made such Disturbances, that all former Tenders and Conclusions were broken; and the young Princes fell again into open Rebellion with their Confederates against him, and being made Heads of the Faction, were forced to commit Theft and Sacrilege to support their Adherents. The Father immediately besieges Limoges; and the Son, who was engag'd against him very unwillingly, fell into a Fever and Flux, which was caused by the Grief and Vexation of his Mind, by which in few days he died. A Prince of excellent Parts, but ruin'd by his Father's Indulgence and Rigour; who never suffer'd him to be a King, tho' he made him one by his Coronation, putting those Desires of Majesty in his Heart which he was forced to break, that he might suppress them. The King was extreamly grieved at the Death of his Son, but did not desist from his Revenge he had begun against the Barons of Aquitain, whom he furiously prosecuted, seiz'd on their Castles, and rased that of Limoges to the Ground. Jeffrey upon his Submission was again receiv'd into Favour, but dy'd the next Year at Paris, being in a Tournament there trodden to Death by Horses [c]: And thus Henry liv'd to see half his Male-issue extinct before him, and that by Deaths as violent as their Dispositions. The other two indeed surviv'd him, but were no less miserable in their Ends, as this ensuing Story will shew.

[a] Prince John did not go for Ireland till the Year 1185. He was ſtil'd King of that Iſland, and had a Crown of Peacocks Feathers, interwoven with Gold, ſent him by Pope Lucius the 3d.

Jeffrey's Death. 1184.

Philip the Second, King of France, being now seated upon his Father's Throne (and able to effect more than his Father could) soon after the Death of King Henry the Son, requires that the Country of Vexin, which was given in Dower with his Sister Margaret, should be restored; but the King of England (who never car'd to part with any thing in his Possession) chose rather to pay Yearly seventeen thousand and fifty Pounds Anjovin to Queen Dowager, than to part with it [d]. And because he saw this Prince to be of an high Spirit and very active, and so likely to give him Disturbance in his old Age, he did Homage to him for all his Dominions he had in France (which he never would do to his Father, and was the first time he ever stoop'd to any Earthly Power) and sided with him against Philip Earl of Flanders, a potent Prince in those days; who had always held a fair Correspondence with Lewis, but was at Variance with Philip, because he required of him the Country of Vermandois, as belonging to his Crown, divorcing his Wife, Niece to the Earl, upon an Allegation indeed of Consanguinity, but most for her Relation to him. The Earl being joyned with Odo Earl Burgogne, the Earls of Champagne, Hainalt, Namur, S. Poll, and others, raised War upon Philip, and made such havock in his Country, that he was forced to agree a Peace to his own Disadvantage. [a] Rad. de Diceto writes, they were discontented with him for his severe Government.

[b] Henry and Jeffrey had seiz'd the Castle of Limoges, and shut out the King; who coming near the Castle to treat with them, the young Princes Guards shot at him, and an Arrow had certainly pierc'd his Heart if his Horse had not by chance tost'd up his Head and receiv'd it in his Forehead.

[c] The French Historians affirm he dy'd of a Fever, and that it was not till the Year 1186.

[d] It is 1750 l. only in Rog. Hov. Mr. Daniel has corrected it, and made it 17050 Anjovin Pounds; for 1750 l. of that Money wou'd be a small Joynture for a Princess, an English Shilling was then of the same Value with 2 d. of Anjou Money.

A. D. 1185. Reg. 31.

French King's Sister to his Son Richard to Wife, the King of France granted her in Dower the Country of Vexin, as her Sister Margaret had before. But these Tyes held not long. The young King of France having contracted so great a Familarity with Richard the King's Son, that one Bed and Board is said to have held them, so stirred up the Jealousie of the old King, that he sent for his Son home, and caused him to swear upon the Evangelists to preserve his Fidelity to him against all Persons whatsoever. The King of France seeing this, laid hold upon the old Cause to pick a Quarrel, and threaten'd that he would invade and destroy Normandy, unless he would either deliver his Sister to Richard forthwith, or resign Gisors and the Country of Vexin into his hands. The news of this Action brought the two Kings to another Parly between Gisors and Try, to settle matters in difference between them, but never came to any mention of them. For the Archbishop of Tyre (who came from the East to obtain assistance against the Turks in the Holy War) did with that Zeal and Earnestness of Persuasion urge that business, that these two great Princes let fall all Contentions between themselves, and with joynt consent resolved to undertake that laborious and dangerous Expedition against the Infidels.

Philip and Henry's Resolution for the Holy War.

Their Preparations for their Expedition.

And now such was the Zeal of these two Kings, that nothing was thought, or talk'd on, but preparations for that War. They agreed to raise each of them a strong Army; and for a mark of Distinction among their Followers and People it was agreed upon, that the King of England should wear a White Cross, the French a Red, and the Flemmings a Green. And as a farther Engagement in this Business, the King of England wrote to the Patriarch of Antioch a most comfortable and pious Letter, concluding with these words: 'That among other Princes, he himself, and his 'Son, rejecting the Glory of this World, and de'spising all the Pleasures thereof, in their own 'Persons, and with all their strength; did intend, 'God willing, to visit them shortly. To raise Money to defray the great Expence of this Undertaking, it was ordain'd by the two Kings, their Archbishops, Bishops, Earls, and other in both their Dominions in France, that all Persons, as well of the Clergy as Laity, (except only such as went with them) should pay the tenth part of all their Lands for that Year, and of all their Moveables and Chattels, as well in Gold as Silver. And besides they made many excellent Orders for the restraint of all Excesses in Meat, Drink, and Apparel, as was convenient for the Undertakers of so good and devout an Action.

1186. Reg. 32.

The King of England having laid these Impositions upon his Dominions in France, comes over into England, and calls a Parliament of his Bishops, Abbots, Earls, Barons, and others both of the Clergy and Laity, at Gayntington[a], and by their consent imposes the same Tax upon all his Subjects in England; and presently sends forth Collectors into every Shire to gather it, as he had done in France. But in all the Cities of England he sought out the Richest Men, as in London two hundred, York an hundred, and proportionably in the rest; which at a Time and Place appointed he summon'd to appear before him, and took of them the tenth part of all their Moveables, as they were rated to him by credible Men, who knew their Estates; and if any refused to pay, he imprison'd them till they did: In which Exaction, Piety bore him out, otherwise 'twould not have been endured in those times. The King also sent Hugh Bishop of Duresm, with other Commissioners, to William King of Scots, to collect the like Tenths in his Country; which that King would not allow of, but offer'd to give the King of England five thousand Marks of Silver, and a Castle, which he claim'd, but the King of England refused the same.

A. D. 1186. Reg. 32.

Whilst these Preparations were making, and Money collecting, a Quarrel happen'd between Richard Earl of Poicton, and Raymond Earl of Tholouse, which blasted their whole Design, and that upon this occasion: The Earl of Tholouse, by the Persuasion of one Peter Suillar, had taken certain Merchants of Aquitain, and used them very hardly. The Earl of Poicton being displeased at it, surprizes Peter, imprisons him, and would not suffer the Earl of Tholouse to redeem him upon any Condition. Whereupon that Earl imprisons two Gentlemen, Servants of the King of England, Robert and Ralph Poer, who were travelling through his Country, as Pilgrims from St. James of Compostella; which Earl Richard took so ill, that he immediately entred Tholouse with an Army, which he had prepared for a better design, destroys the Country with Fire and Sword, and took several Castles. The People and Earl of Tholouse, not able to oppose Richard's Forces, made their Complaints to the King of France, who sends to the King of England to know, whether his Son Richard had done this by his advice or consent? The King answer'd, That he had given neither to his Son; but that his Son had sent him word by the Archbishop of Doublin, that he did it with the consent of the King of France. This that King look'd upon as a delusory Answer; and therefore presently enters Berry, seizes on that Country, and takes divers Castles belonging to the King of England. This Act of Hostility broke all measures laid for the Holy War, and they fell into open and violent Wars between themselves. The Pope by his Legates, and many other Princes, endeavour'd to reconcile these enraged Kings, and brought them to many interviews, but all to no purpose; they went away usually greater Enemies than they came. The Pope's Legates looking upon the French King the cause of this lamentable Breach, threaten'd him, unless he would make a Peace with the King of England, to interdict him; but the French King told them, he feared not their Sentence, being grounded upon no Equity, and it not belonging to the Church of Rome by any Sentence to hinder the King of France from chastizing his Rebellious Subjects; and added, That they smelt of the Sterlings of England. This produced a worse effect than any thing that had hitherto been done. For the King of England upon this Occasion utterly refusing to give Alice, the French King's Sister, to Richard, tho' he offer'd to give her to his Son John with larger Conditions, so angred his Son Richard, that he fell to the King of France, did Homage to him for the Dukedom of Aquitain, and joyn'd his Forces with him against his Father. This quite broke the Heart of the King of England, and as if he had been wholly deserted of his ancient Courage, as well as of many of his Subjects, buckles to any Conditions, leaves the Defence of Mans, (which he had undertaken by Oath never to forsake, by reason it was the Tomb of his Father) and flies away with seven hundred Men; and afterward[b] did Homage to the King of

A. D. 1189. Reg. 35. France for all his Dominions on that ſide the Sea, renders up Alice to his Son Richard, upon Condition ſhe ſhould be marry'd to him when he return'd from the Holy War, and in the mean time to remain in the Cuſtody of any one of ſuch five as the King of England ſhould nominate; grants Fealty ſhould be given to Richard of all his Dominions, and pardons all his adherents, covenants to pay the King of France twenty thouſand Marks in Silver, as a reparation of the Damages he had ſuſtain'd the laſt War. And as if he had been affrighted out of his Reaſon and Wit at thoſe Thunderclaps, which are ſaid to have happen'd at ſome Interviews between himſelf and King of France, he permitted, that in caſe he ſhould not perform theſe Articles, his Barons ſhould ſwear to renounce him, and betake themſelves to the King of France and Earl Richard; and for more ſecurity, he yielded up the Cities of Mons and Turein, with divers other Caſtles into their hands, &c. And thus having concluded this buſineſs, he ended alſo his Life three days after, the greatneſs of his Heart not being able to ſtoop under the weight of his declining Fortune, and therefore with grief and ſorrow broke. Some few hours before he dy'd he ſaw a Liſt of their Names, who had conſpired againſt him with the King of France and his Son Richard; and finding among them his Son John to be the firſt, he fell into a very extravagant Paſſion, curſing his Son's and his own Birth, and in that Fit of Anger departed the World, which he had ſo often diſturb'd, having reign'd [a] thirty five Years, ſeven Months, and five Days. After he was dead, and was carrying to be buried (adorned, according to the manner of Kings, with all Royal Ornaments open fac'd) when his Son Richard drew near his Body, the Blood guſhed out of the Noſtrils (which being uſually noted, as a Sign of Guiltineſs) may rightly be accounted as a Voice of Nature giving notice of the Wrongs and unnatural Offences Richard had done to him, which was ſo interpreted by Richard himſelf; for at the Sight of it being ſurpriz'd, he is ſaid to have burſt out into extream Sorrow and Lamentations. He had by his Wife Eleanor ſeveral Children, viz. four Sons; Henry, Richard, Jeffrey, and John, beſides two, viz. William the eldeſt, and Philip the youngeſt but one, which dy'd young; and three Daughters, viz. Maud, married to Henry Duke of Saxony, Eleanor, who was given to Alphonſo VIII. King of Caſtile, and Joanna, who was married to William King of Sicily. He had alſo two Natural Sons by his Concubine Fair Roſamond, Daughter of Walter Lord Clifford, viz. William ſurnam'd Longeſpee or Long-Sword, and Jeffrey Archbiſhop of York, who after five Years Baniſhment in his Brother King John's time, died Anno Dom. 1213. The other Son William Longeſpee, who was Earl of Saliſbury in Right of Ela his Wife, Daughter and only Heireſs of William Earl of Saliſbury, Son of Patricke, had Iſſue William Earl of Saliſbury, and Stephen Earl of Ulſter, Ela Counteſs of Warwick, Ida Lady Beauchamp of Bedford, and Iſabel Lady Veſey. It is ſaid, that King Henry had a third Natural Son call'd Morgan, by the Wife of one [b] Rodolph Bloetb, or Blewit, a Knight. He liv'd to be Provoſt of Beverly, and was elected to the Biſhoprick of Durham; and coming to Rome for a Diſpenſation (becauſe his Baſtardy made him uncapable of it) the Pope adviſed him to profeſs himſelf as Blewit's Lawful Son, and not the King's Natural, promiſing him to conſecrate him on that Condition; but he (by the Counſel of one William Lane his Chaplain) told the Pope plainly, that he would not renounce his Father, or deny himſelf to be of the Royal Blood to gain the greateſt Earthly Promotion.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES in the Reign of Henry II.

IN the 6th Year of his Reign thirty German Hereticks came into England to propagate their Opinions: One Gerard was their Teacher. They ſaid they were Chriſtians, but deny'd Baptiſm, the Lord's Supper, and Matrimony; for which they were condemn'd by a Council of Biſhops at Oxford, and deliver'd over to the Secular Power to be puniſh'd: Accordingly they were mark'd in the Forehead with a red hot Iron, whipp'd and thruſt out of Doors naked in the midſt of Winter: Where none daring to relieve them, an Order having been publiſh'd to the contrary, they dy'd of Hunger and Cold, and were the firſt that ever ſuffer'd for Hereſie in England.

In his 14th Year Robert Biſhop of Lincoln dy'd, and the King kept his See vacant ſeventeen Years, himſelf all that while receiving the Revenues of that Dioceſs. Hol.

In his 18th Year a mighty Tempeſt happen'd in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and three Men were kill'd by Thunder and Lightning, at Andover in Hampſhire, on Chriſtmas-Day. Hol.

The ſame Year as King Henry was about to take Horſe at Cardiffe in Glamorganſhire, an Apparition appear'd to him; and having threaten'd him with ſome dreadful Plagues if he did not amend his Life, it vaniſh'd. Ibid.

The next Year this Infamous Collect was order'd to be us'd in all Churches in the Province of Canterbury, to expiate the Guilt of Becket's Murther.

Be favourable, good Lord, to our Supplication and Prayer; that we which acknowledge our ſelves guilty of Iniquity, may be deliver'd by the Interceſſion of Thomas thy Bleſſed Martyr and Biſhop. Ibid.

In his 23d Year it rain'd Blood in the Iſle of Wight for two days. Ibid.

In his 26th Year, on the 18th of June, after Sun-ſet, the New Moon then ſhining out fair with her Horns to the Eaſt, the upper Horn on a ſudden ſeem'd to be divided into two; out of which there appear'd to riſe a burning Brand, caſting forth Sparks and Flames as if it had been on fire. In September, the Moon being about twenty ſeven days old, at ſix a Clock a Partile Eclipſe of the Sun happen'd; its Body appear'd to be horn'd, the Horns ſhooting towards the Weſt, as the Moon does at twenty days old: The reſt of it was cover'd with a black Roundel, which coming down by little and little, threw about the horn'd Brightneſs that remain'd, till both the Horns hung down on either ſide towards the Earth; and as the black Roundel went a little forwards, the Horns turn'd to the Weſt, and the Blackneſs paſſing away, the Sun recover'd his former Brightneſs. Hol.

THE LIFE and REIGN OF RICHARD I.

Richard began his Reign, July 6. A. D. 1189. Reg. 1.

RICHARD, ſurnam'd Cœur de Lion, Earl of Poictou, (born at Oxford) ſucceeded his Father in all his Dominions, and firſt ſeizes upon his Treaſures in France, which being then in the Cuſtody of one Stephen Thurnham, Seneſchal of Normandy, he impriſon'd the Treaſurer, that he might by Severities extort the full Sums in his Hands[a]; which having gotten, he departed to Roan, where he was girded with the Sword of Normandy, by Walter Archbiſhop[b] there, and took Fealty of the Clergy and Laity. Then he went to the King of France to agree with him about the Reſtitution of ſome parcels of his Dominions, which had been taken from his Father in the late Wars, which he obtain'd not by his old Friendſhip, but his Money[c]; and to confirm a laſting Amity between them, he gave his Niece Maud, the Daughter of the Duke of Saxony, to Jeffrey the Earl of Perch's Son. While he continu'd in France to ſettle his Affairs there, Queen Eleanor his Mother, whom he had freed from a long Impriſonment of twelve Years, and put into Power in his abſence, endeavour'd to prepare his People's Affections for his coming into England, by iſſuing out Pardons, and relieving Oppreſſions; and at laſt went to meet him at Winchester, and welcome him into England. Gold and Silver, with abundance of Plate, Jewels and precious Stones) there fell to him by the Death of Jeffrey Riddle Bishop of Ely, dying intestate, three thousand and sixty Marks of Silver, and two hundred and five of Gold, which befel him in a fit season to defray the Charge of his Coronation, which was perform'd a little after, viz. September[a] 3. 1189. at Westminster by Baldwin Archbishop of Canterbury. On his Coronation there happen'd an unlucky Accident, which stained that Day with Blood. The Jews inhabiting about the Cities of London and Westminster, desirous to gain the Favour of the new King, came to offer their Presents, as an afflicted People in a strange Country; but the Rabble, who before were incensed against them, set upon them, and in a tumultuous manner so used them, that they lost both their Lives and Money; and their Example was follow'd in the Towns of Norwich, St. Edmundsbury, Lincoln, Stamford, and Lin.

After his Coronation he resumed the Thoughts of his Expedition to Jerusalem, and resolved to go through with it. The great Treasure which was left him by his Father was not thought sufficient to defray the Expence of that Action, and therefore he contrived all the Ways he could to raise more Money. And first he sold many of the Crown-Lands both to the Clergy and others: Godfrey de Lucy Bishop of Winchester bought two Manours, Weregrave and Menes; the Abbot of St. Edmundsbury the Manour of Mildhall for a thousand Marks of Silver; the Bishop of Durham the Manour of Sadborough[b], with the Palatinate Dignity of the whole Province, which gave occasion to that Jocose Speech of his concerning that Bishop, That he was a cunning Workman, that could make a New Earl of an old Bishop. He also granted to William King of Scots the Castles of Berwick and Roxborough for ten thousand Marks, and gave him a Release from those Covenants made and confirmed by Charter to King Henry II. as extorted from him by force while he was a Prisoner; but reserving to himself such Rights as were and had been performed by his Brother Melcolm to his Ancestors the Kings of England. Farther, pretending that his Signet was lost, he made a new one, and put out a Proclamation, That whoever would enjoy peaceably the Grants made under the former Seal, must have them confirm'd by the New; by which means he brought in great Sums of Money to the grief of his Subjects. Then he procured a Power from the Pope of dispensing with such Persons as had vow'd to take the Cross, and were not willing to go, he got great Fines of them. All which Monies he levy'd with great Expedition, because the King of France in November after his Coronation, had sent the Earl of Perch, with other Commissioners, to acquaint King Richard, that in a general Assembly at Paris he had solemnly sworn upon the Evangelists to be ready at Tours, with all his Princes and People who had undertaken the Cross, upon Easter-day following, and from thence to set forward to the Holy Land; and to assure him of this his Resolution, he sent a Charter of their Agreement, desiring the King of England to send him the same assurance to meet him at the same Time and Place; which the King did at a general Assembly held at London. In December, the King, having stay'd but four Months in England after his Coronation, departs into Normandy, kept his Christmas at Rouen; and presently had a Conference with the King of France at Reimes, where both themselves, and most of the Nobility of both Kingdoms, enter'd into a firm Peace and Union one with another, to preserve each other, and their Estates; and agreed upon many Orders for their Journey. These things being settled, Richard sent for Queen Eleanor his Mother, his Brother John, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of Winchester, Durham, Norwich, Bath, Salisbury, Ely, Chester, and others, who came unto him at Rouen, where he committed the chief Charge of the Kingdom to William Longchamp Bishop of Ely, under the Title of Chief Justice of England, and gave him one of his Seals, and the Custody of the Tower of London; and conferr'd upon Hugh Bishop of Durham the supream Command of the North, from Humber to Scotland, and the keeping of Windsor-Castle, which proved after a cause of Quarrel between these two ambitious Prelates, who were impatient of each others Greatness. Hugh Bardulph, William Marshall, Jeffrey Fitz-Peter, and William Brewer, were joyn'd in Commission with the Bishop of Ely. The King knowing the ambitious Mind of his Brother John, dare not trust him in the Commission; but lest he should cause any Disturbance in his absence, he caused him to take an Oath[c], that he would not come into his Kingdom of England for the space of three Years next following; and that he might be obliged the more to behave himself peaceably, he conferr'd upon him the Earldoms of Mortaigne, Cornwall, Devonshire, Dorset, Somerset, Nottingham, Darby, and Lancaster; which, with the Earldom of Gloucester, the Honour of Wallingford, Tichill, and Eye, and Castles of Marlborough and Lutgarsal, which he had by his Wife Isabel, Daughter of the Earl of Gloucester, made him a very great and powerful Prince; but were so far from contenting his Mind, that they only increased his Desires of more, and made him a dangerous Subject, whenever an opportunity should offer. The King having thus provided for the Safety of his Kingdom, and Government of it, sends the Bishop of Ely his Vice-Roy[d] over into England; and to make his Reputation the greater, he procured of the Pope to make him his Legate over all England and Scotland; confining the Archbishop of York, his Base Brother, to Normandy, till his return, lest he also through Emulation might molest his Kingdom: And being thus secured, commanded him to provide what Necessaries he could for his intended Voyage. The Bishop of Ely furnish'd with this ample Authority, begins his Reign with much Zeal for his Master's Service, but Offence to the People, whom he grievously oppressed by his rigorous Exactions: For he took from every City in England four Horses of Service[e], and of every Abby one; and so of all the King's Manours. And to shew how he would prove, he took the Castle of Windsor from the Bishop of Durham, and confined him within his Town of Howedon, questioning his Authority, and depressing him; notwithstanding he made his Application to the King himself.

A. D. 1189. Reg. 1.

The Vice-Roy sent into England to provide for his Master's Voyage.

A. D. 1189. Reg. 1. all his Forces at the latter end of June, in the Company of the King of France to Lyons, where their People growing so numerous, that they were troublesome to each other, the two Kings parted; the King of France went to Genoua by Land, and the King of England to Marseilles, where having stay'd eight Days, expecting his Fleet, which was kept back by Tempests, he was forced to hire ten great Ships, and twenty Galleys to transport him and his Army into Sicily. The King of France, who had taken Ship at Genoua, was likewise driven by Tempest upon the same Isle. They were forced both to winter there, because the French King's Ships were so shatter'd by the Tempest, that they could not go farther till repaired, 1190. and Richard expected his own Navy, which caused great Troubles to the Isle [a], as well as themselves, the English and French not agreeing. William late King of Sicily, who marry'd Joanna the King of England's Sister, was dead, and Tancred, Base Son of Roger, William's Grandfather, was invested in the Kingdom, contrary to the Will of the late King, and the People's Oath to Constantia, the lawful Daughter of the said Roger, who was marry'd to Henry the eldest Son of the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa. This Match created Tancred very powerful Enemies, against whose Force he could hardly hold his Kingdom; but after the King of England's coming he much strengthen'd himself, by making a League with that King, to defend him and his Kingdom, upon Condition he should pay his Sister twenty thousand Ounces of Gold for her Dower, and twenty thousand more upon a Match between Arthur Earl of Britain, his Brother Jeffrey's Son, and then Heir of his Crown, and Tancred's Daughter [b].

At the beginning of the Spring the two Kings having entred into a new League, and signed several Articles and Agreements of Peace, as their Contests in the Isle oblig'd them to, the King of France first sets forward to the Holy Land; but the King of England being detained by the coming of his Mother Eleanor, which brought Berengera, Daughter of the King of Navarre, to be affianced to him, stay'd [c] upon that account till Whitsuntide after, when the Queen return'd home, and the King with his Sister, the Queen Dowager of Sicily, and the young Lady, proceeded on his Journey with an hundred and thirty Ships, and fifty Gallies. In his way he was by a Tempest driven [d] upon the Isle of Cyprus, and being deny'd entrance, he beset the Isle on all sides, assaulted and took it; and placing Garrisons in it, he committed the Custody of it to Richard de Canvile and Robert de Turnham, taking half the Goods of the Inhabitants from them, to confirm the use of their own Laws. And here our Histories say, that he marry'd the Lady Berengera, and had 1191. her crown'd Queen [e]. From hence passed this Famous King to the Holy Land, loaden with the Spoils and Treasure of three noble and rich Islands, England, Sicily, and Cyprus, besides what he had gotten out of Normandy and Guien, which he consumed there, tho' to the great Honour of our English Nation, by his Heroick Actions, of which before I come to give an account, I shall give a short Relation of the State of Affairs in Asia, which drew these two potent Princes from the utmost Borders of Europe to venture themselves, and spend their Revenues there.

The State of the Holy Land at this time.

It was now eighty four Years since Godfrey of Boloigne, Duke of Lorrain, with the Confederate Princes, and their Associates, had recover'd the City of Jerusalem, with the Country of Palestine, and a great part of Syria, out of the hands of the Sarazens; and having obtain'd the Government of it by Election, was crown'd with a Crown of Thorns, in imitation of our Saviour, but reign'd but one Year. Baldwin his Brother succeeded him, and govern'd eighteen Years, and was succeeded by Baldwin de Burgo, who, having ruled thirteen, dy'd, and left only one Daughter, and the Kingdom in Dissention. Fulke Earl of Anjou coming three Years before, marry'd this Daughter, and enjoy'd the Kingdom eleven Years, leaving two young Sons by her, Baldwin and Almericke, who successively inherited their Father's Throne, and had it, the first twenty four, and the other twelve Years. This last left a Son of his own Name to succeed him; but he having no Issue, made Baldwin his Nephew, Son to his Sister Sybil, who was marry'd to the Marquis of Montferrat, his Heir, committing the Charge of him and Kingdom in his younger Years to Raimond Earl of Tripolis. But Guy of Lusignan, who after the Death of the Marquess of Montferrat, marry'd Sybil his Widow, soon put him from his Charge, not so much for any Love he had to the young Prince, as his Kingdom, which he first got the Administration, and then the Possession of, by poisoning (as was supposed) the young Prince. Raymund endeavour'd by Arms to regain his Trust, and put Guy of Lusignan so hard to it, that he was forced to beg the assistance of Saladine Sultan of Egypt, who glad of this occasion to increase his own Dominions, destroy'd them both, and gain'd their Kingdom; taking the Cities of Ptolomais, Asotus, Berythus, Ascalon, and after one Month's Siege Jerusalem it self, eighty eight Years after it had been conquer'd by Godfrey. Against this mighty Prince, who was not only an Experienced Commander, and Ruler of very large Dominions, but flush'd with Victories over the Christians, did these two Kings, with an Army of several Nations, viz. English, French, Italians and Germans, march; and at their first arrival sat down before Acon, a City of Judea, defended by Saladin against the Christians, who had besiegd it three Years. Many worthy Princes and noble Persons had lost their Lives before it, viz. Conradus Duke of Suevia, the Emperor Frederick's Son, the Earls of Perch, Puntif, and Blois, Stephen Earl of Sancerre, Bertoldus Duke of Germany, and Roger and Joselin Earls of Apulia; and [f] of England, Baldwin Archbishop of Canterbury, Robert Earl of Leicester, Ralph de Glanvile Chief Justice of England, Richard de

[a] King Richard took the City of Messina.

[b] Jeffrey Vinesauf, a Learned Historian of those Times, and the Author of King Richard's Travels to Jerusalem, writes, That he gave him twenty thousand Ounces more, to be free from all other Demands for the Plate, and other Rich Moveables, belonging to the late King, Husband to King Richard's Sister Joanna. The same Authors relate, That Richard divided this vast Sum with the King of France, Philip the August, his Fellow-Traveller, tho' he had no manner of Pretensions to any part of it.

[c] During his stay in this Isle he is said to have given himself much to Religious Offices and Duties, confessing his Sins, leading a very circumspect and pious Life; and sending for the Abbot Joachim from Calabria to hear him preach, because he was had in great esteem for his Learning, Holiness, and Prophetick Spirit. In a Sermon before King Richard, the Abbot is said to have deliver'd, That the Pope was Antichrist.

[d] It drove him first into Crete, then into Rhodes, where he stay'd ten Days; and the Ship, wherein the Lady Berengera was, being driven into the Port of Limezun in Cyprus, the King follow'd her thither.

[e] On the 12th of May, 1191. they were marry'd by John Bishop of Eureux.

[f] Some other Noble Persons are remember'd by our Historians to have perish'd in this Holy Expedition, whose Posterity yet flourish, as Ingelram de Fiennes, the Ancestor of the Right Honourable the Lord Say and Seal, the Lord Dacres, Theophilus Clinton Earl of Lincoln, whose Arms still retain the Badges of the Holy War, Stars, Crescents and Crosses; as also St. John, Minshul, Tilney, &c.

A. D. 1191. Reg. 2.

Clare and Walter de Kime; but all in vain, till the United Forces of these two Kings, after three Months Siege more, forced them to surrender upon Articles[a]. At the Entrance into the City, after it was taken, the Ensign of Leopold Duke of Austrich, which he had set upon the Wall, was order'd to be pull'd down by King Richard, and the two Kings Standards to be set up; which being ill resented, was afterwards the Cause of the King's great Misfortune. Besides, during the Siege the two Kings themselves had several Differences concerning Richard's Marriage with Berenguela, and rejecting the French King's Sister, about dividing the Spoils of their Voyage; which, by their Agreement, were to be parted equally: For the King of France claim'd his half in Cyprus, and Richard his Share in the Earl of Flanders's Goods and Estate, which the King of France had seiz'd; and lastly, about the Crown of Jerusalem, which was pretended to by Conradus, Marquis of Montferrat, and Guy of Lusignan, who married Sibilla, the Sister of the late King, and was in Possession of the Kingdom. The King of England took Guy's Part, and the King of France Conrade's. Thus these two Kings liv'd in continual Jars, till a dangerous Sickness through the Heat and Contagion of the Country, put an end not to them only, but almost to their Lives. As soon as they were recover'd, the King of France resolves to return home, where he knew was less Danger and more Honour than there; especially by the Death of the Earl of Flanders, whose bordering Countries he had a mind to add to his Kingdom: And therefore desires the King of England's Leave (for by their Agreement, it was not lawful for them to depart without each other's Leave) to return home. King Richard was very hardly prevail'd with to grant it, being sensible of the Trouble he might create his Dominions in his absence: But at length, by earnest Solicitations and Promises made by the King of France not to molest his Countries in France, he obtain'd his Desires, and so departed, leaving the Earl of Burgogne Lieutenant of his Forces. Richard soon after he was gone besieg'd Ascalon, and wrote invective Letters against the King of France for leaving him; and on the other side, the French King to be even with him, defam'd Richard among his Neighbours at home. King Richard staid ten Months longer, consuming both his Men and Treasure with great Valour, but little Success; the Earl of Burgogne by his Master's Instructions, proving always an Impediment in Matters of Importance, till his Death, which at length happen'd at Acon. Conradus, who was so much favour'd by the King of France in his Title to the Kingdom, was murther'd by two[b] Assassines, not without the Concurrence (as was falsly supposed) of the King of England. The Earl of Champagne marry'd his Widow, who was Sister to Queen Sibilla, and was by King Richard preferr'd to the Crown of Jerusalem, and Guy of Lusignan (the other Pretender to it) he made King of Cyprus, and so gave Content to them both.

The Kings of England and France differ.

While these things were doing in the East, England suffer'd much at home under the Government of Longchamp, who assuming the whole Regal Authority to himself, and excluding both the Nobility and the Commissioners whom the King had joyn'd with him, did act so arbitrarily and insolently, that he became odious to the whole Kingdom, as well Clergy as Laity; which concurring with the Prejudice the English had against him as a Frenchman, and Envy[c] for his excessive Grandure and Pride, begat a general Opposition to his Proceedings; which being encourag'd by Earl John, who study'd all ways to make himself popular, and usurp the Kingdom, soon brake out upon this Occasion. Jeffrey, Archbishop of York Elect, base Son to Henry the Second, whom Richard, who was averse to any Preferment of him in England, had confin'd to Normandy during his absence, obtain'd by great Labour of Pope Celestine a Licence to be invested in that See, and for that end come into England. The Chancellour Longchamp having Intelligence of his Arrival, met him at Dover to apprehend him; but the Archbishop escap'd to the Church to secure himself: Longchamp pursued him to the very Altar, and in a barbarous manner drawing him from thence in his Pontifical Vestments imprison'd him in the Castle. This Action gave just Cause of Offence not only to Earl John, but all the Bishops; who thereupon commanded the Chancellour not only to release him, but also to answer the Matter before the Assembly of Bishops and Nobles, which should meet for that purpose at St. Paul's. Here divers Articles of heinous Offences, committed contrary to the Commission given him, and the Interest of the King and Kingdom, were exhibited against him. The Archbishop of Roan also, and William Marshall Earl of Striguile, openly shew'd them the King's Letters Patents, dated at Messina in Sicily, wherein they were made Commissioners with him in the Government of the Kingdom; but alledg'd, That he never would permit them to manage any publick Business, but took upon him to do as he thought fit. Whereupon in the end, he was by the Assembly[d] deposed from his Office, and the Archbishop of Roan, who would do nothing without the Concurrence and Advice of the Peers, put in his Place; to whom the Tower of London, Castle of Windsor, and Legantine Power, was by him also unwillingly resign'd. Longchamp deservedly thus stripp'd of all his Power and Greatness, endeavour'd to make his Escape to the King in the Habit of a Woman, with a Parcel of Linen Cloth under his Arm; but being discover'd at Dover, he was rudely used by the People, and made Prisoner in the Castle, till Earl John releas'd him within eight days, and suffer'd him to go on in his intended Journey; by which being the Messenger of his own Misfortunes, he had the advantage of his Adversaries, and mightily incens'd the Pope against them, because they had so villified the Legantine Power, which he was very tender of. Soon after his Departure Earl John, the Archbishop of Roan, and the other Justices of the King granted unto the City of London their Immunities, and the Citizens swore Fealty to King Richard and his Heirs; and if he dy'd without Issue, they promised to receive Earl John for their King, and swore likewise Fealty unto him against all Men, reserving their Faith to King Richard. In so great Forwardness was John for his Brother's Crown, while he besieg'd Ascalon, and grappl'd with Saladine in the East.

[a] The Author of King Richard's Travels to Jerusalem affirms, That 300000 Pilgrims perish'd in this Siege.

[b] These Assassins were a precise Sect of Mahometans, dwelling together in six Cities near Antaradus in Syria, being about 40000 in Number; govern'd by one Chief Master, a Saracen Emir, whom they call'd, The Old Man of the Mountains. At his Command they were ready to undergo any dangerous Attempts, and would stab any Prince whom he appointed them to Death. Full. Holy War, out of M. Paris and Paul Æmilius. These Assassins were two young Saracens, whom he kept in his Service.

King Richard's return into England.

But Richard was not so intent upon Victory over the Infidels, but that he was as careful to keep what he was in Possession of; wherefore hearing of the Proceedings in England, and that the King of France had taken Gisors, and the Country of Vexin contrary to his Oath, he embrac'd Saladin's Proffer of a Truce for three Years upon Condition, That he should restore Ascalon to the same State wherein he found it before the Siege, which was done by the Advice of the Templars, and the whole Army; and presently leaving his Wife, Sisters, and People, to come after him as fast as they could conveniently, he took Ship [a] in three Galleys with some few Attendants, and hasten'd into England: In their Passage they pretended themselves to be Pilgrims; but the King was soon discover'd by his lavish Expences, and began to be valu'd by the Masters of the Vessels as a Prize; which when he had notice of, he left his Company, and with one Man only passed on Horsback through wild Deserts and a Rocky Country Day and Night into Austrich; where Fame having given notice of his coming, he was taken in a poor Inn asleep, by means of his Companion, and brought before Leopold the Duke of Austrich; who glad of this Opportunity, to revenge the Disgrace he had receiv'd from Richard at the entring of Acon, seiz'd upon him, and sent him (or rather sold him for sixty thousand Marks) to the Emperour Henry VI. whom likewise he had anger'd by assisting Tancredi, the base Son of Roger, in the Usurpation of the Crown of Sicily against Constantia, the Lawful Daughter of the said Roger, whom this Emperour had married. The News of Richard's Misfortune was soon dispersed into the adjoyning Countries. The Emperour sent word to the King of France of it, that he might rejoice with him; because, as he said, he had gotten the Enemy of the Empire, and Disturber of the Kingdom of France into his Power. England much lamented the Captivity of their Magnanimous King, and endeavour'd all ways possible to obtain his Release, but it could not be effected for a whole Year and six Weeks; tho he clear'd himself of the Scandals laid on him for the Death of Conradus, the Emperour's Kinsman, and other his Actions in the East, and resign'd his Kingdom of England to the Emperour, in the Presence of the German and English Nobility, to hold it of him by the Annual Tribute of 50000 l. Sterling to obtain his Freedom; because Earl John, his Brother, and the King of France, offer'd the Emperour great Sums to keep him Prisoner, and intended by their continual Bribes to keep him in perpetual Imprisonment, that John might be establish'd in all his Dominions with no small Advantage to the King of France: For to that end Earl John did Homage to the King of France for England, Normandy, and all the rest of the Transmarine Provinces, resign'd Gisors and the Country of Vexin to him, and swore to marry his Sister Alice, and to be divorc'd from his other Wife the Earl of Gloucester's Daughter; and the King of France on the other side, covenanted to give him with his Sister that part of Flanders, which he had taken from that Earldom, and swore to assist him in gaining England, and the other Dominions of his Brother. After this, John went over into England with an Army of French and Flemmings, had the Castles of Wallingford and Windsor surrender'd to him presently; and coming to London, requir'd the Archbishop of Rouen, and the other Commissioners for the Kingdom of England, to do Homage and Fealty to him; affirming, That his Brother was dead: But they not giving Credit to his Words, and denying his Desire, provok'd his Passions so much, that he fortified his Castles, and with Force of Arms invaded the Revenues and Lands of the Crown, finding many to joyn with him in the Attempt. The Queen-Mother, Justices of England, and all the King's faithful Subjects guard and defend the Ports against the Invasion of the French and Flemmings, who came over in great Numbers to aid and help Earl John, and more earnestly sought to redeem the King; for whose Ransome the Emperour requir'd an hundred thousand Marks, and to find fifty Galleys and two hundred Men to attend his Service in the Holy Wars for one Year. Nor did the Officers and Subjects of the King in France defend his Dominions in Normandy with less Courage and Fidelity against the King of France, who with all his Power labour'd to subdue them, and by large Offers to the Emperour to prolong his Redemption and enhance his Ransome: Yet such was the good Opinion that his Subjects had of him, and their Love they bear to him for his Valour and Piety, that by their Importunities they brought the Emperour to a Composition for his Freedom in this manner. 'That he should send 'his Commissioners to London, and receive an 'hundred thousand Marks of pure Silver of Cologn Weight, to be seal'd up and convey'd to the 'Bounds of the Empire at the Hazard and Charge 'of the King of England, and that seven Months 'after he should pay fifty thousand Marks more 'of Silver (of which twenty thousand were for 'the Duke of Austrich, and thirty thousand for 'the Emperour) and Hostages to be given in the 'mean time, sixty to the Emperour and seven 'to the Duke: And Richard swears to send his 'Niece, the Sister of Arthur Earl of Britain, to 'be married to the Duke of Austrich.' And on the other side, the Emperour granted to the King of England by his Charter the Sovereignty of Provence, Vienna, Viennoys, Marseilles, Narbon, Arls, Lyons, and all his Dominions in Burgogne, with the Homages of the King of Arragon, the Earls of Dijon and S. Gyles, in which Countries were five Archbishopricks and thirty three Bishopricks: And tho' the Emperour had only a Titular Dominion over those Provinces himself (for he never made any Governour over them) yet they did Richard this Service, that he seem'd not to part with so much Treasure for nothing. For which Reason it was, that he sent over into England to Hubert, the new Archbishop of Canterbury, who was lately made his Vicegerent in England, this News by his Letter wrote to him [b] in these Words. 'Being very sure, That you much desire our Deliverance, and will greatly rejoyce at it, we 'have thought fit to impart the joyful News of 'it, and to signifie to you, that the Emperour 'hath fix'd the day for it, to be upon Monday 'after the Feast of the Nativity; and the Sunday after we shall receive the Crown of the 'Kingdom of Provence, which he hath given us, 'as by his Letters Patents herewith sent you 'may perceive. us and desire our Promotion. Witness Our self at at Spira, 22. Sept. The Emperour also wrote at the same time to the Bishops and Barons, and other the King's Subjects in England, how he purpos'd to advance, and magnificently to honour his especial Friend their King: And thus were the English recompensed for the large Expences they had been at in redeeming their King. The King then sent for his Mother Queen Eleanor, Archbishop of Roan, and many others, to come unto him about the Time and Business of the Deliverance; for which there was imposed upon every Knight's Fee twenty Shillings, the fourth part of all Lay-mens Revenues and Clergy-mens, with a fourth part of their Goods. [a] The Chalices, and Treasure of all Churches, are taken to make up the Sum, and the like was done in all the King's Territories beyond Sea: So dearly did the King's Voyage into the East, in going and returning, cost his People. Nor did the Queen Berenguela escape her part of Affliction in this Journey; for she with her Sister-in-Law, the Queen Dowager of Sicily, fearing the Emperour's Malice, were an whole Year travelling from Palestine, and were at length conducted into Poictou.

The King of France hearing of the Conclusion made between King Richard and the Emperour, wrote immediately to Earl John, That the Devil was got loose, and desired him to look to himself; which shewed, That the King of France was not less disappointed of his Hopes, than Earl John himself. Upon this News, Earl John leaving his Castles in England well fortified, and encouraging his Soldiers to hold out valiantly against all Reports, departed into Normandy; where, with repeated Promises and Solicitations, he and the King of France labour'd to detain King Richard in Imprisonment, proffering the Emperour an hundred fifty thousand Marks, or a thousand Pound a Month so long as he would keep him his Prisoner. But all they could do prevailed not, tho' it stagger'd the Emperour in his Design a little; but at length, he shew'd Richard his Brother's Letter: And having receiv'd the Pledges, viz. the Archbishop of Roan, Bishop of Bath, and several Noblemens Sons, for the Security of that part of his Ransom, which was to remain unpaid, releas'd him from his Captivity, after a 1194. Year and six Weeks, in the fourth Year of his Reign, and deliver'd him to his Mother Queen Eleanor [b]. Immediately after his Release he return'd into England, where he found that the Bishops who continu'd firm in their Fidelity to him, had excommunicated the Earl John, and all his Adherents, and taken his Castles of Marlborough, Lancaster, and a Fort at S. Michael's Mount in Cornwall, defended by Henry de Pomeroy. But his Castle of Nottingham, tho' strongly assaulted by Ralph Earl of Chester, and Earl Ferrers, and the Castle of Tichil by the Bishop of Durham, held out for the Earl, and cost the King a great deal of Blood and Labour to reduce them into his Power; and that at last upon Condition, That their Persons and Goods should be saved, and all Acts of Disloyalty pardon'd.

A Parliament at Nottingham, and the Acts.

Richard having thus settled his Kingdom of England in Peace, call'd a Parliament at Nottingham, where Queen Eleanor was present, and sat upon his Right Hand [c]. On the first day of the Session he depriv'd Gerhard de Camvile of the Possession of the Castle of Lincoln, and his Office of Sheriff in that Shire, and Hugh Bardolph of the Castles of York and Scarborow, and the Custody of Westmorland, and his Office of Sheriff of Yorkshire, and expos'd them to Sale. The Archbishop of York bought the Sheriff's Office of Yorkshire for three thousand Marks down, and an Annual Rent of an hundred Marks. On the second day the King demanded Judgment against his Brother John, for having contrary to his Oath of Fealty, usurp'd his Castles, and enter'd a Confederacy with the King of France against him; as also against Hugh de Nevant, Bishop of Coventry, for adhering to him and his other Enemies; and it was determin'd, That they should both appear upon a day fix'd, to answer according to Law: Which if they refus'd to do, the Earl should be banish'd, and the Bishop undergo such Punishment both from the Clergy and Laity as his Crime deserv'd: But the Bishop, within two Years after, was restor'd to the King's Favour, and his Bishoprick for two thousand Marks. On the third day, the Parliament granted to the King two Shillings from every Plough-Land in England; and besides, the King requir'd a third part of the Service of every Knight's Fee for his Attendance in Normandy, and all the Wool that Year of the Cistercian Monks, which being a very grievous Tax to them, he compounded with them for it. The fourth and last day was spent in hearing and determining of Grievances and Accusations, and so this Assembly brake up, after a Resolution taken up, That to nullifie the Act done to the Emperour, he should be crown'd again, which accordingly was perform'd the Easter following at Winchester.

The King of Scots comes to King Richard.

Whilst the King remain'd about Nottingham, after the Parliament was broke up, William King of Scots came to him to require the Dignities and Honours, which his Predecessors had of Right enjoy'd in England, and withal the Counties of Northumberland, Westmorland and Lancaster. The King reply'd, 'That he could not satisfie him, till 'he had taken the Advice of his Council, which 'he intended shortly to call at Northampton. Where after Consultation had, he told him, 'That he could not grant his Petition with Rea'son then, because most of the Princes of Europe were his Enemies at that time; and if he 'should part with so much of his Country then, 'twould be thought rather an Act of Fear, than 'Love or Justice; and so put him off with fair Words and Promises, but granted by the Consent of his Parliament under his Charter to William King of Scots, and his Heirs for ever, 'That if 'at any time being summon'd, they should come 'to the King of England's Court, the Bishop of 'Durham, and Sheriff of Northumberland should 'receive them at the River Tweed, and bring 'them under safe Conduct to the River Teis, 'and from thence the Archbishop of York and 'Sheriff of Yorkshire should convey them through 'that County; and so the Sheriffs of other Shires, 'till they came to the King's Court, being al'low'd all along their Passage, and so at their re'turn an hundred Shillings a day, and when they 'were at the Court thirty Shillings a Day, 'twelve Loaves of fine Bread, and twelve Sim'nels of the King's; four Quarts of the King's 'best Wine, and six of ordinary Wine; two Pounds 'of Pepper, and four Pounds of Cinnamon;

From Northampton both Kings went to Woodſtock, and from thence to Wincheſter, where the Coronation was ſumptuouſly ſolemnized on the 17th of April, 1194. When the Ceremony [a] was over, he reſumed the two Manours he had ſold to the Biſhop of Wincheſter when he went to the Holy War, with the other Sales of the County and Caſtle, and all other the Demeſnes belonging to the Crown; alledging, That it was not in his power to alienate any of his Revenues, whereby his Dignity was to be maintain'd. The Biſhop of Durham obſerving this, voluntarily deliver'd up the Caſtle of Durham, with the Country of Northumberland, which the King order'd to put into the hands of Hugh Bardolph. Hugh Biſhop of Lincoln at the ſame time gave for the liberty of his Church a thouſand Marks of Silver, redeeming thereby the Cuſtom of giving to the King of England every Year a Cloak lined with Sabel Furs. Hither alſo were all ſuch as had ſided with his Brother John, and defended his Caſtles, ſummon'd to appear; of whom the Richer were fined, and the Poorer ſort ſet at liberty, but by giving Sureties of an hundred Marks a-piece to appear in the King's Courts whenever they ſhould be call'd. The King of Scots ſeeing the King of England make uſe of all means to bring Money into his Treaſure, offer'd him fifteen thouſand Marks for Northumberland, with the Appurtenances; alledging, That King Henry II. gave the ſame to Henry his Father, and that Malcolm after him enjoy'd it five Years. This large proffer of Money tempted King Richard ſo, that he conſulted his Parliament about it again; and in concluſion was contented to yield it to the King of Scots, with a Reſervation of the Caſtles to himſelf; but the King of Scots would not accept it, and ſo in a diſcontent paſſed into his own Country. Richard two Years after ſent Hubert Walter, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to York to treat with the King of Scots about a Marriage between Otho [b] his Nephew, and Margaret that King's Daughter, with whom he was to give all Lenox for her Dower; and he would give with his Nephew Northumberland, and the Earldom of Carliſle, with all the Caſtles: But in the time of this Treaty the Queen of Scots being found to be with Child, it took no effect. From Wincheſter, after the King had gotten as much Money as he could out of his Subjects in ſo ſhort a time as he ſtay'd, which was but from the end of February to the tenth of May [c], he haſted over into Normandy, in an hundred Ships, to ſpend it in his Atchievements there, which took up all the remaining part of his Reign, which was but nine Years in all, of which he ſpent not above eight Months in England. Nor do we find that his Queen Berenguela was ever there, or had any Honour or Dower, or was of any great Regard with him, however Deſerving ſhe was in her ſelf.

And now by the King's Reſidence in Normandy was the Charge and Labour of the Engliſh much greaten'd; all Affairs, which either concern'd the State in general, or the People in particular, being to be diſpatched there. The firſt Action that Richard undertook at his entrance into his Territories there, was to relieve Vernoul, then beſieged by the King of France, which he ſoon raiſed, and by the Mediation of his Mother was reconciled to his Brother John, who abjured the French Party, and adhered to him. His next buſineſs was to ſtrengthen himſelf in thoſe Countries againſt his potent Enemy the King of France, which he did firſt by giving his Siſter Joanna, Queen-Dowager of Sicily, to Raymund Earl of Tholouſe, who was his neareſt Neighbour of Power to his Dutchy of Guien. Then he made a League with Baldwin Earl of Flanders, from whom the King of France had taken away Artois and Vermandois; and ſo on all ſides ſeeks to vex his Enemy. Four Years at leaſt did theſe two great Princes continue their furious Aſſaults one againſt another, invading, ſurprizing, ſpoiling and ruining each other's Eſtates and Dominions; making ſhews indeed often of Peace and Reconciliation by frequent Leagues and Truces, but they laſted no longer than ſome Advantages offer'd of either ſide. The King of France, on the other ſide, to ſtrengthen himſelf with Shipping, that he might oppoſe the Engliſh, marry'd Botilda the Siſter of Canute or Knute King of Denmark; but this Match, which he ſought not through Affection, but for his Politick Ends, created him greater Trouble; for he put her away the next Day after his Wedding, upon a pretence of too great nearneſs of Blood, and ſo made both the Church, and King of Denmark his Enemy. The Emperor at the ſame time ſent to the King of England a maſſy Crown of Gold, and offers to aſſiſt him againſt the King of France, and invade his Kingdom; but Richard was not willing to have him engage in this Quarrel, either becauſe he ſaw that the Emperor ſought to add the Kingdom of France to his Empire, or becauſe he fear'd the King of France might win him over to him by his Money to joyn againſt himſelf, return'd only a Compliment of Thanks for his Tender.

His means of raiſing Money.

But tho' Normandy was the Stage of Action, England was the Treaſury, from whence the King fetch'd Monies for all his vaſt Expences; which to ſupply, he ſought all manner of ways of raiſing Taxes and Fines upon the People [d]. And firſt he gave out his Commiſſion to certain Itinerant Juſtices, whom he ſent into every Shire of England, 'to raiſe and exact Sums of Money upon Pleas of the Crown for Eſcheats, Wardſhips, and Marriages, to improve his Demeſnes, to take an account of Men's Eſtates, and eſpecially of the Jews, on whom he would have none to prey but himſelf; to raiſe an Impoſition upon his allowance of Turnaments, viz. twenty Marks of Silver for every Earl, ten for a Baron, four for a Knight having Lands, and two for a Licenſe for ſuch as had none; the Collection of which the Archbiſhop left to his Brother Theobald Walters. He order'd alſo a new Seal to be made, becauſe the old one was loſt by his Vice-Chancellor at the taking of Cyprus, which was a means for another Exaction. But the Proceedings in the Pleas of the Crown, and extorting of Penalties, Anno Regni 9. by Hugh Bardolph, [b] Otho Duke of Saxony.

[c] He landed the 13th of March, and ſail'd from Portſmouth the 12th of May.
[d] He return'd into England to raiſe this Tax for Turnaments. Matt. Paris. But his Charter or Proclamation for them is dated at Ville Le Veſke in Normandy. Theſe Tiltings were to be held at five Places:
In Wiltſhire, between Salisbury and Wilton.
In Warwickſhire, between Warwick and Kenelworth.
In Lincolnſhire, between Stamford and Warnsford.
In Northamptonſhire, between Brackly and Mixburgh,

Roger

A. D. 1195. Reg. 5. Roger Arundel, and Jeffrey Hatchet, Itinerant Justices for Lincolnſhire, Nottinghamſhire, Darbyſhire, Yorkſhire, Northumberland, Cumberland, and Lancaſter, were intolerable, being manag'd with gradual Tryals of the People's Patience and Abilities. So that (as Hoveden ſaith) all England, from Sea to Sea, was reduced to extream Poverty. Yet did not his Extortion ſtop here; but Hugh Nevile Chief Juſtice, Hugh Wac and Erniſe de Nevile Juſtices of the Foreſt brought a greater Trouble upon the Subjects, by the ſevere Execution of the cruel Foreſt-Laws introduced by the Conqueror; which, being only fit to be damn'd to eternal Oblivion, ſhall not be particularly mention'd. Beſides in the ſame Year this King impoſed a Tax upon every Hide, or Plough-land, (which contains about an hundred Acres) of five Shillings, which was levy'd with great Cruelty. Likewiſe he required by his Vicegerent, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, That the People of England ſhould find three hundred Knights for one Year in his Service, or ſo much Money as would maintain them at three Shillings a Day: Which Hugh Biſhop of Lincoln oppoſed, and ſaid, 'He would 'never yield to the King's Will in this, becauſe 'of the Damage it might bring to Poſterity by 'ſo ill an Example, which might give them cauſe 'to complain, and ſay, Our Fathers have eaten 'four Grapes, and the Childrens Teeth are ſet on 'Edge, and turning himſelf to the Archbiſhop, de'ſired him to do nothing, of which he might after'ward be aſhamed. But the Archbiſhop could deſert this, and yet pretend to have well merited of the King for his other Services in this kind; for in the ſeventh Year of his Reign, he gave up an account to him, that he had levy'd of the Kingdom within the ſpace of two Years an hundred thouſand Marks of Silver, which at that time was an admirable Sum.

The King's Death, and the Occaſion.

And now, as the firſt Act of this King was his violent Proceedings with Stephen Turnham Seneſchal of Normandy, his Father's Treaſurer, about his Treaſure: So was likewiſe his laſt, and the cauſe of his Deſtruction; for Widamore Viſcount of Limoges[a], having found a great Treaſure of Silver and Gold in his Ground, ſends a great part of it to the King, but he refuſed it, laying claim to the whole; Widamore deny'd it. And ſo the King laid Siege to the Caſtle[b], where he imagin'd the Treaſure was hid. They in the Caſtle being unable to defend themſelves, offer'd to ſurrender the ſame, upon Condition, that their Lives, Arms and Members ſhould be ſecured; which the King would not yield to, but ſwore that he would 1199. ſtorm the Caſtle, and hang them all: Whereupon they deſperately reſolved to ſtand to their defence. King Richard, with Merchard, alias Markadey, General of the Brabanzons, his mercenary Soldiers, going about the Caſtle to obſerve what place was fitteſt for an Aſſault, Bertram de Gurdon from the Walls ſhot a Barbed Arrow at the King, and gave him a mortal Wound on the Arm. The King was immediately carry'd to his Lodgings, but gave Commandment to his Forces to proſecute the Siege without Intermiſſion, which they did; and taking the Caſtle, put all the Defenders of it to Death, except Bertram, who was reſerved by the King's Command. The Arrow was drawn out with great Torture, and much mangling of his Fleſh, by an unſkilful Chyrurgeon belonging to Merchard, which cauſed him to deſpair of Life[c], and by Will to diſpoſe of his Eſtate, three parts to his Brother John, and one to his Servants[d]. Before his Death he call'd for Bertram de Gurdon to be brought to him, and demanded of him, what hurt he had done him, which provoked him to do him this Miſchief? Bertram replied, 'Thou didſt kill my Father and two Bro'thers with thy own Hand, and now ordereſt me 'to be ſlain: Take what Revenge thou wilt up'on me, I willingly endure any Torment thou 'canſt inflict, ſince I have ſlain thee, who haſt 'done ſuch, and ſo much miſchief to the World. The King, notwithſtanding this rough and deſperate Anſwer, cauſed him to be ſet at liberty, not only forgiving him for his Fact, but commanding an hundred Shillings to be given him; but Merchard after his Death cauſed him to be flay'd alive, and afterward hang'd[e]. Thus dy'd this Lion-like King, when he had Reigned nine Years and nine Months[f]; wherein he exacted and conſumed more of the Wealth of this Kingdom than all his Predeceſſors from the Norman Conqueſt had done, and yet with very little Noiſe and Trouble, becauſe of his undertaking of the Cauſe of Chriſt (as it was then eſteemed) in the Holy War; the Clergy feeding the People's Opinion of the Merit of that Expedition with ſtrange Relations both of his Valour and Succeſs; and his Miniſters at home being very careful and zealous for him to keep their place, and ſo doing perhaps more for him in his abſence than he could have done with his preſence. But the inſolent Oppreſſions of the Nation in theſe Times made the future more careful and audacious to provide for themſelves: Exceſſes uſually procure Alterations. So that his Succeſſors have reaſon to blame his and his Brother's Oppreſſions and Irregularities for thoſe Limitations of their Power, which have been extorted rather from them, than voluntarily granted by them. Yet what this Prince would have been, had his Days been prolong'd to a time of Peace, is uncertain: But that his Temper was very pliable and yielding to good Counſel, is manifeſt from the good effect that little which a poor Hermit beſtow'd upon him wrought; adviſing him in a Sermon to think ſeriouſly upon the Deſtruction of Sodom, and to abſtain from things unlawful, otherwiſe the deſerved Vengeance of God would come upon him. For not long after falling ſick, he call'd to mind this Advertiſement, and made a Vow to reform his Life; which after his recovery he was ſo careful to perform, that he roſe early every Morning to hear Divine Service. Upon which Action Hoveden makes this Reflection: How Glorious is it for a Prince to begin his Actions in him, who is the Beginning without beginning, and judges to the ends of the Earth. Moreover he grew very Charitable to the Poor, and made Reſtitution of many of the Church's Goods, which had been ſold for his own Ranſom.

Tho' this King had no Children[g], yet was he told by a Prieſt in France, that he had three evil Daughters, and admoniſh'd to beſtow them elſewhere, that he might avoid the Judgments of God. The King gave him the Lye, and said, He knew none he had. Yes, Sir, replied the Priest, Three Daughters you have, which are these, Pride, Covetousness, and Letchery. The King apprehending his Meaning, call'd the Lords and great Persons who were attending upon him, and having told them what the Priest had said to him, requir'd them to bear Witness how he did dispose of his three Daughters. My Pride I give to the Templars and Hospitallers, my Covetousness I give to the Cestercian Monks, and my Letchery to the Clergy [a]. ## REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES in the Reign of Richard I.

IN the 2d Year of his Reign, on Midsummer-Eve, the Sun was eclips'd for three Hours, and the Stars appear'd in the Heavens at ten a Clock in the Forenoon.

In the 5th, 6th, and 7th Years of his Reign there was so great a Dearth in England and France, that a Quarter of Wheat was sold for almost twenty Shillings, as much as six Pound now; which was follow'd by a severe Mortality, that carry'd off innumerable Multitudes of People by a Pestilential Fever. It lasted five Months, and during that time, the dead were bury'd in Pits a great many at once; for they dy'd so fast, that those who surviv'd had not Leisure to bury them singly. About Whitsunday two Suns appear'd, the true Sun and another, and were so like each other, that the Astronomers were forc'd to take a View of them with their Instruments to distinguish them.

Men Eminent in his Time for their Courage were

The most Famous for Learning were

THE LIFE and REIGN OF King JOHN.

JOHN, the Brother of Richard, and youngest Son of Henry the Second, being at his Brother's Death with his Army in the Field, and among all his Servants and Followers, had as good an Opportunity as he could have desir'd to secure his ambitious Aims of the Crown of England, by making his Interests with them; which he did by large Promises of Gifts and Rewards. Hubert, Archbishop of Canterbury, was then in Normandy about some Business, and John knowing him to be a Man of great Power and Interest in England, engages him to his Design, and presently dispatches him into England with William Marshall Earl of Striguil, Jeffrey Fitz-Peter [b], and others, to prepare the People to receive him for their King. These Agents [c] for John, upon their Arrival, began to treat with those whom they knew were most likely to oppose his Aim; and by their confident Promises, That he should restore their Rights, and govern the Kingdom with all due Moderation, so prevail'd with them, that they were content upon those Conditions to swear Fealty to him against all Men, and so an Entrance to the Crown was cleared for him A. among the Engliſh; which becauſe they ſaw the King of Scots only could intercept and hinder, they ſend him word, That upon John's Settlement in the Throne, he ſhould receive Satisfaction for his Claim in England, and ſo ſtopp'd him from any preſent Attempts. In the mean time, Arthur [a] Earl of Anjou, Son of John's elder Brother Jeffrey, who had the Right of Succeſſion by his Birth, was not unactive with the Nobility of Anjou, Main, and Tureine, to maintain and recover his Inheritance: And his Mother Conſtance put him under the Protection of the King of France, who receiv'd him, and undertook the Defence of his Right. John was not inſenſible of the Cloud that was gathering over his Head; and tho' he had reaſon to fear a violent Storm from it, yet judging it beſt to ſecure the Poſſeſſion of England firſt, he having receiv'd the Inveſtiture of Normandy with all the Rites of it, paſſed preſently into England with his Mother Eleanor (who was a forward Aſſiſtant in this her Son's Promotion) and by way of Election, receiv'd the Crown upon Aſcenſion-Day, the 26th of May, at the hands of Hubert Archbiſhop of Canterbury; who in his Oration (as M. Paris relates it) before the Aſſembly of Nobles met at that Solemnity ſaid, 'That by all Reaſon Divine 'and Humane, none ought to ſucceed in the 'Kingdom, but he who for his Vertue and Worthineſs was unanimouſly choſen by the State, 'as this Man was, &c. which he then urg'd to put a fair Pretence upon that Action, becauſe he ſaw the Right of Succeſſion was againſt him; but after being queſtion'd for it, he confeſs'd to his Friends, 'That he foreſaw, that John would 'in the end obtain the Crown, whatever Blood 'and Trouble it coſt; and therefore he thought 'it the beſt way to prevent Confuſion, rather 'to make him King than that he ſhould make 'himſelf, and that their Election would be a 'tie upon him to rule them well. Thus did John get the Crown of England, which he govern'd with as much Injuſtice as he got it, and involv'd the Kingdom in thoſe Miſeries and Troubles, which after produced deſperate Effects, and made thoſe Alterations in Government, which follow'd.

John goes againſt Philip King of France.

England being thus ſecur'd, John returns into Normandy, having receiv'd Information of a general Revolt of his Dominions beyond Sea, procur'd by Philip the French King, who had conferr'd the Order of Knighthood upon Arthur, and taken his Homage for Anjou, Poictou, Main, Tureine, and alſo Normandy it ſelf, becauſe (as he pretended) King John had neglected to come and do him Homage for the ſame. King John being unwilling to engage in ſo ſudden a War, ſo ſoon after his new and doubtful Admiſſion to the Crown, mediated for a Parley with the King of France, but to no purpoſe; for that King well underſtanding his own Advantage, and John's Circumſtances, requir'd ſuch unreaſonable Conditions, as John could not with Honour comply with, and ſo they proceeded to decide the Quarrel with the Sword. The King of France had the better of John, and gain'd ſeveral Parts of his Dominions; but it was ſo plain that what he did was for himſelf, not for Arthur, as he pretended, that Arthur and his Mother Conſtance were induc'd (by the Perſuaſion of their Chief Miniſter William de la Roche) to commit themſelves to the Protection of King John. But neither here could they find a ſafe Repoſe; for either through ſome ſecret Jealouſie, or (as ſome ſay) having Information of John's Purpoſes to impriſon them, they got away the next Night after their coming ſecretly, and fled to Algiers. And ſo this young Prince, born to be cruſh'd between theſe two Potent Monarchs, (who only intended their own Ends and not his Advantage) gave an occaſion to both to become his Enemies. The two Kings continu'd their Conteſt a while, but having made many Attempts on both ſides with little Gain, they by the Mediation of the Pope's Legates came to a Treaty, wherein John buys his Peace upon theſe yielding Conditions; viz. That Lewis, the eldeſt Son to King Philip, ſhould marry his Niece Blanch, Daughter of Alphonſo King of Caſtile, and have with her for her Dower the City and County of Eureux, with ſeveral Caſtles in Normandy, and thirty thouſand Marks in Silver; And farther promiſes, To leave him all his Territories in France, if he dy'd without Iſſue; and that he would not aſſiſt his Nephew Otho (lately elected Emperour) againſt Philip Brother to the late Emperour Henry VI. whom the King of France favour'd in Oppoſition to Pope Innocent, who took Otho's part.

A Peace concluded between the Kings of France and England.

After the Concluſion of this Peace, Otho taking it ill that his Uncle John had thus forſaken him, ſends his two Brothers Henry Duke of Saxony and William of Winton (ſo call'd, becauſe he was born at Wincheſter) to require of him the City of Eureux and County of Poictou, and two parts of the Treaſure, which his Uncle King Richard had given him by Will, beſides other of his Moveables: But they came too late. The Obligations of Kindred, and rendring of Dues, muſt give place to the preſent Neceſſities and Intereſts of State, and ſo they are ſent away without any Anſwer to their Deſires. To this unkind and unnatural Act he ſoon after added another, viz. The Divorce of his Wife, who was Daughter to the Earl of Gloceſter; alledging, that ſhe was too near a Kin to him in the third Degree of Conſanguinity, and marry'd Iſabel the Daughter and Heireſs of the Earl of Angoliſme, who was before affianced to Hugh le Brun Earl of March, (a Peer of a great Eſtate and Alliance in France) by the Conſent of King Richard, in whoſe Cuſtody ſhe then was. Having finiſh'd theſe diſtaſtful Buſineſſes, he return'd into England to do as ungrateful things there; for he impos'd three Shillings upon every Plough-land, to diſcharge the great Dowry of thirty thouſand Mark which he had promis'd with his Niece Blanch. Jeffrey the Archbiſhop of York oppos'd the Collection of it within his Province, and the King being before angry with him for not coming upon his Summons to his Treaty in France, immediately cauſes the Sheriff of the County of York to ſeize upon all his Temporalties. The Archbiſhop interdicts the whole Province of York, and excommunicates the Sheriff. But not long after, the King made his Progreſs into the Northern Parts as far as Scotland, exacting great Fines of ſuch as had offended in his Foreſts, and in his Paſſage through Yorkſhire, was by his Brother the Archbiſhop deny'd Wine, and the Honours of the Bells of Beverly; but by the Mediation of four Biſhops and four Barons, and a great Sum of Money, a Reconciliation was made between them, and a Reformation promis'd on both ſides.

of that See, and there he ſummon'd the Earls and Barons of England to be ready with Horſe and Armour to go over with him at Whitſuntide into Normandy; but they meeting at a Conference at Leiceſter, with one conſent ſent him word, That unleſs he would reſtore them to their Rights and Liberties, they would not attend him out of the Kingdom. But the King (ſaith Hoveden) uſing ill Counſels, took their Caſtles from them; and beginning with William de Aubenie, demanded his Caſtle of Beauvoir, which he refuſed, delivering him his Son as a Pledge of his Obedience. But notwithſtanding this Refuſal of his Lords, having ſettled the Government here, he ſailed into Normandy with his Queen, where his Preſence, with his great ſhew of Preparations, cauſed the Rebels to give over their Attempts for that time; and a farther Ratification of the Peace, with as ſtrong Covenants and Cautions as could be deviſed, was made with Philip King of France; who thereupon feaſted the King of England at Paris with all outward Demonſtrations of real Friendſhip. And here both Kings, being ſollicited to it by the Pope's Legate, granted a Subſidy of the fortieth part of all their Subjects Revenues for one Year (by way of Alms) for the Relief the Chriſtians in the Holy Land; for the levying whereof Jeffrey Fitz-Peter, then Chief Juſtice, ſent out his Writs by way of Requeſt and Perſuaſion, avoiding in it all Terms of Coaction or Due, leſt it ſhould be drawn into a Preſident afterward.

Not many Months after this a Conſpiracy broke out, which was begun and carry'd on by Hugh le Brun, who being greatly incenſed at the taking away his Wife (a Wrong which makes the deepeſt Impreſſion on Man's Nature) joyn'd with Duke Arthur, the Barons of Poictou and Britain, and they made a ſtrong Party againſt him. The King of France (notwithſtanding all the former Obligations of Amity) combined with them out of hopes of Intereſt, declared himſelf for Arthur, to whom he marry'd his youngeſt Daughter, requires King John to deliver to him all his Territories in France, and upon a certain Day to appear in Perſon at Paris to anſwer ſuch Accuſations as ſhould be brought againſt him, and abide the Judgment of his Court; which John refuſing, was by Sentence of Court adjudged to loſe all that he held of that Crown. Then were his Dominions aſſaulted on all ſides, by the King of France in Normandy, by Prince Arthur and the Barons in Anjou, who laid Siege to his Caſtle in Mirabel, defended by Eleanor the Queen-Mother; but near taking, when John, with greater Force and Expedition than was expected, came and defeated the whole Army of the Beſiegers, taking Arthur, Hugh le Brun, the Barons of Poictou, and above two hundred Knights, and Men of Command, Priſoners; all which he carry'd away bound in Carts, and diſperſed into ſeveral Caſtles both in Normandy and England. This Victory, which might ſeem to have Eſtabliſh'd him in his Throne, was his Undoing; for by the ill uſe of it he loſt himſelf and his Reputation for ever. For Prince Arthur was ſhortly after (by his means, as was thought) murther'd[a] in Priſon, and many of the Priſoners and Hoſtages cruelly executed; which ſo exaſperated the Nobility of Britain, Anjou, and Poictou, that they took up Arms againſt him, appealed for Juſtice to the King of France, and ſummon'd him to appear in his Court; which he refuſing, he was condemned to loſe his Dutchy of Normandy, which his Anceſtors had held three hundred Years, and all his other Dominions in France, which either through his own Negligence, or Treachery of his Miniſters, who were diſaffected to him, was brought about, and he wholly diſpoſſed of them[b].

In this miſerable Condition he returns into England, and charges the Lords and Barons with his Loſſes in France, and fines them to pay the ſeventh part of all their Goods for refuſing their Aſſiſtance, not ſparing the Church it ſelf. Hubert Archbiſhop of Canterbury exacted this rigorous Tax of the Clergy, and Jeffrey Fitz-Peter Chief Juſtice of England of the Laity. But all this Treaſure was not ſufficient to ſupply his Wants, and furniſh him with Aſſiſtance to recover his Loſſes, (which was the end of raiſing it) and therefore in leſs than a Year he was forced to call a Parliament[c] at Oxford, to obtain in a more ſatisfactory way another Tax, and by it got a Grant of two Marks and an half upon every Knight's Fee for a Military Aid, and a proportionable Contribution of the Clergy. But no ſooner was this Money gather'd, but an Occaſion was offer'd of ſpending it in France, that devouring Gulph of the Engliſh Treaſure, by a Revolt begun in Britain by Guido, the Huſband of Conſtance, Arthur's Mother, Saveri de Malleon, and Almaric Luſignian, with many other Confederates; who not receiving that Satisfaction they expected from their new Maſter, call'd in the old one again; ſhewing us, that only Men's private Intereſts ſway their Affections, though they often pretend Honour and Juſtice. King John hearing of it, haſted over into Normandy, and by the Forces he carry'd and found there, won the Caſtle of Mont-alban, and a little after the City of Angiers, and was in a fair way of recovering more; but the King of France, by the Fortune of one Day, (wherein he overthrew and took Priſoners the chief Confederates, Guido, Almeric, and Saveri) forced him to accept of a Truce for two Years, and return into England for more Supplies, which he took his old methods to obtain, by impoſing a Tax of the thirteenth part of every Man's Moveables, and others Goods, both of the Clergy and Laity. But his Subjects now ſeeing their Eſtates conſumed without ſucceſs, and likely to be a continual Prey to his extravagant Deſigns, began to bethink themſelves of recovering their ancient Immunities, which had been uſurped by their late Kings, and eaſe themſelves of thoſe Burthens indirectly laid upon them. The Archbiſhop of York was the firſt Man that began the Quarrel between the King and his Subjects, by oppoſing the Collection of the Impoſition, and ſolemnly Curſing the Receivers of it; and then conveyed himſelf out of the Kingdom, chooſing rather to live in Baniſhment abroad, than under Oppreſſion at home. And here began the miſerable Breach between the King and his People, which coſt more Noble Blood to make up again than all the foreign Wars ſince the Conqueſt. For this Conteſt (tho' it had ſeveral Intermiſſions) did not fully ceaſe till the Great Charter (which was firſt obtain'd of this King John, and confirm'd by his Son Henry III.

[a] It is not certain that Prince Arthur was murther'd, tho' perhaps King John was charg'd with it: Kings themſelves, if not lov'd, can't eſcape foul Aſperſions. Arthur was King John's Priſoner of War, and ſuch an one as it ſeems Adverſity could not humble; for when the King in Priſon promis'd him his Favour, if he would renounce his Amity with the King of France, and live peaceably, he was ſo far from compliance, that he threaten'd him; which oblig'd the King to keep him in ſtraighter Impriſonment. And Matt. Paris ſays, To eſcape this tedious Confinement, he ventur'd to ſwim over the River Seine, and was drown'd. Others write, that he dy'd of Grief.

A. D. 1207. Reg. 9. but was never obſerved by either) was freely ratified by that Judidious King, Edward I. in the the 27th Year of his Reign, which was above eighty Years after. This was the firſt Civil Diſſention between the King and his Nobles that we find upon Record ſince the Eſtabliſhment of the Engliſh Kingdom; and to underſtand the Cauſes and Occaſions of it, I ſhall take a View of the poſture of Affairs at that time.

The Norman Nobility.

It was about an hundred and forty Years ſince William the Conqueror planted the Norman Nobility here, whoſe Poſterity being now become meer Engliſh, were at this time very Numerous, Rich, and of great Spirits, being exerciſed in the Wars of France, where moſt of them were Commanders of Caſtles, and had great Eſtates, as well as in England. But being under this violent and unſucceſsful King depriv'd both of their Employments and Eſtates abroad, they contriv'd all they could to preſerve what they had left, and enrich themſelves at home; which, becauſe they could not do ſo long as they were perpetually haraſſed at the King's Will, they reſolv'd to make uſe of their own Martial Courage, and the Privileges of the Nation to do it. Their Cauſe was much better than their Proſecution of it, which filled all things with Injuſtice and Diſorder. The ſtrange Corruption of the Times contributed much to the Miſchief. An ambitious Clergy, polluted with Avarice, brought in a feigned Piety to be a Party in it. The Occaſion of their Interpoſition in this Affair began about the Election of a new Archbiſhop of Canterbury after the Death of Hubert, after this manner: The Monks of that Convent pretending, that it belong'd to them by their ancient Privileges to elect an Archbiſhop, met in the Night, and choſe one Reginald their Sub-prior, on purpoſe to prevent the King's Nomination, and taking an Oath of Secrecy of him, diſpatch'd him to Rome to be inſtall'd. But his great Joy for his Preferment ſoon brake out, and his Election was openly diſcover'd at his arrival in Flanders; which the Monks hearing, and fearing the King's Diſpleaſure, they ſent to crave leave to elect a fit Perſon for their See. The King thereupon nominates to them John Gray Biſhop of Norwich, whom he favour'd much, and perſuaded them to prefer; which, after long Debate, they yielded to: And ſo John Gray was advanced to the Chair, wherein (ſaith Matt. Paris) their laſt Error was worſe than their firſt; and began that Conteſt, which proved an irreparable Damage to the whole Kingdom.

Both Elections null'd, and Stephen Langton choſen by the Pope.

This Election being made, the King ſends to Rome ſome of the Monks of Canterbury (among whom was Elias de Branfield, a truſty Servant of the King's) with a plentiful Proviſion for their Journey, to obtain the Pope's Confirmation of it. The Suffragan Biſhops of the Church of Canterbury ſent alſo their Complaints againſt the Monks, for Electing without their Concurrence, which by Right and Cuſtom they ought to have; alledging, that three Archbiſhops had been by them elected. The Monks oppoſed their Allegation, and offer'd to bring proof, that they only, by the ſpecial Privilege of the Roman See, were accuſtom'd to elect. The Pope appointed a certain Day for the deciding of this Controverſie; and upon hearing of both ſides fully, pronounced both Elections void, by the advice of the Cardinals; the firſt, becauſe it was made in the Nignt, and not in a fit Seaſon; and the other, becauſe the firſt, tho' irregular, was not juridically made null: And then propounded unto the Monks a third Man, which was Stephen de Langton, an Engliſh-man born, and a Cardinal of an high Spirit, whom he perſuaded them to elect; alledging, that it was in their power by his Prerogative to make good his Choice. Stephen Langton being thus choſen, and after conſecrated at Viterbo, the Pope diſmiſſes the Monks and the King's Agents with Letters to King John, exhorting him to receive this Archbiſhop favourably, who was canonically Elected, a Native of his Kingdom, a Doctor of Divinity, and Learned in all the Sciences, and which exceeded his Learning, of a good Life and Converſation, every way fit to hold ſo great a Place, &c. He wrote alſo to the Prior and Monks of Canterbury, charging them by Virtue of their holy Obedience to receive the Archbiſhop for their Paſtor, and obey him in all Spiritual and Temporal Matters. The Letters being brought to the King, with an account of what had been done at Rome, ſo enraged him, that in heat of Paſſion he ſent Fulke de Cantlo [a], and Henry de Cornhill, two fierce Knights, with ſome armed Men, to expel the Monks of Canterbury, as Traytors, out of the Kingdom, and ſeize upon all they had, which was as hotly Executed as Commanded, and the Prior and all the Monks fled into Flanders, (except ſuch as were not able through Sickneſs to remove.)

John offended at the Pope's Election, writes to him.

Then he wrote a ſharp Letter to the Pope, 'accuſing him, that he had done him wrong in 'making the Election of the Biſhop of Norwich 'void, being a Man he greatly favour'd, and advancing Stephen Langton, a Perſon unknown to 'him, and bred up in the Kingdom of France, 'among his Enemies; and which was more to 'his Prejudice, and againſt the Prerogative of his 'Crown, he had preferr'd him without his conſent, which ſhould firſt have been required. 'So that he much wonder'd, that the Pope and 'Court of Rome ſo little valued his Friendſhip; 'and did not conſider, that his Kingdom of England yielded them more advantage than any 'Kingdom on this ſide the Alps. He alſo added, 'That he would vindicate the Liberties of his 'Crown to Death, and would not recede from 'the Election of the Biſhop of Norwich, whom 'he knew every way fit for the Place. And in 'the Concluſion threatens, that if he were not 'gratified in the Premiſſes, he would hinder all 'reſort to the Court of Rome; and that, if Neceſſity required, he had in his Kingdom of England, and his other Dominions, Archbiſhops, 'Biſhops, and other Prelates, of ſo great Learning as could do the buſineſs of his Nation, without going to beg Juſtice of Strangers.

The Pope's Anſwer to the King.

The Pope having received this Letter from the King, return'd anſwer to it, beginning with theſe words: 'Whereas we wrote to you concerning 'the buſineſs of the Church of Canterbury, exhorting and perſuading you, humbly, earneſtly, 'and mildly; you have written again to us (as 'I may with your leave ſay) in a contumacious 'manner, reproving and threatning us; and tho' 'we took care to give you more than your Right, 'you have not been careful to give us ours; reſpecting us leſs than becomes you: And if your 'Devotion be moſt neceſſary for us, ours is no 'leſs fit for you. And whereas we have honour'd 'no Prince ſo much as you, you have derogated 'from our Honour more than any other Prince 'in the like Caſe would have done; alledging 'certain frivolous Pretences, why you can't conſent to the Election of our beloved Son Stephen 'Langton, Cardinal of S. Chryſogonus, made by 'the Monks of Canterbury, becauſe he hath been 'bred among your Enemies, and his Perſon is 'altogether unknown to you. To which he re-

'plies: That it was for his Reputation, not his 'Fault, that he had liv'd ſo long at Paris, where 'he had made ſo great Progreſs in his Studies as 'to be created a Doctor not only of the Learned 'Sciences but of Divinity; and for his Life, 'agreeable to his Learning, obtain'd a Prebend 'at Paris. Wherefore he could not but wonder, 'that a Man of ſo great note, and a Native of 'his Kingdom ſhould be unknown to him, at 'leaſt in Fame; eſpecially ſince (ſaith he) you 'have written thrice unto him, ſince he hath 'been made a Cardinal by us, aſſuring him, 'That tho' you had a Deſire to call him to your 'familiar Attendance, yet you rejoiced that he 'was exalted to an higher Office. Then he 'makes an Excuſe to the King, that his Conſent 'was not requir'd; Altho' (ſaith he) in Elections 'celebrated at the Apoſtolick See, the Conſent 'of Princes is not to be expected, yet were two 'Monks deputed to go unto you to aſk your 'Conſent, who were ſtopp'd at Dover, ſo that 'they could not deliver the Meſſage enjoyn'd 'them, with many other things. So that at 'length (ſaith he) we reſolv'd to do, as the Ca-'nonical Sanctions order'd, without declining to 'the Right Hand or to the Left; that there 'might be no farther Delays to our pious De-'ſigns, leſt the Lord's Flock ſhould be without 'Paſtoral Cure, and therefore it can't be revok'd. And in the Concluſion he uſeth theſe words; 'As we have had more Reſpect to your Honour, 'than we were oblig'd in Duty, do you give us 'that Honour which is our Due, that you may 'deſerve God's Favour and ours; leſt by doing 'otherwiſe, you bring your ſelf into ſo great 'Troubles, as can't eaſily be remov'd. For he 'in the end muſt overcome, to whom all Knees 'bow both in Heaven and Earth and Hell, whoſe 'Vicegerency here below we (tho' unworthy) 'do exerciſe: Yield not therefore to their Coun-'ſels, who deſire to involve you in Confuſions, 'that themſelves may fiſh in troubled Waters, 'but ſubmit your ſelf to our Pleaſure, which 'will tend to your Praiſe and Honour. Neither 'is it ſafe for you to oppoſe God and the Church, 'for which the Bleſſed Martyr and Eminent Bi-'ſhop Thomas lately dy'd; eſpecially ſince your 'Father and Brother, of Glorious Memory, late 'Kings of England, have by the hands of the 'Legates of the Apoſtolick See, abjur'd that 'impious Cuſtom: We, if you behave your ſelf 'well, will ſufficiently take care, that no Pre-'judice ſhall ariſe to you, or yours hereby. 'Dated at the Lateran in the 10th Year of our 'Pontificate. Thus did theſe two great and powerful Princes defend their Prerogatives with Words: But when the Pope underſtood with what Severity the King had proceeded againſt the Monks of Canterbury, he ſends preſently his Mandate to the Biſhops of London, Ely and Worceſter, commanding them to treat firſt mildly with the King, and exhort him to reform his Actions; but if he obſtinately perſiſted, to interdict the whole Kingdom, and if that would not prevail, he would deal more ſeverely with him himſelf: And withal, charged the Suffragan Biſhops of the Province of Canterbury, by Virtue of their Obedience, to receive their Archbiſhop Stephen, and to obey him with all Reſpect. The Biſhops, according to the Pope's Injunction, went to the King, and ſhewing him the Pope's Mandate, beſought him, 'For the Love 'of God, to recall the Archbiſhop and Monks 'of Canterbury, and to uſe them with Kindneſs 'and Reſpect, that he might avoid the Trouble 'of an Interdiction, &c. The King interrupting the Biſhops Speech, broke out into a violent Paſſion againſt the Pope and Cardinals, ſwearing by God's Teeth[a], 'That if they or any other 'ſhould dare to put the Kingdom under Interdi-'ction, he would ſend all the Clergy of England 'immediately to the Pope and confiſcate their 'Goods: And if any Perſon ſent from Rome for 'that end were found in any part of the Land, 'he would have their Eyes put out and Noſes 'cut off, and ſo ſent home, that by theſe Marks 'they might be known of other Nations, charg-'ing the Biſhops to depart his Preſence imme-'diately, as they tender'd their own Safety.

The Kingdom interdicted.

The Biſhops ſoon after give the Pope an Account of the Succeſs of their Meſſage, and the Kingdom was thereupon interdicted, the Miniſtration of Sacraments ceaſed (except of Confeſſion, Extream Unction, and Baptiſm of Children) the dead were buried without Prieſt or Prayer[b]. The Biſhops of London, Ely, Worceſter, Bath and Hereford, fled ſecretly out of the Kingdom. The King to requite this Severity, ſends his Sheriffs and other Miniſters, to command all the Biſhops and their Servants to depart forthwith out of the Kingdom, puts the Biſhopricks, Abbies, and Priories into the hands of Lay-men, confiſcating all their Revenues; but the Biſhops got into the Monaſteries, and would not depart, unleſs expell'd by Force, which the Officers would not do, becauſe their Commiſſion did not reach ſo far, wherefore they ſeiz'd on their Goods for the King's Uſe. The Monkiſh Writers of thoſe Times give us a Tragical Account of the barbarous Uſage the Clergy [c] and Religious Men met withal from the King's Servants at this time, and 'tis probable the incenſed King might encourage Men to injure and abuſe them, from whom he ſuffer'd ſo much; but their rebellious Obſtinacy deſerv'd ſuch Severities, that their credible Relations will paſs for Forgeries.

The King not having been able to prevent this Curſe, ſets himſelf to hinder the ill Conſequents of it. He was ſenſible, that this Breach with the Church would endanger his Peace, and probably cauſe a Defection among his Subjects; and therefore to avoid it, he ſent a Body of Soldiers to all the moſt potent Men in his Kingdom, to require of them Hoſtages for their Fidelity, which many of them yielded to, ſending ſome their Sons, other their Nephews, and others their neareſt Kin. William de Brauſe, a Nobleman, being requir'd to deliver his Hoſtage, was prevented in his Anſwer by his Wife, who told the Commiſſioners, 'That the King ſhould have none 'of her Sons to keep, becauſe he kept Arthur his 'own Brother's Son ſo ill; which raſh Speech the Baron ſharply reproving his Wife for before the King's Servants, told them, 'That he was 'ready, if he had offended, to ſatisfie the King 'without any Pledge, according to the Judg-'met of his Court, or that of his Peers at any 'Time or Place whatſoever. But his Wife's Anſwer was taken more notice of than his, and reported to the King, who ſends immediately to apprehend the Baron; but he having notice of it, or fearing what would follow, got away with his Wife and Children into Ireland, where this afflicted Lady ſought all ways to pacifie the King's Wrath, and preſented the Queen with four hundred Milk-white Cows and a Bull: But this would not procure her Pardon. The King at length apprehended her and her Sons (the Baron himſelf

The Exchequer removed from London. 1209.

The King diſpleaſed with the Londoners, removed his Exchequer to Northampton, and with a great Army marches towards Scotland, to make War upon that King for harbouring his Enemies, and aſſiſting them againſt him. But by mediation a Peace was agreed upon, on theſe Conditions: That the King of Scots ſhould pay eleven thouſand Marks of Silver, and deliver up his two Daughters Hoſtages to ſecure the Peace. In his return he cauſed all the Incloſures of his Foreſts to be beaten down, to the great Grief of his Subjects; whom, though he never minded to ſatisfie, yet he ſought all means to faſten them in their Obedience, (whereof Love, not Rigour, is the faſteſt tye) and therefore took Homage of all Free-Tenants, yea even of Children of twelve Years old throughout the Kingdom.

After the Interdiction had lain upon the Kingdom two Years, to the Diſtraction of the People, but without the effect intended upon the King, the Pope thinking to bring him to compliance, proceeds to the Excommunication of his Perſon; a piece of Rigour, which his Predeceſſor Alexander, being better adviſed, would not uſe againſt Henry II. tho' accuſed of a more heinous Crime upon the Perſon of Thomas Becket; but this method failed alſo, and the King grew only the more enraged againſt the Clergy: So that, notwithſtanding the Pope's Mandate, they durſt not execute it for many Days after, but kept it cloſe from his knowledge; but at length it came to his Ears, by the means of Jeffrey Arch-deacon of Norwich, an Officer in the King's Exchequer, who conferring with his Fellows about the Sentence, affirmed, That it was not lawful for any Beneficed Men to remain in the Service and Obedience of an Excommunicated King; and ſo without leave withdrew himſelf from his place to his own Houſe. The King hearing of this Action was very angry, and preſently ſent Sir William Talbott with armed Men to apprehend him, and lay him in Fetters in cloſe Impriſonment; and afterward, at the King's Command, he was put into a Sheet of Lead[a], in which, with the weight, and want of Victuals, he periſh'd.

Otho the Emperor Excommunicated.

This Excommunication of the King of England was accompany'd the ſame Year with another of the Emperor Otho, his Nephew, which like his Uncle's was look'd upon as a ſtrain of the Pope's Pride and Injuſtice; 'becauſe it was done in a 'Caſe of the Pope's own private Intereſt, ſeeking 'to extend his Authority beyond the bounds of 'a Spiritual Juriſdiction, which reaches only to 'their Souls, not Eſtates. For tho' the Pope had been very Inſtrumental in raiſing him to the Imperial Dignity, and oppoſing the Election of Philip, Son of Fredericke Barbaroſſa, for his own ends, becauſe in the Vacancy of the Empire he had ſeized certain Parts of Italy belonging to it, and hoped ſo to keep them; yet when Otho ſought to recover his Right, he procured the Pope's Diſpleaſure, who ſent him divers Meſſages to deſiſt from the Proſecution of his Deſign, both in reſpect to himſelf, and Fredericke King of Sicily, who had put himſelf under the Protection of the Apoſtolick See. To theſe Meſſages the Emperor replied, 'That if the Pope deſires unjuſtly to 'uſurp any thing that belongs to the Empire, he 'muſt abſolve me from the Oath which he cauſed 'me to take at my Coronation, which was, That 'I ſhould recall and recover the Rights which 'had been rent from the Empire, and I will de-'ſiſt. But the Pope refuſing this, and the Emperor not deſiſting from his Claim, the Pope iſſu'd out his Excommunication againſt him, and abſolved all the States of Germany from their Obedience to him. And thus were two of the greateſt Princes in the World left to the Mercy of their Subjects, ſo far as lay in the Pope's power; but the Ligaments and Sinews of Government were not ſo wholly diſſolved, eſpecially in England, but the Kingdom continued ſtill in ſome tolerable Order and Quiet, the Natural Affections of ſome, Senſe of Duty and Obligations of Intereſt in others, keeping them firm to their Loyalty and Allegiance; ſo that moſt of the Nobles adhered to their King.

King John's Expedition into Ireland 1211.

But becauſe Eaſe and Idleneſs would probably corrupt his Loyal Subjects, and make them ready to hearken to the Suggeſtions of the Pope againſt him, therefore the King reſolv'd to keep them in Employment; and having received an Intelligence of a Revolt of the Iriſh, he undertakes an Expedition into Ireland to ſecure his Dominions there. At his firſt arrival, all the great Men, which held the Caſtles and Champion Country near the Coaſts, came in, and did their Homage and Fealty to him at Dublin; but thoſe that lived in the more remote parts, and held the Forts, refuſed to come; of which Catalus King of Connaught was the ſtrongeſt, and the Confidence of the reſt. King John therefore attack'd and conquer'd him, and ſoon became abſolute Maſter of the Country; which to reduce into better Order, he commanded to be govern'd by the Laws and Cuſtoms of England, cauſed Engliſh Money to be coined there, of equal Value and alike Current as in England, with many other Conſtitutions, which if they had been as carefully kept as they were wiſely ſettled, might have kept that Kingdom in entire Obedience ever after, and ſaved all the Pains and Expence which it coſt in after-Ages to preſerve it. After three Months ſtay, having made John Gray Biſhop of Norwich Chief Juſtice there, he return'd home, and preſuming upon his ſtrength, ſummon'd all the Prelates of the Kingdom to appear before him at London, where he extorted from them for the Redemption of their Sees from the Laity an hundred thouſand Pound Sterling. With this Sum he was enabled to go on with his Expedition into Wales, which then rebelled under Lewelin King of North-Wales, and reduced it to his Obedience in the twelfth Year of his Reign, taking twenty eight Children of their beſt Families for Pledges of their future Subjection. At his return, he exacted two Marks of every Knight that attended not upon his Army in that Expedition; and by the way at Northampton is pleaſed to receive the Pope's Agents, Pandulphus and Durandus, who came from the Pope to make Peace between the Kingdom and Clergy, and found the King ſo pliable to their Propoſals and Advice, in Conſideration of the State of the Kingdom, that he conſented that the Archbiſhop and Monks of Canterbury, with all the exil'd Biſhops, ſhould return to their Places, but refuſed to make good their Eſtates which he had confiſcated: At which the Agents of the Pope departing unſatisfied, brought greater Troubles upon the King. For the Pope finding him a little yielding, grew more intolerably Imperious, and would force him to what he pleaſed; and for that end abſolv'd all his Subjects, of what Condition ſoever, from their Obedience, ſtrictly forbidding them, under pain of Excommunication, the King's Table, Counſel

The Welsh he hasted to subdue, and hang'd up their twenty eight Hostages for breach of Peace; but before he could effect it, the Conspiracy against his Person being discover'd, he was obliged to return to London to suppress the 1213. suspected Nobles, of which he got Pledges; but Eustace de Vescy and Robert Fitz-Walter, the Leaders of it, escaped, the one into France, and the other into Scotland. The Pope being thus again disappointed of his Designs, proceeded to his last Efforts, and pronounced the greatest and most imperious Sentence that ever was given against any Sovereign Prince, viz. an absolute Deposition from the Royal Government of England; and wrote to the King of France, 'That 'as he desired to have Remission of his Sins, he 'should undertake to expel King John out of the 'Kingdom of England, and possess the same for 'himself and his Heirs for ever. And to the same effect he sent his Letters to other Princes, and great Men of other Nations, 'That they 'should assist the King of France in ejecting the 'Contumacious King of England, who had done 'so great Injury to the Universal Church; grant-'ing them the same Remission of Sins, as if they 'undertook the Holy War.

The Pope deposeth the King, and gives his Kingdom to the French.

With the former Commission were the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the other banished Bishops, with Pandulphus, dispatch'd to the King of France for the Execution thereof; which notwithstanding the Pope seems to have done, rather to terrifie King John, than greaten the King of France, whom the Pope desired not to make more powerful; for he order'd Pandulphus to condition thus with him apart: 'That if upon the prepa-'rations gather'd by him against King John, he 'could bring the King of England to such Con-'ditions as he should propound, he should be 'absolved and restored. The King of France, upon this Request and Order of the Pope, and Solicitation of his Ministers, commands all his Nobility and Princes within his Dominions to assemble their Forces, with Horse, Armour, and all Ammunition, to assist him in this business, and be ready in the Spring under pain of being depriv'd of their Estates; preparing also a great Navy for their Transportation into England. King John having Information of these Designs against him, sends to all the Ports of his Kingdom, commanding, That all the Ships, which could possibly be gotten, be ready against the Spring for this Expedition; and summoning 'all Earls, Ba-'rons, and all Persons of every Condition what-'soever, that could bear Arms, to be ready at 'Dover immediately after Easter, furnish'd with 'Horse, Armour, and all other Military Provi-'sions, to defend themselves and his Kingdom 'against the intended Invasion, under pain of 'Culvertage (i. e. being branded for Cowards) 'and perpetual Servitude. Whereupon so great numbers of People resorted to Dover, Feversham, Ipswich, and other places suspected for their landing, that sufficient Arms and Provision could not be got for them; so that Multitudes were sent home again as unnecessary, and only the choice and abler sort reserved, which amounted to the number of sixty thousand, well provided for Battel, besides the Navy, much greater than the King of France's[a]. King John thus prepared, stood in Expectation of his Enemies, when privately two Knights Templars, sent over by Pandulphus, came to propound a Treaty to him about a Pacification, which, notwithstanding all this preparation, the King accepted. Pandulphus being presently advertised of it, withdraws himself out of the French Army, and came over to treat with him; whom he so terrified with the Forces bent against him, and the Danger he was in, that he yielded to any Conditions whatsoever; and not only grants a Restitution and Satisfaction of whatever had been taken from the Archbishop and Monks of Canterbury, and the Bishops of London, Ely, Bath, and Lincoln, who were fled to the Archbishop, but also[b] lays down his Crown, Sceptre, Mantle, Sword, and Ring, the Badges of his Royal Dignity, at the Feet of Pandulphus; delivering up therewith the Kingdom of England to the Pope, and submitting himself to the Judgment and Mercy of the Church. Two Days (some write, six) it was before the Legate would restore him his Crown; and at the receiving of it he swore, (his Earls undertaking for him) That he and his Successors should hold the Kingdom of England, and the Lordship of Ireland, of the See of Rome, at the Yearly Tribute of a thousand Marks of Silver. And this, with his Homage and Fealty, he confirmed by his 'Charter at an House of the Templars near Dover. The weighty Reasons which moved King John to condescend to such dishonourable Terms are said by the Historians of those Times to be these: 'The Sense of 'his own Sins against God, having lived five 'Years excommunicated, and the Troubles the 'Kingdom was in by the Interdiction. 2. The 'Greatness of his Enemies, the King of France, 'and his Adherents. 3. The doubtful Allegiance 'of his Nobility, whom he had offended. 4. The 'Approach of Ascension-day, after which one 'Peter, an Hermite and Southsayer, had prophe-'sied, he should be no more King of England; which, tho' mistaken in the manner, was in some sort fulfilled by this Resignation. But the Southsayer and his Son was put to Death not long after for his otherwise Interpreted Divination. But notwithstanding this Submission of King John, the Interdiction of the Kingdom continu'd, and his own Absolution was deferr'd, till full Restitution was made to the Clergy, for whom eight thousand Marks of Silver was presently deliver'd to Pandulphus, who at the receiving thereof trampled it under his Feet, as contemning the base Matter in respect of the Grace conferr'd upon the Transgressor; and so return'd with it into France, where he declared what had passed in England; 'and forbids the King of France, upon pain of 'Excommunication, to proceed any farther in 'this Expedition, since King John has so much 'submitted himself to the Church.

John's Submission to Pandulphus the Pope's Legate, and the Reasons of it.

The King of France being in a readiness for this great Invasion, and full of hopes of Victory, flew into a great Passion at the Receipt of this sudden and unexpected Message, and was hardly diverted from his Intentions, by reason of the great Charge he had been at[d], and through the [b] Many of the Peers, who were present at this Act of Resignation made by King John to Pandulphus, were much displeas'd, not only with the King for so much debasing himself, but more with Pandulphus for his insolent Behaviour in accepting and detaining his Regalities; and particularly Henry Archbishop of Dublin protested against it, as an illegal Incroachment upon the Crown of England.

Diſhonour of the thing; but at laſt, ſeeing his Confederates all diſcouraged by the Menaces of the Church, he gave it over, tho' unwillingly; but for his own Reputation, and through deſire of Revenge, having ſo great Forces a-foot, and his Navy ready at the Mouth of the Seine, he reſolv'd to undertake ſomething that might give Satisfaction to the Adventurers, and his own People, who had embark'd in that Action. And becauſe Ferrand Earl of Flanders, who was in Friendſhip with King John, refuſed to follow him in this Expedition, he falls upon him, who was next him, and enters his Port of Dam, vowing, That Flanders ſhould be France, or France Flanders. Ferrand ſeeing this Tempeſt coming on him, ſends to King John to aſſiſt him, who being glad that he had eſcap'd a defenſive War at home, was eager to enter into an offenſive one abroad, both to employ his Navy and keep his People in Action, who would be unſatisfied (he knew) if he diſmiſs'd them without Action; and therefore ſends away five hundred Sail of Ships, with ſeven hundred Knights, unto Flanders, under the Conduct of his baſe Brother William Longeſpee Earl of Saliſbury, and Reginald Earl of Bologne; whom being driven out of France for ſome Demerit, he had entertain'd in his Court, and allow'd him a Penſion. Theſe arriving at the Port of Dam found the French Navy in great Diſorder, and without Defence (the Forces being gone out of it to invade the Country) and ſetting upon it defeated it wholly; and afterward, joyning their Power with Ferrand's, drove the King of France's Army home with great Diſhonour and exceeding great Loſs [a].

King John being elevated with this Victory, and his Peace with the Church, reſolves upon great Deſigns; and taking the Opportunity of this Overthrow of the King of France, contrives to recover all his Dominions on that ſide the Sea, by aſſaulting that King on all ſides, engaging his Nephew Otho, the Emperour, to joyn the Earl of Flanders and invade the Eaſt Parts of France, while he with all his Forces would enter the Weſt; for the Execution of which purpoſe, he ſends firſt a Supply of Money to his Captains in Flanders, and then aſſembles a great Army at Portſmouth to paſs the Seas: But all his Contrivance was delay'd and ſpoil'd by the Revolt of his Nobility, who refus'd to aſſiſt or attend him in it till he were abſolved, and had confirm'd their Liberties to them. This unexpected Oppoſition to his Affairs in hand much enrag'd him, but ſeeing no way to avoid it, he ſends immediately for the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the other Biſhops who were yet in France, and promis'd them Reſtitution and Satisfaction under the Hands and Seals of twenty four of his Barons, and Earls who undertook for the Performance thereof according to the Form of the Charter made on this account before. Pandulphus, with the reſt of the exil'd Biſhops, came over forthwith and find the King at Wincheſter [b], where he came forth to meet them, and on his Knees with Tears receiv'd them, beſeeching them to have Compaſſion on him and of the Kingdom of England. He was abſolv'd with great Repentance, and Compaſſion of all the Beholders expreſs'd with Tears, and ſwears upon the Evangeliſts, 'To love, defend, and maintain Holy 'Church, and the Miniſters thereof, againſt their 'Adverſaries, to the utmoſt of his Power: That 'he would bring into Uſe again the good Laws 'of his Predeceſſors, and eſpecially of King Edward, abrogating all unjuſt Laws: That he 'would judge all his Subjects according to the 'juſt Judgment of his Court; and that immediately after Eaſter next following, he would 'make a full Satisfaction of all that had been 'taken from the Church. Which being done, he return'd to Portſmouth with an Intention to paſs over into France, committing the Government of the Kingdom to Jeffrey Fitz-Peter, and the Biſhop of Wincheſter, injoyning them to order all Affairs and Buſineſſes by the Counſel of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. And here a great Company of Soldiers repair'd to him, complaining, that by their long Attendance their Money was ſpent, ſo that they could not follow him, unleſs he would ſupply them out of his Exchequer; which the King refuſing to do, he took Ship in a Rage, with his Family, and ſail'd to the Iſle of Jerſey, expecting that his Nobles would follow him: But ſeeing none of them come, and the Seaſon for Action being over, he was forced to return again into England, where he gather'd an Army to chaſtiſe his Barons, who had forſaken him. But the Archbiſhop of Canterbury follows him to Northampton, 'Urging, 'That it was againſt his Oath, taken at his Abſolution, to proceed in that manner againſt 'any Man without the Judgment of his Court. To whom the King in great Paſſion replied, 'That he would not lay aſide the Buſineſs of 'the Kingdom for his Pleaſure, ſeeing the Judgment of the Laity did not belong to him, and 'ſo in a Fury marches to Nottingham. The Archbiſhop ſtill purſues him, and plainly told him, 'That unleſs he would deſiſt from his Intention, 'he would excommunicate all ſuch as took up 'Arms againſt any Man, before he releas'd the 'Interdiction, and would not leave him till he 'had obtain'd a convenient Day for the Lords 'to come to his Court, which he at length 'granted. And 'a Parliament was ſoon after called, and met in St. Paul's Church, at which the Archbiſhop of Canterbury produced a Charter of King Henry I. by which he granted to his People their ancient Liberties (which had been violated by his Predeceſſors unjuſt Exactions) according to the Laws of King Edward, with thoſe Amendments, which his Father by the Council of his Barons did ratifie. This Charter (which is extant in M. Paris) being read among the Barons, they much rejoyced at it, and ſwore in the Preſence of the Archbiſhop, That for theſe Liberties they would, if need requir'd, ſpend their Blood; and making an Agreement with the Archbiſhop to that end, the Parliament brake up.

The Death of Fitz-Peter Chief Juſtice.

Shortly after this dy'd Jeffrey Fitz-Peter, Chief Juſtice of England, a Man of a generous Spirit, learn'd in the Laws and skilful in Government; the only Man, who in thoſe divided Times kept himſelf diſengag'd, performing the part of an equal Counſellor and Officer between the King and his Subjects; whom tho' the King moſt uſed, he moſt feared and leaſt loved, as bad Princes do their Worthieſt Miniſters, whoſe Gravity and Judgment keeps them in Awe. The King hearing of his Death, was much pleas'd, and ſaid, When he comes into Hell, let him ſalute the Archbiſhop Hubert, whom he will certainly find there; and turning to thoſe that attended, he ſwore by the Feet of God, That now at length he was King and Lord of England, being now at Liberty (as he imagin'd) to free himſelf from the Oath he had made to his great Men againſt his Will, and to break the Peace he had lately concluded. And firſt to make himſelf an abſolute Maſter of his Subjects (of whoſe Combination againſt him he had gotten Intelligence) it is ſaid, That he ſent an Ambaſſage by Thomas Hardington, Ralph Fitz-Nichols, Knights, and Robert of London, Clerk, his Commiſſioners, to [a] Miramumalim the Moor, the great King of Africa, Morocco, and Spain; who was then the Terrour of all Chriſtendom, with his mighty Army, promiſing him to reſign his Kingdom to him and hold it ever after by Tribute from him, as his Sovereign Lord, to forſake the Chriſtian Faith (which he held vain) and become a Mahometan, if he would lend him a ſufficient Aid to accompliſh his Deſigns; but they return'd with an ineffectual Anſwer, either becauſe (as his Enemies the Monks relate) he diſdain'd the Baſeneſs and Impiety of the Offer, or he was made unable to do it by reaſon of the Overthrow of his great Army with the Death of his Son, which ſoon after happen'd. The King being diſappointed in this Attempt, takes another way to bring about his Deſigns, and try Pope Innocent (a Perſon eaſie to be induc'd to do any thing for Money) with great Sums, and [b] a repeated Aſſurance of his Subjection, which he ſhortly after confirm'd by a freſh Oath and a new Charter to the Pope's Legate, the Biſhop of Tuſculum [c], who was ſent over by the Pope for that purpoſe, with a full Authority to compoſe all Differences between the King and the Church. Several Aſſemblies were had in divers places to ſettle this Agreement, and in the end the King having promis'd, and given Security to pay thirteen thouſand Marks more in full Satisfaction for the Damages done to the Church.

The Interdiction was releaſed [d], which had continu'd ſix Years, three Months, and fourteen Days, to the ineſtimable Loſs of the Church and Churchmen, and the King recommended to the Court of Rome for a moſt tractable, obedient, and indulgent Son of the Church; and the Clergy, inſtead of a Satisfaction for their particular Damages which they brought in to the Legate, receiv'd a ſharp Reprimand for their Obſtinacy in oppoſing him.

The King having referr'd the Determination of this whole Controverſie to the Legate and ſome of his own Miniſters (being fully aſſur'd of the Pope's Favour) was gone into Poictou to attack the King of France, according to his Deſign and Agreement with the Emperour Otho, who was to invade him by the way of Flanders. He landed at Rochel with his Queen, and having receiv'd the Fealty of many of the Barons of Poictou, marched forward into the Country, and recover'd many Caſtles and Places of Importance (as appears by his Letters from Parthenas to the Juſtices of the Exchequer, in which alſo he ſays, that he had promis'd his Daughter Joanna in Marriage to the Earl of Marche's Son, tho' the King of France had deſir'd her for his Son, but fraudulently.) From thence he goes into Britain, takes the City of Nantz, and prepar'd to encounter Lewis the French King's Son, who was come into thoſe Parts with a mighty Army to ſtop his Proceedings. But the Poictovins having diſcover'd the Force of the Enemy, refus'd to fight: Whereupon the King to his extream Grief, forſook the Field, and was forced to come to a diſhonourable Peace with the King of France, and ſo irrecoverably loſt his Dominions there. But his Forces in Flanders, which were joyn'd with the Emperour's, and Ferrand's, had far worſe Luck; for the King of France having gather'd all his Forces he could together, encounter'd them at Bovines Bridge, and overthrew the Emperour with all the Confederate Army, which conſiſted of one hundred fifty thouſand Foot, beſides Horſe; of which fifteen hundred Knights were ſlain, and Ferrand Earl of Flanders, the Earls of Saliſbury and Bologne, and (as the Annals of Flanders relate) the Dukes of Brabant and Lemburg, and the Earls of Savoy and Luxemburgh were taken Priſoners, the Emperour Otho IV. himſelf hardly eſcaping, who lived not long after.

The Barons League.

The Barons of England hearing of the King's Misfortunes, and fearing his outrageous Anger at his return, aſſembled themſelves at St. Edmondſbury; where after a long Conference about the late produced Charter of Henry the firſt, they ſwore to one another upon the high Altar, That if King John refuſed to reſtore and confirm to them their Liberties and the Rights of the Kingdom contain'd in it, they would make War upon him, till he had given them Satisfaction therein; and agreed, That after Chriſtmas next they would petition him for the ſame, and in the mean time furniſh themſelves with Horſes and Arms to be ready (if the King ſhould recede from his Oath made at Wincheſter at the time of his Abſolution, for the Confirmation of theſe Liberties) to compel him to ratifie their Demands. After Chriſtmas accordingly the Barons came in a Military manner to the King, who then lay in the new Temple, urging their Deſires with great Vehemency. The King ſeeing their Reſolution and Inclination to War, made them Anſwer, 'That 'the Matter they deſir'd being of Importance, 'he would take time to conſider of it till Eaſter, 'and in the mean time takes upon him the Vow 'of the Croſs rather through Fear than Devo-'tion; thinking himſelf ſafer among Infidels 'than Rebellious Subjects. The Lords continuing their Reſolution, and foreſeeing that the King would grant them nothing but by Force of Arms, ſummon'd their Army to Stamford, wherein 'tis ſaid were two thouſand Knights beſides Eſquires among the Foot; and from thence marched towards Oxford, where the King expected their coming, according to the time appointed for Anſwer to their Demands. The Barons being come to Brackley with their Army, the King ſent the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, William Earl of Pembroke his Marſhal, with other grave Counſellours, to demand of them what were thoſe Laws and Liberties: To whom they gave a Schedule, or Liſt of them, to deliver to the King; which when the Commiſſioners read to the King, he aſked them in great Anger, 'Why 'the Barons did not likewiſe demand the King-'dom? And ſwore, That he would never grant 'thoſe Liberties whereby himſelf ſhould become 'a Slave. The Barons having receiv'd this Anſwer, and being as haſty as he was averſe, reſolve to ſeize upon the King's Caſtles; and having [a] This Embaſſy to Miramumalim, the Mooriſh Emperour, is judg'd by our Engliſh Hiſtorians a Monkiſh Lye, invented to blacken the Memory of this King, becauſe he had been ſo ſevere to them; for it was the common Calumny of the Monks, that they had no Religion who lov'd not their Orders. Mat. Paris is the only Author that relates this Story; yet it ſeems improbable, that he who liv'd and wrote in the Reign of this King's Son, and by his particular Encouragement, ſhould dare to report ſuch a ſcandalous Embaſſy if it was not true.

A. D. 1215. Reg. 17. made Robert Fitz-Walter their General, whom they entitled, The Marſhal of the Army of God and Holy Church, they preſently march towards Northampton, which they beſieged; but finding it in vain, departed to Bedford, where William de Beauchamp ſurrender'd to them; and the Londoners ſent a private Meſſage to them to invite them into their City, which they would deliver up to be ruled by them. The Barons, glad of this news, repair immediately thither, and are joyfully accepted. And now being in Poſſeſſion of the greateſt Strength of the Kingdom, they not only increaſed daily in their Party, but grew bolder with the King; making another ſolemn Proteſtation, never to give over the Proſecution of their intended Deſign, till they conſtrain'd the King (whom they held perjur'd) to grant them their Rights. The King ſeeing himſelf in a manner wholly forſaken, having ſcarce ſeven Knights faithful to him, counterfeits the Biſhops Seals, and writes in their Names to all Nations, 'That 'the Engliſh were turn'd Apoſtates; and whoſo-'ever would come to invade them, he by the 'Pope's conſent would confer upon them all their 'Lands and Poſſeſſions. But this Device taking no effect, becauſe of the ſmall Confidence they had either in him or his People, a Parly by the mediation of the Earl Marſhal and others was obtained with the Barons, to be had between Windſor and Staines, in a Meadow call'd [a] Running Mead, (a place anciently uſed for ſuch Conferences) where, after many Meetings and much Debate, the King freely conſented, for the Glory of God and Benefit of the Kingdom, to confirm thoſe Laws and Liberties formerly reſtored, and in part ordained by Henry the Firſt (contained now in the Great Charter, and Charta Foreſtæ.) And that there might be no Differences in this kind for the future, he granted them a Security for the firm and long Enjoyment of theſe Laws and Liberties in this manner: 'That there ſhould be 'twenty five Barons choſen out of their Number, 'whom they would, who to the utmoſt of their 'power ſhould cauſe the ſame to be obſerved. 'And if the King, or his Chief Juſtice, ſhould 'break any Article of thoſe Laws, and their 'Offence be diſcover'd, four Barons of the twenty 'five ſhould come to the King, or in his abſence 'out of the Kingdom, to his Juſtice, and ſignifie 'the Offence, requiring a Redreſs without delay; 'which, if it were not made within forty Days 'after notice given, then thoſe four ſhould refer 'the Cauſe to the reſt of the twenty five, who 'with the Commons of the Land, may compel 'and force him by all means they could, viz. 'by ſeizing his Caſtles and Revenues, (his own, 'Queen's and Childrens Perſons excepted) till 'redreſs be made according to their Arbitration. 'And that whoſoever would, ſhould take their 'Oath for the Execution of it, and obey the Command of the twenty five Barons without prohibition; and if any of them diſſented, or would 'not aſſemble, the major part ſhall have the ſame 'power of proceeding. And for the greater Caution, the four Governours of the Caſtles of Northampton, Kenelworth, Nottingham, and Scarborough, ſhould be ſworn to obey the Command 'of the twenty five Barons, or the major part of 'them, in whatſoever they thought fit concerning thoſe Caſtles, and none ſhould be placed 'in them, but ſuch as were faithful, and would 'obſerve that Oath, &c. That ſeveral Strangers, 'of which divers are expreſly nam'd, ſhould be baniſh'd the Kingdom, and a general Pardon for all 'Perſons concern'd in this Difference and Conteſt 'from firſt to laſt: That both Parties ſhould engage by Oath to keep this Agreement inviolable 'in all its Articles. The King alſo ſends his Letters Patents to all the Sheriffs of his Kingdom, to cauſe all his Subjects, of what Degree ſoever, within their ſeveral Shires, to ſwear to obſerve thoſe Laws and Liberties thus granted by his Charter.

After this manner, and no better, were the Rights of the Kingdom recover'd; whereof, tho' the Nobles and People ſeem'd to have had the Livery, yet they wanted the Seiſin. For the King being among evil Counſellors [b], who told him, that by this Grant he had made himſelf a King without a Kingdom, a Lord without Dominions, and a Subject to his Subjects; preſently pretends, that what he had done was by Force, and therefore he had no Obligation to perform it, and reſolv'd that he would not; and ſo withdraws himſelf into the Iſle of Wight. From hence he ſends his Agents to Rome (where he could do almoſt any thing) to complain of this forced Act to the Pope, who by his definitive Sentence firſt condemns and makes void what had been done, and after excommunicates the Barons. During the King's abſence in this Retreat, the Barons knowing the Violence of his Nature, and ſenſible of their own Danger, kept themſelves in and about the City of London, and under a ſhew of Tournaments, and exerciſe of Arms, retain'd with them ſuch a number of Men as was ſufficient for their own defence; neither ſeeking to ſurprize his Perſon, nor intercept his Agents, both which they could eaſily have done, had they acted as Enemies, and not as Subjects, who fought not the Deſtruction of their Prince, but Reſtitution of their own Liberties, and the Rights of the Kingdom. Nor was the King idle in this his Retreat in the Iſle, tho' he ſeem'd ſo; but in order to put his Deſigns in Execution, he diſpatch'd the Biſhop of Worceſter, then Chancellor of England, the Biſhop of Norwich, and others, with his Seal to procure him Forces from ſuch foreign Princes as held Correſpondency with him, appointing them to repair to Dover about Michaelmas following. In the mean time, without any Equipage, (except a few Servants, and Mariners) he ſpent his time in Fiſhing, and Excurſions at Sea; inſomuch that the common Reports ran, That he was a Fiſherman, Merchant, or Pyrate. But at the appointed time he meets at Dover, with thoſe Forces which had been gather'd for him out of Poictou, Gaſcony, Lovain, and Brabant, under the Conduct of Savarie de Maleon, Jeffrey and Oliver Butevile Brothers, Walter Bucke, and others, all deſperate Adventures, leading as deſperate a Multitude of Soldiers, whoſe low Fortunes made them forward in any the moſt hazardous Attempt. With theſe the King ſets upon his Subjects, who could hardly be call'd Rebellious; and had not Hugh de Boues, who was come from Calis with a farther addition of forty thouſand Men, been drowned in the Paſſage, he had no doubt made a more general Conqueſt of England than the Norman did, conſidering what he effected with the Survivers. For after he had recover'd the Caſtle of Rocheſter (which William de Albines with memorable Courage held out three Months againſt him, and was forced to reſign, becauſe the Barons dare not relieve him) he marched over the whole Kingdom almoſt, and within half a Year got in all the Caſtles of the

Barons,

A. D. 1215. Reg. 17. Barons, as far as the Borders of Scotland, and was abſolute Maſter of all England, except the City of London, on which he was afraid to adventure, becauſe of the united Power of the Barons, who had vow'd to die together in the defence of it: But dividing his Forces, with one part he cut off all ways of Supply, that he might annoy them; himſelf with another part marching Northward, and laying waſte the Countries as he went, as far as Berwick. He was intended to have invaded Scotland, as appear'd from his threatning Alexander King of the Scots, That he would hunt the Fox out of his Hole; alluding to his red Hair: But the 1216. news of ſome freſh Deſigns plotted by the Barons brought him back from thoſe parts. For they ſeeing themſelves depriv'd of their Eſtates, (which were given to Strangers) their Wives and Daughters raviſh'd, and all their Subſtance conſum'd, deſperately fall upon another extream, and ſend for aſſiſtance to Lewis the French King's Son, promiſing him by their free Election to inveſt him with the Crown of England, and engaged to give him Pledges for the Performance; being perſuaded, that upon the approach of the French, King John's French Forces would forſake him. Lewis gave a good entertainment to the Meſſage, and in a Parliament call'd for that purpoſe by his Father Philip[a], it was reſolv'd upon, and a Meſſage ſent to the Barons, that he would ſpeedily ſend them Relief, and be not long behind them himſelf in Perſon; having hopes of the Crown of England, not only from their proffer'd Election, but alſo upon the Title which he pretended from Blanch his Wife, King John's Siſter's Daughter[b]. The Intelligence of this Deſign ſoon flew to Rome, and got to the Pope's Ears, who preſently ſends his Agent to the King of France with Letters to intreat him not to ſuffer his Son to invade or diſquiet the King of England, but rather to defend him, in regard he was a Vaſſal of the Roman Church, and the Kingdom, as to the Dominion of it, did belong thereunto. The King of France anſwers: 'That the Kingdom of England never 'was, nor is, nor ever ſhall be, the Patrimony of 'St. Peter; and that King John was never lawful 'King thereof, and if he were, he had forfeited 'it by the Murther of Prince Arthur, for which 'he was condemned in his Court; neither could 'he give away the Kingdom without the Conſent 'of the Barons, who are bound to defend the 'ſame: And if the Pope would maintain this 'Error, 'twould be a pernicious Example to all 'Kingdoms. With this Anſwer the Pope's Agents depart, but unſatisfied; and Lewis firſt having diſpatch'd Commiſſioners to Rome, to declare his Right, and juſtifie his Undertakings, ſets forth from Calis with ſix hundred Ships, and eighty other Veſſels, and lands 'at Sandwich with his Army. King John waited at Dover for his landing, with purpoſe to encounter him; but upon notice of his great Forces, and diſtruſting the Faith of his Mercenaries, forſook the Field; and having committed the keeping of the Caſtle to Hubert de Burgh, flies firſt to Wincheſter, and after to Gloceſter, and leaves all to the Will of his Enemy Lewis; who, after he had gotten the Submiſſion of all Kent, (except of Dover-Caſtle, which he never could obtain) he march'd to London, where he is received by the Barons with great Joy; and upon his Oath to reſtore their Laws, and preſerve their Rights, hath Homage and Fealty done to him as their Sovereign Lord. To him alſo came the Earls Warren, Arundel, Saliſbury, and William Marſhall the younger, with many others, forſaking King John, and render'd themſelves to him. Guallo, the Pope's Agent, purſu'd Lewis; and tho' he paſſed through many Dangers by Lewis's party, got to Gloceſter, ſhews King John the Pope's Care and Zeal for him, and in a ſolemn manner pronounces the Sentence of Excommunication againſt Lewis, and all his Adherents: Which, tho' it brought ſome little Comfort to John for the preſent, yet did his Enemy little or no harm, nor could confirm his hired Soldiers in their Fidelity to him: For ſoon after moſt of them left him, and either went over to Lewis, or return'd home with the Spoils they had gotten; yet was he not ſo utterly forſaken, but he had Forces enough to annoy, tho' not to encounter his Enemy, and ſome Miniſters at a diſtance from him, that ſtood firm to him. Dover-Caſtle held out with a ſmall Company againſt all the Forces Lewis could bring againſt it; and Windſor-Caſtle, with ſixty Men, ſtood out againſt all the Barons could do; and Nottingham and Lincoln Caſtles made a reſolute Reſiſtance, and could not be gain'd. Nothing was effected almoſt, but the Ruine and Deſtruction of the open and undefended Country, and that in the moſt fruitful and plentiful parts of the Nation, viz. about Gloceſter, the Marches of Wales, Lincolnſhire, Cambridgeſhire, Norfolk, Suffolk, Eſſex, Kent, and London, which were the Seat of the War. But this Miſchief, which had continued all that Summer, came to an end about the latter end of October, when a burning Fever ſeized upon this fiery King. The Cauſe of it was thought to be from the extream Grief he had conceiv'd by the loſs of his Carriages, which paſſing over the Sands between Lin and Boſton, were loſt[d], and was increaſed by a Surfeit of Peaches and New Ale, gotten at the Abby of Swinſhead; from whence he was convey'd in great Weakneſs to Newark, where, after he had receiv'd the Euchariſt, and taken Order for the Succeſſion of his Son Henry, he dy'd in the one and fiftieth Year of his Age, having Reigned eighteen Years, five Months, and four Days[e]. The Abbot of Crockeſton, a Perſon well ſkill'd in Phyſick, and at that time the King's Phyſician, diſbowell'd him, and would no doubt have given notice to the World had his Maſter (as it was afterward reported) been poiſon'd 'by a Monk of Swinſhead-Abby;

[f] Mr. Daniell ſeems to be of Opinion, That the Relation that King John was kill'd by Poiſon, which is follow'd by moſt of our modern Engliſh Hiſtorians, as Mr. Fox, Speed, and Fuller, is forg'd, depending upon the Authority of Matt. Paris, who liv'd in thoſe Times, for the Truth of what he ſays. But ſince many ancient Hiſtorians, both Printed and Manuſcripts, which are quoted by Mr. Speed, aſſert it, and Paris himſelf relates a Paſſage in King Henry his Son's Life, which intimates as tho' the King himſelf believ'd his Father was poiſon'd by the Monks, tho' perhaps he could get no clear proof of it; it is more reaſonable that Matt. Paris ſhould conceal ſo dangerous a Crime in his Son's Life, than the other Monks, who wrote afterward, ſhould ſo groſly bely their own Order by an Invention, which became ſo famous, that it muſt needs meet with great Contradiction. Caxton was the firſt that told the Story of his being poiſon'd, in Engliſh; and no Author who liv'd within ſixty Years of the time ever mention'd it. Caxton alſo writes, That the Monk poiſon'd himſelf to poiſon the King, drinking firſt of the ſame Bowl. Walter Hemingford relates, He was poiſon'd by a Diſh of Pears. And their Difference in their Report, adds to the Diſcredit of it.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES in the Reign of King John.

IN the 3d Year of his Reign about December, five Moons were seen in Yorkshire, one in the East, the second in the West, the third in the North, the fourth in the South, and the fifth in the middle of 'em, having many Stars about it: Which Wonder was in those days, observ'd to precede a violent Season for Cold and Rain afterwards. The next Year the Floods were so high, that Bridges were thrown down, the Corn and Hay spoil'd, and Cattel and Men drown'd in several Places. In that which follow'd, after an extraordinary cold Winter, there happen'd grisly Tempests, terrible Storms of Thunder, Lightning, and Hail, the Stones as big as Hens Eggs; Spirits were seen in the Air in the Shape of Birds, flying up and down with Fire in their Beaks, which they dropt on several Houses, and set them on fire. Holinshead.

If these Miraculous Events are not true, they serve at least to give us an Idea of the Superstition and Ignorance of those Times.

In the 6th Year of his Reign, the Fishermen of Orford in Suffolk took a Sea Monster in their Nets, resembling a wild Man in Shape. They presented him to Sir Barth. de Glanville, Governour of the Castle of Orford, who kept him several Days. He was naked, and like a Man in all his Limbs and Members; he was hairy in those Parts of the Body where Hair grows, except the Crown of his Head, which was bald; his Beard was long and rugged, and his Breast hairy; he greedily devour'd whatever Meat was set before him, Fish or Flesh, raw or boil'd; the raw he press'd in his hand, till he squeez'd out the Moisture, and then he swallow'd it. He wou'd not, or cou'd not speak; tho' to force him to it, the Knight's Servants ty'd him up by the Heels, and cruelly tormented him. He lay down on his Couch at Sun-set, and rose at Sun-rising. They carry'd him one Day to the Sea, and suffer'd him to go into it, having secur'd him from getting from them as they thought, by spreading three rows of strong Nets; but the Monster div'd down below them all, past them, and came up again beyond them. He there shew'd himself to the Country Fellows that waited for him on the Shore, he pop'd up and down in the Water as if he mock'd them for suffering him to deceive them; and having sported some time, when they gave him over for lost, he voluntarily return'd to them: But two Months after he grew weary of Land, and watching his Opportunity stole away to the Sea. Ralph, Abbot of Coggeshall, and John Stow, both tell this very odd Story; and Caxton, who wrote above two hundred Years ago, has it at large, but he places it in this King's Reign, and the two former Historians in the 33d of Henry the second. If the Authority of these Writers can warrant for the Truth of it, 'tis the most remarkable Adventure that ever History transmitted to Posterity.

In the Winter, this Year, there was a hard Frost from January to April, which produc'd a Dearth, and in the next Year was a dreadful Storm of Wind, that blew down abundance of Houses; and driving the Snow which then lay on the Ground about in Drifts, overwhelm'd great Numbers of Sheep and Cattel.

In the Year 1208. the 10th Year of this King, the Citizens of London had a Charter from him to chuse their own Mayors, whom the King nam'd before himself; and on Michaelmas-day they chose Henry Fitz-Alwin, who as Stow reports, had that Office in the first Year of Richard the First, to be their Mayor. On the same Day, the Title of the Bailiffs of London was chang'd into that of Sheriffs, and Peter Duke and Thomas Neal were sworn Sheriffs, the first who bore that Office under that Name in London.

In his 11th Year the Students at Oxford being terrify'd at the hanging of three of their Fellows, remov'd to Cambridge and Reading, and were not soon persuaded to return to their old University. In the same Year one Alexander Cementarius, surnam'd Theologus, preach'd against the Pope's meddling with Temporal Affairs; affirming, No Power was granted to St. Peter, but in Matters only relating to the Church.

In his 14th Year, on the 10th of July, St. Mary Overy's Church in Southwark was burnt with London Bridge, and a great part of the City; three thousand People were suppos'd to be burnt and drown'd in the Confusion the Inhabitants were in upon the Fire taking both ends of the Bridge at once.

Men Illustrious in Arms in his Time were

Robert Fitz-Walter, General of the Barons, Eustace Vesie, Peter de Breause, William de Albanie, Hugh de Lacy, famous Assertors of English Liberty. William Marshal Earl of Pembroke, who was always on the King's side, and many other Barons who were on both sides, animated by Passion or Interest, did brave things in the Civil War. Jeffrey Fitz-Peter, King John's chief Minister, was reckon'd one of the ablest Politicians of his Age.

In his time flourish'd also Geffrey Vinesauf, Gervaise of Canterbury, William Petit or Parvus, a Monk of Newburgh in Yorkshire, Roger Hoveden, Gervaise of Tilbury, Nicolas de Ely Bishop of Durham, Giraldus Cambrensis, Radulfus de Diceto Dean of St. Paul's, Hugh White of Peterborough, John Gray Bishop of Norwich, Walter of Coventry, Radulphus Niger, John of Oxford, Historians; as also John of Tilbury a London Divine, John Brakelow a Benedictine Monk, Stephen Langton, who wrote the Life of Becket, and Alain Abbot of Tewksbury, Heribert de Bosham, Joannes Carnotensis, and William of Canterbury, which last four joyn'd together to write the Quadrilogium of Becket. Joseph of Devonshire a Poet, Simon Thurvay a Philosopher, of whom 'tis said, that he was miraculously seiz'd with a Fit of Oblivion or Forgetfulness, and turn'd Fool, as a Judgment upon him for his high Opinion of his own Wit, and his Contempt of the Deity. Hubert Walter, and Langton, Archbishops of Canterbury; Walter Bishop of Lincoln, Coleman surnam'd Sapiens, Simon Ash, Richardus Canonicus, William Peregrine, Gervdise of Dover, John Hanvil, Nigell Woreker, Gilbert de Hoiland, Benet of Peterborough, Alexander surnam'd Theologus, Walter Mapis, Gilbert Lesley, Maurice Morgan, John de Fordham, William Leicester, Joceline Brackland, Roger of Crowland, John de St. Omer, and Adam of Barkin, Divines and Mathematicians.

THE LIFE and REIGN OF HENRY III.

A. D. 1216. Reg. 1.

Henry III. crown'd King at Gloucester.

HENRY, the eldest Son of King John, a Child of about ten Years old, was immediately upon the Death of his Father crown'd [a] King of England at Gloucester, October 28. nine Days after his Father's Death; and being, by reason of his Age, unable to manage a Kingdom, especially in such Trouble, he was committed to the Care and Guardianship of the great Marshal, William Earl of Pembroke, a Man eminent both for Courage and Council; who as he had been the grand Supporter of his Father in his Right, so was he the chief Preserver of the Crown to this his Son. Lewis still held his Hopes, and with his Party stood up as his Rival in the Kingdom, which this Loyal Earl made it his first attempt to remove; and to that end, joyning with Wallo the Pope's Legate, the Bishops of Winchester, Bath, and Worcester, used all means to draw the Barons, and others the most powerful Men of their Party, to their new and natural King, from the [b] Excommunicated Stranger and his Adherents. The Proposition was received with some hesitancy at first, because they had obliged themselves by Oath to adhere to Lewis, tho' most of them thought it their Duty to return to their Allegiance, when their old King, the Cause of the Quarrel, was dead, and his Successor gave them such hopes. But at length, observing the Insolence of the French, and how Lewis, contrary to his Oath to them, had subjected all places to Spoil and Plunder to enrich himself and his Nation, and it being discover'd to them by the Viscount Melun, a Frenchman, upon his Death-Bed, that Lewis had vow'd utterly to extinquish [c] the English for their rebellious Humour, when he was compleat Master of the King-

A. D. 1216. Reg. 1.

[a] He was not immediately crown'd King; the Earl of Pembroke brought him to Gloucester, and summon'd the Barons, who were on the late King's side, to meet him there; when they were met, he made a Speech to them in behalf of the young Prince, and was oppos'd by the Earl of Chester: But at last they all agreed, that he should be their King, crying (says the Author of this Passage) as if divinely inspir'd, Fiat Rex, Fiat Rex; Let him be made King, Let him be made King. Walter Hemingford Chron. He was crown'd with a plain Circle or Chaplet of Gold, for want of a Regal Diadem.

[b] The Pope had been very zealous for King John in his Life-time, against Lewis and the Barons, and had Excommunicated them with wonderful Solemnity, to deter the People from joyning with them; and after his Death, Wallo the Pope's Legate us'd the same methods to secure the Succession to the young Prince Henry, causing Lewis and his Party to be anathematiz'd in all Churches every Sunday and Holiday, and interdicting Wales for assisting him; in which, tho' the Pope shew'd his Good-will, yet the Spiritual Sword would have done this young Prince little good, had not the Temporal joyn'd with it, in the Hand of that Noble, Loyal, and Couragious Person, the Earl of Pembroke.

[c] Other Historians say, That Lewis, and sixteen of his greatest Lords, swore, That if he got the Crown of England, he would banish all those that fought against their King, and seize their Estates; and the Viscount Melun was one of them.

KING HENRY THE III.rd

A. D. 1216. Reg. 1. dom; they took up such an aversion against him, that many of them relinquished their sworn Fidelity, and left him; as many more would have done, had it not been for the Fame of Inconstancy, and the Danger of their Pledges which remained in France. Of those that came over 1217. to Henry from Lewis, the chief Men were William Earl of Salisbury, the King's Uncle, who brought over a considerable Party with him; the Earls of Arundel and Warren; and William the Son and Heir of the Great Marshal, who having been six Months in the Service of Lewis, more out of Policy than Disaffection, return'd again to their Fidelity to their Natural King. Yet Lewis found Assistants enough to keep London, with all the Countries about, a whole Year after: So that the young King was obliged to remain about Gloucester, Worcester, and Bristol, till his vigilant and politick Ministers could find out ways to break their united Forces, and draw them from their strong Hold, the Head of the Kingdom. And this they did first by besieging the Castle of Montsorel in Leicestershire, which belonged to Saer de Quincy Earl of Winchester, a principal Man of Lewis's Party, to relieve which a considerable Body was sent from London, and the adjoyning parts, who after went to Lincoln, and possessed themselves of that City, all but the Castle, which was defended against them for a whole Year by a Noble Lady named Philippa, a Woman of Masculine Courage; tho' of what Family she was, Time hath depriv'd us of the knowledge.

Lewis and his Party overthrown.

The French Forces having here posted themselves, the Earl Marshal, the Protector of the King and Kingdom, with his Son William, the Bishops of Winchester, Salisbury, and Chester; the Earls of Salisbury, Ferrers, and Albemarle; William de Albinet, John Marshall, Jeffrey Lucy, and many other Barons and great Captains, with all the young King's Army (which increas'd daily in their March) came to a place call'd Stow, within eight Miles of Lincoln, where Guallo the Legate (to inspire the Army with Courage and Resolution) caused, upon the Confession of their Sins, the Eucharist to be administer'd to them, and gave them a plenary Absolution of all their Sins; and having afterward accursed Lewis, with all his Adherents, as separated from the Church, they set forward to besiege the City, and assaulted it so violently on all sides, that notwithstanding they made a gallant defence (in which the Earl of Perch was slain, valiantly fighting) the City was taken [a], and all their principal Men made Prisoners; of which these are named, Saer Earl of Winchester, Henry de Bohun Earl of Hereford, Gilbert de Gant, made Earl of Lincoln by Lewis, Robert Fitz-Walter, Richard Montfitchet, William Mowbray, William Beauchamp, William Maudit, Oliver Harcourt, Robert Cressy, William Colevile, William de Ros, Robert de Ropsley, and Ralph Chanduit, Barons, besides four hundred Knights, or Men of Arms, with their Servants, Horse and Foot; by which Victory the King gave Lewis such a blow, that it was the last Battel he ever fought in England. The Spoils of the City, which fell to the King's Party, were very great, it being at that time a place full of Rich Merchants; whom, while they pillaged, they term'd it in Derision Lewis's Fair. Some of the Besiged escap'd out of the Overthrow, but were most of them slain by the Country People in their Passage towards London to Lewis, who upon this Loss sends for more Men into France, and summons all his Party in England to London. The Earl Marshal, with the young King, bend all their Forces immediately thither, intending either to assault the City in their Distraction and Trouble for their Loss, or bring Lewis to some Agreement to relinquish the Kingdom. At their approach, the first being found difficult and dangerous, the latter was propounded; but would not at all be listen'd to by Lewis, until he had received the news, that his Recruits coming out of France were beaten by Philip de Albenie and Hugh de Burgh, with the Forces of the Cinque Ports; and then, being void of all hopes of any future Success, or staying with Safety, he came to this Agreement [b], 'That upon the 'Payment of fifteen thousand Marks for his Voy- 'age he would abjure his Claim to this Kingdom, 'and procure, as far as in him lay, that the King 'his Father should restore the Provinces of France, 'which belong'd to the Kingdom of England; and 'when himself came to the Crown of France, to 'restore them in a peaceable manner, which he 'promis'd by Oath to perform. On the other side, Henry takes his Oath, and the Legate and Protector for him, 'to restore unto the Barons of this Realm, 'and all his other Subjects, all their Rights and 'Inheritances, with those Liberties, for which 'the Contest between the King and People 'began'. A General Pardon is granted, and all Prisoners releas'd on both sides; Lewis is honourably dismiss'd, and attended as far as Dover, from whence he pass'd out of England [d] about Michaelmas, two Years after his first arrival, having been received for the most of that time as King, and more likely to have establish'd himself, and made a Conquest of the Kingdom, than the Norman, because he was invited hither by a strong Party, and maintain'd by others Arms: But God, who is the wise Disposer of all things, order'd it otherwise, and sav'd us from a foreign Enemy. Thus were the Destructions wrought among the English by the Violences and Oppressions of an unruly King again composed, and the Son, notwithstanding the Father's Faults, received by the People, who are naturally given to love and obey their Princes, unless forced by Oppression, and despair of Redress, to vindicate their own Rights and Privileges. In this Settlement Guallo was a chief Instrument, tho' more for his own Ends, and the Pope's Interest, than the real advantage of the Kingdom; and so what he did was less worthy of Thanks or Reward: Yet, because his Service was advantageous to the King, he was well paid for his pains; and notwithstanding the great distress of the Kingdom, carry'd away with him to Rome twelve thousand Marks.

Wallo rewarded for his Service.

The Nation being thus eased of the principal Cause of her Disturbance, began to hope for Days of Peace and Quietness; but this could not be effected, so long as many troublesome Members, who had no way to live but in Wars and Confusion, remain'd in it. For many of the Nobles, who had sided with the King, being unsatisfied in their Expectations, and having no Estates to maintain their Greatness, fell to mutiny, 1222. Second Parliament. at London, by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Stephen Langton, put in mind of his Oath made by himſelf, and taken by others for him at the Conclusion of the Peace with Lewis, to confirm the Liberties of the Kingdom; for which there had been ſuch bloody Contentions with his Father and without which the Peace now ſettled would not hold, adviſing him timely to prevent the miſerable Inconveniences of ſuch Conteſts, and ratifie their Ancient Laws and Liberties. Some of his Miniſters oppos'd the Propoſition (of whom one William Brewer a Counſellor was one) and urged, That his Promiſe and Oath was conſtrain'd, and ought not to be perform'd, but their Advice prevail'd not ſo far as to hinder it: For the King promis'd to ratifie them, and to that end twelve Knights, or other ſufficient Men of every Shire were ſent into the Nation, and charged to examine the Laws and Liberties, which the Kingdom enjoy'd under his Grandfather, and return the ſame by a certain Day. This Delay ſhew'd too great a Compliance with thoſe that counſell'd him againſt it, and was look'd upon as a ſhift by ſeveral of the Nobility, whoſe Affections towards him cooled upon this Denial: For preſently the Earls of Cheſter and Albemarle, with many other great Men and Officers, met at Leiceſter to conſult upon removing from the King Hugh de Burgh, Chief Juſtice, and other Officers about him, who were ſuppos'd to hinder this Motion. But the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, with his Spiritual Power, and the reſt of the Nobility, who were careful to preſerve the Peace of the Kingdom, ſtood up in the Defence of the King, and would not ſuffer any violent Proceedings in that kind as yet; and ſo the Lords effected nothing at that time, but were conſtrain'd to come in and ſubmit themſelves. At this Parliament His Reſumptions. the King by an Act reſum'd ſuch Lands, as had been alienated from the Crown by his Anceſtors [e], that he might have Revenue ſufficient to maintain his Kingly Dignity without preſſing his Subjects; but theſe were not enough to do it, for in the next Year another [f] Parliament was held at Third Parliament. Weſtminſter, wherein he requir'd the 50th part of all moveable Goods, both of the Clergy and Laity, for the Recovery of thoſe Countries in France, which Lewis the preſent King, contrary to his Oath and Promiſe, made in England before his Departure, with-held from this Crown: And tho' this Motion much concern'd the Honour and Dignity of the Kingdom (being the Inheritance of the King, and moſt of his Nobility, which no doubt they were very deſirous to recover) yet they would not grant this Subſidy until their Liberties were confirm'd; which in The Liberties of the Nation confirm'd. the end they obtain'd in the ſame Words and Form as King John had granted them in the two Charters aforeſaid, and twelve Knights or ſufficient Men were choſen in every Shire, and ſworn to part the old Foreſts from the new, and all ſuch Foreſts as had been made ſince, or Lands added to Foreſts, ſince the firſt Coronation of Henry II. to be diſforeſted and diſpoſed to ſuch Perſons as were the lawful Owners of them. [e] The Reſumptions began in the Year 1224. and were not done by Authority of Parliament. The King began with the Earl of Cheſter, and demanded Reſtitution of certain Lands that had formerly belong'd to the Crown, the Earl being too weak to ſtand out againſt the King, now the Nation was in Peace, reſign'd them, and other Barons follow'd his Example. Hol. p. 205.

The King revokes the Charter of Forests. Fourth Parliament.

Two Years were these Liberties enjoy'd by the Kingdom with general Peace and Content, where the King called a Parliament at Oxford, and there declaring himself to be of Age, and free from a Guardianship, to dispose of the Affairs of the Kingdom, he disannuls and cancels the Charter of Forests, as being granted in his Nonage, when he had no Power of himself or Seal, and therefore of no Force; and causes Proclamation to be made, That the Clergy and all others, that would enjoy their Liberties, must come and have their Charters renew'd and confirm'd again under his new Seal; for which they were forc'd to pay, not according to their Abilities, but as the Chief Justice Hugh de Burgh pleased, who bore the Blame of the Fact, and the Hatred of all the People; but this bred a new Insurrection of the Nobility against the King upon this Occasion. Richard Earl of Cornwall, the King's Brother, had the Castle of Barkamsted belonging to his Earldom, which the King seiz'd upon without the Earl's Consent, and put it into the Custody of one Walleran, a Dutchman. The Earl returning out of Gascoigne with Forces, flush'd with Honour, seizes upon his Castle, and turn'd out Walleran. The King hearing it, commands his Brother to restore the Castle to Walleran, which he had given him for his good Services, or depart the Kingdom. The Earl answers, That he would do neither, without the Judgment of his Peers; and so departed to his House, leaving the King much disturb'd at his Answer. Hugh de Burgh, Chief Justice, fearing a Disturbance of the Peace, advises the King to apprehend the Earl, and commit him to close Custody; but the Earl either guessing at the Effect of the King's Anger, or having notice of his Design, flies presently to Marlborough, where he finds William Earl Marshal his Friend and Confederate by Oath, with whom he went to Stamford. While he remain'd here, the Nobility, who were lately under a great Discontent for his cancelling of their Liberties and Charters, flocked to him, and seem'd to abett his Quarrel. The Heads and Leaders of them were the Earls of Chester, Gloucester, Warren, Hereford, Warwick, Ferrers, and many others, who being attended with a considerable Force of arm'd Men, send to the King to advise him to desist from injuring his Brother, of which they accus'd Hugh de Burgh of being the Cause and not himself, and require Restitution to be made immediately of the Liberties of the Forests, which he had lately cancell'd at Oxford; which if he refus'd to do, they would compel him to it by the Sword. The King, to avoid this impending Danger, appoints them a Day to meet them in a [a] Parliament at Northampton, where they at length came to an Agreement; and the King to satisfie his Brother, restor'd to him his Castle, and gave him besides, his Mother's Dower, and all the Lands that the Earls of Britain and Bologne held in England, and so the Parliament was dismiss'd. After the Dissolution of this Parliament, there was a Motion made for the Holy War, which found so great Entertaiment in that credulous and zealous Age, that sixty thousand able Men are said to have undertaken that Voyage under the Command of Peter Bishop of Winchester, and William Bishop of Exeter.

Fifth Parliament.

About this time the King receiv'd a fresh Invitation by Hugh le Brun Earl of March, who had marry'd his Mother, from the Nobles of Gascoigne, Poictou, and Normandy, to come over in Person into France to recover his Right, upon the great Alterations which happen'd there on this Occasion. Lewis VIII. the Son and Successor of Philip II. being dead, after his great Siege of Avignon, and his War with the Albingenses in Provence, left his Son Lewis, a Child of twelve Years old, to inherit his Throne; who being too young to manage the Affairs of a Kingdom, his Mother Blanch took the Regency of it upon her in his Minority. This Action so discontented the Princes of the Blood, that they rebell'd, as holding it both dishonourable and dangerous, that a Woman and a Stranger should by the Counsel of the Spaniards (whom she entertain'd and preferr'd above the Natives of the Kingdom) govern all according to her Pleasure, and therefore joyn'd in a League against her. The Chief of them were Philip Earl of Bologne, the King's Uncle by Father side, Robert Earl of Champaigne, Peter de Dreux Duke of Britain, and Robert Earl of Dreux, his Brother, and with them Hugh the Earl of March took part, being instigated to it by his Wife the late Queen of England, who was angry with the Queen Regent for requiring her Husband to do Homage to her Son Alphonso lately made Duke of Poictou, by which she thought her Greatness would be much lessen'd, and drew in his Brother the Earl of Lusignan into that Conspiracy: But not thinking themselves able to oppose the Power of the Queen, they invited the King of England over to assist them. Henry readily accepts their Desires; and having supply'd himself with Money for this Occasion, by exacting great Sums of the Clergy, and [b] City of London for their Liberties; and by taking a third part of all the Goods of the Jews, passed over with a great Army, lands at St. Malo's [c], and is there met by many Nobles of Poictou, who with the Earl of Britain did him Homage, and assisted him in making great Preparations to obtain his Provinces, which had been gotten from his Father by the King of France. The Queen Regent raises a powerful Army to stop the Proceedings of the King of England, and much Mischief was done by both sides in Poictou, Xaintonges, and Angoumois, as well to their Friends as Enemies; but at length they were both weary of their fruitless Quarrel, and came to a Peace. The King of England having expended a great Mass of Treasure, and lost divers of his Nobles and valiant Men in this Expedition, returned home; bringing with him the Earl of Britain, and many of the chief Men of Poictou to receive their promis'd Reward, for which farther Sums must be wrung from the poor People of England. And first to the Earl of Britain, by whose Counsels he was now chiefly directed and dissuaded from a Marriage with the King of Scots Sister, which he had entertain'd with great dislike of his Nobility, he gave five thousand Marks, and to the Poictovines the Preferments which he got by displacing his Officers, Receivers, and such as he thought fit to call to an account, and cast out under a Pretence of defrauding him; of whom the chief were Ralph Bretton, Treasurer of his Chamber, whom he imprison'd and fin'd, and Hugh de Burgh his Chief Justice, who had been a principal Man with him, was cast out of his Office, and Steven de Segrave, a worse

Minister

Minister a great deal for the Kingdom put in: But no sooner was this great Man fall'n under the King's Displeasure, but whole Loads of Accusations were brought against him. The Citizens of London charge him with the Murther of one Constantine, who was slain in a Riot in St. James's Fields some Years before, and crave Justice for his Blood. Others bring all the Crimes that Malice could invent or urge against him: So that to avoid the Rage of his Enemies [a], he was forced to fly to the Church of Merton for Sanctuary, but the Sacredness of the Place could not protect him from his Enemies; for being pursu'd by arm'd Men he was drawn out by Force, and committed to Prison. This Breach of Privilege of Sanctuary being heard of by the Bishop of London, in whose Diocess it was; he made his Complaint to the King, and prevail'd so far with him, that Hubert was brought back again to the same Chapel. But this would not secure him from the King's Displeasure; for the King commannded the Sheriffs of Hartford and Sussex to set a strong Guard about the Chapel, that no Sustenance could be brought to him, and so starv'd him into a Compliance: So that he came out and submitted himself to the King's Mercy, and by him was sent Prisoner to the Devises; and his Money, then in the Custody of the Templars, seiz'd upon for the King's Use, as stoll'n out of the Exchequer. Walter, Bishop of Carlile, was put out of his Office of Treasurer, and William Rodon, Knight, deprived of his Place of Marshal of the King's House, and all the Counsellors, Bishops, Earls, and Barons of the Kingdom, were removed for Distrust, and Strangers put into their Places; Peter, Bishop of Winchester, and one Peter de Rivalis being blam'd as the Authors of these Changes.

The Lords combine for the Defence of the Kingdom, and refuse to come to a Parliament at Oxford.

These injurious and arbitrary Actions in the King so exasperated the Nobility, that many of them under the Command of Richard Earl Marshal enter'd into a League for the Defence of the publick Liberties, boldly shewing the King 'his Error, and unadvised Actings, in preferring 'Strangers to be the chief Officers about him to 'the Disgrace and Injury of his own Natural 'Subjects, contrary to their Laws and Liberties; 'and telling him, That unless he would reform 'these Abuses, whereby his Crown and Dignity 'was in imminent Danger, they would with-'draw themselves from his Council. The Bishop 'of Winchester return'd them Answer; That it 'was lawful for the King to employ what Stran-'gers he pleas'd, about him, for the Defence of 'his Crown and Kingdom, that he might by 'that means bring his proud and rebellious Sub-'jects to their Duty and Allegiance. This Reply bred such Dissatisfaction in the Lords, that they went away in great Anger, and vow'd, That in a Cause of that general Concern to all Englishmen, they would spend their Lives. The King fearing what might follow, immediately sent for whole Legions of Poictovins, and withal summon'd the Lords to a Parliament in Oxford, to try whether they would come or no to it; but the Lords seeing themselves despised at Court, and not thinking it safe to venture themselves among such Multitudes of Strangers as the King had about him, refused to come; nor would be perswaded to it by a second and third Citation. And now the Signs of a publick Breach became so evident, that Robert Bacon, a Preaching Friar, from the Pulpit in a grave Discourse, and Roger Bacon in a jesting way, told the King plainly, That he would make Shipwrack of his Kingdom, if he did not avoid what the Seamen chiefly feared, Petræ & Rupes wittily alluding to the Advice of Peter de Rupibus, Bishop of Winchester, by whom he was misled at this Juncture. But the King proceeded in other Methods, and call'd another Parliament at Westminster, and summon'd the Lords to it; but they dealt now more plainly with him, and sent him word, That they would not come, unless he would remove the Bishop of Winchester and the Poictovins from his Court; which, if he refused to do, they would expel him and his evil Counsellors out of the Realm, and create a new King. These bold Threats, which sounded harsh in the King's Ears, caused him to require of all his Nobility Pledges of their Allegiance by a certain Day, and to issue out his Writs to all, who held any Lands of him by Knights Service to repair to him at Gloucester; which being both refus'd by the Earl Marshal and his Confederates, the King without the Judgment of his Court, or their Peers, proclaim'd them Outlaws, and seiz'd upon their Lands, which he gave to the Poictovins, and sent out his Writs to attach their Bodies in any Place of his Kingdom. The Bishop of Winchester to weaken the Earl Marshal's Party, drew away from them the Earls of Chester and Lincoln by a Gift of a thousand Marks, and the King by his Kindness won from them his Brother the Earl of Cornwall. The Lords being a little weaken'd by these Losses, withdrew into Wales, and there strengthen'd their Party by a Confederacy with Lewelin, and the other great Men of that Country; who with Hugh de Burgh [b], who was then lately escaped out of the Devises Castle, took an Oath one to another, that they would not come to any Agreement with the King. The King, soon after their Departure, pursues them with an Army into Wales, engages them, but with so much Loss, that he return'd with great Dishonour to Gloucester; and tho' he sought to recover it by new Recruits of Strangers, yet he miss'd of Success. And now Force being found useless, another Stratagem was invented to heal the Difference, by sending a Friar of the Order of Minors, to confer with the Earl Marshal, and perswade him to come in and submit to the King's Mercy, who was inclinable to pardon him, restore him to his Estate, and give him so great a part of Herefordshire besides, as should maintain him in great State and Grandure. The Fryar press'd him very earnestly to submit, telling him, That as it was his Duty, so 'twould be his Advantage and Safety: But the Earl being nothing moved told him, That the King's

[a] Mr. Daniel delivers this Story of Hubert's taking Sanctuary very confusedly and untruly; for the Sanctuary at Merton was not a Chapel, but the Abby-Church, nor was it in the Diocess of the Bishop of London, nor was Hubert taken out of the Sanctuary at Merton by Force: But the Course of this Affair was thus; Hubert having fled to Sanctuary to the Abby-Church at Merton in Surrey, the Citizens of London would have taken him by Force from thence, and were marching in a Body of twenty thousand thither, but were countermanded by the King; and so Hubert abode safe there. After some time Hubert left Sanctuary at Merton, and endeavour'd to get to Bury to his Wife. The King having Intelligence of it, sent Sir Godfrey Crancumb and his Soldiers to intercept him in his Passage; of whom Hubert seeing himself in Danger, took Sanctuary again in Brentwood Chapel in Essex, but Sir Godfrey took him from thence by Force. Roger Bishop of London, in whose Diocese it was, complain'd to the King of Sir Godfrey's Breach of Sanctuary, and procur'd that Hubert was return'd to the Chapel again; but being guarded by the Sheriffs of Hartford and Essex (not Sussex) so that no Provision could be brought to him, he was forc'd to yield himself to the King's Mercy. This Event happen'd in the Year 1232.

[b] King Henry fought the Welsh about Michaelmas, and Hubert de Burgh was in Sanctuary in the Church of the Devises on the 15th of October, as appears by the King's Letter (on the Record of the Tower) to the Good Men of Wiltshire, informing them, That he had sent Ralph de Mowbray and Ralph de Norwich, his Justices, to take Hubert de Burgh's Abjuration of the Kingdom, if he would not come out of the Church and stand to the Law, and if he would do neither, to guard the Church and starve him there.

Promises

Promiſes could not be depended upon ſo long as he had thoſe evil Counſellors about him, who intended only Miſchief to all Loyal Subjects. The Fryar farther urged the Danger he was in from the King's Power: But the Earl concluded, That he fear'd no Danger, and never would relinquiſh the Juſtice of his Cauſe to yield to the King's Will, which was guided by no Reaſon, and was the Cauſe of ſo much Injuſtice; for he valu'd Right and Honour more than all Worldly Poſſeſſions. This Negotiation therefore proving ineffectual, the War went on furiouſly on both ſides with an Effuſion of Blood, all the Borders of Wales as far as Shrewſbury being laid waſt. But at length a way was found to draw the Earl Marſhal into Ireland to defend his Eſtate there, which being very large, was ſeiz'd upon and ſpoil'd by the King's Commiſſion: And here in recovering of his Eſtate, he loſt his Life by Treachery, to the great Grief both of his Enemies and Friends; to whom the King diſown'd his Commiſſion, to excuſe himſef from the Blame of his Death. Two Years theſe Diſturbances continu'd in the Nation, when the King called a Parliament at Weſtminſter, wherein the Biſhop gravely adviſed the King from the Conſideration of his Father's Example, and the Miſchief of theſe civil Diſſentions, to come to an Agreement with his People, and remove thoſe Strangers and others from his Perſon, who were the Cauſe of theſe Troubles, and made him diſaffected to his Subjects; and beſought him to govern his People by his own Subjects and Laws, as other well-govern'd Nations do, otherwiſe they would proceed with Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures both againſt his Counſellors and himſelf. The King ſeeing now no way to compaſs his Deſigns, yields and conſents to call home his Lords out of Wales, and to reſtore them to their Places and Eſtates, to remove all the Strangers from him, and call his new Officers to an Account; whereupon the Biſhop of Winchester, Peter de Rivallis, and Stephen Segrave [a], took Sanctuary, but upon Mediation, and the Payment of great Fines, were reſtor'd to their Liberty, dearly paying for their two Years Preferment.

1235. Iſabel the King's Siſter marry'd to the Emperour.

The King having thus ſettled Affairs in Peace, gave his Siſter Iſabel to the Emperour Frederick II. who ſucceeded Otho in the Empire, and was Grandchild to Frederick Barbaroſſa. The Archbiſhop of Cologne and Duke of Lorain were ſent for her, ſhe was conducted to Sandwich by the King, with a thouſand Horſe, and was married at Wormes. Henry gave the Emperour with her thirty thouſand Marks, beſides an Imperial Crown [b], and other Ornaments of great Value, to furniſh out which he had two Marks upon every Hide of Land, and propounded to himſelf great Advantages by the Alliance; but this Emperour was engag'd in ſuch continual Wars abroad, with four Popes ſucceſſively (viz. Innocent III. Honorius, Innocent IV. and Gregory IX.) who endeavour'd to extort from him his Hereditary Countries in Italy, with his Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, beſides the Troubles he underwent at home by Excommunications, that he was not able to aſſiſt his Friends. He left a Son and Succeſſor Conradus, but with him dy'd all his Imperial Power in Italy. He had one Son by Iſabel King Henry's Siſter, to whom he gave the Kingdom of Sicily, and a thouſand Ounces of Gold; but he liv'd not to enjoy them. The next Year Henry himſelf marry'd Eleanor the Daughter of Raymond Earl of Provence, an Alliance neceſſary by reaſon of ſome private Promiſes made to her Father, but in it ſelf diſadvantageous having no Dower with her, and many poor Kindred to depend upon her: However, there was no Conſideration of theſe Circumſtances at firſt. The Marriage was ſolemniz'd with great Magnificence [c], and ſoon after a Parliament call'd to meet in the Tower [d]; but becauſe the Lords were not willing to aſſemble there, it was remov'd to a Place of greater Freedom. In this Parliament, after many things propounded for the Good of the Kingdom, it was order'd, That ſuch Sheriffs as were found guilty of Bribery ſhould be diſplac'd, and Men of abler Eſtates and Integrity ſhould be put in, who ſhould take an Oath, To receive no Gifts, but of Proviſion, and that but moderately. In it alſo he removed his Steward, and ſome other of his Counſellors, and offer'd to take the Great Seal from the Biſhop of Chichester his Chancellour; but the Biſhop refus'd to deliver it, alledging, That it was entruſted to him by the Common Council of the Kingdom, and without the Conſent of the ſame he would not reſign it; and having carry'd himſelf well in his Office, he was much favour'd by the People. Peter de Rivallis, and Stephen Segrave, were again received into Favour, a great Argument of the mutable Temper of this King, which begat no good Opinion of him among his People. At this time alſo he would have revok'd ſome Grants, by the Pope's Authority, which he had made formerly; becauſe they were done, as he pretended, without the Conſent of the Church, and beyond his Power, which increaſed the Diſpleaſure of the People, before taken up againſt him.

Sheriffs remov'd for Corruptions.

In the twenty firſt Year of his Reign another Parliament was held, or rather the ſame met by Adjournment at London, where in Conſideration of his own and Siſter's Marriage, he requir'd a 30th Part of the Moveables both of the Clergy and Laity: But he met with great Oppoſition from the whole Aſſembly, who recounted the ſeveral Taxes he had already receiv'd of 20th, 30th, and 40th Parts; and alledged, That it was unreaſonable to ſuffer a King, who never did any good to the Kingdom, either by driving out or ſubduing an Enemy, or enlarging its Dominions, but had rather leſſen'd it and made it ſubject to Strangers, to extort ſo many great Sums from his People. The King hearing this, and being deſirous to pacifie this general Murmur, promiſed by Oath, That he would never injure the Nobles of the Kingdom, if they would relieve his preſent Wants, ſince he had exhauſted his Treaſure by the Marriage of his Siſter and himſelf; but they plainly reply'd, 'That both were 'done without their Advice, and they ought not 'to bear the Puniſhment of that, which was not 'their Fault. Yet after four Days Conſultation, the King having promiſed to uſe the Counſel of his Natural Subjects only, and granted them an inviolable Obſervation of their Liberties, under pain of Excommunication, he had the thirtieth part of every Man's Moveables granted him (reſerving to them their ready Money, Horſe and Armour for the Service of the Common-wealth.) For the Collection of this Subſidy, four Knights of every Shire, and one of the King's Clerks were appointed, and ſworn to deliver it, after they had gather'd it, either to ſome Abby, or Caſtle, to be reſerved there; that if the King failed in the performance of his Grants, it might be reſtored to the Country from whence it was collected. Before this Parliament broke up, the King, to ſhew the Realty of his Intentions in performing that promiſe, which he had frequently repeated, of uſing the Counſel of his own Subjects only, cauſed the Earls Warren and Ferrers, with John Fitz-Jeffrey, to be ſworn his Counſellors; but after it was diſmiſſed, he neither gave the Kingdom ſatisfaction concerning Strangers, nor obſerved ſuch a method in levying the Tax as was eaſie and convenient for his Subjects. For he cauſed Men's Eſtates to be overvalued, and made William Valentine, the young Queen's Uncle, his Chief Counſellor; invited over the Earl of Provence, a poor Prince, to ſhare 1238. in his Treaſure; marry'd Simon de Monford[a], a Frenchman, ſecretly to his Siſter Eleanor, (Widow of William Earl of Pembroke, Great Marſhal) and by the Right of his Mother Amice, Daughter of Blanchman Earl of Leiceſter, made him Earl of that County. Theſe Actions of the King much incenſed the Nobility, and all the King's Subjects in general, and put them into a new Commotion, of which Richard Earl of Cornwall, the King's Brother, an ambitious Youth, and Heir apparent to the Crown, was choſen the Head; it chiefly concerning him (as they ſaid) to preſerve the Good of the Kingdom, and remove all deſtructive Grievances from it. Richard accepts this Employment, and going to the King, repreſents the Diſcontents of his People to him, and reproves him for his laviſh Expence of his Treaſure upon Strangers, his heavy Exactions from his People, his impious Gains made of the Vacancies of Arch-biſhopricks and Biſhopricks, Abbies, Earldoms, Baronies, Wardſhip, and Monaſteries; and yet his Treaſure, which ſhould be the ſtrength of his Nation, empty. Moreover, he objected to him his Obſequiouſneſs to the Roman See, and his Fondneſs of the Pope's Legate, without whoſe Advice and Conſent he would do nothing: So that he ſeem'd perfectly the Pope's Feudary, which troubled his People at the Heart. The King upon this plain and ſevere Remonſtrance of his Brother, fearing a Rebellion (after he had try'd the Affections of the Londoners, and found them averſe to him, and by the Pope's Legate ſought to draw his Brother over to him in vain) call'd a Parliament at London, where the Lords came arm'd, both for their own defence, and to conſtrain the King (if he refuſed) to obſerve his former Promiſes, and reform his Courſes. In this Meeting, after ſeveral Debates, the King (having ſworn) refers the whole Controverſie to the Determination of certain Grave Men of his Kingdom, and Articles between both Parties are drawn, ſealed, and publickly ſet up, with the Seals of the Legate, and ſeveral great Men. But before any thing was agreed, Simon de Monford and the Earl of Lincoln having made their Peace with the Earl of Cornwall, he grew cold in the buſineſs; and the other Earls being diſcouraged by his Indifferency, fell off from that Enterpriſe, and ſo nothing was effected, but the Miſeries of the Kingdom continu'd as they had been.

And to ſhew his Inconſtancy in diſpoſing his Favours, he removed Simon Norman, the Maſter of his Seal, yea, as he was call'd, Maſter of the King, Court, and Kingdom, took his Seal from him with diſgrace, and gave it to the Abbot of Eveſham. Likewiſe he turn'd his Brother Jeffrey, a Knight-Templar, out of his Council, becauſe they would not yield to grant to Thomas Earl of Flanders, the Queen's Uncle, a Groat upon every Sack of Wool; in which Action, tho' they loſt the King's Favour, yet they regain'd the good Opinion of the Nobility and People of the Nation, who having often deſired their Removal from the King's Council, as corrupt Officers, were found by this Deed better Friends to the Kingdom than they were imagined; and proved, that Officers under bad Princes are not many times ſo faulty as the World thinks them. But notwithſtanding this, the King granted to the Earl of Flanders three hundred Marks to be paid annually out of his Exchequer.

Beſides the great Exactions of this King, the Biſhop of Rome, to maintain his Wars againſt the Emperor, extorted great Sums from the Kingdom through the permiſſion of the King; which ſo encouraged the Pope, that he was ſo bold as to ſeize upon their Poſſeſſions, ſending over three hundred of the Roman-Clergy, and commanding by his Mandate that they ſhould be preferr'd to the firſt Benefices that fell, which much amazed the Clergy in general, and eſpecially Edmund Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who foreſeeing that theſe Encroachments upon the Liberties of the Church would tend to his diſgrace and damage, who ſhould withſtand it, gave over all, and retired into the Abby of Pontiniac in France, to ſpend his Life in Contemplation; but before his departure, he gave eight hundred Marks to the Pope as a Ranſom for his Church[b]. But the other Clergy bore not the Pope's Uſurpations ſo cowardly; for beſides their open and daily Exclamations againſt the Pope's Avarice, they made[c] as ſtrong an Oppoſition to his Rapine as they could; and that they might do it the moſt effectually, they repair to the King, and repreſent it to him, how prejudicial and derogatory it was to his Regal Power, and Liberty of the Kingdom, to ſuffer ſuch Proceedings, which none of his Predeceſſors would ever endure, and would be of dangerous Conſequence to his Succeſſors. The King, either not apprehenſive of the Miſchief, or content to joyn with the Pope to puniſh and awe his Kingdom, not only refers all to the Legate, but offers to deliver up the chief Opposers of the Pope's Impositions to him; which so encouraged the Pope's Legate, that he more peremptorily urges them to supply the Pope's present Wants, and calls a Convocation at London for effecting the same. The Clergy, tho' deserted by the King, yet stood stoutly to the Privileges of their Nation, and told the Legate, 'That the 'Contribution now required of them by the Pope 'for the Destruction of the Emperor, and the 'Effusion of Christian Blood, was unlawful; he 'not being an Heretick, nor condemn'd as such 'by the Judgment of the Church, tho' Excommunicated: That it was against the Liberties 'of the Church of England, being required under 'pain of Ecclesiastical Censure, as a thing of Servitude and Compulsion: That they had heretofore given a Tenth to the Pope, upon Condition that he should not exact any thing of them 'for the future, lest it be drawn into a Custom; 'for as much as Binus actus inducat consuetudinem: 'That they should create an Enemy to themselves by it, and hinder their Passage to Rome 'through the Emperor's Dominions: That they 'should impoverish the King by it, who had many Enemies, and could not live without War 'long, which would not be safe for the Kingdom: 'That the Church having made divers Contributions for the furnishing out many Noblemen 'for the Holy War, was so poor as hardly to be 'able to sustain it self: That General Contributions were to be made by a General Council, &c. These Reasons somewhat stagger'd the Legate; but not daring to desist from his attempt, he first won the most powerful Opponents with Promises of Preferment, after which the rest were forced to yield: And so the Pope prevail'd in this business by Treachery, and Division of the Council.

[c] The Students in Oxford, griev'd and incens'd at the Oppreſſions of the Church, aſſaulted the Legate's Houſe in his abode there, and kill'd his own Brother; for which Fact the Univerſity was Interdicted, and could not be releas'd from that Infliction but by thirty Students going Barefoot to the Legate's Houſe from St. Paul's, which was a Mile. Matt. Paris writes, He was honourably receiv'd by the Scholars, and that the Occaſion of the Quarrel was this: A poor Iriſh Student begging Alms at the Kitchin-Door of Oſney-Abby, where the Legate lay, his Cook threw a Ladle full of Boiling Water in his Face; a Welſh Parſon or Clerk ſeeing this, and having a Bow in his Hand, ſhot the Legate's Cook through the Body with an Arrow, and a Fray enſu'd between his Servants and the Scholars; the King ſent Earl Warren with ſome Soldiers to aſſiſt the Legate, the Earl brought him off; and with much ado the haughty Prelate was prevail'd upon to accept of the ſlaviſh Submiſſion the Scholars were forc'd to make him.

Edward the Prince born.

The King about this time had a Son born[a], whom he named Edward; and Richard Earl of Cornwall, having also issue, was at this time allow'd by the Nation to undertake the Cross, (which he was deny'd before) with whom his Uncle William Longsword Earl of Salisbury, and many other Noblemen, joyn in the Expedition. After their departure, Peter of Savoy, another of the

After this the King made another Expedition into

Wales, which had often put him to great Charge and Trouble, but all in vain, so long as Lewellin the Prince or King of North-Wales liv'd; but he being dead, his two Sons, David and Griffin, among whom his State was divided, fell into Quarrels one with another, and so made themselves a Prey to their common Enemy. For David calling Henry to his assistance, did him Homage for his own part to assist him to conquer the other; and so without Labour or Charge (for David paid the Charges of his Journey) he became Master of that which he could not purchase before with much Blood.

The Earl of March, with his Wife, the Queen Dowager, and many other great Lords of Poictou, sollicit the King again to undertake an Expedition into France, to recover his Dominions there, and by their Assurances of Success, so prevail'd with him, that he resolves upon it, and moves it to a Parliament for their Assistance: But the Design met with a general Opposition, it being alledg'd, 'That it was a great Expence, and the 'last Attempt was very prejudicial to the King- 'dom; and besides, That it was unlawful to 'break the Truce made with the King of France, 'who was now too strong for them to do any 'good, &c. Yet these Arguments did not deter many of the Nobility from listening to it, being allur'd by fair Promises, and hopes of Recovery of their Estates; and so the Action was resolv'd on, and an Aid demanded for it. But a Motion for Money, after so many Taxes as this King had had from the beginning of his Reign, was very distasteful, and begat nothing but a fresh Memory of the heavy Impositions of Carucage, Hydage, Escuage, Escheats, Amercements, and several parts of their Moveables, which the King had received of them, besides the Exactions of the Pope, and their Expences for the Holy War, they would grant no more, especially considering, that the thirtieth part of their Moveables, which was levy'd about four Years before, and laid up in the Castles, and not to be deliver'd out but by the allowance of four Peers, could not be spent, the King to their knowledge having had no necessary occasion to employ it for the Publick. The King seeing this, comes in Person to the Parliament, and in a most submissive manner craves their Aid at this time; shewing them a Letter from the Pope to persuade them. But all he could do prov'd in vain, they had vow'd not to yield to any Sollicitations, and so they held out. Whereupon the King was forced to get what he could of private Men, either by Loan or Gift; with whom he found so much Interest, as that he carry'd over with him thirty Barrels of Money; and so taking the Queen along with him, he went over into France, leaving the Government to the Archbishop of York; having contracted for his greater Security an Alliance with the King of Scots, by the dition was as unsuccessful and unfortunate to him as the first; for in it he spent all his Treasure upon Strangers, discontented the English Nobility, (who for that reason left him) and being deceived by the Poictovines, whom he trusted, was after an whole Year's stay forced to make a dishonourable Truce[b] with the King of France; nor could return home, till he had received Provision out of England, and a Tax of Escuage to defray the Charges of his Passage.

tribution of the Londoners, and was visited by his Wife's Mother, the Countess of Provence, who bringing with her her Daughter Zanchia, was sumptuously Feasted, and a Marriage shortly after solemnized between the young Lady and Richard Earl of Cornwall, the King's Brother, whose Wife was lately dead, and himself returned from the Holy Wars. The old Countess at her departure was presented with many Rich Gifts, besides the four thousand Marks which she had yearly from the King, upon an Agreement, that he should after her decease have the Earldom of Provence; which yet she disappointed him of soon after her return home, giving the same with her youngest Daughter Beatrix to Charles the French King's Brother, who was after King of Naples and Sicily: So that she liv'd to see all her four Daughters Queens, Richard Earl of Cornwall being elected King of the Romans.

After these large Expences of the King's in Marriages and Entertainments, there happen'd an occasion for farther Supplies for the necessary Defence of the Kingdom against the Inroads of the Scots and Welsh, who now revolted. The King had now no way to raise Money but by the Parliament, which was therefore assembled at Westminster this Year, Anno Regn. 28. and the King's just Occasions urged and pressed upon them, but nothing could be effected without an Assurance of a Reformation, and the due Execution of Laws, tho' the King came to it in Person; and to this end it was insisted on, That four of the most grave and prudent Peers should be chosen Conservators of the Kingdom, and being sworn of his Majesty's Privy Council, should see Justice duly administred, the Treasure frugally and wisely expended, and always attend upon the King: That the Lord Chief Justice, Lord Chancellor, two Justices of the Benches, and two Barons of the Exchequer, should be chosen by the Parliament: That as their Office was publick, so should their Election be. But while these things were debating, the Enemy of Mankind, and the Disturber of Peace, the Devil (saith Matt. Paris) hinder'd the Accomplishment of them by the coming of one Martin, a new Legate from the Pope, with a larger Power to exact Money upon the Kingdom than ever, which he supposed was now moulded so, as to yield to any thing; but he soon found himself mistaken: For the Parliament gave him a bad Reception, and sent him home with this unpleasant Message, 'That the Kingdom was poor, 'and involv'd in Wars: That the Church was in 'debt, and not able to give any thing: That 'these Impositions were of ill Consequence to 'the Kingdom, which would thus seem exposed 'to the Pope's Pleasure; and therefore since a 'General Council was shortly to meet at Lyons, 'if the Church wanted any Relief, it is fit it 'should be done by a General Consent in that 'Council. And indeed the Parliament were encouraged the rather to give this Answer to the Pope at this time, because they had received Letters from the Emperor Fredericke, which were read in the Assembly, desiring, 'That the Pope 'might have no Supplies out of England, which 'were only to uphold him in his Oppression of 'the Empire, whose Cities and Castles he had, 'contrary to all Justice and Piety, seized; and 'to detain them from him, had proceeded against 'him in all foul and hostile ways, to Excommunicate and make War against him: That he had 'referred his Cause to the Arbitration of the 'Kings of England and France, and the Barons 'of both Kingdoms, and hoped that they would 'not take part with his Enemy, whom he had 'made his Judges: Adding in the Conclusion, 'That if the King would be advised by him, he 'should free his Kingdom from that unjust Tribute which Innocent III. and other Popes had 'laid upon it. The Interposition of this Affair took up so much time, that nothing was done in this Parliament more, besides a Tax granted to the King for the Marriage of his Daughter, twenty Shillings of every Knight's Fee, and that with much unwillingness, and a Repetition of all his former Taxes. Having obtained it, he undertook an Expedition against Alexander King of Scots, and commanded all his Barons, both Laymen and Ecclesiastick, which held any Lands of him in Capite, to attend him with all military Provisions, and Thomas Earl of Flanders, with sixty Knights, and an hundred Servants, came over to assist him; which was taken ill by the Barons, because it shew'd, that the Strength of the Kingdom was not thought sufficient for that Action; but it was suddenly ended by a fair Conclusion of a Peace with that King, who is highly commended by the Writers of those Times for a Virtuous Prince. Being arrived at London again, he calls another Parliament in the Winter, and moves for a Tax to enable him to go against the Welsh, and pay his other Debts, which, as he urged, were so great, that he could not stir out of his Chamber for the Clamour of such as he ow'd Money to for Wine, and other Necessaries of his House; but they told him unanimously to his Face, they would grant him nothing. Whereupon he fell upon violent Courses to supply his Wants, viz. He quarrell'd with the Londoners, and made them pay fifteen thousand Marks: He gives a Commission to one Passeleve his Clerk to enquire out all such as had encroached upon his Forests, and fine them severely; which he did with so much Rigour, that tho' he undid many of the King's Subjects, he filled the King's Treasure, and had gotten himself a Bishoprick, as a Reward of his Fidelity, (viz. the Bishoprick of Chichester) but that the Bishops opposed the King in it.

And now, that the King might be acquainted with the State of the Nation, and the Oppression of the Popes, it was appointed, that an Enquiry should be made throughout the Kingdom, what Revenues the Romans and Italians had out of England; and it was found that they received sixty thousand Marks, which was more than the Yearly Revenues of the Crown of England; which so moved the King, that he caused the same to be represented to the General Assembly at Lyons[a], with other the Pope's Exactions. This Complaint (with the ill usage of his Legate Martin) so angred the Pope, that he is said to have utter'd these words, It is high time that we make a quick end with the Emperor, that we may crush these petty Kings, (viz. of France and England) For if the Dragon be once appeased or destroyed, the lesser Snakes will soon be trodden down. This impious Speech from a Mouth which should have utter'd nothing but Words of Peace and Charity, gave great Offence, and awaken'd those Princes to secure themselves; but chiefly the King and Clergy of England, who were always most forward to vindicate the State and Church from his Oppression: For upon the Pope's rejecting the Consideration of the Grievances of England, particularly deliver'd to him by the King's Procurators at this Council at Lyons, and despising the King's Message, (who, he said, began to Frederize) it was peremptorily ordain'd, under great Penalty, That no Contribution of Money should be given to the Pope by any Subject of England; and the [b] King so strenuously opposed these Exactions, as gave some hopes that they would now cease. But being of a timorous and fickle Temper, he soon gave over the pursuit of what he had bravely begun; and so the Pope continued his Rapine. And tho' through the Exclamations of the Clergy he promised

[b] The King himself gave the Parliament a List of those Grievances which the Kingdom labour'd under, and which requir'd a speedy Redress. 1. That the Pope extorted great Sums of Money from his Subjects without his assent. 2. That he depriv'd Patrons of their Right of Presentations to Benefices by his Provisions. 3. That he oppress'd his Subjects by insufferable Pensions, by requiring Appeals, by dispensing with Oaths, Customs and Grants, and the King was zealous to have them reform'd by Law.

And as the Church, ſo alſo the State, found great Cauſe of Complaint. For Peter de Savoy, Earl of Richmond, brought over ſeveral young Virgins to be marry'd to the King's Wards, young Noblemen of Edgland, of which Edmund Earl of Lincoln had one, and Richard de Burgh another; and the ſame Year three of the King's Brothers, by Mother-ſide, *viz. 1247. Thomas of Savoy alſo (ſome time Earl of Flanders, in right of his Wife) came with his Siſter Beatrix, Counteſs of Provence, the Queen's Mother, and they were greatly Treated and Gifted at the Expence of the People. Theſe things were alſo repreſented to the King by the Parliament, which met in London in Candlemas-Term, and boldly reproved the King for his breach of Promiſe (upon his requiring another Supply) having vow'd and declar'd (at the Grant of the laſt Tax) by his Charter, 'That he would never 'injure the State again in that kind: They 'blame him alſo for taking up Proviſions of 'Wine, Dyet, Silks, &c. of the Sellers againſt 'their Wills, to the great Diſcouragement of 'Merchandize: That his Judges went their Cir-'cuits under a pretence of doing Juſtice to fleece

They 'reprove him alſo for holding the Biſhopricks 'and Abbies in his Hands vacant, contrary to 'the Liberties of the Church, and his Oath made 'at his Coronation. Laſtly, They all complain'd 'in general, that the Chief Juſtice, Chancellor 'and Treaſurer, were not made by the Common 'Council of the Kingdom, as they had been in 'the time of his Predeceſſors, as was convenient 'they ſhould; but ſuch were advanced to thoſe 'places of Truſt, as wholly ſought how to pleaſe 'him, and profit themſelves, without regarding 'the Advantage of the Kingdom. The King pa-tiently endured all this Reproof, and gives them Promiſes of Redreſs, in hopes to obtain his Deſires; but nothing was granted, becauſe they were reſolv'd to ſee how the King would behave himſelf towards them firſt, and accordingly obey and ſatisfie him; and after many Debates they were prorogu'd till Midſummer. But this Delay produced no good Advantage: The King grew more harſh and ſevere to his People, inſomuch that at the next Seſſion he made a Speech to them to this effect: 'Would you curb your King and 'Lord at your pleaſure, and impoſe a Servile 'Condition upon him? Will you proudly deny 'him that which every one of you hath power 'to do? It is lawful for every one of you to 'take whoſe Counſel he pleaſes, and for every 'Maſter of a Family to prefer whom he pleaſes 'to any Office, and remove him from it as he 'will; and will you raſhly deny your Lord and 'Sovereign to do the like? 'who muſt ſubmit to your pleaſure. Wherefore he anſwers them plainly, That he would not remove the Chief Juſtice, Chancellor, or Treaſurer at their Deſire; and ſo he replied to their other Objections, requiring poſitively a Tax, which he ſaid concern'd their Right as well as his: And ſo the Parliament broke up in great Diſcontent. The King being now left to furniſh his own Wants, ſold all his Plate and Jewels, being told, That as Rivers return'd to the Sea, ſo they would revert to him again. The City of London bought them; which, when the King heard, he inveigh'd againſt it[b], and ſought all ways to draw the Trade from it.

A. D. 1248. Reg. 32.

The Chriſtmas following he paſſed without any Royal Magnificence, meanly requiring New-years Gifts of the Londoners; and ſhortly after writes to them imperious Letters to aid him with Money, which at length with much unwillingneſs they conſented to do, to the Sum of twenty thouſand Pound; for which, the next Year after, he craved Pardon of them, ſending for them to Weſtminſter Hall. And notwithſtanding his continual taking up all Proviſions for his Houſe, yet he ſo leſſen'd his Hoſpitality, (introducing, ſay they, the Roman way of Living) that it was held very diſhonourable, and unuſual to the Engliſh Magnificence of their Kings. Then, whereas he could obtain nothing of his Parliament, he either ſends for, or writes to every Nobleman apart, declaring his Poverty, and that he was bound by a Charter in a Debt of thirty thouſand Pound to thoſe of Burdeaux, and the Gaſcoignes, ever ſince he was laſt in France; notwithſtanding which, he required nothing of them, but in Favour; which, where he found, he would return the like. But he could obtain nothing of them, no more than of the Biſhops, to whom he addreſſed the ſame Requeſts. By much Importunity he got an hundred Pound of the Abbot of Ramſey; but the Abbot of Borough deny'd him the like Sum, tho' the King told him, That it was more Alms to give to him, than to a Beggar that went from Door to Door. The Abbot of St. Albans was more yielding, and gave him ſixty Marks. To ſuch a lowneſs did the Neceſſities of this King, through his own Laviſhneſs, bring him. But tho' his own Subjects felt not the weight of his Wants, yet the Jews did, whom he always polled at every low ebb of his Fortunes. One Abraham, who was found delinquent, was forced to pay ſeven hundred Marks for his Redemption. Aaron, another Jew, proteſted, That the King had ſince his Voyage into France taken from him at times thirty thouſand Marks of Silver, beſides two hundred Marks of Gold, which he had preſented to the Queen. And in like manner he uſed many other of the Jews.

1250. The Lords meet again at London, and urge the King with his Promiſe made to them, That the Chief Juſtice, Chancellor and Treaſurer ſhould be conſtituted by the General Council of the Kingdom; but by reaſon that Richard Earl of Cornwall was not preſent, which was thought to have been on purpoſe, they could not obtain their Deſire; ſo that the Diſcontents of both ſides ſtill remained, to the great Diſtraction of the Nation, and great Strugglings were on both parts. But tho' the King could get nothing for himſelf, he was very zealous to gain ſomething for others, eſpecially to prefer his Brother Athelmar to the Biſhoprick of Durham; and to that end, endeavours all he could to perſuade the Covent to chuſe him. But he could not prevail, becauſe of his Youth and Inſufficiency: Wherefore he tells them,

Shortly after the Biſhoprick of Winchester became void, and thither he immediately ſends his Agents to prepare the Monks of that Cathedral to elect his Brother; and that he might not meet with a Denial from them, he went down thither in Perſon, enters the Chapter Houſe, as a Biſhop or Prior, gets up into the Preſident's Chair, begins a Sermon, and takes this Text, Juſtice and Peace have kiſſed each other; and thereupon uſes theſe Words, 'To me and other Kings, and to our 'Princes and Judges, who are to govern the Peo'ple, belongs the Adminiſtration of Judgment 'and Juſtice. To you, who are Men of Religion 'and Piety, Peace and Tranquillity: And this 'Day I hear that you have for your own Ad'vantage been favourable to my Requeſt, and 'ſo Juſtice and Peace have kiſſed each other. 'I was angry once with you for oppoſing me in 'the Election of William Rale, your late Biſhop, 'a Man that I lik'd not; but now I am Friends 'with you for this Election, and will both re'member and reward your Kindneſs. As by a 'Woman came the Deſtruction of the World, ſo 'by a Woman came the Remedy. I to ſatisfie 'my Wife, who was deſirous to prefer her Un'cle William Valentine, diſquieted and damni'fied you; ſo now being willing to advance my 'Brother by the Mother, will reconcile my ſelf 'to you, &c. Conſider, that in this City I 'was born, and in this Church baptiz'd; and 'therefore you are bound to me in a ſtraighter 'Bond of Affection, &c. Then he commended the high Birth and good Parts of his Brother, and what Honour and Benefit they would have by electing him, but concluded with ſome Threatnings: So that the Monks ſeeing him thus to require the Biſhoprick, thought it in vain to deny him, and Athelmar is elected; but with this Reſervation, If the Pope allow'd thereof. Soon after happen'd the Memorable Cauſe of Sir Henry Bath, [a] one of the Judges of this Kingdom, and a great Counſellor to the King; who having gotten a great Eſtate in his Place by Bribery and Corruption (for he is ſaid to have gotten 200 l. per Annum in one Circuit) was at length accuſed by Sir Philip D'arcy of Injuſtice in his Office, and Treaſon; which ſo incens'd the King, that in the Parliament holden about this time at London, Proclamation was made, That every Perſon that had any Action or Complaint againſt Sir Henry Bath, he might come in and ſhould be heard; whereupon one of his Fellow-Judges accus'd him of acquitting a Malefactor for a Bribe. But Sir Henry was ſo ſtrong in Relations and Friends, who were at hand ready arm'd for his Reſcue, that the King ſaw he could not be puniſh'd openly; and therefore he breaks out into a Rage, and ſaid, That whoſoever would kill Henry de Bath, ſhould be acquitted for that Deed. But this Heat was ſoon after allay'd, by the Mediation of the Earl of Cornwal and Biſhop of London, who urging the Danger of the Time, and the Diſcontents of the Kingdom, and that his ſevere Proceedings with one that had ſerv'd him in ſo great Buſineſs, would diſcourage others from ſerving ſuch a Maſter; who upon malicious Accuſations would forſake them, whoſe Places are ever expos'd to Detraction, ſo prevail'd with the King, that Sir Henry upon the Payment of two thouſand Marks, was reſtor'd to his former Place and Favour. The King keeping his Chriſtmas at York, the Marriage between Alexander King of Scots and Margaret his Daughter was ſolemniz'd there with very great Coſtlineſs of Apparel and Proviſion, the Archbiſhop giving ſixty fat Oxen to be ſpent at one Feaſt, and four thouſand Marks for other Charges, which ſhews that the Poverty of the Church was not ſo great as was pretended, ſeeing the Churchmen could find Money to ſhew their Greatneſs, tho' they deny'd it at other times [b].

A. D. 1251. Reg. 35. Margaret the King's Siſter marry'd. 1252.

The Pope, and Alphonſus King of Caſtile, ſolicit the King to undertake the Croſs, the latter offering to accompany him in Perſon to reſcue the King of France; who having empty'd his Country both of his Treaſure and Nobility, was taken Priſoner by the Sultan, and kept in miſerable Captivity, out of which he could not eaſily be redeem'd; becauſe the Money, which with much Difficulty had been collected for his Ranſome, was loſt in a Tempeſt at Sea. This made the Captive King ſeek other means, and offer the King of England to reſtore Normandy, if he would undertake to reſcue him; which tho' the Nobility of France took ill, and blam'd the Weakneſs of their King for, yet upon the Pope's Sollicitation, and a Grant of a Tenth both of the Clergy and Laity for three Years to come, the King of England undertakes the Croſs; yet rather to get the Money (which had it been collected, would have amounted to 600000 l.) than to perform the Journey, which he ſaw was nothing but a politick Device of the Pope's to impoveriſh his Kingdom, and the other Princes of Europe, that he might enlarge his own Power and Dominion. However the King, as if his Deſign had been real, firſt ſummon'd the Londoners to Weſtminſter, and there by the Biſhops of Winchester and Chichester declares his Intention to them, who added their Exhortations to the People to attend him, but few were moved by their Perſuaſions; only three Knights, and they of no great Note, are nominated, whom the King embrac'd, kiſs'd, and call'd Brethren, checking the Backwardneſs of the Londoners in ſo pious an Action, and ſwearing to ſet forth on Midſummer-Day. After this, the Parliament was call'd at London to confirm the Tenth granted by the Pope, not by the People; and the Biſhops Conſent in this ſo pious a Work was firſt requir'd to induce the reſt, but they abſolutely refus'd the ſame: Which Example the Lords ſo cloſely follow'd, that the King in a Rage drove them out of his Chamber. Then the King tries to perſuade them to it ſeverally, and firſt began with the Biſhop of Ely, and in a mild manner tells him, 'How many Favours he had 'receiv'd from his hands, and how forward he 'had formerly found him to ſupply his Occa'ſions, and therefore intreats him now to give 'a good Example to others. The Biſhop re'ply'd, 'That he was glad, that he had at any 'time done him good Service; but in this he be'ſought his Highneſs not to expect a Compli'ance, ſince he thought it a diſhoneſt Act to 'recede from the Univerſal Determination of 'the Nation, and therefore diſſuades him from 'that Journey by the Example of the King of 'France, on whom he ſaw the Judgment of God 'fall'n for robbing his People to enrich his Ene'mies, who were grown fat with the vaſt Trea'ſure that Chriſtian Princes had tranſported thi'ther. [b] When this Marriage was ſolemniz'd, King Henry wou'd have had the Scots King do him Homage for the Kingdom of Scotland, as he had done for Lothian and other Places, which he held of the King of England; but Alexander evaded it, and King Henry was not in Circumſtances to oblige him to do it.

ing by him what he was to expect of the reſt, fell to his old Courſes of raiſing Money by Violence and Extortion. During this Parliament (an ill time for Suitors) Iſabel Counteſs of Arundel, a young Widow, came to him about a Ward detain'd from her by reaſon of a ſmall parcel of Land held of the King in Capite, which depriv'd her of her Wardſhip for the reſt. The King gave her a ſharp Anſwer, and turn'd away from her: Whereupon ſhe ſaid to him, 'My Lord, Why 'turn you away your Face from Juſtice, that 'we can't obtain our Rights in your Court? You 'are God's Vicegerent, but you neither govern 'your ſelf nor us wiſely, but ſhamefully oppreſs 'your Nobles and the Kingdom. To this Speech the King reply'd in Diſdain, 'Lady Counteſs, Have 'the Lords made you a Charter to be their Advocate, and ſent you, being an Eloquent Speaker, to defend their Cauſe? No, Sir, ſhe ſaid; 'I have no Charter, but that which your Father 'and you made, and have ſworn ſo often to obſerve, that you might get Money from your 'Subjects, but you do unworthily tranſgreſs. 'Where are the Liberties of England ſo often 'granted and bought? I though a Woman, and 'with me all your Natural Subjects, appeal 'againſt you to the Tribunal of the moſt High 'Judge to avenge us. At theſe words the King being diſturb'd, aſk'd her, 'If ſhe expected no 'Favour from him, being his Kinſwoman. She ſaid, 'How can I hope for Favour from you, 'when you deny me Right? I appeal to Chriſt 'againſt thoſe Counſellors of yours, who have 'infatuated and bewitch'd you for their own 'Gain. As boldly, tho' in fewer words, did the Maſter of the Hoſpital of Jeruſalem at Clerkenwell reprove him; who coming to complain of an Injury done them againſt their Charter, the King told him, 'That the Biſhops, but eſpecially 'the Templars and Hoſpitallers, had ſo many 'Liberties and Charters, that their Riches made 'them proud and their Pride mad; and 'tis beſt 'for them, that thoſe things which were unadviſedly granted ſhould be revok'd; alledging, 'That the Popes had often recall'd their Grants 'by a Non-obſtante, and why might not he diſannul thoſe Charters, which his Predeceſſors 'had inconſiderately granted? The Prior anſwer'd, 'God forbid you ſhould do as you ſay: 'So long as you obſerve Juſtice, you may be a 'King, but if you violate it, you will ceaſe to 'be a King. The Fryars, call'd Minors, when he ſent them a Load of Freeze to cloath them, ſent it back again, with this Meſſage; 'That he 'ought not give Alms of what he had extorted 'from the Poor, nor would they accept of ſuch 'an abominable Gift. Such Affronts did this King meet withal from his Subjects, whoſe Duty ſhould have taught them more Manners to a worſe Prince; but when Princes have once loſt the Love of their People, and their Reputation, every one will be ready to ſhake off their Power, and put off all Reverence to them.

The Inſolencies of Strangers.

This ill Behaviour of the Engliſh to the King harden'd him every Day more and more againſt them, and made him encourage the Inſolencies of Strangers againſt his People; who proud of the King's Favour, were ready enough to gratifie his Anger, in committing many Riots and Oppreſſions upon them. Thus William de Valence, an hot and fiery Youth, going from his Caſtle of Hartford to a Park of the Biſhop of Ely's, which lay near his Manour of Hatfield; he deſtroy'd the Game, and after entring the Biſhop's Houſe, where he found no other Drink but Ale, he caus'd the Cellar-door to be broken open by his Attendants, and when they had drank their fill, let out the reſt upon the Floor. The Biſhop Elect of Winchester alſo did great Wrongs to an Official of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Guy de Luſignan being entertain'd by the Abbot of S. Albans, violates all the Laws of Hoſpitality and Civility, and many others did the like Injuries to the Engliſh; inſomuch, that their general Complaint was, 'Our Inheritance is given to 'Aliens, and our Houſes to Strangers, which notwithſtanding the King ſought the more to prefer: For a Daughter of Guy de Luſignan Earl of Angoleſm, is marry'd to Richard (or Gilbert) de Clare Earl of Glocester, an eminent Man, and much lov'd of the Nobility, learn'd in the Laws, and a great Patriot of the Rights of the Subject; from which this near Alliance to the King could not keep his hands, but he would ſtill defend the Liberties of the Nation. The King promis'd to the Earl five thouſand Marks for a Dower, and ſought to borrow it of many, but could not; wherefore he again compels the Londoners to contribute a thouſand Marks.

A. D. 1252. Reg. 36.

The People of Gaſcoigne being about to revolt, unleſs a ſpeedy Remedy were taken, the King cauſed general Muſters to be made, and gave order, That whoever could expend 13 l. per Annum, ſhould furniſh out an Horſe for that Expedition. This, with the extream Wants of the King, occaſion'd another Parliament, wherein the States wiſely conſidering, that all their Oppoſition did no good, the King's Wants muſt be ſupply'd one way or other; and that it was heavier for private Men to do it, than for the Kingdom in general, agreed to relieve him rather by the uſual way, than force him to thoſe extravagant Courſes he took: Yet upon condition, that he would reform the Government, and ratifie their ancient Laws and Charters, which (after fifteen Days Conſultation about the way of raiſing a ſufficient Sum for this Expedition, which was at length agreed to be done by a Tenth from the Clergy for three Years, and three Marks of every Knight's Fee) was done after the moſt ſemn manner, and with as much Ceremony as Religion and State could deviſe; for the King, with all the Chief Nobility, and Biſhops in their Robes, and with Candles burning in their hands, being aſſembled, the Charters granted by King John his Father were openly read, and the terrible Sentence of Excommunication being pronounc'd againſt all the Breakers of the ſame in theſe Words; 'Autoritate Dei Omnipotentis, &c. they all threw down their Candles, which lay ſmoaking on the Ground, and all cry'd out, 'So 'let them who incurr this Sentence, be extinct 'and ſtink in Hell. And the King, who laid his hand on his Breaſt all the while the Sentence was read, ſaid with a loud Voice, 'As God ſhall 'help me, I will, as I am a Man, a Chriſtian, 'a Knight, a King crown'd and anointed, inviolably obſerve all theſe things. And at this the Bells rung out, and all the People ſhouted for Joy: So that never Laws were publiſh'd with more Ceremony than theſe, except thoſe of God himſelf from Mount Sinai; and if Prayers could have procur'd the ſame Thundrings and Lightnings, it ſhould have been done to make them reverently to be obſerv'd, and the Breach of them formidable. After this, the Buſineſs of Gaſcoigne was readily taken into Conſideration, being the thing that requir'd their preſent Care; which to underſtand, we muſt look back a little to the Original. The King, by the Counſel of the Lords, had twenty ſeven Years before this, freely granted to his Brother Richard all that Province of Gaſcoigne, which thereupon receiv'd him as their Lord, and ſwore Fealty to him.

The

A. D. 1253. Reg. 37.

The Queen, after the King had a Son by her, ſollicits him to revoke his Grant to his Brother, and confer it upon his eldeſt Son Edward, which he immediately did. But Richard, tho' he were depriv'd of the Poſſeſſion, would not yield to forego his Right; ſo that when the King was laſt in Gaſcoigne, the People were doubtful whom to attend. The King therefore in great Diſpleaſure commands his Brother to reſign his Charter, and renounce his Right; which he refuſing to do, the King commanded the People of Burdeaux to take him and impriſon him; but they conſidering his Greatneſs, and the Mutability of the King's Temper, would not venture to do it till he promiſed them a large Reward of Money; by which the Earl perceiving he was in danger, eſcaped from Burdeaux, and got into England. The King after his departure aſſembles the Nobility of Gaſcoigne at Burdeaux, where having much inveigh'd againſt his Brother, as a covetous Oppreſſor, and promiſed them not only a better Governour, but thirty thouſand Marks, (which they required him to confirm to them by his Charter and Oath) he nulled the Charter of Donation to his Brother, (and takes their Homage and Fealty to himſelf. In which, tho' they pleaſed him, yet by holding him to the performance of his Oath, they afterward loſt his Love; and to be reveng'd of them, he ſent Simon Montfort, Earl of Leiceſter, a rough and warlike Man, to curb their Pride, gave him a Charter for ſix Years, and furniſhed him with ten thouſand Marks, that he might execute his Command the better. Montfort by his ſevere management ſo diſcontented the People of Gaſcoigne, that they after three Years Sufferings ſend over the Archbiſhop of Burdeaux, with other great Men, to complain of his hard Dealings, and accuſe of ſeveral heinous Crimes, who were heard before the King and Council. Montfort is ſent for over to anſwer for himſelf; but was ſo abetted and befriended by the Earl of Cornwall, and the Lords his Friends, that the King taking the People of Gaſcoigne's part, more to curb his Nobles, than in favour to them. Montfort in an undutiful manner upbraided the King with his Expenceful Service and Breach of Promiſe, gave him the Lye, and threaten'd to make him repent of that Action, if his Regal Dignity did not protect him, called him no Chriſtian, with many like Abuſes; which cauſed the King to tell him, That he repented that he had admitted him into England, and ſo much preferred him. The Gaſcoignes after this were ſent for privately by the King, who comforted them, and encouraged them againſt Montfort, whom he told them he would ſend over again to his Charge with clipt Wings, that they might be reveng'd of him; and confirmed the State of Gaſcoigne to his Son Edward, whom he promiſed ſhortly to ſend over to them, wherewith they were well pleaſed; and having done him Homage, depart. The effect of this Contrivance was but bad. Montfort returns in Flames, plagues the Gaſcoignes, and they in like manner him; but he by his great Alliance in France, got ſo many Forces, as overmatch'd that People, and ſo ſpoil'd their Eſtates. The People being thus oppreſſed by a powerful Army, ſend over their Complaints again; alledging, That unleſs they were ſpeedily reliev'd, they muſt of neceſſity put their Country into ſome other hands to protect them. In this State was Gaſcoigne at the meeting of this Parliament. Wherefore the King, as ſoon as he obtain'd the Supply (laying aſide his Eaſtern deſign) goes over with three hundred Sail of great Ships, and lands at Burdeaux in Auguſt, in the 38th Year of his Reign, having firſt depoſed Simon Montfort from his Government, and made void his Charter by Proclamation. Montfort retires, and is offer'd Entertainment by the French, but refuſes it. Before Winter the King had pretty well appeaſed the Country, and taken thoſe Caſtles which had long held out againſt him, and the late Governour. For they having put themſelves under the Protection of the King of Spain, who was a near Neighbour, to maintain the Factions of the Country, the King was forced to be more quick in diſpatching that Affair; and the rather, becauſe the King of Spain pretended a Title to Acquitain; of whom, that Henry might be the more ſecure, he ſends to him to treat of a Marriage between Prince Edward and his Siſter Eleanor; to which the King of Spain willingly conſented. After this the King kept his Chriſtmas at Burdeaux, whither the Queen ſends him a New-years Gift of five hundred Marks; and the next Summer ſhe went over to him with the Prince, and the Marriage was ſolemnized at Bourges, where the King of Spain Knighted the Prince, and by his Charter quits his Claim to Aquitain for him and his Heirs for ever. The King of England alſo inveſts the Prince and his Wife therein; and beſides, gives him Ireland, Wales, Briſtol, Stamford, and Grantham; which being diſpatched, the King prepares for his Return, having conſumed all his Treaſure in theſe Journeys, which was reckon'd 2700000 l.[a] more than all the Lands which he had in thoſe Countries were worth, had they been ſold right-out; which, when he was told of, he deſired it might not be publiſhed to his Diſgrace. The Seas being dangerous in the Winter, the King obtains leave of the King of France (lately releaſed from his Captivity) to paſs through his Country homeward; and in his Paſſage goes to Paris with a Retinue of a thouſand Horſe, beſides Sumpters and Carts, where he ſtaid eight Days, and was magnificently feaſted by the King of France, which he returned with equal Charge and Pomp, in reſpect to the two Queens with him, and the Counteſſes of Cornwall and Provence. About Chriſtmas the King arriv'd in England, and was preſented by the Londoners with an hundred Pounds in Silver, which being received without Thanks, they gave him a piece of Plate of double the Value, which had a more kind acceptance, though it could not excuſe them from greater Sums afterwards.

The Londoners were alſo compelled to pay him three thouſand Marks for ſuffering a Priſoner to eſcape; and the poor Jews are again ſqueez'd, and then let out to farm to the rich Earl of Cornwall to make the beſt of them. At length he calls a Parliament in Eaſter Term, of which he expected large Contributions to his Wants; but inſtead of that, he meets with nothing but Complaints of Breaches of their Charter, and other Grievances from them, who inſiſted upon their pretended Rights of chuſing the Chief Juſtice, Chancellor and Treaſurer: About which things, when there had been much Debate to no purpoſe, the Parliament was adjourn'd to Michaelmas, without any Grant of Money to him; becauſe, as was pretended, many Peers were not ſummon'd according to the Tenure of Magna Charta. But tho' the King got no Supplies, he had freſh occaſions for Charge. Thomas Earl of Savoy, the Queen's Brother, is at War with the City of Thuren, and muſt be ſupply'd with Money by the King and Queen, and Boniface Archbiſhop of Canterbury his Brother. The Biſhop of Toledo Elect, the King of Spain's Brother, came over, with other Great Men of that Nation, ſtay at the King's Charge, and are richly Preſented. Shortly after Eleanor, the Prince's Wife, viſits the King, with a multitude of Spaniards; and ſhe muſt be met, and received by the Londoners in a coſtly manner, and is after much Feaſting ſent home with Rich Preſents. The Pope ſends the Biſhop of Bononia with a Ring of Inveſtiture to Edmund, the King's ſecond Son, for the Kingdom of Sicily (with which Innocent IV. had deluded the King himſelf before) and he alſo was ſent back with great Rewards. Then arrives Ruſtandus, with power to collect the Tenths of England, Scotland, and Ireland, for the uſe of the Pope and King, and abſolve the King from his Oath for the Holy War, upon Condition that he ſhould come to deſtroy Manfred, the Emperor Frederick's [a] Son, who was now in Poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of Sicily and Apulia, and put his Son Edmund in that Kingdom; which the King was ſo pleaſed with, that he vow'd to go preſently upon that Expedition; being encouraged to it by a Report, that Manfred had received a Defeat by the Pope's Power in Apulia, which proved falſe; for Manfred had conquer'd the Pope's Army, and was eſtabliſhed in his Government by the general Conſent of the Sicilians, who were angry with the Pope for giving away their Country without their conſent to Strangers. But Ruſtandus could not obtain that he came for of the Clergy, (tho' he got a rich Preſent at York of the King) who proteſted, That they would rather loſe their Lives and Livings, than yield in this thing either to the Will of the Pope or King, who, they ſaid, were as the Shepherd and the Wolf, who combined to deſtroy the Flock.

The Complaint of the Merchants of Gaſcoigne.

The King this Year keeps his Chriſtmas at Wincheſter, and here the Merchants of Gaſcoigne, who had their Wines taken from them by the King's Officers, without due Satisfaction for them, complain of it to the Prince, who was now their Lord, and tell him, 'That they had better trade 'with Sarazens and Infidels, than the Engliſh, if 'they were thus uſed. The Prince addreſſes himſelf to his Father, and begs a Redreſs; but was ſo far from gaining it, that he brought the Storm upon himſelf. For the Officers having prepoſſeſſed the King, that their Complaints were falſe and unjuſt, he brake out in a great Rage at the Prince's Motion, and ſaid, 'That his own 'Bowels, his Son, afflicted and oppoſed him, as 'his Brother had done; and the Miſeries of his 'Grandfather Henry II. were come upon him. But this Paſſion being allay'd by his Council, he gave order, That thoſe Injuries ſhould be redreſſed. However, the Prince fearing future ill effects of his Father's Diſpleaſure, enlarged his Train, and rod with two hundred Horſe for his Guard. While the Prince, who was very young, raſh, and unexperienced, remained in England with a Train of Strangers, moſt of them of no Eſtates, and of youthful and violent Spirits (ſaid to be more Ravenous than the Crew which Lewis brought with him out of France) many Outrages were committed to the great Trouble of the King's Subjects; for they made every thing a Prey that they could get into their power; yea, and the Prince himſelf is ſaid upon the Road to have cauſed the Ear of a young Man to be cut off, and one of his Eyes put out, whom he met travelling about his buſineſs; which foul Act made many to have no good Opinion of his Diſpoſition, and fear what he would after prove. But long Experience in Travel, and an innate Nobleneſs of Mind, ſo ſuppreſſed his Vices, that he after proved a very worthy Prince. But for the preſent he ſuffered ſome Diſgrace for his Youthful Follies; which the Welſh not having that Patience to endure as the Engliſh had, broke out into open Rebellion againſt him, who was then their Governour. He craved the Aſſiſtance of his Father, Mother, and Uncle Richard, to ſuppreſs them: But the King's Treaſure was gone over the Alps with Edmund, the Queen's to the Duke of Savoy, and Earl Richard had lent more already than he could get again; and ſo nothing was done, but only a rough Meſſage ſent him, That 'twas his Princedom, and he muſt find ways to defend it. But the King uſed all the Shifts he could to ſupply his own everlaſting Wants. He comes himſelf into his Exchequer, and with his own Voice order'd, 'That 'every Sheriff which appeared not yearly in the 'Octaves of S. Michael with his Money, as well 'of his Farms, as of Fines and other Dues, for 'the firſt Day he ſhould be fined five Marks, for 'the ſecond ten, for the third fifteen, and for 'the fourth at the King's pleaſure. In like manner, that all Cities and Free-Towns, which anſwer by their Bailiffs, ſhould be fined for the 'ſame Defaults, and the fourth Day to loſe their 'Freedom. Beſides every Sheriff throughout 'England was fined five Marks, becauſe they 'did not diſtrain within their Countries all that 'held ten Pound Land per Annum, and came 'not to be made a Knight, or freed by the King. Then he fell to the Examination of Meaſures for Wine and Ale, Buſhels and Weights, which brought him in ſome ſmall Sums; and every Year he had a Quarrel with the Londoners for one thing or another, and got ſomething out of them. Thus by various ways ſupporting his great Charge.

But now happen'd a buſineſs, which as it took up ſome time, ſo it was look'd upon by all the World as advantageous to the Engliſh, viz. The Election of Richard Earl of Cornwall to be King of the Romans, by the general Conſent of all the Electors [b], who ſent for him to receive that Crown. It was firſt debated in the Council, whether he ſhould accept of the Offer: Some, who thought his Preſence neceſſary for the Affairs of this Kingdom, were againſt it, and diſſuaded him from it by the Examples of two lately elected to that Dignity, Henry Landgrave of Turing, and William Earl of Holland, who were miſerably deſtroyed. But others, of which the King himſelf was one, perſuaded him to it, judging him too great for a Subject, and very uſeful if a foreign Prince: This the Earl yielded to, tho' with a ſeeming unwillingneſs. But the German Writers (who are beſt Witneſſes of their own Affairs) give a different account of it, and ſay, That after the Murther of the Earl of Holland the Electors were divided about a Succeſſor; ſome were for their old Cuſtom of electing a Native, others were for a Stranger, who might ſupport their declining State, which was moſt politick, and at laſt prevailed. But in this they had ſome difference about the Competitors, Alphonſus King of Spain, and Richard Earl of Cornwall, who offer'd them large Sums for it. In the Concluſion Richard, who was neareſt in Perſon and Money readieſt, was preferr'd and crown'd at Aquiſgrave [a]. He behav'd himſelf, ſay they, with great Tyranny and Severity to thoſe who had oppos'd his Election, thinking thereby to confirm himſelf in his Power, but it proved contrary: For having conſum'd his Riches by purchaſing their Votes, and by giving great Gifts afterward, he was forſaken and diſpoſſeſs'd by his Subjects, and forc'd to return into England to his Brother Henry, who was then in War with his Nobles. Thus they deliver it, but in our Hiſtories we find it thus: Before the Earl departed out of England, the Earl of Gloceſter and Sir John Manſell were ſent into Germany to try their Affections towards him, who return'd well ſatisfied of the Buſineſs; and ſhortly after the Archbiſhop of Cologne came to conduct him over, and the Earl beſtow'd five hundred Marks on him towards his Charges, and a rich Mitre ſet with precious Stones. This Prince, the Earl of Cornwal, is reported to have been able to expend an hundred Marks a Day for ten Years, beſides his Revenues in England. The French, and eſpecially the King of Spain, were much diſpleaſed with this Choice, and complain'd to the Pope and King of England, that he was ſupplanted by the Earl, Spain pretending that he was firſt elected: But he being a Philoſopher, and ſtudious of Mathematicks (which he reviv'd in Europe) he was drawing Lines when he ſhould have drawn his Purſe, and ſo loſt his Hopes, and Richard ſtept in before him [b].

About the time that Earl Richard departed out of England, while the Kingdom was yet in its Jollity for this new Promotion, the King calls a Parliament to ſet forward another, of his Son Edmund; whom bringing forth to them in an Apulian Habit, he thus ſpake to the Aſſembly. 'Behold, my good Subjects, here my Son Edmund, whom God of his Grace hath called to the Dignity of Regal Excellency, how worthy is he of your Favour, and how inhumane will it be in you, in ſo important an Affair, to deny him your Counſel and Aid? And then he ſhews them, how by the Advice and Kindneſs of the Pope, and the Church of England, he had for the attaining of the Kingdom of Sicily, bound himſelf under a Covenant of loſing his Kingdom of England in the Sum of an hundred forty thouſand Marks; That he had obtain'd a Tenth of the Clergy for three Years to come of all their Benefices to be valu'd at the full Rate, without Deduction of Expences, unleſs very neceſſary, beſides their Firſt-fruits for three Years; which Declaration was not very pleaſant to the Clergy, as may be judg'd from their former Grumblings. Nevertheleſs, after ſome inſufficient Excuſes for their Poverty, they promis'd, upon the uſual Condition, That Magna Charta, and the Liberties of the Kingdom ſhould be finally eſtabliſh'd, which had been ſo often bought before, fifty two thouſand Marks, tho' this ſatisfied him not. Wherefore the next Year he ſummons another Parliament at London, wherein he preſs'd them hard for ſuch Supplies as might enable him to pay his Debts to the Pope; but the Lords tell him plainly, 'That they would not yield to pay him any 'thing, and if he had without their Conſent, 'unadviſedly bought the Kingdom of Sicily, and 'was cheated, he ſhould impute it to his own 'Weakneſs, and have taken Example by his 'Brother; who when it was offer'd him by the 'Pope's Agent, abſolutely refus'd it, becauſe it 'lay ſo far off; ſo many Nations were between, 'the Pope full of Cavils, the People unfaithful, 'and the Pretender powerful, &c. Then they 'repeated their own Grievances, how that he 'had broke his Promiſes, contemning both the 'Keys of the Church, and the Charter he had 'ſolemnly ſworn to obſerve; how inſulting his 'Brethren, and other Strangers were, againſt 'whom no Writ, by his own Order, was to paſs 'in any Cauſe whatſoever out of Chancery; 'That their Pride was intolerable, eſpecially of 'William de Valence, who had given the Lye to 'the Earl of Leiceſter, and was not puniſh'd for it 'upon Complaint; That they abounded in Riches, 'and kept him ſo poor, that he could not ſuppreſs the ſmall Forces of the Welſh, who waſted 'the Borders of England, but going the laſt Year 'againſt them, return'd with Diſhonour. The King hearing this, grew ſenſible of his Fault; and being urg'd with Neceſſity humbled himſelf, and told them, 'That he had indeed been ſe'duc'd by ill Counſel, but promis'd by Oath, 'which he took upon S. Edward's Tomb, to re'form all theſe Errors. But the Lords not knowing how to hold this ever-changing Proteus (as Paris ſays) got the Parliament to be adjourn'd till S. Barnabas's Day, and then to aſſemble at Oxford. In the mean time, the Earls of Gloceſter, Leiceſter and Hereford, the Earl Marſhal Bygot, Spencers, and other great Men, enter into a Confederacy, and provide Force ſufficient to effect their Deſires; whilſt the King put to great Sraights for Money, procures the Abbot of Weſtminſter by Promiſes of great Preferments, to give him a Deed ſeal'd with the Seal of the Covent for three hundred Marks [c], to encourage others to do the like; which he ſent by ſome truſty Officers to the ſeveral Monaſteries with his Letters, and his ſaid Deed, to effect. But all the Art and Threats that they could uſe, could not bring them to yield to ſuch Deeds. They were told, That their King was Lord of all they had, and therefore they ought readily to offer a ſmall part for the Supply of his Wants; but they reply'd, That they acknowledg'd the King Lord of all they had, but it was to defend and enrich, not to deſtroy and undo them. So the Officers return'd without Succeſs, and the King was diſappointed; and the Prince, who ſhar'd in the Miſeries of his Father's Wants, forc'd to mortgage the Towns of Stamford, Braham, and many other Places, to William de Valence; that out of his Stores he might ſupply his Father and himſelf with Money, which prov'd the Breach of all Love and Favour between them.

Chief

A. D. 1258. Reg. 42. Chief Juſtice, Chancellour, and Treaſurer ſhould be choſen by the People; That twenty four Conſervators of the Kingdom be appointed, twelve by the Election of the King, and twelve of the Lords, and many things elſe which they imagin'd to be for their Security. The King ſeeing their Strength, and obſerving after what manner they requir'd theſe things, ſwears ſolemnly again to the Confirmation of them, and cauſes his Son the Prince to take the ſame Oath. But the Lords were not thus ſatisfied, the King's Brethren, all the Poictovines and Strangers muſt be preſently remov'd, and the Kingdom clear'd of them; and this they would have all the Peers of the Nation to ſee done: But the Prince, Earl Warren, and Henry the eldeſt Son of Richard, now King of the Romans [a], ſtrongly oppos'd it, the laſt refuſing to take his Oath without his Father's Leave: Whereupon the reſt told him, 'That if his Father would not joyn with the Ba-'rons in this Caſe, he ſhould not hold a Furrow 'of Land in England. In the end, the King's Brethren, and all their Followers, are deprived of their Eſtates, and baniſh'd by Proſcription under the King's own hand, directed to the Earls of Hereford and Surrey, with a Charge not to ſuffer them to paſs either with Money, Arms, or Equipage, other than as the Lords appointed; and after their departure, he enjoyn'd the City of Briſtol and other Ports, not to permit any Strangers or Kinſman of his to enter the Kingdom, unleſs they behav'd themſelves as both he and the Lords ſhould like. The Poictovines flying to Bologne in France, ſent to King Lewis to beg a ſafe Paſſage through his Country into Poictou; but by the French Queen's means, who had heard they had diſgrac'd her Siſter of England, they were deny'd, and Henry Son to the Earl of Leiceſter is ſent to incenſe the French againſt them. And now, as Envy is always ready to thruſt headlong, ſuch as are falling, the Poictovines have all the Miſchiefs laid to their Charge imaginable. The Sickneſs and Death of divers great Men, which happen'd ſoon after this Fatal Parliament, are imputed to Poiſons made and given by theſe Gentlemen, and ſome executed, as Walter Scoyny, the Earl of Gloceſter's Steward, becauſe his Maſter and his Brother had been dangerouſly ſick, tho' they could prove nothing againſt him. Elias, a converted Jew, aſſerted, That the Poiſon was prepar'd in his Houſe, but it was when he was a Devil, not a Chriſtian: Every Man that had receiv'd any Wrong by theſe great Men, put up their Complaints, and are heard with Aggravations of their Inſolence and Injuſtice. Guido de Rochfort, a Poictovine, to whom the King had given the Caſtle of Rocheſter, is baniſh'd, and all his Goods confiſcated; William Buſſey, Steward to William de Valence, is committed to the Tower of London, and cruelly uſed as an Inſtrument of his Maſter's Inſolencies; Richard Gray, whom the Lords had made Captain of Dover Caſtle, is ſet to intercept whatever the Poictovines carried that way to convey out of England, who took a great deal of Treaſure from them, and the Elect of Wincheſter, beſides great Sums which they had put in the new Temple, all which were ſeiz'd into the King's Hand. And that the People in this Execution of Juſtice, as 'twas thought, tho' much Wrong was done under that Umbrage, might not think themſelves forgotten, the new Chief Juſtice Hugh Bygot the Marſhal's Brother (who was choſen by the Parliament) procures, that four Knights in every Shire ſhould inquire into the Oppreſſions of the Poor, done by thoſe great Men, and certifie the ſame under their Hands and Seals to the Barons, that Redreſs might be made. Moreover Order was taken, 'That from thenceforth no Man 'ſhould give any thing (but Proviſions) for Ju-'ſtice, or to hinder it; but the Corrupter and 'corrupted to be grievouſly puniſh'd. But notwithſtanding this Care for the Publick, yet the Lords oppreſs'd the King's Tenants that dwelt near them, and became Totidem Tyranni: For they furniſh'd the chief Forts of the Kingdom with Garriſons of their own, ſworn to be faithful to the State, and to the like Aſſurance of all the Sheriffs, Bailiffs, Coroners, and other publick Officers, inquiring by Oath into the Behaviour of many Commiſſioners; and to make their Cauſe the more popular, they gave it out, that the King's Neceſſities muſt be ſupply'd out of the Peoples Eſtates, and that he would not want while they had it: Whereupon the King iſſues out his Proclamation, declaring, 'That 'whereas certain malicious Perſons had falſly 'and ſeditiouſly reported, that he deſign'd un-'lawfully to charge his Subjects, and ſubvert 'the Laws and Liberties of the Kingdom, and 'by ſuch falſe Suggeſtions, drew the Hearts of 'his People from him; he deſir'd them not to 'give Credit to ſuch Diſturbers of their Peace, 'becauſe he was reſolv'd to defend all Rights 'and Cuſtoms belonging to them; and that they 'might be aſſur'd of it, he had cauſed theſe his 'Letters to be made Patents.

The Lords uſurp the Royal Power.

1259. And now Montfort, Gloceſter, and Spencer, who had by the late Conſtitution of the twenty four Conſervators of the Kingdom, gotten the whole Management of all things into their hand, forc'd the King to call a Parliament at London, where the whole Authority of the twenty four was devolv'd upon them, and Order taken, That three of them at the leaſt ſhould always attend at Court to diſpoſe of the Cuſtody of Caſtles, and manage other Buſineſſes of the Kingdom, to direct the Chancellor, Chief Juſtice and Treaſurer, and all other Officers both great and ſmall; and beſides, oblige the King to looſe them from their Obedience whenſoever he broke his Charter. In this State and Condition was the Kingdom, when there came Intelligence to the Lords, that Richard King of the Romans was coming over into England; which being not expected, gave them grounds to ſuſpect, that he was ſent for by the King to come over with an Army to overthrow their Conſtitution, as King John had done: Whereupon they ſent to him to know the Cauſe of his coming, and require an Oath of him before he landed, that he would do nothing prejudicial to their Eſtabliſhment newly made in the Kingdom. But the King of the Romans gave them a ſtern Anſwer and Refuſal, ſaying, 'He had no Peer in 'England, being the Son and Brother of a King, 'and therefore was above their Power; and if 'they ſaw it neceſſay to reform the Kingdom, 'they ought firſt to have ſent for him, and not 'ſo preſumptuouſly attempted a Buſineſs of ſo 'great Importance without him. The Lords, upon the hearing of this Anſwer, ſent down a Force to guard the Ports, and came down well arm'd, and attended to encounter him if neceſſary; but finding his Train ſmall, viz. only his Queen, two German Earls, and eight Knights, they permitted him to land upon his Promiſe of taking their Oath, which they propounded to him; but would not permit him nor the King, who alſo came down to meet him, to enter into Dover Caſtle. At Canterbury they brought him into the Chapter-houſe, and the Earl of Gloceſter ſtanding forth in the midſt, called out the Earl, not by the Name of King, but Richard Earl of Cornwall, who in a reverent manner came forth, and took his Oath in this form: 'Hear all Men, that I Richard Earl 'of Cornwall do here ſwear upon the Holy Evan-'geliſts, to be faithful and diligent to reform 'with you the Kingdom of England, which hath 'by the Counſel of wicked Perſons been hereto-'fore much diſorder'd; be an effectual Aſſiſtant 'with you to expel the Rebels and Diſturbers of 'the ſame: And this Oath I will inviolably ob-'ſerve under the penalty of loſing all the Land I 'have in England. So help me God.

Richard takes an Oath impos'd by the Lords.

By this means the Lords endeavour'd to joyn this Earl to them, ſuppoſing that his Power was greater than it really was; which at length they found to be nothing but an airy Title. For having in two Years conſumed all thoſe vaſt Riches which he had gather'd with great frugality in many, he return'd home poor, and forſaken of the Germans, without any Means to truſt to, but what he had in England.

1259. The King ſeeks to recover his Power of the Lords hands.

Upon the Earl's return into England the King takes heart, and ſought all means to recover his Power, which the Barons had retrench'd; and to that end firſt of all ſends his Ambaſſadors to Rome to procure an Abſolution from his forced Oath made to them, and then ſends into Scotland to the King, and Queen his Daughter, for Aids to be ready upon occaſion. And that he might not be diverted in his Deſign by the King of France, he makes an abſolute Reſignation of his Right to the Dutchy of Normandy[a], and the Earldoms of Anjou, Poictou, Turene, and Main; for which he was to receive of the King of France[b] three hundred thouſand Pounds (ſome ſay Crowns) of Anjovine Money, and to be ſecured in the Enjoyment of all Guien beyond the River Garonne, all the Country of Xantonge as far as the River Charente, the Countries of Lamoſin and Quercy, for 1261. him and his Succeſſors, doing their Homage and Fealty to the Crown of France, as a Duke of Aquitain, and a Peer of that Kingdom. The Lords likewiſe, on the other ſide, ſeek all ways to ſtrengthen their Aſſociation, by keeping each other to their Oaths, and Obſervation of their Orders, which was very hard for them to do, being of ſeveral Inclinations, and ſometimes at odds among themſelves. For the Earl of Leiceſter, (a chief Leader of the Faction) finding the Earl of Gloceſter a little ſtaggering, told him plainly, 'That he cared 'not to live with Men of ſuch mutable and un-'certain Tempers, as my Lord of Gloceſter ſeem'd 'to be; who, as he was the moſt eminent, ſo he 'was the moſt obliged to ſtand to what had been 'undertaken for the good of the Kingdom. By theſe Heats he incenſed many, being animated in them by Walter Biſhop of Worceſter, and Robert Biſhop of Lincoln, who enjoyned him upon Remiſſion of his Sins to proſecute the Cauſe unto Death; affirming, 'That the Peace of the Church 'of England could never be eſtabliſhed but by 'the Material Sword. Many alſo were drawn by various Temptations to leave them, eſpecially after 'the King of France had given his Sentence againſt them, being choſen an Arbiter in the Quarrel; for tho' he allowed the Confirmation of King John's Charter, yet he condemned all the Proviſions of Oxford; which, tho' they pretended to be grounded upon the Charter, yet it much advantaged the King's Cauſe, and made them thought unlawful; ſo that many diſpenſed with their Oaths, and left their Party: Among whom were Henry the Son of the Earl of Cornwall (on whom the Prince had beſtow'd the Honour of Tickhill) who coming to the Earl of Leiceſter, told him, 'That he would not be againſt 'his Father the King, nor his Allies; but added, 'My Lord, I will never bear Arms againſt you, 'and therefore I crave leave to depart.' The Earl chearfully replied: 'My Lord, Henry, I am 'not ſorry for your Departure, but for your In-'conſtancy; Go, return with your Arms, and I 'fear them not at all. This Example was followed by Roger de Clifford, Roger de Leiborn, Haymo Le-Strange, and many others, who were won by Gifts, to forſake the Barons. Shortly after this Roger Mortimer, who was for the King, begins the Quarrel about three Years after the Parliament at Oxford, entring into the Lands of the Earl of Leiceſter, and ſpoiling all before him, becauſe the ſaid Earl combining with Lewellin Prince of Wales, had ſent Forces to ſeize upon Mortimer's Lands in thoſe parts. The Prince joyns with Mortimer, and ſurprizes the Caſtle of Brecknock, with other places of Strength, which he delivers into his Cuſtody. The Earl of Leiceſter re- 1264.

covers the Town and Caſtle of Gloceſter, and forces the Citizens to pay a thouſand Pound for their Redemption; then goes with his Army to Worceſter, where he poſſeſſed himſelf of the Caſtle; and ſo went to Shrewſbury, and ſo comes about to the Iſle of Ely, conquers the ſame, and became very powerful. The King not being fully ready for him, and fearing leſt his approach to London ſhould prove prejudicial to him, mediates for a Peace, and obtains it upon theſe Conditions: 'That all the King's Caſtles ſhould be put into 'the keeping of the Barons; That the Proviſions 'of Oxford ſhould be inviolably obſerved; That 'all Strangers by a certain time ſhould depart 'the Kingdom, except only ſuch as by a general

[a] The Earl of Leiceſter proteſted againſt this Reſignation in right of his Wife, who, as King Henry's Siſter, had a Title expectant.

[b] Henry is ſaid to have repented of this Bargain, tho' under vaſt Neceſſities, and never to have taken the Money.

[c] The Reference made to the King of France, which Mr. Daniell gives no account of, and ſo leaves this part of the Hiſtory concerning the Breach between the King and his Barons, in the dark, was thus: Soon after the arrival of the King of the Romans in England, Henry aſham'd of his too eaſie Condeſcenſions to the Barons Encroachments upon his Prerogative, eſpecially by the late Proviſions of Oxford, calls a Meeting in the ſame City, and declar'd plainly to his Lords, 'That for as much as he evi-'dently ſaw, that they ſought not the Kingdom's, and his, but their own advantage, and went about to ſubject the Regal Autho-'rity to their Wills, he would no longer be rul'd by them or their Council, but provide ſome way to ſecure his Dignity from them. The Lords, as reſolute to hold what they had, as zealous to get it, boldly Anſwer, 'That they would hold to the Proviſions at Ox-'ford, and maintain them to their Lives end: And ſo were departing. But the Biſhops ſeeing what would enſue, interpos'd between the King and Barons, and perſuaded them to refer the Controverſie to the King of France, which both Parties agreed to; yet did not ceaſe to make Preparations for their own Defence on both ſides. The King of France gave Sentence wholly for the King, and therefore the Quarrel ought to have ended, tho' it did not. Some Lords indeed came over to the King upon it; but the Earl of Leiceſter had a ſtrong Party ſtill, which held out againſt King Henry. Some other Authors ſay, The Barons were ſo far from referring the Matter to the French King, that when Lewis the Ninth propos'd to have the foreign Lords, who had been baniſh'd by Procurement of the Barons, reſtor'd to their Places and Eſtates, the Earl of Leiceſter, in the Names of the Engliſh Lords, reply'd, 'That they were not oblig'd to give any account of what had been done in England in the Court of France, but 'only in that of their own Prince, and that only by Judgment of their Peers, (Annals of St. Auguſt. and a Manuſcript Hiſt. in the Cottonian Library.) Yet afterwards, by the Perſuaſion of the Biſhops, the Lords conſented, that Lewis ſhould be Arbitrator of their Differences; and the King of France, who was after his Death canoniz'd for his Piety, gave this Sentence, the 3d of Febr. 1263. 'That the Proviſions of Oxford were null and void; That notwithſtanding the ancient Laws and Conſtitutions, the King might 'nominate his Chief Juſtice, Chancellor, Treaſurer, and all other Officers of the Kingdom; and that Foreigners were as capable of Offices and Dignities in England as the Natives.'

'Conſent

'Conſent ſhould be judged faithful, and profita'ble for the ſame. All this he granted to get time only to greaten his Party. The Prince had fortified Windſor-Caſtle, well victual'd it, and put in Strangers to defend it; himſelf marching to Briſtol, where in a Quarrel between his Men and the Citizens, he had the worſt; and was forced to ſend for the Biſhop of Worceſter (a conſiderable Man on the Barons ſide) to protect him, and conduct him back. When he came near Windſor, he got into the Caſtle, which the Earl of Leiceſter was come to beſiege; and being about Kingſtone, the Prince met him to treat of a Peace; but the Earl refuſing it, lays Siege to the Caſtle, which was ſurrender'd to him; and the Strangers being turn'd out, were ſent into France. The King, to get a little more time, calls another Parliament at London, wherein he gained many Lords to his Party; with whom, and the Prince, Richard Earl of Cornwall, Henry his Son, and William de Valence, with the reſt of his Brethren, he marched to Oxford, where ſeveral Lords of Scotland came to his aſſiſtance, viz. John Comin, John Baliol, Lord of Gollaway, Robert Bruce, and others, as alſo ſeveral of the Northern Barons, as Clifford, Peircy, Baſſet, &c. From Oxford with all his Forces he marched to [a] Northampton, where he took Simon Montfort the younger, with fourteen other great Men, Priſoners; and from thence he paſſed to Nottingham, laying waſte the Eſtates of the Barons which lay in thoſe parts. The Earl of Leiceſter draws towards London in the mean time to gain that City, as of greateſt Importance, and ſeeks to ſecure Kent, and the Ports; but the King, to ſtop his proceedings, ſends Relief to the Caſtle of Rocheſter, which was then beſieged; and was ſo ſucceſsful, that the Earls of Leiceſter and Gloceſter, in behalf of themſelves and their Party, write to the King, humbly proteſting their Loyalty, and declaring, That they oppoſed not him, but ſuch only as were his and the Kingdom's Enemies. The King returns them anſwer, That they were the Diſturbers of his Kingdom, and Enemies of his Perſon, and ſought the Deſtruction of both, and therefore defies them. The Prince alſo and Earl of Cornwall ſent [b] their Letters of Defiance to them. The Barons, notwithſtanding this, diſtruſting their Strength, and unwilling to put all to the hazard of a Battel, ſend the Biſhops of London and Worceſter to mediate for a Peace, offering thirty thouſand Marks to the 'King for the Damages done in theſe Wars, ſo that the Statutes of Oxford might be obſerved. But this yielding Grant procured them no advantage, being interpreted as an Argument of their own Weakneſs and Diſtruſt; and the King, ſecure of Victory, would hearken to no Propoſals of Peace. The Earl of Leiceſter ſeeing that there was a neceſſity of venturing the Fortune of a Battel, and being a Man ſkilful in ſuch Affairs, ſtudies to ſupply the want of Hands with Wit, gets ready ſooner than was expected, and having placed his Soldiers very advantageouſly upon the ſide of an Hill, near Lewis, (his Men wearing white Croſſes to denote the Juſtice of his Cauſe) offer'd to give the King Battel; which he, confident in his own Power, as readily embraced. The Battel was very bloody, but the Victory fell to the Earl of Leiceſter; Simon de Monfort, and the King, Prince, Earl of Cornwall, and his Son Henry, the Earls of Arundel and Hereford, and all the Scotch Lords, taken Priſoners. The Earl Warren, William de Valence, Guy de Luſignan, the King's Brethren, with Hugh Bigod the Earl Marſhal, ſaved themſelves by flight; and five thouſand were ſlain in the Combat. The Earl of Leiceſter for a Year [d] and a half kept his Royal Priſoners in his power, and carry'd the King about with him to countenance his Actions, till he had gotten all the ſtrongeſt Caſtles of the Kingdom into his Hands. He ſeem'd now a King, even of Kings, and England wholly his, when on a ſudden Providence made way for a Change, to humble proſperous Rebellion ſeveral ways. The Prince made his eſcape out of Hereford Caſtle, and got a Party to recover his Father's Loſſes; which yet was deſpicable in the Eyes of the great Earl, till an addition was made to it by his own Party upon this occaſion: The Earls of Leiceſter and Gloceſter coming to make a Dividend of their 'Gains 1265.
by Victory, according to the Agreement of their Confederacy, fell into a ſharp Debate; and Gloceſter taxes Leiceſter (as Fortune often makes Men forget themſelves) of 'neglecting the common 'Good to promote his own private and particular 'Intereſts, in that he took to himſelf the benefit 'and diſpoſal of the King's Caſtles, aſſumed the 'Power of the Redemption of Priſoners as he 'pleaſed; and to prolong the buſineſs, would not 'uſe the means of a Parliament to end it. This Charge inceniſed Leiceſter, but more angred his Sons, who, exalted with their Father's Greatneſs, behav'd themſelves with ſtrange Inſolence to him; which Gloceſter took ſo ill, that he left him, and betook himſelf to the Prince, to whom he carry'd over a great Party with him, by which he was enabled to gain many places of Strength in England and Wales. The Earl of Leiceſter, to ſtop the proceedings of this mighty Prince, (who was now with his Army about Worceſter) encamps in a Plain near Eveſham to give him Battel; and as the Prince's Forces drew up to him, obſerving their orderly approach, he ſaid to his Followers: Theſe Men come on bravely, they lent it not of themſelves, but of me. And ſeeing himſelf likely to be beſet and overpower'd with Numbers, he adviſed his Friends, Hugh Spencer, Ralph Baſſet, and ſeveral others to ſhift for themſelves; which, when he ſaw they refuſed to do, he ſaid, Let us commit our Souls to God, for our Bodies are theirs; and ſo undertaking the main ſtreſs of the Battel, periſhed in it; and with him were ſlain his Son Henry, and eleven other Barons, with many thouſands of common Soldiers [f]. At the time of the Earl's Death there happen'd ſo terrible a Thunder, Lightning, and Darkneſs, as affrighted them more than their terrible Slaughter. And thus dy'd the great Earl of Leiceſter, the worthieſt Man of his time, had he been as good a Subject; yet ſo much honoured by the People after his Death, that they would have worſhipped him as a Saint, if the ſucceeding Kings would have permitted it. This Battel delivered the Captive King, and rid him of his Goaler, Monfort, whom he hated, and long feared, more than any Man living. After his Deliverance, the King, with the victorious Prince, who had redeemed both him and the Kingdom, went to Winchester, and call'd a Parliament; in which all who adher'd to Simon Monfort, were depriv'd of their Eſtates, which were conferr'd upon others at the King's Pleaſure. The Londoners had their Liberties taken from them [a], Simon and Guy de Monfort, the Sons of the Earl of Leiceſter, with the diſſeized Barons, and others, who had eſcap'd the Battel of Eveſham, took and defended the Iſle of [b] Ely. The Caſtle of [c] Killingworth was defended by the Servants of the late Earl, tho' it were in the Heart of the Kingdom, and maintain'd a Siege of half a Year againſt the King and his Army; but in the end, their Victuals failing, yielded upon Condition, 'That they ſhould depart with 'their Lives, Members, and Goods ſafe: And thus concluded this Rebellion. 'And it is wor-'thy of our Obſervation, That we find no Exe-'cutions of Men put to Death, except in open 'Battel, in all theſe Combuſtions; or any No-'bleman dying on the Scaffold, either in this 'King's Reign or any other ſince the Conqueror, 'which is now almoſt three hundred Years. Only in the 26th Year of this King, William Marſh the Son of Jeffrey Marſh, a Nobleman of Ireland, being condemn'd for Piracy and Treaſon was hang'd, headed and quarter'd, which is the firſt Example of that kind of Puniſhment, which we read in our Hiſtories.

After this Parliament at Winchester, the King marches with an Army againſt the diſſeized Barons and their Adherents, who were many deſperate Perſons ſtrongly linked together; but being come to Northampton, Simon and Guy de Monfort, by the Mediation of Friends and Promiſes of Favour, came and ſubmitted themſelves to the King; who at the Requeſt of the Earl of Cornwall their Uncle, and the Lord Philip Baſſet, had reſtor'd them to their Eſtates: But Gloceſter and ſome others, who doubted their Affections, perſuaded the King to keep them under [d]; ſo that they were forc'd in the end to flie the Kingdom, and make their Fortunes, the elder in France and the younger in Italy, where they raiſed two great Families. Their Mother was baniſh'd ſoon after the Battel of Eveſham: 'She 'was a Lady of great Worth, the Daughter and 'Siſter to a King, culpable only by her For-'tune; who being ſpoil'd of her Coronet of mi-'ſerable Honour, betook her ſelf to a Religious 'Life, and dy'd a Nun at Montarges in France. Three Years the diſſeized Barons held out in thoſe Fortreſſes of the Kingdom, where they could beſt defend themſelves, making many Sallies to the great Damage and Vexation of the King's Subjects. At length Conditions of Surrender are propoſed, but the King's Council was divided concerning them. Mortimer, an eminent Man, and much in Favour with the King, who was poſſeſs'd of many diſſeiz'd Barons Eſtates, oppoſes their Reſtoration to them, alledging, 'That it is a great piece of Injuſtice to have that 'taken from them again, which the King had 'for their Labour and Fidelity beſtow'd on them, 'and was forfeited by them for their Treaſon 'and Rebellion, and therefore they would hold 'what they had. Gloceſter, and twelve more, who were empower'd to ſettle the Peace of the State, ſtood for a Reſtoration, and his Friends with him; but not obtaining his Deſign as he expected, he takes up new Diſpleaſure, retreats from Court, refuſes to come to the King's Feaſt on S. Edward's Day [e], and ſends Meſſengers to warn the King, 'To remove Strangers from his 'Council, and obſerve the Proviſions of Oxford, 'according to his laſt Promiſe made at Eveſham, 'otherwiſe that he ſhould not marvel, if he 'himſelf did what he pleaſed. Thus Victory could not ſettle Peace in theſe factious and diſcontented Times; wherefore it was thought fit to have recourſe at laſt to a Parliament, the ſureſt way to cure theſe Diſtempers, and accordingly one was call'd at Bury, whither all Perſons who held Lands by Knights Service were ſummon'd to appear with ſufficient Horſe and Armour, to ſubdue thoſe depriv'd Malecontents, who contrary to the Peace of the Kingdom held the Iſle of Ely. From hence John de Warren Earl of Surrey, and William de Valentia, are ſent to perſuade the Earl of Gloceſter (who had gotten an Army on the Borders of Wales) to come peaceably to the Parliament; which tho' he refuſed, yet he gave the Earls thus much under his Hand and Seal, 'That he would not ever take up Arms 'againſt the King, or his Son Edward, but de-'fend himſelf, and purſue Roger Mortimer and 'his other Enemies, for which he pretended, 'that he took up Arms. After this, the Buſineſs of the Parliament went on, and the firſt Demand was made by the King and the Legate, 'That 'the Clergy ſhould grant a Tenth for three 'Years to come, and for the Year paſt ſo much 'as they gave the Barons to defend the Ports 'againſt the landing of Strangers. To this they anſwer'd, 'That the War, which was begun up-'on ill Motives, and yet continu'd, made it 'more neceſſary to deliberate of ſetling the Peace 'of the Kingdom, than to ſet on foot ſuch De-'mands, that this Parliament might prove for 'the Benefit of the Nation and not Damage, as 'the extorting Money from them would prove, 'ſince the Land had been ſo miſerably haraſs'd 'by War, as that it would ſcarce ever recover 'it. 2. Then it was requir'd, That the Clergy 'ſhould be tax'd by Lay-men, according to the 'true Value of their Revenues. They anſwer, 'Twas no reaſon, but unjuſt, that Lay-men 'ſhould collect Tenths which they would never 'conſent to, but would have the ancient Valua-'tion to ſtand. 3. Then it was requir'd, That 'they ſhould pay the Tenths of their Baronies 'and Temporalties, according to the utmoſt Va-'lue. They anſwer'd, That they were impo-'veriſh'd by their Attendance upon the King in 'his Wars, and that their Lands lay waſt by 'reaſon of them. 4. Then it was requir'd, That 'the Clergy ſhould in lieu of a Tenth, give 'amongſt them thirty thouſand Marks to diſ-'charge the King's Debts, contracted for Sicily, 'Calabria, and Apulia. They anſwer, They 'would give nothing, becauſe thoſe Expences 'were not converted to his own, or the King-'dom's Benefit. 5. All this being deny'd, de-mand is made, 'That all Clergy-men that held 'Baronies, or other Temporalties, ſhould ſerve 'the King in his Wars. They anſwer, They 'were not to fight with the Material, but Spiri-'tual Sword; That their Baronies were given 'them as Alms. 6. Then it was requir'd, That 'the whole Clergy ſhould diſcharge the 9000 l.

A. D. 1267. Reg. 51.

[a] The Lord Mayor, and forty of the Principal Citizens, were thrown into Priſon. The King gave the Eſtates of ſixty of the moſt Eminent Citizens to his Favourites, and requir'd fifty thouſand Marks Compoſition of the reſt, which on their humble Submiſſion and Petition he forgave.

[b] The Iſle of Axholm in Lincolnſhire, as ſome think. [c] Kenelworth, more properly in Warwickſhire.

[d] Simon Montfort was to have five hundred Marks a Year Penſion, on which Conſideration he agreed to leave the Kingdom; but afterwards he fell off from his Agreement, and joyn'd with the Privateers of the Cinque Ports.

'which the Biſhops of Rocheſter and Bath, and 'Abbot of Weſtminſter, were bound for to the 'Pope's Merchants for the King's Service, when 'they were at Rome. They anſwer, They ne-'ver conſented to any ſuch Loan, and therefore 'were not bound to diſcharge it. 7. Then the Legate from the Pope requir'd, 'That they ſhould 'thro' the whole Kingdom exhort Men to take 'the Croſs for the Holy War. To this they ſaid, 'That the Nation was almoſt conſum'd already 'by the Sword; and if they ſhould put Men up-'on this Action, the Nation would not be able 'to defend it ſelf, but be a Prey to Strangers. 8. Laſtly, It was urg'd, 'That the Clergy had 'ſworn to yield to all the King's Demands by 'their Oath at Coventry, where they ſwore to 'aſſiſt him in all they could. They anſwer, 'That when they took that Oath they meant 'no more than ſpiritual and wholſome Counſel. So the King met with Denials only in this Parliament, and obtain'd nothing of the Clergy.

The Legate alſo ſent certain Perſons to the diſinherited Lords, which held the Iſle of Ely, to ſolicit them, 'To return to the Faith and 'Unity of the Church, their Duty and Allegi-'ance to the King, according to the Proviſion 'made at Coventry, for redeeming their Eſtates 'from ſuch as held them by Gift from the King 'for ſeven Years Profits, and to leave off their 'Robberries. The Lords return'd this Anſwer to the Legate, 'That they retain'd the Faith, 'which they receiv'd from their Catholick Fa-'thers, and paid Obedience to the Roman Church, 'as the Mother Church of all Chriſtians, but 'would not ſubmit to the Covetouſneſs and cruel 'Exactions of thoſe that govern'd the ſame: 'That they accounted themſelves unjuſtly diſin-'herited of their Lands, left them by their Pre-'deceſſours, who had purchas'd it by Conqueſt: 'That they had formerly taken an Oath to de-'fend the Kingdom and Holy Church, the Bi-'ſhops thundring out Excommunications againſt 'ſuch as oppos'd them, and they were ready to 'venture their Lives to make good that Oath; 'and ſince they made War for the Safety of the 'Kingdom and Holy Church, they ought to live 'upon the Goods of thoſe Enemies who kept 'their Eſtates from them: That the Legate 'ought to ſee their Eſtates reſtor'd, that they 'might not be forc'd to prey upon others: That 'the Spoils they had taken were not ſo great 'as was reported, but that the Prince commit-'ted great Robberies, and laid them on their 'Party to make them odious; wherefore they 'deſir'd the Legate not to give Credit to ſuch 'Reports, becauſe if any among them had done 'ſuch things, they themſelves would have pu-'niſh'd them for it. Farther, they declar'd to 'the Legate, That he had taken out of the 'Kingdom the Biſhops of Winchеſter, London, 'and Chicheſter, Men of great Caution and deep 'Judgment, whereby the Council of the King-'dom was much weaken'd to the great Danger 'of it; wherefore they adviſed him to take Care 'of the Reformation of the ſame, and that they 'might be reſtor'd to their Lands without Re-'demption: That the Proviſions of Oxford might 'be obſerv'd: That they might have Hoſtages 'ſent to them into the Iſle to hold the ſame 'peaceably for five Years to come, until they 'could ſee how the King would perform his Pro-'miſes. Thus did theſe Lords treat with the King, not as reduc'd to the loweſt Ebbs of Fortune, but as Men of Power to capitulate, being elevated either with the Opinion of their Cauſe, or Hope of their Party. But this Stubbornneſs of theirs ſo exaſperated the King, that the next Year he gather'd a very great Army, beſets the Iſle: So that they were confin'd to it, and Prince Edward with Bridges made of Boats enter'd it in ſeveral Places, and compell'd them to yield. In the mean time the Earl of Gloceſter, with his Army which he had gather'd upon the Borders of Wales to aſſiſt them, came up to London and were receiv'd by the Citizens [a]: But the Legate, who then reſided in the Tower, ſo prevail'd with him, that he ſurrender'd himſelf up to the King's Mercy, and by the Mediation of the King of the Romans and Lord Philip Baſſet, was reconcil'd upon [b] Condition, that he ſhould forfeit [c] twelve thouſand Marks if he ſhould raiſe any Commotions again. Having ſettled things thus at home, the King goes with his Army into Wales againſt Prince Lewellin, for aſſiſting Simon Monfort and the Earl of Gloceſter in their late Rebellions againſt him; but his Wrath being appeaſed by a Gift of 32000 l. Sterling, a Peace was concluded between them, and four Cantreds of his Country reſtor'd to him by the King, which had been taken away by the War. And here was an end of the firſt Barons Wars in England, wherein both ſides got nothing but Trouble and Vexation to themſelves; and whilſt the one ſtruggled to do more than they ſhould, and the other leſs than he ought, both Parts ſuffer'd heavily, according to the uſual Fate of ſuch National Conteſts and Differences.

1269. The next Year after this Pacification, the Legate Ottobon ſigns with the Croſſado both the King's Sons Edward and Edmund, the Earl of Gloceſter, with many other Noblemen, whom by his earneſt Solicitation he had induced to undertake the Holy War, with the King of France; who notwithſtanding his former Misfortune in this Action, would again adventure in it, either to recover his Honour, or merit another World. Prince Edward wanted Money to furniſh himſelf and Company out, and therefore borrow'd thirty thouſand Marks of the King of France, for which he mortgag'd Gaſcoigne [d] to him, which might ſeem a piece of Policy rather than Piety in this King, to engage an active Prince in foreign Wars, to keep his own Dominions in quiet at home. And now, while this Preparation is in hand, King Henry is labouring to ſettle his Kingdom in perfect Peace, and reform thoſe Extravagancies the War had bred, cauſing by his Proclamation Stealth of Cattel to be made a Capital Crime; and the firſt that ſuffer'd for it was one of Dunſtable, who had ſtollen twelve Oxen from the Inhabitants of Colne [e], and being purſu'd to Redburn, was by the Bailiff of S. Albans (according to the King's Proclamation) condemn'd and beheaded. And the ſame Year the King aſſembled his Parliament at Marlborough, where the Statutes bearing that Title were enacted [f].

Prince Edward and others go to the Holy War.

Twenty third Parliament at Marlborough.

[a] He was admitted into the City by Order of the Nuntio, whom he had deceiv'd with his fair Pretence of Loyalty.

[b] The King alſo promis'd, 1. That he wou'd do nothing without the Conſent of nine Counſellors, or two parts of them, choſen by the Nation. 2. That the Church ſhou'd be reform'd. 3. That all his Officers in his Court ſhou'd be Engliſhmen. 4. That all their Party ſhou'd be pardon'd. And 5. That the old Cuſtoms of the Realm ſhould be obſerv'd.

[c] Mat. of Weſt. writes, That he only gave ten thouſand Marks Security, that he wou'd no more make War againſt the King.

[d] Riſhanger, the Continuator of Mat. Paris's Hiſtory, ſays, he only mortgag'd the Revenues of Bourdeaux, and the Charter or Deed of Agreement between King Lewis and Prince Edward witneſſes, that the Money was to be rais'd out of the Cuſtoms of the City of Bourdeaux.

[e] Colney, belonging to the Abby of St. Albans, Cony in Hertfordſhire.

Near

A. D. 1271. Reg. 55.

Near two Years it was after the Prince had undertaken the Croſs, before he ſet forth in that Expedition; a time long enough to have alter'd his Reſolutions, if they could have been ſhaken, for going on with ſo hazardous an Enterprize; but ſo ſtrong were his Deſires, that no Worldly Reſpects could deter him from it, otherwiſe he had Diſcouragements more than enough to have done it. His Father Henry was aged, and broken with Labour and Troubles, ſo that the Kingdom, if not at preſent, yet ſhortly muſt need his Perſon to govern it. His Wife Eleanor, who reſolved it ſeems to accompany him in all his Fortunes, was newly with Child. The King of France, who with two of his Sons, the King of Navarr, and a mighty Army, was gone before, and by the way beſieged the City of Tunis in Africa, (then in the Poſſeſſion of the Sarazens, who much infeſted Chriſtendom) died of the Peſtilence, that raged in his Army, and with him one of his Sons, and many of his Nobility; whereby their Deſign was utterly quaſh'd. Charles King of Sicily, Brother to the King of France, who came to aſſiſt him [a], loſt the greateſt part of his Navy in his return home. Yet ſuch was the undaunted Courage of this Prince, that all theſe ſad Examples of others Calamities, would not deter him from proceeding; but he ſet forward for the Holy Land. In his Paſſage many of his own People were deſirous to return home; at which the Prince being angry, ſmote upon his Breaſt, and ſwore, That if all his Followers forſook him, he would yet enter Ptolemais, or Acon, tho' only with his Horſe-keeper Fowin. By which Speech they were encouraged to go on with him. But his Coſin Henry, Son to the King of the Romans, obtains leave of him to depart, and was ſet on Shoar in Italy, where he found, what he ſought to avoid, Death; being ſlain in the Church of Viterbo at Divine Service, by his own Coſin-German Guy de Monfort (Son to Simon late Earl of Leiceſter) in Revenge of his Father's Death. The News of this barbarous Murther haſten'd the Death of the King of the Romans, his Father, who died ſhortly after [b]. Henry himſelf ſurviv'd not his Brother long, for he dy'd [c] the next Year [d], in the 65th Year of his Age, and 56th of his Reign: A time ſo full of remarkable Contingents, partly through the Inconſtancy of the Prince, and partly through the Pride and Impatience of a ſtubborn Nobility, that it takes up a tenth part of the Hiſtory from the Norman Conqueſt [e].

The Prince's undaunted Reſolution in going to the Holy War.

He had by his Wife Eleanor ſix Sons, of which only two [f] ſurviv'd him, Edward and Edmund; the reſt, viz. Richard, John, William, and Henry, dy'd young; and two Daughters [g], which liv'd to be marry'd; Margaret the eldeſt was marry'd to Alexander III. King of Scots, and Beatrix to John I. entitled Duke of Britain.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES in the Reign of Henry the Third.

IN the 5th Year of his Reign two Impoſtors were crucify'd for giving out, they were both of them the Meſſiah, or Chriſt; and two Women were executed, the one for pretending to be the Virgin Mary, and the other Mary Magdalen.

In the 6th Year there was a dreadful Tempeſt of Thunder, Lightning, and Rain, in February, which threw down ſeveral Churches, and rooted up Trees. This was follow'd by extraordinary Rains; and that by a Dearth, another violent Tempeſt, an Earthquake, a prodigious Storm of Wind, Inundations, and a Comet. Hol.

In his 17th Year, it Thunder'd for fifteen Days together. The next Year began with terrible Tempeſts of Thunder, Rain and Floods, which ſpoilt the Fruits of the Earth.

In April, 1233. Matt. Paris affirms, There appear'd four falſe Suns in Worceſterſhire and Herefordſhire. The true Sun was of a red Colour, with a great Circle of Chryſtalline Colour, whoſe Circuit ſeem'd as large as the Kingdom of England; from its ſides went forth certain half Circles, in whoſe Sections the four falſe Suns appear'd. The true one was in the Eaſt, it being about ſeven in the Morning, the Air clear, and the Sky ſerene. The Biſhop of Hereford and Sir John Monmouth ſaw and witneſs'd to this Wonder. In June, near the Sea-ſide, two huge Dragons were ſeen fighting in the Air; after a long diſpute, the one vanquiſh'd the other, and drove him into the Sea; and the Conqueror following him, they were both no more ſeen. The ſame Year there was a Dearth, which was preceded by an Earthquake. Hol.

In his 20th Year, according to Matt. Paris, the moſt credible Hiſtorian of thoſe Times, Near Rock-Abby in the North two Troops of arm'd Men ſeem'd to riſe out of the Earth, and to engage with Spear, Shield, Sword, and Banners diſplay'd; they wou'd ſometimes tilt as at a Turnament of Triumph, and the Country People beheld them at a little diſtance wounding and unhorſing one another. What was moſt ſtrange was, the Graſs of the Ground where they appear'd to give Battel ſeem'd trodden down, and Prints of Feet remain'd there. The ſame Sight was ſeen more apparently in Ireland. This Year was full of Prodigies, Thunder, Lightning, Floods, &c. which deſtroy'd abundance of People and Cattel.

[a] Prince Edward overtook the King of France at the Siege of Tunis, and with his Army ſoon brought the City to offer a Capitulation. Edward refus'd to hearken to it, as contrary to their Vow; the Kings of France and Sicily accepted it, and ſo it was ſurrender'd upon theſe Articles. 1. That all Chriſtian Captives ſhould be releas'd. 2. That the Chriſtian Religion ſhould be freely profeſs'd and preach'd in that City. 3. That the King of Tunis ſhould pay their Charges: And, 4. Hold his Kingdom of the King of Sicily, as Tributary. But the Misfortunes that befel theſe two Kings ſoon after, were imputed to their Breach of Vow; and ſo much the more, becauſe Prince Edward, who oppos'd them, eſcap'd any ſuch Calamity.

Walter Hemingford, p. 590. affirms, The Prince ſail'd directly from Sicily to the Holy Land, taking Cyprus in his way. Moſt Authors agree, that he was not at the Siege of Tunis.

[b] Henry, before his Death, conſtituted the Earl of Gloceſter Ruler of the Kingdom in his Son's abſence, if he return'd not before his Death, and ſwore all the Peers to accept and obey his Son Edward for their King, tho' he were at his Death out of the Kingdom. [c] He dy'd on the 20th of November, 1272.

[d] The King of the Romans and King Henry dy'd in the ſame Year, the former in April, 1272. the latter in November.

[e] His Reign may very well take up a tenth part of the Hiſtory, ſince 'tis almoſt a fourth part of the Time from the Norman Invaſion. [f] The two eldeſt.

[g] He had three Daughters by his Queen, Margaret, Beatrix, and Katherine, who was born in November, Anno 1253. and dy'd at five Years of Age.

On

On the 16th of June, 1239. the 23d of this King's Reign, Prince Edward his eldeſt Son was born. Before his Birth-day there appear'd a new Star in the Heavens for ſeveral Days together. It was carry'd with a ſwift Courſe through a long Circuit of Air; it ſeem'd ſometimes to bear Fire along with it, and ſometimes to leave Smoak behind it. In the next, there was a great Battel of Fiſh at Sea; the Conſequence of which was, that eleven Whales were caſt on the Shoar, and appear'd to be dead of ſome Wounds they had receiv'd. Matt. Paris tells this Story. Not long after, a great Sound was heard at one time in all parts of England, as if it had been the Noiſe of Mountains fall'n into the Sea.

In the 26th Year the Sun was Eclips'd in a terrible manner; and two Years afterwards ſo many Stars ſeem'd to fall in one Night, that (ſays Hollinſhead) if there had ſo many fall'n indeed, there wou'd have been none left in the Sky.

In his 32d Year, a dreadful Earthquake happen'd on the 14th of February, and the Sea, for a long Tract near the Coaſt of England, ceas'd to ebb and flow near three Months together. The next Year the Town of New-Caſtle was deſtroy'd by Fire; and an Earthquake threw down ſeveral Steeples and Houſes in Somerſetſhire.

On the 1ſt of October, in his 34th Year, the Moon appear'd red and bloated, which was the Preſage of a Storm of Wind, ſo violent, that the Sea flow'd twice without ebbing, and in the Night ſeem'd to burn: Soon after an Earthquake was felt at St. Albans. In the following Year, the Chimney of the Chamber where the Queen and her Children were was blown down by a terrible Storm, and her whole Appartment (at Windſor) ſhaken and torn; Oaks in the Park were rent aſunder, and turn'd up by the Roots; and all was accompany'd with ſuch Thunders and Lightnings, as had not been heard or ſeen in the Memory of Man.

In May, the New Moon appear'd three Days before her time; and the Sun, Moon and Stars, for fifteen Days ſucceſſively, ſeem'd of a red Colour. A Dearth, and a Murrain among Cattel follow'd this Prodigy. In his 38th Year, the New Moon in February was ſeen four Days before the Courſe of her Time. In his 39th Year, a Ship was ſeen in the Air at St. Albans; and in his 40th, a Comet.

In his 52d Year, the two Companies of Goldſmiths and Taylors of London fought, and ſeveral were kill'd on both ſides. The Sheriffs appeas'd the Tumult, and thirteen of the moſt Mutinous of them were hang'd. As were thirty Citizens of Norwich in the laſt Year of his Reign, for quarrelling and fighting with the Monks of that City.

Hollinſhead has many more Miracles, Prodigies, and extraordinary Sights, in his Hiſtory of King Henry the Third: But we have reported enough to let the Reader ſee, that the Seaſons were as much diſtracted as the Times, and that Nature ſeem'd to be diſturb'd in all her Productions during the Reign of this weak Prince; who had, however, many brave Subjects, and govern'd a People that ſhew'd they might have been Great and Happy, had their Prince known how to have made them ſo.

Men Famous in his Days for their Valour and Wiſdom were

Simon Earl of Leiceſter, and his Sons Simon and Guy Montfort, Gilbert de Clare, the Earls of Cheſter and Gloceſter, Roger Mortimer, great Warriors; Hubert de Burgh, and Stephen Langton, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Maſters in Politicks.

In Learning the moſt Eminent were

Robert Curſon, made a Cardinal for his Knowledge of Divine and Humane Letters, Gervaiſe de Melkelie, Albricius of London, Hugh Kirkſtead, Richard of Ely, Peter Hexham, John Giles, an excellent Phyſician; Caducan, a Welſhman, Biſhop of Bangor; Alexander, Author of ſeveral Treatiſes in Divinity, Philoſophy, and Humanity, both in Proſe and Verſe; William Lanthony, Peter of St. Saviour, a Canon of Trinity-Houſe near London; Alexander Hales, an excellent Divine, Thomas Aquinas's and St. Bonaventure's Maſter; Ralph Abbot of Coggeſhal in Eſſex; Alexander Eſſebienſis, who wrote an Epitome of our Engliſh Annals; Matthew Paris, a Monk of St. Albans, whom the Biſhop of Carliſle calls One of the moſt renown'd Hiſtorians of this Kingdom; his Hiſtory comes down to the Year 1259. in which he dy'd; Alexander Neckam, Robert Bacon, John Shitſhed, and Robert of Gloceſter, who wrote a Rhiming Chronicle; Ralph Earl of Cheſter, and Henry Bracton, both learned in the Laws of England; Roger Bacon the Aſtronomer, thought to be a Conjurer by the vulgar ſort of People; Richard ſurnam'd Medicus, an excellent Phyſician; Alexander Wendock Biſhop of Cheſter, Edmund Rich, Robert Rich, John Blund, Richard ſurnam'd Theologus, Walter of Eſham, Ralph Freſburne, Laurence Somercot, Cardinal Somercot his Brother, Dr. Nicholas Fernham a Phyſician, Simon Langton Brother to Archbiſhop Langton, Richard Fiſaker, Simon Stokes, John of Kent, William Shirwood, Michael Blaunpain, John Goddard, Vincent of Coventry, Aubery de Vere a learned Baron, Richard Wick, John of Baſingſtoke, Roger Waltham, William Sepingham, and Robert Groſteſt Biſhop of Lincoln, who had a long Diſpute with Pope Innocent IV. Johannes a Sacro Boſco, who wrote of the Sphere, and is made an Engliſhman by Leland and Bale, but Sir James Ware puts him among the Iriſh Writers.

THE LIFE and REIGN OF EDWARD I.

Edward proclaim'd King, tho' in the Holy Land.

IMmediately after the Death of King Henry, Edward his Son was proclaim'd King by the Order of all the Chief Biſhops and Peers of the Kingdom, who for that purpoſe met in the New Temple, and there all ſwore their Fidelity to him; tho' at that time they knew not whether he were alive or dead. But till they were certified of the Truth of either, they proceeded to ſettle and ſecure the Government, cauſed a new Seal to be made, and appointed fit Miniſters and Officers for the Management of his Treaſure, and Preſervation of the Peace, while he remain'd in Paleſtine, where he raiſed the Siege of Acon, which was ready to yield to the Sarazens, and did many other extraordinary Acts of Valour againſt the Infidels [he [a] was dangerouſly wounded in three Places of his Body with a poiſon'd Knife by a treacherous Aſſaſſin, of which Wounds, when no Medicine could cure him, his loving Wife Queen Eleanor extracting the Poiſon by ſucking them, perfectly healed them.] When he had continu'd three Years in the Holy Lands, and underwent many Dangers without any great Effect, ſaving that he had well manned and fortified Acon; being diſappointed of Aids which he expected, he reſolv'd upon his return home, and firſt ſailing [b] to Sicily, he was ſplendidly feaſted and entertain'd by Charles the King of that Iſland. From thence he ſail'd to Italy, where in his Paſſage by Land through that Country he receiv'd all imaginable Expreſſions of Honour and Reſpect from [c] the Pope and other Princes of that Nation. At his Entrance into Savoy, at the Foot of the Alps, he was met by many of the Nobility of England, and there challeng'd by the Earl of Chablown [d], (a valiant Warriour) to a Tournament; in which, tho' it may ſeem beneath his Dignity ſo lightly to hazard his Perſon, yet the Greatneſs of his Valour would not ſuffer him to refuſe the Combat, tho' with a Perſon much beneath him; and thereupon engaging with him, ſo overmatch'd him both in Skill and Strength, that the Earl was forc'd to yield to him. From hence he came down into France, where he was magnificently receiv'd, and entertain'd by King Philip III. ſurnam'd The Hardy; to whom he did Homage for all his Territories he held of that Crown [e]. Leaving France he went into Acquitain, where he ſpent ſome time in ordering his Affairs, and then [f] after ſix Years abſence returns into England and receives the Crown, three Years after he was firſt [g] proclaim'd King, from the hands of Robert Kilwarby, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Sept. 1275. and with him his Royal Conſort Queen Eleanor, there being preſent at this Solemnity his Mother Queen Eleanor, Alexander King of Scots, and John Duke of Britain, who had marry'd his two Siſters.

His Perſonal Skill in Arms, and Courage.

The many Brave and Princelike Actions which this Prince had ſignaliz'd himſelf to the World by, before his Acceſſion to the Crown, viz. His Victory over the Barons at Eveſham, and his Proſecution of the diſinherited Barons in the Iſle of Ely; his great Readineſs to expoſe his Perſon to all Hazards and Labours; his ſingle Fight with [h] Sir Adam Gurdon, the Outlaw, at Farnham; his Expedition into the Eaſt, and his great Experience he had of all Civil Affairs by his Age (being about thirty five Years old before he came to the Crown) gave the Kingdom Hopes of a well-manag'd Government, and flouriſhing State under ſo compleat a Maſter, whoſe Deſert and Reputation were equally unparallel'd. Soon after his Coronation he call'd a Parliament at Weſtminſter, where he made Tryal of his Peoples Patience and Affections towards him, and had a fifteenth of all the Goods both of the Clergy and Laity granted him without any repining; tho' the Clergy had not long before given a Tenth for two Years to his Brother Edmund, for the carrying on of the Holy War. But the Liberality of the Clergy could not divert him from the Deſign which he had fram'd to himſelf, of abating the Eccleſiaſtical Power, which by long and woful

[b] As he was about this he heard of his Father's Death, which caus'd him to haſten his Return the more.

[c] In his ſhort ſtay with the Pope he perſuaded him to excommunicate Guy de Monfort, for killing his Coſin Henry the Son of Richard King of the Romans, and to interdict his Territories.

[e] The Words of his Homage were very remarkable; My Lord the King, I do you Homage for all the Lands I ought to hold of you, meaning as well thoſe that the French King detain'd from him, as thoſe he was poſſeſs'd of. Mat. Weſt.

[f] From Aquitain he went to the Council of Lyons to viſit the Pope. Here Embaſſadors from England met him, and deſir'd him to haſten his Return home, for that his Preſence was wanted. Chron. de Lan. in Bib. Cot.

[h] This Knight being a Perſon of great Strength of Body and very courageous, was in the Rebellion of the Barons, for which his Eſtate was ſeiz'd; and not daring to come in, he liv'd by Theft and Robberies upon the Road, having Aſſociates of like deſperate Fortunes. He was outlaw'd, but no Man durſt attempt to take him. His Miſchiefs were chiefly done to the King's greateſt Friends, which incens'd the Prince the more againſt him, and induc'd him to make an Experiment of his Strength and Courage by a ſingle Combat; in which the Prince ſo over-match'd him, that he yielded to him, but got his Pardon and Eſtate from the Prince's Favour.

KING EDWARD THE I.st

A. D. 1278. Reg. 6.

Experience of former times, he saw, had been very prejudicial to the Regal Authority, especially when it combined with the Nobility; and therefore, while he was high in the Opinion of his People, he set upon that difficult Work to abate their Privileges. And to that end, in the sixth Year of his Reign, he depriv'd many famous Monasteries of the Nation of their Liberties, and took from the Abbot and Covent of Westminster the Return of Writs granted them by the Charter of King Henry III. his Father. In the Year following he got the Statute of Mortmain to be enacted, to hinder the increase of their Temporal Possessions (which made them so powerful) as being prejudicial to the Kingdom, and Military Affairs. In the second Statute of Westminster he confined the Jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Judges to narrower Limits. Nor did he end here, but lying heavier upon them, he required one half of all their Goods, both Temporal and Spiritual, for one Year; at which, though they were very much disturb'd, yet they were forc'd to yield to his Demand; because, their Discontent being discover'd, one Sir John Havering stood up among them in their Assembly, in the Monks Hall at Westminster, and said, 'Reverend Fathers, if any 'of you dares to contradict the King's Demand 'in this business, let him stand forth into the 'midst of the Assembly, that his Person may be 'known, and taken notice of, as a Breaker of the 'Peace of the Kingdom. At which Speech they all sate silent, and dare not oppose it, as they often did in his Father's Reign.

King Edward subdues Wales.

And now this active Prince being settled in Peace both at home and abroad, could not lie idle; but to satisfie his own Desires of enlarging his Power, as well as to keep his Subjects in Action, whose Ease would corrupt, as he very well knew, resolves upon an Undertaking of Importance to his future Security and Government. Wales, tho' a small Principality, had always been a troublesome Neighbour to the greater part of England and the Kings of it, a Receptacle for all Rebels against the English Kings, and ever ready to combine with Scotland to disturb their Peace and Government, seldom or never having her Borders free from Blood and Mischief; which Edward considering, thought he could never have a better opportunity of curbing them than now. Occasions are easily taken where there is a Design to quarrel. But the Welsh, who were always struggling for their Liberty, seldom fail'd to give some just ones, as there happen'd one at this time.

1279. Leoline, a Prince of that Province, who had been a chief Promoter of the Civil Wars of England, (tho' he dearly paid for it at last) was summon'd to the King's Coronation, and afterward to his first Parliament, there to do his Homage and Fealty to him, as holding his Principality of the English Crown, but he refused to come to them both; alledging, 'That he well remember'd how 'his Father Griffin had broken his Neck in the 'Tower of London, and therefore he could not 'endure to appear in that place, but in any 'other, if he had Hostages given for the Security 'of his Person; or if the King would send Commissioners to him, he was ready to pay his Homage, as the King desired. The King did not seem to resent this arrogant Answer, very unbecoming an Homager, but resolv'd with himself to seize upon his Country; and to this end the next Year after enters it with a powerful Army, laying all waste before him with Fire and Sword, in so fierce a manner, as Leoline, being unable to resist the impetuous Current, sued for Peace, and obtained it; but upon such Conditions, as made the Tenure of his Principality little better than that of a Subject; for he was fined fifty thousand Pound Sterling, and to pay a thousand Pound per Annum Tribute [a] for what he held, which was but for his Life. But yet the King, to gratifie him in something which might oblige him more firmly to him, deliver'd to him Eleanor, the Daughter of Simon Monfort, late Earl of Leicester, who being in her Passage with her Brother Almerick from France into Wales, to become Leoline's Wife, was taken by some Bristol-Ships, and deliver'd Captive to the King, who gave her to Leoline, as the greatest tye of Subjection to him. But all would not do, the desire of Liberty, and some little Wrongs received by ill Administration of Justice upon the Marches, broke the Agreement within three Years, and Leoline in Arms surprizes the Castles of Flint and Rutland [b], with the Person of the Lord [c] Clifford, who was sent a Judge into those parts, and committed many other Acts of Hostility. His Brother David, whom the King had Knighted, and marry'd to the Daughter of the Earl of Derby, a rich Widow, and given him the Castle of Denbigh, with a thousand Pound per Annum, great Favours from so Puissant a King, nevertheless joyned with him to deliver his Country, and recover his Liberty. Edward having notice of this Revolt, being then at the Devises in Wiltshire, prepared a great Army to repress them. But before his setting out upon this Expedition, he went privately to visit his Mother Queen Eleanor, living in the Nunnery of Ambresbury in the same County. While he was discoursing with her, there came into the Chamber, where they were, one who feigned himself to have been Blind, and received his Sight at the Tomb of Henry the Third her Husband; when the King saw him, he knew him a notorious Lyar, and therefore desired his Mother not to believe him. His Mother overjoy'd to hear of the Miracle, which tended so much to the Honour of her Husband, fell into a furious Passion, and bid the King be gone out of her Chamber. The King obey'd, and going forth, meets a Clergyman, to whom he tells the Story of the Impostor, and merrily said, He knew his Father to be so just, that he would rather pull out the Eyes of such a Wretch when he could see, than restore him to Sight if he were blind. In the mean time, while these things were doing, John Peckham Archbishop of Canterbury, to whom the Welsh had before sent a List of the Causes of their Revolt, went [d] of his own accord into Wales, to persuade Leoline to a Submission, that he might avoid the Ruine he foresaw would come upon him. But he could not prevail with him, because he had the better of the English in some little Skirmishes, and the People being encouraged by a Prophecy of Merlin's, which foretold, That he should be shortly crown'd with the Diadem of Brutus [e], so instigated this unhappy Prince, that he would not listen to Peace. Whereupon the Archbishop excommunicated him and his Adherents, and the King entred his Country with a mighty Army: Which, tho' indeed Leoline valiantly opposed, and slew many of great Note in [e] Mr. Daniell does not speak so much in favour of the Welsh as he might have done. They had other more substantial Reasons for the War, and Leoline and his Brother gave the Archbishop above a dozen Articles of Grievances, most of them very weighty, which provok'd them to take Arms; and King Edward refus'd to treat with them. it, yet was himſelf ſlain in the Battel by a common Soldier[a]; and his Head being cut off, was preſented to King Edward, who (as if his Death were not ſufficient without Reproach) cauſed it to be crown'd with Ivy, and ſet upon the Tower of London. And thus died the laſt Prince of Wales, who was betray'd (as they write) by the Men of Buelth. Shortly after David his Brother was taken in Wales, and ſentenced in England to an ignominious Death, which was this: He was firſt drawn at an Horſe's Tail about the City of Shrewſbury, and then beheaded, his Body quarter'd, and his Heart and Bowels burnt. His Head was ſent to be ſet on the Tower with his Brother's, and his four Quarters to theſe four Cities, viz. Briſtol, Northampton, York, and Winchester. An Execution never before ſhewed in this Kingdom upon the Son of a Prince, or any other Nobleman, that we read of in any of our Hiſtories. But by this Example it after grew uſual in the Nation: Even this King (under whom it began) had the Fate of ſuch a miſerable Death entail'd upon his Family, ſeveral of his own Brother's Poſterity dying on the Scaffold. And juſt upon this Conqueſt, his eldeſt Son Alphonſus, then a Youth of twelve Years old (and a Prince of great hopes) dy'd; and Edward, lately[b] born at Carnarven, is his Heir to the Kingdom, and the firſt of the Engliſh who was entitled[c] Prince of Wales; as if it had been an Omen of that Deſtruction which, as we ſhall after ſee, befel him in his Regal Dignity. Thus was Wales (the little Portion of the Iſle of Great Britain, which thoſe Natives could reſerve to themſelves from their firſt Conquerors the Saxons) united to the Crown of England in the eleventh Year of this King's Reign, Anno Dom. 1283. A thing not to be wonder'd at, that they were at laſt wholly ſubdu'd, ſeeing 'twas next to a Miracle how they held out ſo long againſt ſo powerful a Kingdom, without any foreign Aids and Aſſiſtance. Whether the Ground of the Conqueſt was juſt, is not for us to examine. It was certainly of great[d] Benefit to the Nation; for the miſerable Conteſts and bloody Miſchiefs, which often happen'd to both Nations, were hereby extinguiſh'd; and they became one People, govern'd by one Law, and under one Prince; as may be ſeen by the Statute of Rutland, Anno Reg. 12.

1284. Wales annex'd to the Crown of England.

1286. King Edward does Homage to Philip the Fair, King of France.

This Work being effected and ſettled, King Edward having heard of the Death of the King of France, Philip the Hardy, and the Succeſſion of Philip IV. (called the Fair) went over into France to renew and confirm ſuch Conditions as were to be perform'd for the preſervation of his Dominions beyond Sea under the new King, and did him Homage for Aquitain, having before quitted his Claim to Normandy for ever. When he had finiſhed his own Buſineſs, he accommodated the Differences between the Kings of Sicily and Arragon in Spain, (to whom he was Allied) redeemed Charles, entitled Prince of Achaia, (the Son of Charles King of Sicily) from his Impriſonment in Arragon, paying thirty thouſand Pounds for his Ranſom. After his being three Years and an half abroad, he returned into England, with his Coffers empty'd by this Voyage, which he muſt have ſupply'd again. And for it an opportune Occaſion is offer'd. For at his return he meets with many Complaints concerning the ill Adminiſtration of Juſtice in his abſence, which he could not but liſten to, and puniſh the chief Miniſters for, if they were found guilty. The Parliament met at that time, and the Neceſſity of reforming ſo great a Miſchief in the Kingdom being propounded, the Judges were had all into Examination, and upon a plain proof of their Extortions, they were fined to pay theſe following Sums. Firſt, Sir Ralph Hengham, Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench, ſeven thouſand Marks; Sir John Loveton, Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, three thouſand Marks; Sir William Brompton, Juſtice, ſix thouſand Marks[e]; Sir Solomon Rocheſter four thouſand Marks, Sir Richard Boyland four thouſand, Sir Thomas Sodington two thouſand, Sir Walter Hopton two thouſand; which four laſt were Judges Itinerant; Sir William Saham three thouſand Marks; Robert Lithbury, Maſter of the Rolls, one thouſand; Roger Leiceſter, one thouſand; Roger Bray, Eſcheater and Judge for the Jews, one thouſand: But Sir Adam Stratton[f], Chief Baron of the Exchequer, was fined thirty four thouſand Marks; and Thomas Wayland[g], who was found the greateſt Delinquent, and of the greateſt Subſtance, had all his Goods and whole Eſtate confiſcated to the King; which, were it but equal to Sir Adam Statton's Fine, all the Fines together make a hundred thouſand Marks, to enrich the King's Treaſury; which, according to the Rate of Money now, is above three hundred thouſand Marks; a mighty Treaſure to be gotten out of the Hands of ſo few Men, if it were not probable, that the fewneſs of Lawyers in thoſe Days made their Practice in thoſe leſs litigious Times more advantageous. Of no leſs Grievance did this King eaſe the Nation by the Baniſhment of the[h] Jews, for which the Parliament willingly granted him a Fifteenth. The Nation indeed had before offer'd him, in the ninth Year of his Reign, a fifth part of all their Goods to have them expell'd; but then the Jews gave more, and ſo ſtaid till this time; which brought him a greater benefit by confiſcating all their Eſtates, with their Tallies and Obligations, which

[a] He was ſlain by one Stephen Desfranſton at Landweyr in Buelt, in Radnorſhire, on the 11th of December 1283.

[b] He was born on the 26th of April, 1284.

[c] The Welſh lov'd this Prince, partly for the Honour he deriv'd from them, and partly for his Nativity among them, ſo entirely, that in his greateſt Misfortunes through his Reign they ever continu'd firm to him; and after his Death bewail'd him in lamentable Songs.

[d] How great a Benefit the Conqueſt of this little Kingdom of Wales was thought then to England, may be ſeen by King Edward's own Words in the Preamble to his Law, call'd Statutum Walliæ, where he thus ſpeaks, 'The Divine Providence, which diſpoſeth 'all things rightly, among other Diſpenſations of his Mercy, by which he hath vouchſafed to adorn us and our Kingdom of 'England, hath now by his Mercy ſubjected the Kingdom of Wales, with the Inhabitants thereof, wholly and fully, without 'any Lett and Hindrance, to our Property and Dominion, having annex'd and united the ſame to the Crown of our ſaid Realm, 'as one Member of the ſelf-ſame Body.

[e] His Fine was but three thouſand Marks.

[f] In the Chronicle of Dunſtable, a Manuſcript in the Cott. Libr. he is call'd Adam de Stratten, a certain Clerk of the Court.

[g] Sir Thomas Wayland, Chief Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, was alſo baniſh'd for ever out of the Kingdom. After this juſt Puniſhment of ſuch corrupt Judges, the King caus'd, that all the Judges at their entring upon their Office ſhould ſwear, That they would take no Gift of any Man, unleſs it were a Breakfaſt, or ſome ſuch ſmall Preſent.

[h] The Jews came in with the Conqueror, and were ſettl'd in certain Streets by themſelves in London, of which Old-Jury was the chief. They had a Judge appointed over them, to decide all Controverſies between themſelves, or with the Chriſtians; and had an High-Prieſt (who was confirm'd in his Office by the King) and Synagogues allow'd them. They were always hated by the People for their Extortions and Uſury, and rather tolerated than lov'd by the Kings, becauſe they now and then fleec'd them. But now they were grown intolerable to the Nation, by their Witchcraft, Poiſoning, Clipping of Money, Counterfeiting of Hands and Seals, Crucifying of Children privately, and cruel Uſury: So that nothing would ſatisfie the People, but the utter extirpation of them out of the Kingdom; to which Edward did not very unwillingly yield, becauſe they were allow'd to carry nothing away with them, but ſome ſmall matter to bear their Charges, and ſo left him a vaſt Treaſure. They went moſt of them into Italy and Germany.

amounted to an infinite Treaſure; which, tho' it was the laſt advantage the Crown could hope for from them, yet he gained a more valuable Treaſure by it, viz. the Good-will of his People, who as they had granted him many Supplies, were obliged by ſuch Proviſions always to aid him with their Eſtates. He came to an empty Treaſury at firſt, and having great occaſion for Money, he was driven to all the Shifts poſſible to fill it. For beſides what he had given him by the Parliament and Pope in the firſt three Years of his Reign before mentioned, in the ſeventh Year of his Reign the Old Money was called in, and New coined, becauſe it had been much defaced by the Jews, two hundred ninety ſeven Perſons being executed at London at one time for this Crime; and this alſo brought in great benefit to the King. In his eighth Year he had a deſign to examine every Man's Title to his Land by a Quo-Warranto; but it was ſo fiercely oppoſed by the Earl Warren, who drew out his Sword upon the Writ, ſaying, That he held his Land by his Sword, and by it he would make his Tenure good. Whereupon the King deſiſted from that Attempt, and obtained a fifteenth of the Clergy. In the 11th Year he had a thirtieth of the Laity, and a twentieth of the Clergy, for the War againſt the Welſh; and in the 13th Eſcuage of forty Shillings every Knight's Fee for the ſame purpoſe. In the 14th Year he had a thouſand Marks of certain Merchants, who were fined for falſe Weights. In his 17th he had the Fines of the Judges before mentioned; and in his 18th Year, this Confiſcation of the Jews Eſtates, and a fifteenth of the Engliſh. After this, in the 19th Year of his Reign, upon a pretence of a Voyage to the Holy Land, the Clergy granted him an eleventh part of all their Moveables. And ſhortly after the Pope procured him a tenth for ſix Years, to be gather'd in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and laid up in Monaſteries, till he was entred into Mare Maggior, or the Euxine-Sea: But he made the Collectors pay him the Money gather'd for three Years, without going ſo far, having occaſion to uſe it at home about the purchaſe of a new Kingdom.

The Occaſion of Edward's Wars with Scotland.

For the Crown of Scotland, upon the Death of King Alexander, who dy'd without Heirs, was in Controverſie. Six Competitors pretended a Title to it, who were all deſcended from David Earl of Huntington, the younger Brother of William King of Scots, who was Grandfather to the late King Alexander. Edward pretending a Right of Superiority from his Anceſtors over that Kingdom, undertakes to decide the Quarrel; and the Scots, who govern'd the Nation in the Interregnum, to avoid farther Inconveniences, were forced to make him Arbitrator, and the ſix Competitors to ſtand to his Award. John Baliol Lord of Galloway, and Robert Bruce[a], both deſcended of David, Brother of King William, the one of the ſecond, the other of the eldeſt Daughter, had the plaineſt and moſt undiſputable Claim. The Controverſie was long, and tho' debated by the moſt Learned in the Law of both Kingdoms, and the Civilians of France, yet, after ſix Years, remain'd undecided. King Edward therefore, to put an end to this buſineſs, but with ſome advantage to himſelf, took a Journey into the North with his Queen; but in [b] the Way he loſt his greateſt Worldly Felicity, Queen Eleanor, who dy'd Novem. 29. at Hardeby in Lincolnſhire. This Accident not only caus'd exceſſive Grief to him, but brought him back again to inter her Body at Weſtminſter; and all along the Road, in the places where it reſted, viz. at Stamford, Waltham, Weſtcheap, Charing, &c. he erected goodly Croſſes, engraven with her Image, in Teſtimony of his great Affection to her, and as Memorials of her Fidelity and Virtues; in which ſhe excell'd all Womankind, as much as ſhe did in Dignity. Her Funeral Solemnities being performed, the King return'd back to his Scotiſh Buſineſs; and that he might ſettle it to his own Honour and Advantage, he firſt treats privately with Robert Bruce (who had the weaker Title, but moſt Friends) and promiſes, That if he would pay a Fealty and Homage to the Crown of England, he would make him King of Scotland. But Bruce anſwer'd him, That he was not ſo deſirous of Rule, as to deſtroy the Liberties of his Country for it[c]. Then he makes the like offer to Baliol, who having indeed the beſt Title, but leaſt Love and Intereſt with the People, and being more greedy of a Kingdom than true Honour, yields to it, is crown'd King at Scone, receives Fealty of the chief Nobility, except Bruce, comes to New-Caſtle upon Tine, where King Edward then lay, and there, with many of his Nobles, ſwears Fealty and did Homage to him, as his Sovereign Lord[d]: Which Act, tho' he did it to ſecure him, was his undoing. For being very little belov'd before, he now became leſs; and ſuch as ſtood for Bruce, and other Noblemen, (who were deſirous to preſerve the Liberties of their Country) were much incenſed againſt him, not only for this Act; but for his Injuſtice done in the Caſe of the Earl of Fife, who having been one of the ſix Governours in the Anarchy, was after ſlain by the Family of Abernethe[e]. The Earl's Brother proſecuted the Murtherers by Law, and brought the Cauſe before the King, Baliol, in his Parliament; but not obtaining Juſtice, the King deciding it for the Abernethe, the wronged Gentleman appeals to the Court of England. King Baliol upon this is ſummon'd to anſwer, and appears, ſitting with King Edward in his Parliament till his Cauſe was to be try'd; and then is cited by an Officer to ariſe, and

[a] The other four were Erick King of Norway, Florence Earl of Holland, John Haſtings Lord of Abergavenny, and John Earl of Badenaw; there were ſix Competitors more, Patrick Dunbar Earl of Marche, William de Veſey, William de Ros, Robert de Pinkny, Nicholas de Sowles, Roger de Mandeville.

[b] The Queen did not die in this Journey, but the laſt Year, when King Edward was going into Scotland, to put his Daughter-in-Law, Wife to Prince Edward, and Daughter to Eric King of Norway, in Poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of Scotland, that Princeſs having the beſt Title to the Crown. She dy'd alſo before the King reach'd the Borders. And this Year he was call'd back by the Death of Queen Eleanor his Mother.

[c] This Story is ſo far from being true, that when the Diſpute about the Succeſſion to the Crown of Scotland was firſt left to King Edward to be decided, all the Competitors were oblig'd to own the King's Superiority over that Kingdom, and Robert Bruce was the firſt of them that did it, in theſe words: I do acknowledge the King of England ſuperiour and direct Lord of the Kingdom of Scotland, and will before and from him, as my ſuperiour and direct Lord of the Kingdom of Scotland, anſwer and receive Juſtice. Rot. de Superioritate Regis Angliæ in Scotiam, 18 Ed. 1. ——— In the Tower.

[d] On the 26th of December, 1273. He did Homage in theſe words, My Lord, Edward, King of England, ſuperiour Lord of the Kingdom of Scotland: I, John, King of Scotland, become your Liege-Man for the whole Kingdom of Scotland, with its Appurtenances; which Kingdom I claim and hold, and ought of right to hold, for Me and my Heirs, Kings of Scotland, Hereditarily of You and your Heirs, Kings of England, and ſhall bear Faith to You and your Heirs, Kings of England, of Life and Limb, and terrene Honour, againſt all Men.

[e] It appears by the Rolls in the Tower, De Sup. Reg. Ang. in Scot. and Riley's Placita Parliamentaria, that Macduff Earl of Fife, brought a Complaint or Appeal, for certain Lands, againſt King John; and the Proceſs of this Suit being before King Edward, as ſuperiour Lord of Scotland, occaſion'd the Scots League with France in the courſe of this Affair, and all the Wars that follow'd between the two Kingdoms.

ſtand at the place appointed for Pleading. Baliol unwilling to do it, pleads, That he might anſwer by a Procurator, but was deny'd; whereupon he riſes himſelf, deſcends, and pleads his Cauſe: But taking it for an Indignity, offer'd him by the King of England, he returns home with an Heart full of Diſcontent, and meditating Revenge, renews the ancient League with France, and confirms it with the Marriage of his Son Edward to a Daughter of Charles, King Philip's Brother, who was glad to embrace a Quarrel with the King of England, with whom he was offended; and when he had thus done, he bids Defiance to King Edward, and renounces his Allegiance, as unlawfully promiſed, being not in his Power without the Conſent of the State to do any ſuch Act. And now began the Conteſt between theſe two Nations, which ſpilt more Chriſtian Blood, did more Miſchief, and continu'd longer than any Wars (that we read of) between any two People of the World; for all the Kings who ſucceeded for three hundred Years together, even to the Bleſſed Union of them by King James I. had their Share more or leſs in this Quarrel. And though England, being much the greater and ſtronger Nation, had the good Fortune often to overcome; yet it was with ſo great Expence of Blood, Time, and Treaſure, that what the got coſt more than 'twas worth, and was ſo ſoon loſt again, the Scots being never ſo fully ſubdu'd, but that they were ſoon for recovering their Liberties again, and that with Succeſs: So that Providence may ſeem to decree no Union firm between theſe two Nations, that was made by Force, but by the milder way of Peace and Succeſſion.

The Wars between Scotland and England begun. 1296.

Edward, who had long before formed to himſelf a Deſign of obtaining the Kingdom of Scotland by the faireſt means he could, and for that end ſought to match his Son Edward to Margaret the King of Norway's Daughter, Heir to the laſt King Alexander, but by her Death was diſappointed, reſolves to do it by Force, upon this Defection of King Baliol. And becauſe he was ſenſible that he had no contemptible Enemy to deal with, upon the account of his League with the King of France, he counter-leagues with all the Neighbouring Princes that he could either by Gifts or Alliance draw in to ſtrengthen his Party; as firſt with Guy Earl of Flanders, with whoſe Daughter he deſigns to match his Son Edward: Then with Adolphus of Naſſaw the Emperour, to whom he gave [a] 15000 l. Sterling to recover certain Territories of France, which he claimed as belonging to the Empire. He had likewiſe marry'd one of his Daughters to the Duke of Barr, who pretended a Title to Champaigne, and another to John Duke of Brabant; all which Princes, with many other, who bord'er'd on France, he ſets upon that King. On the other ſide, the King of France ſummon'd King Edward, as owing Homage to his Crown, to appear and anſwer in his Court for certain Spoils committed on the Coaſts of Normandy by the Engliſh; which he refuſing to do, or making any Satisfaction for the Wrongs done, was by an Arreſt condemn'd to loſe all his Territories in France, and an Army was preſently ſent under the Command of Charles de Valois, and Arnold de Neal Conſtable of France, to ſeize upon them, who took Bourdeaux and many other important

Places, and fortified them. The King of England hearing this, ſends over his Brother Edmund Earl of Lancaſter, the Earls of Lincoln and Richmond, with twenty eight Banners, ſeven hundred Men at Arms, and a Navy of three hundred and ſixty Sail to recover his Right in France. And in the mean time himſelf ſets upon Baliol (refuſing upon Summons to appear at his Court at Newcaſtle, and ſtanding upon his Guard) and enters Scotland with an Army big enough to conquer a greater Nation, conſiſting of four thouſand Horſe and thirty thouſand Foot, beſides what the Biſhop of Durham brought to his Aſſiſtance, which were five hundred Horſe and a thouſand Foot, intending to make a ſpeedy Conqueſt of Scotland, that he might afterward paſs over into France to aſſiſt his Confederates, and be reveng'd on the King of France. He firſt took Berwicke with the Slaughter of fifteen thouſand Scots, or more [b], and after ſeiz'd upon the Caſtles of Dunbar, Roxborough, Edenborough, Sterling, and S. John's Town, which were either won by Force, or yielded to him. This furious Current of Succeſs brought Baliol to ſue for Peace, and ſubmit himſelf by taking his Oath of Fealty to King Edward, as his Sovereign Lord [c]; and then he call'd a Parliament for Scotland, which was held at Berwicke, wherein the Nobility did their Homage alſo to him, confirming the ſame by a Charter under their Hands and Seals, except William Douglaſſe, who choſe rather to endure the Miſeries of a Priſon, than yield to the Subjection of England. But King Baliol (notwithſtanding his Subjection) was ſent Priſoner into England, after he had enjoy'd that Dignity four Years; for he had ſo little Power, that he could hardly be ſaid to reign; and King Edward returned into England again, leaving John Warren, Earl of Surrey and Suſſex, Warden of all Scotland; Hugh Creſſingham Treaſurer, and William Ormeſby Chief Juſtice, giving them a Commiſſion to take the Homages and Fealties of all that held Lands of the Crown in his Name: So that the Conqueſt of Scotland ſeem'd almoſt effected, but was not, as we ſhall ſee by the many Wars to maintain it [d]. But theſe happen'd not preſently, the King therefore turns his whole Deſigns againſt France, and for that end calls a Parliament at S. Edmunds Bury; wherein the Citizens and Burgeſſes of ſeveral great Towns of England, granted him the eighth part of their Goods, and others of the People the twelfth. But the Clergy, who had privately procur'd of Pope Boniface [e] a Prohibition of paying any Tallage, or Impoſition, laid upon them by any Lay Prince, or upon any thing that belong to the Church, abſolutely refus'd to pay any thing (having had ſo many Levies raiſed upon them lately, viz. Anno Reg. 22. 600000 l. of which the Abby of Canterbury alone paid 596 l. 7 s. 10 d. and in the twenty third Year of his Reign the King ſeized into his hands all the Priories and their Goods that were in the Poſſeſſion of Strangers, beſides a Loan, which he had of the Clergy amounting to an 100000 l. of which the Abbot of Bury is ſaid to have paid 655 l.) But theſe Reaſons were not accepted as a Plea for their Obſtinacy; but upon their Refuſal, the King ſeized upon all the Temporalties of the Church, puts all the Clergy out of his Protection, by which they were expoſed to all the Injuries of ill Men, and could have no Juſtice or Redreſs in the King's Courts. This Strain of State, which was never before uſed, nor could be foreſeen, ſo amaz'd the Clergy, that the Archbiſhop of York, the Biſhops of Durham, Ely, Saliſbury, and Lincoln, yielded to pay a fifth part of all their Goods towards the Maintenance of the King's Wars; and ſo the King's Wrath was appeaſed, and they were receiv'd into Favour. But the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Robert Winchelſea, who animated all the reſt to ſtand out, had all his Goods ſeiz'd on, and all the Monaſteries within his Dioceſs, and part of Lincoln, taken into the King's hand, and Officers appointed to collect their Revenues and Rents for the King, allowing them only ſo much out of them as was neceſſary for their Suſtenance: But at length, the Abbots and Monks, with all Prieſts, giving the King a fourth part of their Goods, redeem'd themſelves and the King's Favour. Thus will Warlike Princes force Supplies from their Subjects in their Neceſſities, tho' they are very unwilling, and it be burthenſome to them [a].

During this Conteſt and Agreement with the Clergy, the King called a Parliament of his Nobility at Saliſbury, to which no Churchmen were admitted; and in it he requires ſome of his great Lords to go over with him into his Wars in Gaſcoigne, where he wanted a preſent Supply of Commanders, becauſe of the Death of his Brother Edmund; who having ſpent much Time and Money upon the Siege of Bourdeaux in vain, retir'd to Bayon, then in the Poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, and there died: But they all ſingly made Excuſes for themſelves; which ſo anger'd the King, that he told them, 'They ſhould go, or he would give 'their Lands to them that ſhould. Upon this Threat, Humphrey Bohun Earl of Hereford, High Conſtable, and Roger Bygod Earl of Norfolk, Marſhal of England, declared, 'That if he would go 'in Perſon, they would attend him, otherwiſe 'not. Which Anſwer offended the King more, who urged it again; and the Earl Marſhal proteſted, 'That he would willingly go thither with 'the King, and march before him in the Van-'guard, as by Right of Inheritance he ought to do: But the King told him plainly, 'He ſhould go 'with any other, although he went not himſelf 'in Perſon. But the Earl ſaid, 'I am not ſo 'bound, neither will I take that Journey with-'out you. Then the King ſwore, 'By God, Sir 'Earl, you ſhall go or hang. But the Earl re-ply'd, 'I ſwear by the ſame Oath, I will nei-'ther go nor hang, and ſo departed without Leave. This Heat ſtirred up a Revolt, for the two Earls immediately gather'd together many Noblemen, and others their Friends to the Number of thirty Banners: So that they were fifteen hundred armed Men, well accoutred, and ſtood upon their Guard againſt him. But he, like a prudent Prince, who knew his times for Buſineſs, lets the Matter fall; becauſe both his Buſineſs in France, and preſſing Neceſſity of his aiding the Confederates (on which his Honour, and all his Dominions abroad depended) called him over into Flanders, which the King of France had invaded, pretending the ſame Title to that Province as King Edward did to Scotland. The Occaſion was this: The King of France having had Intelligence of the Deſigns of Guy Earl of Flanders, and the Alliance that he intended with the King of England, ſends for him (as if he knew nothing of it) to come with his Wife and Daughter, and make merry with him at Paris: But inſtead of Feaſting he made him his Priſoner, and takes his Daughter from him; becauſe being his Vaſſal, he deſign'd to match her with the Son of his Capital Enemy. The Earl excus'd himſelf, as well as he could, and by much Mediation was releas'd and ſuffer'd to depart, but without his Daughter; for whom notwithſtanding his Complaints to the Pope, and other Princes, who carneſtly ſolicited for him, he could not get a Releaſe; and thereupon this Earl preſuming upon the Aſſiſtance of the Confederates takes Arms, and defies the King of France, who immediately invaded his Territories with ſixty thouſand Men. The King of England hearing this, made all the haſte he could to relieve this diſtreſſed Earl, tho' he left his Buſineſs at home in a broken Condition, the Scots revolting, the Engliſh in Diſcontents, for which he made the beſt Proviſion he could, by leaving the Adminiſtration of the Kingdom to his Son the Prince in his abſence, with the Advice of ſome great Counſellours, as the Biſhop of London, the Earl of Warwick, the Lords Reginal Gray and Clifford; and to pacifie the Clergy, he receiv'd the Archbiſhop of Canterbury into his Favour. Being now ready to take Ship, the Archbiſhop, Biſhops, Earls, Barons, and the Commons, ſend him a Roll of the general Grievances of his Subjects; 'Concern-'ing his Taxes, Subſidies, and Impoſitions; his 'ſeeking to force their Services by unlawful 'Courſes; his late Impoſt of forty Shillings up-'on every Sack of Wool, which was but a Noble 'a Sack before, valuing the Wool of England to be 'a fifth part of all the Subſtance of it. The King ſends them this Anſwer; 'That he could not an-'ſwer any thing without the Advice of a Council, 'which were not now about him; and therefore 'requir'd them, ſince they would not attend 'him, tho' he went in Perſon in this Expedition, 'becauſe he went not into France or Scotland, 'that they would not diſturb the Peace of the 'Kingdom in his abſence, and at his return he 'would ſet all things in order. And ſo he ſet forward in his Journey with five hundred Sail, and eighteen thouſand armed Men [b], but found not Fortune ſo favourable in Flanders, as uſually ſhe had been to him. For contrary to his Expectation he found the People divided into popular Factions; and tho' they were willing to aſſiſt their Prince and defend their Liberties, yet ſo rich and proud, that they would be commanded no otherwiſe than they liſted; the King of France daily getting ground, having won Liſle, Douay, Courtray, Burges and Dam, and the Emperour Adolph failing in his Perſonal Aſſiſtance contrary to his Engagement and Bargain; all which much perplex'd him, with tedious Delays, and put him to great Trouble and Expences: So that he was forc'd to order his Son to call a Parliament at York, to procure him Supplies of Money and Treaſure; and becauſe he would not be diſappointed of a liberal Grant, condeſcended to all Articles that were demanded concerning the great Charter, promiſing never after to charge his Subjects otherwiſe than by their own Conſents in Parliament, and to pardon thoſe that refuſe to attend him in this Journey, for which all the Commons of the Realm granted him the ninth Penny of their Goods; the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, with the Clergy of his Province, the tenth Penny, and the Archbiſhop of York and his Province the fifth, and ſo the King's Wants were relieved and Kingdom ſatisfied; but ſuch Conceſſions, which are extorted by Neceſſity, are always unſincere, and ſo never laſting. The King being thus ſupply'd, he ſtaid all that Winrer at Gaunt, where his Soldiers committed ſo many Outrages, that the Citizens being exaſperated thereby took Arms, ſlew many; and tho' the Earl Guy did all he could by Gifts and fair Words to appeaſe the incens'd Rabble, yet they purſu'd the King and his Forces ſo hard, that they could hardly get ſafe out of the Country.

Thus the King left Flanders without Succeſs, having made a Truce with the King of France for two Years; and leaving the poor Earl Guy to ſhift for himſelf, who ſhortly after became a Prey to his Enemy, and being made a Priſoner in Paris died with Grief, with his Daughter, and Flanders was made ſubject to the King of France, though he kept it not long: For after they had received him for their Lord, his Exactions and Oppreſſions upon them were ſo great, contrary to their ancient Liberties, that they arm'd all the People againſt him, being rich and mighty; who gave France the biggeſt Blow that ever it at once received at the Battel of Courtray, wherein the Earl of Artois, General of the Army, Arnold de Neel Conſtable of France, and all the Commanders, with twelve thouſand Gentlemen, were ſlain; and tho' he ſtill maintain'd the Quarrel againſt them for their Country, yet 'twas with his great Damage: For he loſt in the eleven Years ſpace the Lives of an hundred thouſand Frenchmen (as their own Hiſtories affirm) and by his Impoſitions of new Taxes of Malletote, and the tenth Denier, i. e. Penny upon every Livre or Pound of all Merchandizes, bred great great Outcries and dangerous Seditions among his Subjects, the lamentable Fruits of ſuch Attempts, which may juſtly deter Princes from meddling upon ſuch unjuſt Titles.

1300. King Edward's Expedition into Scotland, which was almoſt loſt by the Courage of one Wallis.

King Edward being come home, immediately prepares for an Expedition into Scotland, which in his abſence had beaten his Officers and People almoſt out of the Country; having put Earl Warren to flight, and ſlain Sir Hugh Creſſingham, with ſix thouſand Engliſh, recover'd many Caſtles, and regain'd Berwicke, and all by the Encouragement and Conduct of a poor private Gentleman, tho' deſcended of a Noble Family, William Wallis; who ſeeing his Country in miſerable Slavery, the Nobility either in Captivity or Subjection, and all Hopes of Recovery from other ways to no purpoſe expected, gather'd a Company of Men of as poor and deſperate Condition as himſelf, and attempts upon all Advantages he could diſcover to annoy the Engliſh; wherein having good Succeſs, his Company and Courage ſo increaſed, that he became the general Guardian of the whole Kingdom, and having given the Engliſh ſeveral Defeats, was in a great Poſſibility to have redeem'd his Country from Subjection to England. So much could the Courage of one brave Man contribute to ſet a whole Nation free, which being all that he aim'd at, and not a Diadem or Crown, made his Vertues more admirable to all Ages, than otherwiſe they would have been.

Courts of Juſtice remov'd to York.

And now King Edward, that he might the better govern his two Kingdoms, removes his Exchequer and Courts of Juſtice to York, where they continu'd above ſix Years; and here he called a Parliament, requiring all his Subjects that held of him by Knight's Service, to be ready at Roxborough upon a certain Day, who accordingly aſſembled in great Numbers, viz. three thouſand armed Men with barded Horſes, and four thouſand other armed Horſemen without Bards, with an Army of Foot proportionable [a], conſiſting moſt of Welſh and Iriſh, beſides five hundred Men out of Gaſcoigne, and with this Army he makes his ſecond Expedition into Scotland. The Earls of Hereford and Norfolk, notwithſtanding their former Contempt, attended him: But tho' he was at the Head of a mighty Army, and ſurrounded with a great Strength, yet before they would advance one Step, they requir'd that the two Charters and their Pardons might be ratified, which they thought not ſufficiently ſecur'd to them, becauſe they were granted beyond Sea; wherefore the Biſhop of Durham, and the Earls of Surrey, Warwick, and Gloceſter, undertook for the King, that after he had ſubdu'd his Enemies and was return'd, he ſhould grant their Deſires; and ſo theſe two Earls, with the Earl of Lincoln, led his Van-guard at the famous Battel of Fawkirke, wherein the King of England obtain'd a great Victory at the Expence of two hundred Knights, and above forty thouſand Scots [b] Blood: But Wallis, with ſome few, eſcaped to make him more Work. And now again Scotland might ſeem quite overcome, moſt of the Eſtates of the Earls and Barons of Scotland (with their Titles) for this Revolt being given to the Engliſh Nobility to make them more reſolute and ready to maintain this Conqueſt, and a Parliament is called at St. Andrews, where all the great Men of the Kingdom (except only Wallis) ſwore Fealty to the King of England [c]. The Scotiſh Writers brand King Edward with moſt cruel Tyranny in this Expedition; 'Becauſe he was not content to carry away captive all that were likely to create any Diſturbances in the Nation, but endeavour'd to blot out their Memory for ever, by aboliſhing their ancient Laws, changing their Eccleſiaſtical Rites for the Cuſtoms of England, taking from them their Hiſtories, Inſtruments of State, Monuments of Antiquity, either left by the Romans or erected by themſelves, carrying all their Books and Learned Men into England, and removing the Marble Chair, on which the Fate of their Kingdom, as they imagin'd, depended; as if he had reſolv'd not only to deprive them of their Strength, but their Underſtandings, that he might eſtabliſh a perpetual Dominion over them.

This Expedition being over, he call'd another Parliament at Weſtminſter, wherein he promiſed to confirm the two Charters; and a farther Allowance for Diſforeſting again what had been once done before, was urg'd, and at length granted, with omiſſion of the Clauſe, Salvo Jure Coronæ Noſtræ, which the King greatly deſired ſhould have been inſerted, but the People would not endure it; and the Perambulation of the Foreſts of England is committed to three Biſhops, three Earls, and three Barons. The same Pope also obtained a Permission of Edward, that John Baliol, the Captive King of the Scots, should go and live upon certain Lands he had in France, and undertook for his Observation of the Peace, and his Confinement; but he shortly after dy'd, having had little Joy in a Crown, and scarce leisure to know he was a King. About this time the crying-down and calling-in of a certain base Money, call'd Crocard and Pollard, and stamping them again, brought some advantage to the King's Treasury. But he had soon an occasion to spend it in a third Expedition into Scotland (from which he had not been return'd above eighteen Months) wherein he did little more than recover Sterling-Castle, defended three Months against all his Forces by William Oliver, and at last surrender'd to him upon Conditions. The Scots complain to Pope Boniface.

Upon the Conclusion of the Peace with France, the Scots being left out, and having none to relieve them, send their lamentable Complaints to Pope Boniface, representing to him 'the afflicted 'State of their Country, the Usurpation of the King 'of England upon them, and his most Tyrannical 'Proceedings with them, contrary to all Right 'and Equity; protesting, That they never knew 'of any Sovereignty he had over them, but that 'they were a free Kingdom of themselves; and 'so at first he dealt with them upon the Death 'of their last King Alexander, both in the Treaty 'of Matriage for his Son Edward with Margaret 'the Heir of Scotland, and also after her Death 'for the decision of the Title of their Crown, 'wherein he sought by their Consents to be made 'Arbitrator, as he was: And tho' since they have 'yielded much more to him, yet it was done by 'force, because they were not able to resist. The Pope having received this Remonstrance, writes powerful Letters to the King of England, commanding him 'to forbear farther proceedings a-'gainst them, claiming withal the Sovereign Au-'thority over that Kingdom, as belonging to the 'Church. The King answers the Pope's Letters at large, 'proving from all Antiquity, that the 'Dominion of Scotland had ever appertained to 'the English Crown, even from Brutus to his own 'Time. And at the same time all the Nobility wrote to the Pope, 'owning and claiming the 'same Right; and peremptorily conclude, That 'the King, their Lord, should in no wise under-'go his Holiness's Judgment therein, nor send 'his Procurators (as was required) about that bu-'siness, as tho' their King's Title were dubious, 'to the prejudice of the Crown, the Royal Dig-'nity, Liberties, Customs, and Laws of England, 'which by their Oath and Duty they were bound 'to observe, and would defend with their Lives; 'nor could they permit, if the King would, any 'such unlawful proceedings. And therefore be-'sought his Holiness not to concern himself far-'ther in this matter. These [a] Letters were subscribed with all their Names (set down particularly in Speed, p. 541.) and dated at Lincoln, where the Parliament was then holden, Anno Dom. 1301. The Pope upon this Answer, tho' not very grateful to him, yet stirr'd no more in the Scots Cause, because he had his Hands full of other Matters. For the King of France, whom he had Excommunicated, and given away his Kingdom to Albert of Austria, then Emperor, shortly after so wrought as his Spirituality was surpriz'd at Anagne, a City of Abruzzo, whither he was retir'd from the Troubles of Rome, and so violently treated by Sciarra Colonesse, a Banditto of Rome, and Nogoret an Albigioye, both whom he had persecuted as in extream Rage and Anguish, within few Days after he ends his turbulent Life.

Boniface's Death.

The King of England, not yet enjoying a peaceable Possession of Scotland, was forced to make a fourth Expedition thither, to allay fresh Commotions there; and to furnish himself out for this Action, he call'd a Parliament at Lincoln, where he confirmed the two Charters again, and received of the People, as a grateful Acknowledgment of his Kindness to them, a fifteenth of all their Goods. Being thus supply'd with Money, he invades Scotland again, and had Homage and Fealty sworn to him a fourth time, as a Conqueror of it; which, accounting a sufficient confirmation of his Sovereignty over it, he return'd in a Triumphant manner, and in his way removes his Exchequer from York, feasts his Nobility at Lincoln magnificently, and so comes to London, where he gave solemn Thanks to God and S. Edward for the Victory; which Act of Piety may seem to have been the Cause of his obtaining a more compleat Victory, by bringing into his power his greatest Enemy (that renowned Guardian of his Country) William Wallis, who being betray'd by his Companion, was taken by Sir John Menteth, and sent up to the King to London, where he was try'd for his many Treasons commited against the King (tho' at his Arraignment he would not acknowledge him to be his King) and was condemned, according to the Laws of England, to be drawn, hang'd and quarter'd; and accordingly suffer'd the Sentence. Thus dy'd that worthy Man, for the defence of the Liberties of his own Country, in a strange one, and remains among the best Examples of Piety and Courage in that kind. And now the King being (as he supposed) secure from all Disturbances abroad and at home, being an universal Lord of the whole Isle, and having strong Alliances abroad, began to look nearly into his Government, and to raise himself Advantages from those Disorders which the Wars had caused. And the first Example of his Power (which he would have equal to his Will) was in the Case of Sir Nicholas Segrave, one of the greatest Knights of the Kingdom, who being accused of Treason by Sir John Crombwell, offer'd to justifie himself by Duel; which, because the King refused to grant, in respect to the present War, he leaves the Camp, and went over the Sea to fight his Enemy. The King being angry at his Contempt of his Prohibition, accuses him of exposing his Royal Person to the Rage of his Enemies, and orders Justice to proceed against him. The Judges consulted three Days on his Case, and at last adjudged him guilty of Death, and all his Moveables and Immoveables to be forfeited to the King; but added, 'That he went out 'of the Nation, not in contempt of the King, but 'to be reveng'd of his Enemy, and therefore it 'was in the King's power to shew him Mercy. The King in anger replied, 'Have you been all 'this while consulting for this? I know it is in

But let this your Judg-'ment be recorded, and ever held as a Law. And ſo Sir Nicholas, for Example and Terror to others, was put into Priſon; tho' afterward, by the Interceſſion of many Noblemen of the Kingdom, and thirty of his Equals, being bound Body for Body, and Goods for Goods, for his Appearance whenever he ſhould be call'd, the King reſtor'd him to his Eſtate. Shortly after the King likewiſe ſends out a new Writ of Inquiſition, call'd Trail-Baſton[a], to ſearch out, and enquire after Intruders on other Men's Lands, who, to keep out the right Owner of them, would make over their Land to great Men; as alſo after Batterers, who were hired to beat Men; Breakers of the Peace, Raviſhers, Incendiaries, Murtherers, Fighters, falſe Jurors, and other ſuch Malefactors; which Inquiſition was ſo ſtrictly executed, and ſo great Fines impoſed upon ſuch as were guilty of any the ſaid Crimes, that the King's Treaſure was much increaſed by it. And ſo did likewiſe another Commiſſion, ſent out at the ſame time, to examine into the Behaviour of all Officers, and Miniſters of Juſtice; whereby many were found Delinquents, and paid dearly for it. By this means Informers grew in great Requeſt, and were encouraged, as the King's Friends, and his chief Agents for his Treaſury. But beſides theſe ways of Enriching himſelf, the King made ſome profit of certain Silver Mines in Devonſhire, (as Hollinſhead relates) but it ſeems they were not ſought after in following times, becauſe the Charge was greater than the Profit.

And now the King being become a Terror to his Subjects, began to ſhew his Reſentment of the ſtubborn Behaviour of his Nobles to him in times paſt, and ſo terrified Roger Bigod[b] Earl Marſhal, that to recover his Favour, he made him Heir of all his Lands, (tho' he had a Brother living) and only reſerved to himſelf an Annuity of a thouſand Pound per Annum for his Life. Of others of them alſo he got great Sums for the ſame Offence. But the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, whom he accuſed of having diſturbed the Peace in his abſence, he ſent over to Pope Clement V. who ſucceeded Boniface, to be cruſh'd by a double power. For this Pope was a Native of Burdeaux, and ſo as more regardful of the King, once his Sovereign, ſo alſo more favourable to the King's Deſires; which to cheriſh and increaſe, the King ſent him a compleat ſet of Furniture for his Chamber of clean Gold, which had ſuch an influence upon the Pope, that he let loſe the Lion upon his Subjects again, by abſolving him from his Oaths and Obligations concerning the Charters, which he had confirmed by his three laſt Acts of Parliament; an Act of as little Piety in the Pope, as Conſcience in the King. But it was not long before he found the Error of this Action, and ſaw juſt Cauſe to reform it, having as much need of their Love, as they of his Juſtice, which was by the unexpected News of a King made and crown'd in Scotland, done after this manner. Robert Bruce Earl of Carricke, the Son of that Robert who was Competitor with Baliol for the Kingdom, eſcaping out of England, becomes Head of the confuſed Body of that People, was crowned King[c], and pieced them up into ſuch an Union preſently, that he had Hands enough to ſupport him before any Rumour of it could come to the Ears of King Edward, altho' John Comyn, his Coſin-German, a Man of great Intereſt and Alliance in Scotland, had written to the King of England to diſcover his Deſign; of which Bruce being either aware or ſuſpicious, found out ways to intercept his Letters; and finding him at Dunfrays, ſet upon him, and murther'd him in the Church. This Foundation, which was laid in Blood, (the Place, Perſon, and Manner of it making it odious) much blemiſh'd his beginning, and was ſo far from gaining him a greater Security, as he imagin'd, that it got him more Enemies, and raiſed a mighty Party againſt him. King Edward (tho' late acquainted with his deſign, yet haſten'd the faſter to overtake him) and therefore ſends Amier de Valence Earl of Pembroke, the Lords Clifford and Piercy, with a ſtrong Power to relieve his Wardens of Scotland, (who upon the Revolt of Bruce were all retreated to Berwick) whilſt he himſelf prepared an Army to follow. And to effect this, and be more nobly attended, he put forth his Proclamation, commanding, 'That all, who by Paternal 'Succeſſion, or any other ways, ought him Ser-'vice, ſhould repair to Weſtminſter at Whitſuntide 'to him, to receive Order of Knighthood, and a 'Military Ornament out of the King's Wardrobe. Upon which Summons, three hundred young Gentlemen, all of them Sons of Earls, Barons and Knights aſſembled, and accordingly received Purples, Silks, Sindons, and Scarfs, wrought with Gold and Silver, according to every Man's degree; the Prince, who was by the King himſelf knighted, and girt with a Military Belt, girding the three hundred, whom the King had knighted, in the ſame manner as he had himſelf been before; and after, keeping their Vigil together in the New Temple, which being performed with all the Magnificence and Solemnity poſſible, the King made a Vow, That alive or dead he would avenge the Death of Comyn upon Bruce, and the perjur'd Scots, adjuring his Son, and all his Nobles upon their Fealty, that if he dy'd in the Journey they would carry his Corps about with them in Scotland, till they had ſubdu'd the Country, and conquer'd the Uſurper. Which Deſire, tho' it were more Martial than Chriſtian, yet the Prince and all the Nobles promiſed upon their Faith to the utmoſt of their power to perform. And then having gotten the thirtieth Penny of the Clergy and Laity, and twentieth of all Merchants, he ſet forward immediately after Whitſuntide on his Expedition, in the 34th Year of his Reign. The Earl of Pembroke, who was ſent before, being aſſiſted with a ſtrong Party of the Friends of Comyn, who were deſirous to revenge his Death, had before the King's arrival defeated the whole Army of the new King at a Battel near St. John's Town, and had almoſt taken his Perſon; but he eſcaping in diſguiſe recover'd an obſcure ſhelter[d], being reſerved for more and greater Battels, while his Brother Nigel Bruce, with Thomas, and Alexander a Prieſt, were executed as Traitors at Berwick. So that King Edward at his coming had not ſo much to do as he expected, but went up and down the Country to ſhew his Power, and terrifie his Enemies, executing many great Perſons, who had been concern'd in the Murther of Comyn, and Advancement of Bruce, as a Terrour for the reſt; for by reaſon of his Deſire of Revenge, Age and Fury, he was grown implacable. The Earl of Athol he ſent to London to be raiſed upon an higher Gallows, Bruce's Wife taken by the Lord Roſſe, he made a Priſoner at London; and his Daughter, a Nun at Lindſey, and the Counteſs of Boughan, who had aſſiſted at the Coronation of Bruce, was put in a wooden Cage, and hung upon the Walls of Berwicke for People to gaze at. But this Rigour, as it exaſperated his Enemies, ſo it begat an Averſion to him in his Friends, and was a means to increaſe Bruce's Party, tho' at preſent he appear'd not, but fled from Place to Place for his Safety, with only two Noble Gentlemen, the Earl of Lenox and Gilbert Hay; for within five Years he got together ſo great a Strength, that he overthrew the greateſt Army that ever the Engliſh brought into the Field, and reveng'd upon the Engliſh all the Blood that they had ſhed.

Enemies,

A. D. 1307. Reg. 34.

The King calls a Parliament at Carliſle.

All the Summer the King ſpent in Scotland, and winter'd in Carliſle, that he might be ready the next Spring to ſuppreſs any Inſurrections that might ariſe; for he had reſolv'd not to depart, till he had fully ſubdu'd it. And here he held his laſt Parliament, wherein the State being mindful of the Pope's late Action, got many Ordinances to paſs for the Reformation of the Abuſes of his Miniſters, and as Remedies againſt his former Exactions, which were almoſt intolerable: For being poor himſelf, he wrung from the Archbiſhop of York Elect in one Year nine thouſand five hundred Marks, and obtain'd of Anthony Biſhop of Durham, who is ſaid to have had beſides his Preferments in the Church, a Temporal Eſtate of five thouſand Marks per Annum, very large Sums to make him Patriarch of Jeruſalem. The King and Pope prey upon the Clergy. Theſe large Sums from private Perſons ſhew'd the Pope the Riches of the Kingdom, and embolden'd him to require the Profits of all the Benefices, Abbies and Monaſteries, which ſhould become vacant in England, Scotland, Wales and Ireland, for one Year; which though it were deny'd him, yet he got ſomething conſiderable by it, the King and he dividing them between them. The Pope alſo granted the King the Tenth of all the Churches of England for two Years, and the King yielded that the Pope ſhould have the Firſt-fruits of thoſe Churches; which the Pope took care to ſecure, by ſending Cardinal Petrus Hiſpanus, his Legate a Latere, under a Pretence of confirming the Marriage between Prince Edward and Iſabel, the King of France's Daughter; by which Ambaſſage the Cardinal got ſomething, tho' not ſo much as was expected. While the King was thus buſied at Carliſle, Robert Bruce about the beginning of the Spring appear'd with ſome Forces he had gotten together, and falling upon the Earl of Pembroke unawares, gave him a great Defeat; and within three Days drives the Earl of Gloceſter into the Caſtle of Air, in which he beſieg'd him, till the King's Forces drove him to his former Retreat, in which ſo long as he was ſecure, the Engliſh could never expect an end of the War. And this was the Reaſon, that King Edward ſent out another Proclamation, to command all that ought him Service, to attend him at Carliſle upon the Midſummer-day after, ſending the Prince in the mean while to London to conſummate his Marriage. In July, tho' he found himſelf much indiſpoſed, he enter'd Scotland with a freſh Army, but was not able to lead it far; for [a] he dy'd of a Dyſentery at Borough upon the Sands, having reign'd thirty four Years and ſeven Months, in the ſixty eighth Year of his Age. He was a Prince of a generous Spirit, born and bred for Action, and very judicious in Military Affairs; wary and provident in his own Buſineſs, watchful and ambitious to enlarge his Power, deſiring more the Greatneſs than Quiet of England. Never King ſhed ſo much Chriſtian Blood in England while he lived, nor was the cauſe of ſhedding ſo much after his Death.

In the following Year

[a] Being ſenſible of his Death approaching he made his Will, and gave 32000 l. to be expended in the Holy War, charging his Son, that it ſhould not be ſpent any other way. He call'd his Nobles then preſent with him, and caus'd them to ſware their Fealty to his Son Edward, and promiſe to have him crown'd as ſoon as they could. Then he adviſes his Son to be gentle and kind to his Subjects, dutiful to his Mother, and loving to his Brethren, not to take the Crown, nor bury his Body till he had ſubdu'd Scotland; aſſuring him, That ſo long as his Bones were with him, he ſhould not be conquer'd. And Laſtly, charg'd him upon his Bleſſing never to recal Peirce Gaveſton, whom he had baniſh'd for leading him into many Vices and Extravagances: But he never fulfilled any of theſe his Father's reaſonable Deſires and wiſe Admonitions, as the Story of his Life will clear. And indeed the Chronicles of Abingdon and Lanercroſt agree both, that Prince Edward was not preſent at his Father's Death.

THE LIFE and REIGN OF EDWARD II.

Edward the Second succeeded his Father.

EDWARD, surnam'd of Carnarvan, succeeded his Father of the same Name, and began his Reign in July 1307. in the 23d Year of his Age. A Prince not only much inferiour to his Father in Age and Experience when he came to the Crown, which might be imputed to his Youth, but naturally in Greatness, and height of Spirit, and like his Grandfather in Flexibleness and Easiness of Temper. Yet never Prince came to the Crown with greater Love, and more general Applause of all his Subjects, than he did; which, being built upon the Admiration of his Father's Worth, might have been easily secured to him by a little wise Management. But he being a wilful and revengeful Prince, began his Reign with such distasteful Actions to all his Subjects, as lost him their good Opinion immediately, and after proved fatal to him. For the first thing he did, after his [a] return from Scotland, where he received the Homage of many of the Scotish Lords at Dumfrees, before his departure, was, The entertaining his old Companion Peirce Gaveston, whom his Father had banished the Kingdom, because he had corrupted his Son, and led him into many Extravagancies, of which the Robbing of the Bishop of Chester's Park was one, (for which the King his Father was so angry, that he imprison'd his Son, and banish'd Gaveston) and as if he had foreseen the Mischiefs of his Advice, charged him on his Death-bed never to recall him; requiring the Lords who were present, to see his Will observed in this particular. But notwithstanding this wise Caution, and severe Command of his Father, he sent for Peirce Gaveston before his Father's Funeral was solemniz'd, and not only entertain'd him with great Favour in his Court, but invested him in the Earldom of Cornwall, and Lordship of the Isle of Man, which were part of the Demesnes of the Crown, and made him his Chief Chamberlain. And because the Bishop of Chester [b], who was his Father's Treasurer, had often abbridged his excessive Expences, and by his Complaint of Robbing his Park, had been the means of bringing that heavy Storm upon himself and Companion, he revenges himself on the Bishop; and to this end, causes him to be arrested, and committed him to Prison, seized upon his Goods, which he gave to Gaveston,

Which done, he removed most of the Court-Officers placed by his Father, and put in new ones of his own choosing; and all this without the Advice or Consent of the Privy-Council, which gave a general Discontent, and discover'd an ill Disposition in him.

Before his Coronation there was a Parliament held at Northampton, wherein it was enacted, That the Monies coined by his Father, notwithstanding they were accounted base Metal, should be Current; and he obtain'd a fifteenth of the Clergy, and twentieth of the Laity. After which, having performed the Funeral Rites of his Father at Westminster, he took a Voyage into France to be marry'd to the Lady Isabel, the Daughter of Philip the Fair, King of France; where their Nuptials were celebrated with great Magnificence and Solemnity, there being present at them the King of France, and King of Navarr his Son, the King of Almain, the King of Sicily, and three Queens besides the Bride, with an extraordinary Concourse of Princes and great Men. Gaveston was also at this Feast, and is said to have exceeded all the Company in Richness and Bravery of Attire, with which afterwards he infected the Court of England, and by that the whole Nation: A Mischief great enough to undo a Kingdom alone, with the Expence to maintain it. Yet this was not all the Mischief he did, for he filled the Court with Parasites, Buffoons, Fidlers, Stage-players, and all kind of dissolute Persons, to entertain and fill the King with carnal Delights and Pleasures; in which he was so deeply engag'd, that he lov'd no other Company, but spent all his Time in Wantonness, neglecting the Affairs of State, and the Counsel of his Nobles. These things so much distasted the great Men, that when he was to be crown'd with his Queen at Westminster in the second Year of his Reign, they met together, and requir'd of him, That Gaveston might be removed out of his Court and Kingdom, otherwise they intended to hinder his Coronation at that time. The King, to avoid so great Disgrace, promised to grant whatever they desired in the next Parliament; and so the Coronation was permitted to be solemnized, yet it was done with that haste and precipitancy, as took off the Reverence and Grace of it. In it the King gave Gaveston S. Edward's Crown to carry before him, which greatly incensed the Lords against him, and added much to their former Offence and Hatred of him [a].

Shortly after his Coronation, all the Knights-Templars througout England were at once arrested, and committed to Prison, according to the Example which had been given him by the King of France, and most other Princes of Christendom. They were an Order of Knights first instituted by Baldwin IV. King of Jerusalem, about two hundred Years before this time, and were appointed for the Defence of that City, and the safe Convoy of all such as went thither. Afterwards by the pious Bounty of Princes, they were dispersed into all parts of Christendom, and richly endow'd with large Possessions, which made them degenerate much from their first Institution, and become execrably Vicious; for which Reason the Christian Princes combined together to apprehend them, and turn them out of their Order and Estates, the King of France being foremost in the design, because he intended to make one of his Sons King of Jerusalem, and get their Revenues for him. Their Accusation was brought to the Council at Vienna, and they were condemn'd (more by Fame than Proof) as is evident from the condemnatory Sentence in the Bull of Pope Clement III. wherein are these words, Quanquam de Jure non possumus, tamen ad plenitudinem Potestatis, dictum Ordinem reprobamus; and then their Estates were given to the Hospitallers. This Affair being over, the Lords prosecute their Design against Gaveston, who presuming upon the King's Favour, insolently scorn'd them, as much as they hated him, terming the chiefest of his Enemies by reproachful Names, as he pleased, viz. Thomas Earl of Lancaster he call'd the Stage-player; Aymer de Valence Earl of Pembroke, Joseph the Jew; and Guy Earl of Warwick, the Black-Dog of Ardern; which Scoffs so heighten'd their desires of Revenge, that in the next Parliament, the whole Assembly, as if they had engaged in the Quarrel, humbly besought the King to advise and treat with his Nobles concerning the State of the Kingdom, that by their Counsel he might avoid the great Mischiefs which would fall upon him through neglect of Government; and urg'd it so far, that the King not only consented, but promised with an Oath to ratifie all such Articles as should be concluded upon by them to be necessary for the Welfare of the Kingdom. Upon this certain choice Men, both of the Clergy, Nobility and Commons, were selected to frame these Articles; and when they were finished, the Archbishop of Canterbury, who was lately recall'd from Banishment, with the rest of his Suffragans, at the Reading of them publickly before the Lords and Commons, in the presence of the King, solemnly pronounced the Sentence of Excommunication against all that shall dare to oppose them. Some of the Articles were: 1310.

A. D. 1309. Reg. 3.

The Lords prosecute Gaveston for his Insolencies.

A Parliament call'd to settle the Affairs of the Kingdom, and the King swears to submit to it.

'That the King should observe, and put in Execu'tion Magna Charta, with all other Laws neces'sary for the preservation of the Church and 'Kindom; That as the late King had done, so
'he should banish all Strangers out of his Court
'and Kingdom, and remove all his bad Counsel-
'lors from his Person; That the King shall not 'begin any War, or go any where out of the King'dom, without the consent of the Parliament.

These Articles seem'd very harsh to the King, but to avoid farther trouble, he granted them, and especially consented to the Banishment of his Favourite Gaveston, whom he sent immediately into Ireland, tho' not as an Exile, but in Quality of his Lieutenant there; as if that piece of Self-denial would have excused him from all the rest [b]. But he could not be long without his Company, and therefore within a few Months he recall'd him; and to secure him the better against his Enemies, he marries him to his Neice (the Daughter of Joanna de Acres) Sister of [c] Gilbert Earl of Gloucester, a Man much belov'd and esteem'd among the Nobility, for whose sake, and by whose means he hoped Gaveston would find more favour with the Nobility. But all this would not do. Either his Behaviour or their Malice was such, that they would not endure him about the King, who, by making him great, lessen'd them; and by enriching him, not only impoverish'd himself (for 'tis said [d] he gave him the Jewels of the Crown, and so much of his Treasure, that the Queen complained of Want of Maintenance [a] to her Father) but the whole Kingdom, which by his immoderate Gifts to him was wasted. These Actions so provoked the Barons, that they send him plain Word, 'That unless he did put from him Pierce 'Gaveston, and observe the Articles, which he 'had promis'd by Oath to keep, they would all 'with one Consent rise up in Arms against him, 'as a perjur'd Prince. The King, who was easily terrified with such Messages of his Nobles, as they found, not only yields again to the Banishment of his Favourite, but granted them farther, 'That if he were ever after found in the King-'dom, he should be condemn'd to Death, as an 'Enemy of the State. Peirce having left England, could find no safe Place of retreat: Ireland could not any more protect him, France was very unsafe for him, because wait was laid for him there to apprehend him. In Flanders he lurk'd a-while, but in great Danger; wherefore seeing he could be secure no where, he resolves to adventure again into England, and commit himself to the King's Protection, a Sanctuary that would not be violated. The King received him with great Joy, and that he might be out of the envious Eye of his Nobility, he carry'd him into the North Parts of England, but he was soon after discover'd by the Lords; who, withal hearing that he was, tho' privately, in as great Favour as ever, presently [b] combine together and take Arms, electing Thomas Earl of Lancaster, the Son of Edmund Earl of Lancaster, Brother to Henry III. for their Leader, a Man very popular and powerful, and Earl likewise of Leicester, Ferrers and Lincoln. With him joyn'd Humphrey Bohun Earl of Hereford, Aymer de Valence Earl of Pembroke, Guy de Beauchamp Earl of Warwick, the Earl of Arundel, with many other Barons: But Gilbert Earl of Gloucester, the King's Nephew, being desirous neither to offend the King, nor be wanting to his Peers, stood Mediator between both Parties for the Liberties and Peace of the Kingdom. The Earl Warren was doubtful, and favour'd the King's Party rather, till the Archbishop of Canterbury brought him to joyn with the Lords; who being well prepar'd against all Encounters, send to the King in behalf of the whole Commonalty of England, 'Beseeching him to deliver up 'Peirce Gaveston to them, or send him with all 'his Train out of England. The King neglecting an Answer to their Petition, they set forward with some Forces toward the North. The King and Gaveston withdraw to Newcastle, and there having a full Account of the Strength of the Lords, they took Ship together (leaving the Queen, then with Child, in great Grief behind) and land at Scarborough Castle, into which the King puts Gaveston, with the best Forces he could get for his Defence, and leaving him departed into Warwickshire. The Earls of Pembroke and Warren, who were sent by the Earl of Lancaster, lay Siege to the Castle, and Gaveston surrender'd himself into their hands; but intreats, That he might have Liberty to speak once more to the King, and then they should do as they pleas'd with him. The Earl of Pembroke undertakes [c] that he should upon his Honour, but as his Servants were carrying him, the Earl of Warwick met them, and took him by force from them, and commits him to his Castle of Warwick; where, after some Consultation among the Lords (tho' the King earnestly solicited for his Life) they condemn'd him without Tryal to the Block, and cut off his Head. And this was the end of Peirce Gaveston [d]: He was a Native of Gascoigne, and for the great Service his Father had done to this Crown, was educated by King Edward the First with his Son the Prince, by which means he gain'd so great an Interest in his Favour. He was a goodly Person, of undaunted Courage, and a skilful Man at Arms, as he shew'd himself at a Tournament at Wallingford; wherein he challeng'd the best of our Nobility, and is said to have foil'd them all, which inflam'd their Malice against him. In Ireland, during the short time he was Lieutenant there in his Banishment, he conquer'd the Rebels in the Mountains of Dublin, built Newcastle in the Kerns Country, repair'd Kevni-Castle, and afterward passed up into Munster and Thomond, doing great Service to his Master with much Valour and Bravery. He seems to have been a Person, that could not fawn or stoop to those he loved not, nor disguise his Nature so far, as to temporize with his Enemies: But presuming upon his Fortune, grew in the end to be arrogant and proud, and was so intolerable as nothing but his Ruin, which it produced, could ease the Subjects of that heavy Burthen.

The Barons take up Arms.

The Lords having gotten their Desire upon Gaveston, and thereby finding the King's Weakness (for he should never have fall'n into their hands, if the King had had Power enough to have kept him out) assume to themselves greater Authority; and as if all things were under their Command, peremptorily require the Confirmation and immediate Execution of all the Articles formerly granted, threatning the King, That unless he perform'd the same, as they desir'd, they would force him to it; and for this end, with their Swords drawn, assembling at Dunstable make towards London, where the King lay. The great Bishops, and Earl of Gloucester, seeing the Tempest gathering, labour to appease them; and with two Cardinals [e] (which at that time were sent by the Pope to reform the Disorders of the Kingdom) repairing to St. Albans, desire Conference with the Lords, who receive them very peaceably, but rejected the Pope's Letters written to them; saying, 'They were Sword- 1313.

'many wise and learned Men in the Kingdom,

'gers, who knew not the Cause of their rising,
'and therefore would not permit Foreigners to

'Affairs of the Kingdom, with which Answer

But the English Bishops so prevail'd by their Persuasions with the Lords, as that they were willing to restore to the King such Horses, Treasure and Jewels, as they had taken from Pierce Gaveston at Newcastle, if the King would grant their Petitions; and so John Sandal, Treasurer of the Kingdom, and Ingelard Warle, Keeper of the Wardrobe, were sent to S. Albans to receive them of them. About this time Queen Isabel was deliver'd of a Son [f] at Windsor, whom Lewis her Brother, and the great Men and Ladies of France, would have baptiz'd by the Name of her Father Philip, but Here the King kept his Chriſtmas, feaſting the French with great Magnificence, by whom he was ſuſpected by his Barons to have had ill Advice given him. Shortly after a Parliament is called at London, wherein the King complains, 'That his Barons had contemn'd him, rais'd 'War in his Realm againſt him, and murther'd 'Peirce Gaveſtone. But they unanimouſly anſwer'd him, 'That they had not offended in ſo 'doing, but had merited his Love and Favour; 'having taken Arms not in Contempt to his 'his Royal Perſon, but to deſtroy the publick 'Enemy of the Kingdom, who as ſuch had been 'baniſh'd before by two Kings; a Man by whom 'his Reputation and Honour was blemiſh'd, his 'Revenue waſted, and a dangerous Conteſt rai'ſed between him and his Subjects, of which 'there could otherwiſe be no end with all their 'Labour. Adding farther, That they would not 'be longer deluded with vain Promiſes or Delays, 'concerning their requir'd Articles, as they had 'been. The Queen and Biſhops ſeeing their Reſolution, endeavour'd by their Perſuaſions to allay their Heat, and prevail'd at length ſo far, that to appeaſe the King's Wrath, they and their Confederates ſubmitted to beg the King's Pardon in open Parliament, which they obtain'd; and the King having receiv'd them into his Favour as his Loyal Subjects, granted them their Articles, and particularly pardons by his Charter all ſuch as had been concern'd in the Death of Gaveſtone, and then the State in Conſideration of his great Wants, granted him a fifteenth. Guy de Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, was here alſo appointed to be one of the King's Council; who being a Perſon much envy'd by thoſe that had the King's Favour chiefly, dy'd ſhortly in that Station, not without Suſpicion of Poiſon.

1314. The Scots united diſturb England. While England labour'd under theſe Diſtractions and Diviſions, through the Weakneſs of its King, Scotland grew unanimous almoſt under a provident one, who in this time did not only ſubdue the Scotiſh Faction, and recover moſt of his Country, but began to ſpoil England, laying waſt all Northumberland in ſuch manner, as that the People were forced to make their Application to the King for Recovery of their Country out of their hands. King Edward awaken'd with the Importunities of the People, and thinking it would be a great Diſhonour to the Kingdom to ſit ſtill, raiſed an Army for the Redreſs of their Loſſes, and enter'd Scotland with the moſt powerful Hoſt that ever went thither, conſiſting (as the Scotiſh Writers relate) of an hundred thouſand Men, of ſeveral Nations, viz. Flemmings, Gaſcoigns, Welſh and Iriſh; who confiding in their Numbers, devour'd the Country in their Imagination before they came thither, and thought not of fighting, but dividing the Prey. Beſides, moſt of the Nobility of England attended the King, except the Earls of Lancaſter, Warwick, Warren and Arundel; who refuſed to go with him, becauſe the King delay'd the Execution of the former Articles. The Caſtle of Sterling was the firſt thing the King intended to relieve, which had held out a long time againſt the Scots, by the valiant Conduct of Philip Mowbray, a courageous Knight. Near this Place, upon the River Berwicke, did Bruce with thirty thouſand Scots, encounter this mighty Army of the Engliſh; which tho' much too great a Match for them, yet the Scots had been ſo harden'd to Wars, and receiv'd them with ſo much Preparation, and at ſuch an Advantage, having inacceſſible Rocks behind them to defend them, and a Mooriſh uncertain Ground before them, wherein they had dug Trenches, and cover'd them with Hurdles, that the Horſe could not paſs, that they eaſily became Conquerours, and gave England the greateſt Overthrow that ever it receiv'd: For there periſh'd in this Battel (call'd the Battel of [a] Bannock's Borough) Gilbert de Clare, the laſt Earl of Gloceſter, a great Supporter of the Engliſh State, Robert Lord Clifford, the nobleſt of our Lords, with the Lords Tiptoft, Marſhal, Giles de Argenton, Edmund de Maul, and ſeven hundred Knights, Eſquires, and Gentlemen of Note; and of common Soldiers the Scotiſh Hiſtorians ſay fifty thouſand, but ours ten thouſand. Humphrey Bohun Earl of Hereford, Ralph de Morthelmere [b], (who marry'd Joanna de Acres, Counteſs Dowager of Gloceſter) with many others, were taken Priſoners [c]; the King, and thoſe that were preſerved, eſcap'd by Flight [d]. This Victory [e] put Scotland into Heart and Wealth together; ſo that they held their own the better for a long time after, and diſcourag'd the People of this Nation for many Years ſo much, that tho' Edward deſir'd ſeveral times to recover this Diſhonour, yet his People choſe rather to ſink in their Loſſes, than run any farther Hazards; and the poor Borderers, who had the worſt of it, were ſo dejected, that Walſingham ſays, an hundred of them would flie before three Scots. So weak do the lower parts become, when the Head is impaired.

This great Misfortune was not ſingle, but in the next Year many great Calamities follow'd it, viz. ſuch Inundations as brought forth Dearth, and Dearth produced Famine, and Famine Peſtilence, all which exceeded any that had ever been in England before; inſomuch, that a Parliament was call'd at London to abate and ſettle the Prizes of Victuals, which then grew exceſſive dear. And therefore it was [f] ordain'd, That an Ox fatted with Graſs ſhould be ſold for 16 s. fatted with Corn for 20 s. the beſt Cow for 12 s. a fat Hog of two Years old for 3 s. 4 s. a fat Sheep ſhorn 14 d. with the Fleece 20 d. a fat Gooſe 2 d ½. a fat Capon 2 d. a fat Hen 1 d. four Pigeons 1 d. and whoſoever ſold for more, ſhall forfeit their Goods to the King. Here ſeems then to have been no Calves, Lambs, Goſlins, Chickens, or young Pigs to be ſold, ſuch Dainties were not yet in uſe. After the Settlement of theſe Rates, all kind of Proviſion grew more ſcarce; for there happen'd ſuch a Murrain to Cattel, and ſuch a Deſtruction of all ſorts of Fruits by the exceſſive and unſeaſonable Rains, that Victuals could not be gotten for the King's Houſe, nor Means for other great Men to maintain their Tables; inſomuch, that they were forced to put away their Servants in great Numbers, which produced another Miſchief: For theſe Men being brought up in Lazineſs and [c] King Edward, tho' in manifeſt Danger, was ſo much troubl'd at this Defeat, that he cou'd hardly be perſuaded to fly.

[d] This Victory is remark'd by our Hiſtorians as a Divine Puniſhment of the Lewdneſs and Exceſſes of the Engliſh Army, who ſpent the Night before the Fight in Drunkenneſs and Intemperance, but a Reward of the Piety of the Scots; who enter'd upon it with ſolemn Confeſſions, and receiving the Sacrament: Wherefore God gave them ſuch a miraculous Victory, as ſo few hands without a ſpecial Aſſiſtance of God could not have effected.

[e] The Battel was fought on the 25th of June, 1314.

[f] The Rates of Corn ſeem not to be ſettl'd, becauſe there was ſcarce any to be gotten, for ſoon after there was an Order put out, that no Corn ſhou'd be malted or brew'd with, that Barley might be preſerv'd for Bread.

Plenty,

A. D. 1317. Reg. 11.

Plenty, and not able to work, fell to Robbery and Spoil, ſo that nothing was ſafe from danger. Three Years this Affliction held, and was attended with ſuch a general Sickneſs and Mortality of the common ſort, cauſed by their [a] unwholſome Food, that the Living were ſcarce enough to bury the Dead. But all theſe Miſeries, which befel the Nation, could not allay the Diſcontents and Hatred between the King and his Nobles, but they were daily ſeeking opportunity to increaſe it. The King employs one Richard St. Martin, a deform'd Dwarf, to take the Wife of Thomas Earl of Lancaſter out of his Houſe at Canford in Dorſetſhire, claiming her for his Wife, and declaring, He had lain with her before ſhe marry'd the Earl; which the Lady, to her eternal Diſgrace, owned. By her this mean Perſon [b] claim'd the Earldoms of Lincoln and Saliſbury, of which ſhe was Heir, and raiſed not only a deſire of Revenge in the Earl againſt himſelf, but the King, who was look'd upon to be the chief Agent in it. This and other of the King's Actions became ſo obſervable to his People, that a Knight ſetting a Woman in a fataſtical Dreſs upon an Horſe, ſent a Letter by her into Weſtminſter-Hall to the King as he ſat at Dinner upon the Feaſt of Pentecoſt, wherein he was blamed for neglecting ſuch as had done him and his Father good Services, and advancing Men of mean Parts, and no Deſerts, &c. At which, tho' the King was angry at firſt, yet when the Knight owned he did it for his Honour, he was ſatisfied, and did nothing to him.

The King and Nobles diſaffected to each other.

While theſe Afflictions lay upon the Nation within, the Scots infeſted them in the North parts, with which the Engliſh, who undertook to defend them, ſo far joyn'd, that what they kept the Scots from taking away and ſpoiling, they took themſelves [c]. So that the miſerable People were utterly undone by being plunder'd on all ſides; and Bruce, who was now abſolute King of the Scots, ſent his Brother with a mighty Army into Ireland, where he got a part, and reigned under the Title of a King three Years [d]. Thus all things, both at home and abroad, went ill with England. But yet they were a means of producing ſome good, for they were an occaſion of that Reconciliation which was ſhortly after made between the King and Earl of Lancaſter, by the mediation of two Cardinals, upon ſuch Conditions as were ſoon after broken unjuſtly by the King. For a Knight was taken paſſing by Pomfret, with Letters, ſealed with the King's Seal, directed to the King of Scots, about murthering the Earl. The Meſſenger was executed, and his Head ſet upon the top of the Caſtle, and his Letters reſerved to witneſs the intended Plot. This Action, whether true or falſe, caſt a foul Aſperſion upon the King, and made many take the Earl's part. After this, upon an Invaſion of the Scots, who foraged as far as York, a Parliament is call'd at London, in which the King, by the Interceſſion of the Cardinals and Clergy of England, yields faithfully to obſerve all the former required Articles. Whereupon an Army is agreed to be raiſed, at the Expence of the People, to go againſt the Scots; London ſends two hundred, Canterbury forty, St. Albans ten, and ſo all other Cities and Boroughs according to their proportion; by which means a conſiderable Army was levy'd; but being come as far as York, through Mutiny and Diſcontents was diſſolved, and ſo turn'd back, and nothing was effected. The next Year after, upon the Surrender of Berwick to the Scots, by the Treaſon of Peter Spalding, who had the keeping of it, the King raiſed an Army and beſieged it. The Scots, to divert his Forces, entred England in other places, and had almoſt ſurprized the Queen's Perſon lying at York; but the Siege, notwithſtanding this, continued, and the King was in great poſſibility to have gained the Town, had not the Earl of Lancaſter and his Followers withdrawn themſelves upon a Diſcontent, hearing the King ſay, That he would give the keeping of it to the Lord Hugh Spencer the younger, who now was the King's Favourite, and therefore hated by the Earl. Again, The Inhabitants of York, and the adjoyning Counties, having received ineſtimable Damages by the Scots, gather an Army of ten thouſand Men, and encounter them at Milton on the Swayle; but being not well conducted nor experienced, they were beaten with the loſs of three thouſand Men [e]. This being related to the King, he ſeeing all things ſucceed ill with him, concludes a Truce with the Scots for two Years, and ſo leaves thoſe parts diſhonourably.

A. D. 1317. Reg. 10.

A Truce made with the Scots for two Years.

In the time of this Peace, a great Flame aroſe from a ſmall Spark, which was kindled by this occaſion. A Baron, whoſe Name was William Brewes [f], having by his Prodigality and Vice waſted his Eſtate, offer'd to ſell a part of it, called Powes, to ſeveral Men; Humphry Bohun Earl of Hereford, becauſe the Lands adjoyned to his Eſtate, begs leave of the King to buy it, and bargains for it. The two Mortimer's, Uncle and Nephew, great Men in thoſe parts, not knowing of the former Bargain, made a Contract alſo for it with Sir William Brewes. Hugh Spencer the younger hearing alſo that thoſe Lands were to be ſold, and lay near his Eſtate, obtains a more particular Grant of the King, being his Chamberlain, and buys it out of all their hands. The Earl of Hereford being thus defeated of his Bargain, complains to the Earl of Lancaſter (the Refuge of all diſcontented Men) of this Injuſtice, and induced him to enter into a Confederacy with divers other Barons there aſſembled, obliging themſelves by an Oath to live and die one with another, in maintaining the Rights of the Kingdom, and procuring the Baniſhment of the two Spencers [g], the Father and Son, whom they ſtiled The Seducers of the King, and Oppreſſors of the State; diſpoſing all things at Court as they pleaſe, and ſuffering nothing to be obtain'd but by their means; which the State accounted an intolerable Miſchief. Under theſe pretences they take up Arms, and contrary to all Juſtice and Right ſeiz'd upon and deſtroy'd the Lands and Goods of thoſe Perſons, which they pretended to proſecute, and of all thoſe that had any Affinity or Friendſhip with them, killing their Servants, and diſpoſing of their Caſtles at their pleaſure. Which done, they marched to St. Albans, and from thence ſend

Farther 'ſwearing, That he would never break his Coro-'nation-Oath, by granting a Pardon to ſuch no-'torious Offenders, as contemned his Perſon, di-'ſturbed his Government, and violated his Ma-'jeſty. This Anſwer ſo exaſperated the Lords, that they preſently drew near to London, and lodged in the Suburbs, till they could obtain leave to enter into the City; which being granted, they came to the King, and boldly urge their Demands; which at length the King, by the mediation of the Queen and chief Biſhops, condeſcended to; and by his Edict, publiſhed in Weſtminſter-Hall by the Earl of Hereford, are the Spencers baniſhed the Kingdom for their Lives. Hugh the Father keeps beyond the Seas, but the Son ſtaid privately in England, expecting a Turn of Affairs[a]. The Lords (being ſatisfied, and pardoned) return home, yet not to live ſo ſecure as to give over all proviſion for their own Defence. Yet all their Care could not prevent their Deſtruction, which ſoon after follow'd, upon this Occaſion: The Queen, who had always been a principal Inſtrument of Peace and Concord between the King and his Barons, going on a Progreſs to Canterbury, was diſpoſed to lodge in the Caſtle of Leeds, which belonged to the Lord Bedleſmere, who was lately the King's Steward, but then took part with the Barons; and to that end ſent her Marſhal before to make things ready for her and her Attendants. But the Keeper plainly told him, That neither the Queen, nor any Body elſe ſhould be admitted without Letters from his Lord; which Anſwer he alſo gave to the Queen her ſelf coming in Perſon, ſo that ſhe was forced to take up ſuch Lodging that Night as they could get for her. This Indignity the Queen at her return complain'd of to the King, who took it ſo ill, that he preſently went down with a Body of armed Men out of London, and laying ſiege to the Caſtle, took it, hang'd the Keeper Thomas Culpeper, ſends the Wife and Children of the Lord Bedleſmere to the Tower, and ſeizes upon all his Goods and Treaſure. And now having this power about him, and emboldened by Succeſs, and the Inſtigation of the Queen, he went on to Ciceſter, where he kept his Chriſtmas, and there provides an Army againſt the Barons. Some of the Lords ſeeing the King's Power to increaſe, left their Aſſociates, and yielded themſelves to the King's Mercy; among whom were the two Mortimer's, Men of great Eſtates and Intereſts, the Lords Hugh Audley and Maurice Barklay, and others, who notwithſtanding, contrary to their Expectation, were ſent to divers Priſons[b]. The Earls of Lancaſter and Hereford ſeeing this ſudden change, withdrew themſelves and their Company from Gloceſter, towards the North-parts. The King, with whom were the Earls of Arbol and Angus, followed them with his Army, and engaging them at Burton upon Trent, ſubdued their Forces, and put them all to flight. Whereupon they retired farther North, and at Borough-Brigs were engaged by Sir Simon Ward Sheriff of York, and Sir Andrew Harkley Conſtable of Carliſle, who ſlew the Earl of Hereford in ſtriving to paſs the Bridge, and took the Earl of Lancaſter, and divers other Lords, Priſoners. The King being at Pomfret, the Captive Lords were carry'd thither to him; and on the third Day after their coming, the King ſitting himſelf in Judgment, with Edmund Earl of Kent his Brother, the Earls of Pembroke and Warren[c], Hugh Spencer, lately created Earl of Winchеſter, and others, gave Sentence of Death againſt Thomas Earl of Lancaſter, by drawing, hanging, and beheading as a Traitor, but the two firſt being pardoned, becauſe he was of the Royal Blood, he was beheaded the ſame Day without the Town of Pomfret, before his own Caſtle[d]. And by the like Judgment were condemned and executed at York the Lords Roger Clifford, Warren, Liſle, William Tutchet, Thomas Mauditt, Henry Bradburn, William Fitz-Williams, William Lord Cheyney, Thomas Lord Moubray, and Jocelin Lord Danyll. Shortly after the Lord Henry Teyes was taken, drawn, hang'd and quarter'd at London; the Lord Aldenham at Windſor, the Lords Badleſmere and Aſhburnham at Canterbury, the Lord Gifford at Gloceſter, principal Men in principal Places, to ſpread the Terror of their Actions over the Kingdom, all their Eſtates and Inheritances being confiſcated[e], and new Men put into them. And this was the firſt Blood of the Nobility, which was ſhed after this manner ſince the Conqueſt; which being ſo profuſely ſpilt, procured ſharp Revenge ſoon after.

He was but badly provided of Victuals for ſo great a Multitude; which the Scots having notice of, convey'd themſelves and all Succours out of the way; and thereby forced him to endure ſo great Wants, that he was conſtrained to return with Diſhonour, having conquer'd his Armies without Blows. And in the next Reign a Church was built over his Tomb, and Queen Iſabel her ſelf wrote to the Pope to juſtifie the Miracles done there, and to deſire his Canonization, which indeed he deſerv'd much more than any of his Countrymen, who had acquir'd that Honour ſince the Conqueſt. homeward,

A. D. 1323. This was the Succeſs of this unfortunate King (who was not born for Triumphs) in his third Expedition into [a] Scotland. After this, the King being at leiſure, and in a calmer Humour it ſeems, began to reflect upon the Execution of the Earl of Lancaſter, which he diſcover'd upon this Occaſion. Some of his Courtiers making an earneſt Petition to him to pardon one of the Earl's Followers (a Man of low Degree) and preſſing him much to it, he burſts out into a Paſſion, and exclaims againſt them as unjuſt and wicked Counſellors, who can urge him ſo much to ſave the Life of a notorious Villain, but would not ſpeak one Word for his near Kinſman the Earl of Lancaſter, who, ſaid he, had he lived, might have been ſerviceable to me and the whole Kingdom; but this Fellow, the longer he lives the more Miſchief he'll do, and therefore by the Soul of God, he ſhall die the Death he hath deſerv'd, Sir Andrew Harkley, who took the Earl of Lancaſter Priſoner at Borough-Brigs, and for that Service was advanced to the Earldom of Carliſle, enjoy'd his Honour but a little while; for the next Year, either through the Malice of the Spencers, who envy'd his Preferment, or elſe for joining with the Scots in hopes of a great Match (as was proved upon him) he was degraded of all his Honours, drawn, hang'd, and quarter'd at London for Treaſon [b], and is a remarkable Example of the Inſtability of Honour and Greatneſs under fickle and ill governing Princes.

1324. The important Buſineſs of the Nation at this time, and eſpecially the Summons ſent by the new King of France, Charles the Fair, who ſucceeded his Brother Philip the Long, to King Edward to come and do his Homage for his Province of Gaſcoigne, made it neceſſary for the Parliament to be called, and accordingly met. In it it was decreed by the common Conſent of all the Aſſembly, That the King ſhould not go in Perſon into France at that time, but ſend ſome Principal Men to excuſe or defer his Appearance. In this Parliament the King requir'd a Subſidy both of the Clergy and Laity, for the Redemption of John Brittain Earl of Richmond, who was lately taken Priſoner by the Scots. But it was deny'd and alledg'd, 'That no Contribu-'tion ought of right to be made for the Redem-'ption of any Perſon but King, Queen or Prince, 'and ſo nothing was gotten but more Anger kin-'dled. At this Seſſion alſo the [c] Biſhop of Hereford was arreſted, and accuſed of High Treaſon before the King and his Council, for aiding the King's Enemies in their late Rebellion; but he refuſed to anſwer (being a conſecrated Biſhop) without leave of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, whoſe Suffragan he was, and who was his only proper Judge next under the Pope, or without the Conſent of his Fellow Biſhops, who thereupon aroſe and begged the King's Clemency to him: But finding him implacable, they took the Biſhop from the Bar, and deliver'd him to the Cuſtody of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, till the King ſhould appoint another time for his Anſwer to what he was charg'd with. Shortly after he was again taken and convented as before, which the Clergy underſtanding, the Archbiſhops of Canterbury, York and Dublin, with ten other Biſhops, went to the Place of Judgment with their Croſſes erected, and took him away with them, commanding all Men upon pain of Excommunication, to forbear to lay violent hands upon him. This audacious Act much diſpleaſed the King, who commanded, that Inquiry ſhould be made concerning the Objections brought againſt the Biſhop, Ex Officio Judicis; and being found guilty tho' abſent, all his Goods and Poſſeſſions were ſeiz'd into the King's hands. This Act of the King's loſt him the Clergy, and added much to the diſcontented Party of the Nation, which was now grown to be almoſt univerſal, except the Spencers, and their Followers; who being enrich'd with the Spoils of the Barons, govern'd all things as they pleas'd, ſelling the King's Favours, and ſuffering none to ſee him, but whom they liſt; and at length becoming ſo arbitrary in their Diſpoſals, that they preſum'd to abridge the Queen [d] of her Maintenance, and leſſen her Houſhold Train, which was the fatal Act that proved their undoing.

While theſe things were done in England, Homage was neglected in France; whereupon the King of France proceeded ſo far, that all King Edward's Territories there were adjudged to be forfeited, and many Places of Importance ſeiz'd upon by the French. The King ſent over his Brother Edmund into Gaſcoigne to ſecure his Dominions, and recover what was lately fall'n into the French hands, but to little purpoſe; the King of France was before him, and had gotten the People over to him, being the ſtronger ſide: So that nothing could be done, unleſs either the King would go over in Perſon, or ſend the Queen to her Brother to mediate a Peace, otherwiſe all was in danger to be loſt. As for the King's going in Perſon, the Spencers held it unſafe both for him and them, if he ſhould leave his Kingdom in ſo great and general Diſcontents, as then it was; wherefore the Queen, with a ſmall Train, is ſent over to accommodate the Buſineſs, which ſhe negotiated ſo well; that it was agreed, That all Quarrels ſhould end upon Condition, that the King of England would give to his Son Edward the Dutchy of Aquitain, with the Earldom of Ponthieu, and ſend him over to do Homage for the ſame; which, after many Conſultations, the King was perſuaded to yield unto. The Prince therefore is ſent with [e] the Biſhop of Exeter, and others, to the Court of the King of France, where he was moſt welcome to his Mother, who herein got her Aims; and being wholly bent upon Revenge (of which Women are uſually moſt eager) found there, as well as in England, enough to nouriſh that Humour in her; of whom the chief was Roger Mortimer, Lord of Wigmore, a gallant Gentleman, whom ſhe much favour'd, who had lately eſcap'd into France out of the Tower of London. The Biſhop of Exeter perceiving ſome Plots in hand, by their Conſultations, which they manag'd cloſely without him, withdraws ſecretly, and diſcovers to the King what he obſerved of their Actions. The King therefore ſends preſently for the Queen and the Prince, and ſolicits the King of France to haſten their return: But when he ſaw it was neglected and delay'd, he cauſed them openly to be proclaim'd Enemies to the Kingdom, and baniſh'd them and all their Adherents, cauſing all the Ports to be ſtrongly kept, and ſending three Admirals, who ſhould wait on ſeveral Coaſts to oppoſe their landing. On the other ſide, as the King hath a faithful Subject, ſo had the Queen officious Perſons; who to enflame her againſt the King, and widen the Breach, inform'd her, That there was a Deſign in hand to murther her and the Prince: Whereupon ſhe having before found her Brother backward to countenance and aſſiſt her againſt her Huſband, miſtruſted, that ſuch a Deſign would be entertain'd by the French Courtiers eaſily, through the Advantage of the Spencers Gold, and ſo withdrew to the Earl of Henault, being then a rich and potent Prince, and Earl of Holland, to whoſe Daughter Philippa ſhe contracted her Son the Prince, and gets both ſufficient Aid and Money of him to tranſport her ſafely into England. Arriving at Harwich[a], with the Prince, Earl of Kent, the King's Brother (whom ſhe brought with her from the Court of France) the Earl of Pembroke, the Lord Roger Mortimer, and John the Earl of Henault's Brother, with 2500 Henowayes and Flemings: She was received with great Joy, and a general Concourſe of all the diſcontented Nobility, and others of the Nation, and eſpecially the Biſhops of Hereford and [b] Lincoln, who having loſt the King's Favour, ſought by this means to recover their Loſs by aſſiſting the Queen. The King having notice of the ſudden and ſafe Arrival of the Queen, demands aſſiſtance of the City of London; who returns anſwer, 'That they would 'with all Duty honour the King, Queen, and 'Prince; but would ſhut their Gates againſt all 'Foreigners and Traitors to the Realm, and with 'all their power withſtand them[c]. The King and his Council, not daring to rely upon ſuch an Anſwer, reſolved to leave them; and having firſt put out a Proclamation, that none upon pain of Death ſhould aſſiſt the Queen, but deſtroy all her Adherents, only her own Perſon, the Prince, and his Brother the Earl of Kent, excepted; and promiſing, That whoſoever ſhould bring the Head of Roger Mortimer ſhould have a thouſand Pound. And committing the keeping of the Tower to Sir John Weſton, with the preſervation of his younger Son John of Eltham, and his Neice the Counteſs of Gloceſter (who was firſt the Wife of Peirce Gaveſtone, and now of Hugh Spencer the younger, a Lady always unfortunate by the over-great Favour of her Huſband) departed towards the Weſt, hoping to find as great aſſiſtance now as he had done before againſt the Barons; but he found the Caſe alter'd, and no Man regarded him, nor would be hired to fight for him. The Queen having an account of the King's Courſe and Deſign, marches after him (growing every Day ſtronger as ſhe went on) and comes to Oxford, where the Biſhop of Hereford preach'd before her, and the whole Aſſembly and Univerſity, taking for his Text, (2 Kings 4. 19.) My Head aketh, my Head aketh; from which he took occaſion to deliver the Cauſes of the Queen's proceedings againſt her Huſband, and concluded at laſt, moſt unlike a good Divine, That an aking and ſick Head of a Kingdom is of neceſſity to be taken off, and not otherwiſe to be cured. A moſt execrable Doctrine, as repugnant to that ſacred Word, which in all corrupted Times is produced by wicked Temporiſers, to abuſe Men's Credulities, and juſtifie the Impieties of ambitious and ill Men. And to countenance the Queen's proceedings the more, it was noiſed abroad, That two Cardinals were ſeen in her Camp, ſent by the Pope to excommunicate all ſuch as took up Arms againſt her, who ſought nothing by appearing in Arms, but to deliver the King and Kingdom from the Spencers, who were the Miſleaders of the King, and Deſtroyers of the Kingdom, and their Adherents[d], the Lord Chancellors and others; all other of the King's Subjects to be ſafe. And that ſhe might ſatisfie[e] all Perſons, ſhe put out a Proclamation, 'That nothing ſhould be taken from any Subject 'without paying ready Money, and a ſevere Penalty impoſed upon any one that ſhould dare 'to do the contrary; as, for the value of Three-pence to loſe a Finger; of Six-pence, an Hand; 'of a Shilling, the Head; and whoſoever brought 'to the Queen the younger Spencer's Head ſhould 'have two thouſand Pound. Thus was a bad Cauſe cover'd with a ſhew of Juſtice, and the unnatural Oppoſition of a Wife againſt an Huſband, and a Son againſt his Father, made plauſible and ſeemingly juſt by Power; which, tho' in factious Times it paſſed well enough, hath left an indelible Mark of Ignominy and Diſgrace upon her Memory for ever.

The King's Dominions in France ſeized.

The Queen's Actions and Pretences in raiſing Arms.

The miſerable King having his Reputation (which is the main ſupport of Majeſty) lamentably torn in pieces by his Purſuers, found few or no Hands to aſſiſt him; ſo that after he had put Hugh Spencer the Father into the Caſtle of Briſtol, with ſuch Forces as he was able to provide for the defence of it, he leaves the Nation to his Truſt, and commits himſelf to the Sea, with a deſign either to conceal himſelf awhile in the the Iſle of Lundy, or paſs over into Ireland; but being oppoſed by contrary Winds, and deſerted by thoſe few Attendants he had with him, viz. Sir Thomas Blunt, his Steward, and others, he was driven a-ſhoar in Wales in Glamorganſhire, where, tho' he found not Protection, he met with Love, and was hidden in the Abby of Neth. The Queen in the mean time goes with her Army from Oxford to Gloceſter, where the Lords Peircy and Wake met her with Aids from the North; and from thence ſhe marched to Briſtol, aſſaults and wins the Caſtle, and puts to Death the Defender, Hugh Spencer, without Form or Tryal of Law, cauſing him to be drawn and hang'd on the common Gallows in his Coat-Armour, cut up before he was dead, headed and quarter'd. This done, ſhe paſſes to Hereford, and the King being not to be found, a Proclamation was put out, 'That if he would 'come and govern the Nation, as he ought to 'do, he ſhould again be accepted as King with 'a general Conſent. But the King, either not daring to truſt himſelf to them, or not having ſufficient Information, ſtill concealed himſelf; and thereupon they took the advantage to diſpoſe of the Government, and the Prince, who was now under their Care and Management, was made Guardian of the Kingdom, hath Fealty ſworn to him, and a new Chancellor and Treaſurer are appointed. But the King was too great to be concealed long; and being diſcover'd, was by Henry Earl of Lancaſter, Brother to the late Thomas, William Lord Zouch, and Ries ap Howell, taken

[c] 'Twas not this part of their Anſwer that the King diſlik'd, but that which follows, That they were not willing to march out of their City to fight, unleſs according to the Liberties granted them, they cou'd return the ſame Day before Sun-ſet.

[d] Sir Roger Baldocke. [e] She alſo gave leave to all Perſons, that were baniſh'd in the late Diſſentions, to return to their Eſtates and Friends; whereby ſhe engag'd many Malecontents firmly to her Party.

A. D. 1326. Reg. 19. and convey'd to the Caſtle of Kenelworth. The younger Spencer, with Baldocke the Chancellor, and Simon Reading, who were apprehended with him, were ſent to the Queen to Hereford. Spencer, who was at this time Earl of Gloceſter, is drawn and hang'd on a Gallows fifty Foot high, in his Coat-Armour, on which it was written, Quid gloriaris in Militiâ, Pſ. 52. Simon Reading was hang'd ten Foot lower than he. But Baldocke, becauſe he was [a] a Prieſt, had the Favour to be pined to Death in Newgate [b]. And here likewiſe a little before was the Earl of Arundell, with two Barons, John Danyll and Thomas Micheldever [c] executed as Traitors [d], by the procurement of Roger Mortimer, for adhering [e] to the King's Party. And that the Mob may not fail to act its part in every Rebellion, the Commons of London riſe, and force their Mayor, who held his Loyalty, to joyn with them to let out all Priſoners, poſſeſs themſelves of the Tower, put to Death the Conſtable of it Sir John Weſton, and murther'd the Biſhop of Exeter, whom they hated, becauſe when he was the King's Treaſurer he cauſed the Juſtices Itinerant to ſit in London, who laid heavy Fines upon them. And thus all things were in Confuſion.

1327. The King depoſed by a Parliament, and the Prince choſen. After a Month's ſtay at Hereford, the Queen return'd with the Prince, and kept her Chriſtmas at Wallingford, and her Candlemas at London, where the Parliament being aſſembled, agreed to depoſe the King as unfit to govern, objecting many Articles againſt him, and to elect his eldeſt Son Edward, which they did in the great Hall at Weſtminſter, with the univerſal Conſent of the People there preſent; and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury made a Sermon upon this Text, Vox Populi, Vox Dei [f], exhorting the People to pray to the King of Kings for him that they had choſen. The Queen ſeeing what was done, began now ſeriouſly to reflect upon her ſelf, and her own Actions, which were the cauſe of it; and either out of remorſe of Conſcience, or trouble for the loſs of her own Dignity, ſhewed great diſcontent at this Election, inſomuch that her Son to comfort her was forced to ſwear, That he would not accept of the Crown without the conſent of his Father. This Reſolution of the Prince produced a common Decree in Parliament, 'That [g] three Biſhops, two Earls, two Abbots, four Barons, three Knights of every Shire, with a certain number of Burgeſſes of every City and Borough, and eſpecially of the Cinque-ports, ſhould be ſent to the King at Kenelworth, to declare unto him the Election of his Son, and to require of him the Renunciation of his Crown and Royal Dignity; whereunto, if he refuſed to conſent, the State were reſolved to proceed as they thought fit, and renouncing his Children, chooſe whom they pleaſed. The King being firſt privately acquainted with the Meſſage, which was one of the moſt ungrateful that could be ſent to any Prince, was after by two, whom he chiefly hated, the Biſhops of Hereford and Lincoln, brought before the Aſſembly. When they had deliver'd their Meſſage [h] he ſaid to them (as ſoon as his Paſſion would give him leave) 'He confeſſed that he had been miſguided (the common Excuſe of a poor Spirit) and done many things, of which he now repented; and which, if he were to govern again, he would amend; and was very ſorry to have ſo much offended the State, as they utterly ſhould reject him: But yet thanked them, that they were ſo favourable to him as to chooſe his eldeſt Son for King. Having ſaid this, they proceeded to the Ceremony of his Reſignation, which conſiſted chiefly in the ſurrendering his Crown, and other Enſigns of Majeſty, to the Uſe of his Son. The Form was perfectly new, becauſe it was the firſt that ever was known in England, and therefore could have no Precedent. But William Truſſell, a Judge, put it into the Stile of the Law, to render it more Authentical, and pronounced the ſame in this manner: 'I William Truſſel, in the Name of the Men of the Land of England, and of all the Parliament, Procurator, reſign to thee Edward the Homage that was made to thee ſome time ſince; and from this time forward now following, I defie thee, and prive thee of all thy Royal Power; and I ſhall never be tendant on thee, as King, from this time. Thus was the laſt Act, and firſt Example of a depoſed King, no leſs diſhonourable to the Nation, than unto him. He was a Prince more weak than Evil. His Faults in Government were many, but not ſo many as thoſe of his People to him, in dealing ſo roughly and uncivilly with him. He is reported by ſome to have been Learned (which perhaps might make him the ſofter) and written Verſes when he was in Priſon. He is ſaid to have been the Founder of Orial-College and S. Mary-Hall in Oxford.

He had by his Wife Iſabel two Sons; Edward, born at Windſor, who ſucceeded; and John, ſurnam'd of Eltham, who was created Earl of Cornwall, 1315. and dy'd in the Flower of his Age in Scotland: And two Daughters, Joanna marry'd to David Prince of Scotland, and Eleanor to the Duke of Gelders. His Iſſue.

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES in the Reign of Edward II.

SOme time before Chriſtmas, in the 9th Year of his Reign, a Blazing-Star or Comet appear'd in the North, was ſeen for a Month together, and was the Forerunner of a Famine and a Mortality. The Dearth was occaſion'd by prodigious Rains in the Summer, which hinder'd the People's getting in their Corn; and what was got in yielded very little. Wheat was ſold for forty Shillings a Quarter, as much as eight Pound now; and a Murrain deſtroy'd the Cattel.

[b] Thomas of Walſingham in his Chronicle relates, That Baldocke the King's Chancellor was committed firſt to the Biſhop of London's Priſon, from whence he was pull'd out by the common People of London to be carry'd to Newgate; but they beat him ſo cruelly by the way, that he dy'd of his Bruiſes in great Torment.

Sir Thomas de la More in his Hiſtory writes, That the Biſhop of Wincheſter and the Biſhop of Lincoln were the two Biſhops that were ſent before to the King, to bring him to it.

The next Year the Famine continuing, the Poor were forced to eat Horſe-fleih, Dogs and Cats; and there was not ſufficient, even of that vile Food, to keep them alive. Wheat was ſold for near 3 l. a Quarter, and the Mortality rag'd as violently as in the Year preceding. Holinſhead.

THE LIFE and REIGN OF EDWARD III.

EDWARD III. being thus made King by the Reſignation of his Father Edward II. the late King, began his Reign Jan. 20. 1327. being about fourteen Years of Age, and immediately ſends out his Proclamations for the Preſervation of the Peace into all Counties, in this Form; 'Edward by the Grace 'of God, King of England, Lord of Ireland, and 'Duke of Aquitain, To N. N. our Sheriff of S. 'greeting. Whereas the Lord Edward, the late 'King of England, our Father, by the Common 'Council and Aſſent of the Prelates, Earls, Ba'rons, and other chief Men, with the whole Com'monalty of this Realm, did voluntarily amove 'himſelf from the Government thereof, willing 'and granting that we his Eldeſt Son and Heir 'ſhould aſſume the Government of the ſame, &c. A Preamble intended to palliate the Wrong done to his Father, but indeed making it more apparent [a]. Five days after he was crown'd at Weſtminſter, by Walter Archbiſhop of Canterbury; but the Queen ſeem'd much troubled and grieved at it, till ſhe was pacified ſoon after by a great Enlargement of her Joynture, the King ſettling upon her three parts of his Revenue. The Management of the Kingdom was the next thing to be conſider'd, which was put into the hands of twelve of the moſt able, and grave Stateſmen during the King's Minority, till he ſhould be of Age to govern it himſelf; which were the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, the Biſhops of Hereford, Wincheſter, and Worceſter, Thomas Brotherton Earl Marſhal, Edmund Earl of Kent, John Earl Warrein, Thomas Lord Wake, Henry Lord Peircy, Oliver Lord Ingham, and John Lord Roſſe [b]: But the Queen and Mortimer uſurped their Charge, and left them nothing but a Name of Governours. And the firſt thing that was acted by this new King by their Advice, was an Expedition into

An Expedition into Scotland, but unsuccessful.

Scotland, undertaken not only to recover the Honour of the Nation, but to keep Mens Minds busie at present, and uphold the Change; and hither not only a considerable Body of English are sent, but all the Strangers which were brought over with the Queen under the Conduct of the Lord John Beaumont, the Earl of Henault's Brother, and at York the whole Army met, where the English (being not all of a Party) quarrel with the foreign Aids, and so great a Contest rose between them, that some Blood was spilt, and it was very hardly appeased. At Stanhope Park the English came to an Engagement with the Scots, and tho' the English were treble the number, and might easily have conquer'd them; yet through the Treason of some great Men (as it was reported) they all escap'd, and nothing remarkable was done, and so the young King, who was born for Victories, was deprived of the Honour of this his first Action; which being undertaken by others Advice, was not so dishonourable unto him as it was to others. However, upon his return, all the Henoways and Stipendiary Soldiers were sent home.

During this Expedition, the deposed King remained a Prisoner at Kenelworth, under an Allowance of an hundred Marks a Month for his Expences, and depriv'd of all the Comforts the World should yield him. His Wife, whom he loved greatly (tho' now the Author of all his Misery) sends him fine Cloaths, and kind Letters, but deny'd him her Presence (tho' it was often desir'd by the King by Letters) upon a Pretence, that she was not allow'd to come to him by the State. But after the King's return, he was removed, because he was not thought safe enough, nor look'd so strictly to as he ought, being in Custody of his Uncle [a] the Earl of Lancaster, and [b] was committed to more faithful Keepers, two Men of the most rough Natures that could be found, the Lord Matrevers [c] and Sir Thomas Gourney the Elder; who immediately remov'd him from thence, and put him into the Castle of Barkley in Glocestershire, where he stay'd not long, but he was removed to Corfe Castle, and from thence from one place to another to disappoint his Friends; who, they fear'd, were laying of Plots to [d] restore him, till at last they brought him in a Disguise, having shorn his Head with cold Water [e] in the open Fields, while he sat upon a Mole-hill, to Barkley Castle again; where shortly after, Gourney and Matrevers caused him to be murther'd in a most barbarous manner, by thrusting up an hot Iron into his Bowels through an hollow Instrument put up into his Fundament, by which means no outward Sign appear'd to discover his Death; for his Body being afterwards laid forth to be viewed by many substantial Citizens of Glocester [f] (who were summon'd for that purpose) they could find no sign either of Wound or Poison; so that they concluded that he dy'd of Grief, as was reported. Thus dy'd Edward II. within eight Months after he was deposed, and was buried in the Abby Church of the Benedictines at Glocester. The Actors of this cruel Deed, Gourney and Matrevers, tho' they had a Commission from the Queen to do as they did; yet she being asham'd to own it, they dare not undergo the Tryal, but presently fled their Country. Gourney three Years after was taken at Merseilles, but was murther'd in his Passage into England, that he might not discover who set him a-work, and Matrevers lurked a long time in Germany. But this Deed cost more Trouble and Blood afterwards; for the Judgments of God fell heavily, not only upon the Contrivers of this Wickedness, but upon the whole Kingdom in general, and the King's Posterity and Nobilities and Children in particular; as the many bloody Scaffolds, infinite Slaughters, and civil Wars of the Nation in after Ages, will plainly prove, tho' for the present the Authors of it, the Queen and Mortimer lately created Earl of March, prosper'd and govern'd all to the no small Dissatisfaction of the Nation, which brought forth new Factions, according to the Nature of those turbulent Times.

1328. The King's Marriage, and a Parliament called.

The King's Marriage with Philippa of Henault was now solemniz'd, and a Parliament is held at Northampton, at which a dishonourable Peace is concluded with the Scots, and confirm'd by a Match between David Bruce Prince of Scotland, Son of Robert Bruce, the present King, and Joanna Sister to the King of England; which Match, by reason of the tender Age of the Prince, could promise but little good to the Nation. Besides, by the secret Contrivance of the Queen Mother, Roger Mortimer [g], lately made Earl of March, and Sir James Douglasse, 'The King surrenders by 'his Charter his Title and Sovereignty to the 'Kingdom of Scotland, restores many Deeds and 'other Instruments of their former Homage and 'Fealty, with the famous Evidence call'd the '[h] Ragman Roll, and many ancient Jewels and 'Monuments; among which, was one of great 'Value, call'd the Black Cross of Scotland, &c. 'and besides, all Englishmen were not permitted 'to hold any Lands in Scotland, unless they 'would dwell there. In Consideration of which Grants, King Bruce was to pay the King thirty thousand [i] Marks. Shortly after a Parliament was held at Winchester, where Edmund Earl of Kent, Brother to the late deposed King, is accus'd and condemn'd by his own Confession, for endeavouring to restore his Brother, and conferring with divers great Men concerning the same, without any Matter of Fact [k]. This miserable Earl stood on the Scaffold from one till five a Clock in the Afternoon, and no Man would execute him; but at length, a silly Wretch of the

The whole Order of the Friars-Preachers zealously maintain'd his Right, and are said to have contriv'd his Restoration; which to avoid, the Queen and Mortimer are reported to have sent private Orders to his barbarous Keepers to dispatch him: But tho' they spared no other ill Usage, yet they were a little startled at this, and sent to the Bishop of Hereford, a fit Casuist; who was, it's thought, the Adviser of it, to know whether it were lawful. The Bishop willing to further it, but not to seem so, sent them this Answer. To kill King Edward you need not to fear it is good; which Answer, by putting a Comma in different Places, is a Plea for himself, and Encouragement to them, but the latter is most obvious, and no doubt he design'd it.

[k] This Earl's Son Edmund petition'd the King in the next Parliament, That the Judgment against his Father might be revers'd, for that his Father had been falsly accus'd by Roger Mortimer, Sir John Matrevers, and their Accomplices, and made to believe that King Edward was alive after he was murther'd. 'Tis said, that accordingly the Earl entred into a Plot for his Delivery out of Corfe Castle, where the Traytors who had deceiv'd him pretended he was still confin'd.

Marshalsea

A. D. 1328. Reg. 2.

Marshalsea cut off his Head[a]. But these Courses in a new Alteration could not last long without producing another. Wherefore a Parliament being call'd at Nottingham, the Queen and Mortimer, who had long bore the blame of every thing done amiss in the Government, were stripped of all their Power and Glory; the Queen hath her great Joynture taken from her, and is put to a Pension of a thousand Pound a Year. Mortimer is accused 'to have procured the late King's Death, 'to have been a means of the Scots escape at 'Stanhope-Park, for which he had a Bribe of twenty thousand Pound; to have procured the late 'Marriage and Peace with Scotland, which was 'so dishonourable to the King and Kingdom; to 'have consumed the King's Treasure, besides all 'that was taken from the Spencers; to have been 'too familiar[b] with the Queen, &c. And for these heinous Offences he is condemned of High-Treason, sent up to London, drawn and hang'd at the common Gallows at the Elms, now called Tyburn[c]; there his Body remained two Days a Spectacle of Disgrace to all Beholders. And thus was the Cruelty and Ambition of Mortimer justly rewarded, and an Example of Terror given to the other Ministers about the King, who being now come to Age, wanted nothing but faithful Ministers to direct him in such Courses as might be most honourable for himself and the Kingdom, being of a Spirit able and bold enough to go thro' with any brave Actions, of which he had variety that offer'd themselves.

King Edward summon'd to do Homage to the King of France.

And first a new King of France lately crown'd upon the Death of Charles the Fair, lately deceased without Issue-male, requires his Homage for the Dutchy of Guien, and other Lands, held of the Crown of France, according to the Custom; to which, tho' King Edward was supposed to have the better Right, yet because Philip de Valois was now in Possession of the same, and himself young, and his own Kingdom factious, turbulent and unsettled, he was not able to debate his Title otherwise than by Law (which seldom gets a Crown) and therefore willing to yield to Necessity, he went over in person into France to perform this Ceremony, which did much prejudice his Claim afterwards, and took from the Justice of his Cause; because by this Act he seem'd to acknowledge the Right of his Competitor. The Case of these Princes stood thus: Philip the Fair, the Father of Isabel King Edward's Mother, had three Sons, Lewis, Philip, and Charles, who were all successively Kings of France, and dy'd without Male-issue; for tho' Lewis the eldest Son had a Daughter, whom Eudes Earl of Bologne would have brought to the Crown, yet because it was judged to be contrary to the Salick Law for a Woman to succeed, Philip the next Brother was received for King, who also leaving only four Daughters, Charles succeeded by the same Law without any opposition. Charles dying, left his Wife new with Child, and so the Kingdom to be under a Regency till it could be known whether it were a Son. Philip de Valois, the first Prince of the Blood, Son of Charles de Valois, the Brother of Philip the Fair, claimed the Regency as belonging to him; but Edward King of England put in for it as his Right, being a nearer Relation to the deceased Kings; but the Regency was entrusted to Philip, because he descended from a Brother more capable of the Crown than a Daughter, of which Edward was descended.

King Edward's Title to the Crown of France.

And thus things remained till the Queen was deliver'd, which happen'd to be a Daughter; and Philip was received and crowned King of France by the Salick Law, maintain'd to be inviolable. Robert de Artois, a Peer of great Power, was a principal means of his Preferment, and the Exclusion of Edward. Shortly after this Settlement of the French Crown, Edward was summon'd to pay his Homage, and accordingly met King Philip at Amiens, where two Points were chiefly debated by the Council of both Kings. 1. Concerning the Quality of the Homage pretended to be due by the Council of King Philip, but deny'd by King Edward's. 2. About the Lands in Guien, which the last King Charles had detained from Edward, of which his Council required Restitution, as belonging to his Dutchy. The Resolution of this last Point was easie, because of the Treaty made between the said King Charles and Edward the Second the last of May, 1325. wherein their Rights were secured by mutual Protestations, and Homage received, and paid to the said King Charles by the said Edward before he was King; which Protestations were repeated, and agreed to be followed in this, with a Covenant, That if King Edward would pursue his Right in Parliament, he should have Justice done him for the things in Controversie. But as for the Point concerning the Quality of his Homage, it was agreed in general, That it should be done and received according to the usual manner of the former Kings; and a sufficient time was granted to King Edward, to enquire of it, and make Declaration of it; which being done, King Edward upon the 6th of June, 1329. in a Crimson Velvet Gown, embroider'd with Leopards, with his Crown on his Head, his Sword by his Side, and Golden Spurs on his Heels, presents himself in the body of the Cathedral Church at Amiens before King Philip, sitting in a Chair of State in a Velvet Gown of Violet-Colour embroider'd with Flower-de-luces of Gold, his Crown on his Head, and his Scepter in his Hand, with all his Princes and Peers about him[d]. Then the Viscount Melun Chamberlain of France first orders King Edward to put off his Crown, his Sword, and his Spurs, and kneel down, which he did on a Crimson Velvet Cushion before King Philip; and then the Viscount putting both his Hands together between the Hands of the King of France, pronounced the Words of the Homage, which were these: 'You shall become Liegeman to the 'King my Master here present, as Duke of Guien 'and Peer of France, and you promise to bear 'Faith and Loyalty to him. Say Yea; and King Edward said Yea, and kissed the King of France, as Lord of the Fee, on the Mouth. The like Homage he did for the Earldom of Ponthieu. This Act of Submission, tho' condescended to by the King at that Juncture, yet he took himself wronged by Philip in exacting it so punctually of him, and was thereby so highly provoked and angred, that he resolved upon a Revenge, which he so severely performed afterward, as not only Philip himself, but all Christendom wished the Ceremony had been spared.

might not seem to break it [a] he took the opportunity of their Differences to set it aside after this manner: The Minority of the present King (which is the misery of Kingdoms) being attended with the Emulations and Factions of the great Men, encouraged Edward Baliol, Son of John Baliol, (some time King of Scotland) thirty two Years after his Father's Deposition, to attempt the Recovery of that Crown; and accordingly by the Sollicitation of his Friends he comes out of France, where he had all that while remained, into England, where he was permitted underhand to get Aid; which all those Scots and English, which were of a Faction contrary to Bruce readily offer'd him, and with them he suddenly assaults the Governours of the Kingdom in the Nonage of the young King David (who was at that time with the King of France) and overcame them in a Battel, wherein many Noblemen, and thousands of the Common-people were slain, and thereupon was immediately crown'd King of Scotland at Scone. But his Party not being so strong as to maintain what he had gotten, or defend him in the Possession of it against those that oppos'd him, he was forced, notwithstanding his first Victory, to return again into England to get more assistance of King Edward, who now shews himself in the Quarrel, joyns with Baliol against his Brother-in-law King David, and goes in Person with a strong Army to recover Berwick, which after three Months Siege, being valiantly defended by the Lord Seton, was again taken, and the whole Army of Scots, which came to relieve it at Halidown-Hill, utterly defeated and routed, with the slaughter of seven Earls, nine hundred Knights and Baronets, four hundred Squires, and about thirty two thousand common Soldiers, as our Writers report, but theirs say but fourteen thousand [b]; and thus was Baliol brought through a torrent of Blood to the Crown of Scotland again. In the Siege of Berwick [c] one memorable Action of the Lord Seton is not to be pass'd over, related by the Scotch Writers, which is this: When the Lord Seton saw that the Relief he expected failed, and the Assaults of the Enemies were very violent, so that he could not hold out, he conditioned with King Edward, That if he had not Relief by such a time [d] he would surrender the Town to him, and for the assurance of this Promise delivers him two of his Sons. King Edward soon after having notice of the approach of the Scotch Army, that it was greater, and came with more speed than was expected, and would be there before the Day, summons the Lord Seton to render the Town presently, otherwise he would execute his two Sons before his Face; and withal a Gallows is prepared within sight of the Town, and the young Gentlemen brought forth and put under the Executioner's Hands. The Lord seeing this, was doubtful what to do, being distracted between Love and Duty, till his Wife, the Mother of those Sons, and a Lady of masculine Courage, comes to him and exhorts him 'to remember his Allegiance sworn to the King, the Love he owes to his Country, and the Dignity of his noble Family; that they had other Children left, if these were destroy'd, and themselves not so old, but that they might have more; That if they should be preserved from Death now, they might perish otherwise soon upon a worse occasion; That it would be an eternal Blemish upon his Name to yield up a Place committed to his Charge, and yet it is uncertain whether he could preserve his Childrens Lives by it; for how could he trust that King who had broken his Promise already, and therefore besought him not to prefer an uncertain and momentary Advantage before a certain and perpetual Ignominy. And so having recover'd his Resolution to hold it out, she withdrew him from the Walls of the Town, that he might not see the Sufferings of his innocent Children.

A. D. 1331. Reg. 5.

The next Year after this Battel at Hallidown-Hill Edmund Baliol King of Scots did Homage to the King of England [e], as his superiour Lord, at New-Castle, and took his Oath of Fealty, binding 'himself and his Heirs to hold that Kingdom of 'him and his Successors for ever, with the In'heritance of five Countries next adjoyning to 'the Borders. So large a part of his Kingdom was he willing to part with, rather than be in danger of losing the whole; which yet was so far from securing his peaceable Enjoyment of it, that it rather embroiled the whole, by reason of the Discontent which most of the Nobility of Scotland took at this Act of Alienation of their Country; so that it created both Princes much Trouble, and cost a great Expence of Treasure to keep what they had gotten. The King of England had a fifteenth of their Laity, a twelfth of the Cities and Boroughs, and a tenth of the Clergy, in a Parliament held at London, granted to him for these Wars; and three Years together he went in Person with his Army into those parts, and never returned without so great Destruction and Bloodshed, that it is admirable how such a small Country could find so many Men to maintain their Quarrel, and fight for such barren Deserts. But Edward prosecuted the Business of Scotland, not meerly to be Master of it, but so to settle it as that it might not be an hindrance to his greater Designs upon France, which he chiefly intended, and was the sooner put upon by the Instigation of Robert de Artoys, who being driven out of the Kingdom by King Philip his Brother-in-law, came over into England, and was here entertain'd with great Honour. This Robert was a Prince of the Blood Royal of France, being descended of Robert the Son of Lewis VIII. Brother of S. Lewis. He had long Contention with Maud his Aunt, Countess of Burgogne, about the Earldom of Artois, and

[a] King Edward also requir'd Homage of the young King David, but was refus'd; which gave him a just ground for this Expedition, when fit occasion offer'd, as it did in Baliol's Cause.

[b] This Battel, according to Henry de Knighton, was fought on the 19th of July, 1333. and all the Scotish Historians place it under the same Year.

[c] This Story is taken out of Hector Boethius, a Scotch Historian, but a Writer of no very good Credit, and seems design'd not so much to honour the Name of the Lord Seton, as to blacken the Memory of this great Prince Edward III. for which Reasons 'tis rejected as a Calumny against the King by our English Writers of Judgment.

[d] By two Manuscripts the Chronicle of Lonercost in the Cotton. Library, and Scala Chronicon a French Manuscript in Bennet-College Library in Cambridge, it appears, that after the fifteen Days Truce made with Alexander Seton was expir'd, the King summon'd the Town; Seton answer'd, He did not yet doubt of Relief, and did not think himself oblig'd to surrender it. The King reply'd, That no Relief being come, he expected the performance of the Treaty. The Governour prevaricating with him, he order'd one of his Sons, and not both to be hang'd (by the Advice of his Council) and upon this the Garrison and Townsmen came to new terms, to have the Truce prolong'd for eight Days; in which time, if they were not reliev'd, they wou'd yield up the Town. Which accordingly they did; and the Scotish Historians own, that Seton himself was compell'd to side with King Edward; which 'tis not probable he wou'd have done by any Compulsion, had he us'd him so barbarously, and contrary to Articles. But those Authors are not very famous for Veracity, especially where the Cause of their own Country is concern'd.

preſuming upon his own Power, his Alliance with King Philip, who marry'd his Siſter, and the Service he had done in advancing him to the Crown, counterfeited a Deed to overthrow his Aunt's Right; which being diſcover'd, made his Cauſe the worſe, and moved the French King to give Judgment for her; and ſo the County of Artois was by Arreſt of Parliament confirmed to her. This ſo offended Robert, that in his Paſſion he ſaid openly, That he would unmake the King by the ſame Power he made him; which raſh and bold Threat, ſpoken before many Witneſſes, ſo incenſed the French King, that he laid wait to apprehend him; but failing in that, he proclaimed him Traitor, confiſcated his Eſtate, forbad all his Subjects, both within and without his Kingdom, to receive, comfort, or aid him, upon pain of Confiſcation of all their Goods; and charged them all to ſeize his Perſon, and ſend him Priſoner to him. Whereupon this Prince finding no place in France ſafe for his abode, comes over into England, where he is joyfully entertain'd by King Edward, made one of his Council, and inveſted in the Earldom of Richmond; which Favours, that he might recompence, he ſet on foot a War with France, which laſted above an hundred Years, diſcovers the Councils of France, by which Philip had been advanced to the Crown, diſapproves his Title, and prefers Edward's as moſt juſt. Upon which a Declaration was publiſhed, and ſent to the Pope, and all the neighbouring Princes, ſhewing the Uſurpation of Philip de Valois upon the Crown of France.

King Edward, who ever ſince his return from Amiens had been making Preparations againſt the King of France, and by the aſſiſtance of his Father-in-law, William Earl of Henault, had drawn into a Confederacy with him the Dukes of Brabant and Geldres, the Earl of Juliers, Archbiſhop of Cologne, and Valeran his Brother, John of Henault, and other Princes of Germany, doth now ſtrengthen his Intereſts farther, and by Gifts obtain'd of Lewis of Bavaria, the preſent Emperor, to be Vicar General of the Empire, by which Office he might require all the Princes that confined upon France to ſerve him. And this the Emperor did the more readily, becauſe Edward had ſtood for him againſt Frederick of Auſtria, who was a Competitor with him for the Empire, and had marry'd his Wife's Siſter. Then, by the means of one Jaques de Artovile, a Citizen of Gaunt, who was a great Man, and a Leader of the Flemings in all their Tumults, he gained all the People of thoſe Cities in Flanders, who maintain'd a kind of Liberty among themſelves, and who were the more eaſily won, becauſe their Wealth chiefly proceeded from the Wools of this Kingdom, which by a Parliament holden at London, in the 9th Year of the King's Reign, were 'forbidden to be tranſported unwrought, but 'Clothes ſhould be made here; and to that end, 'liberty was allow'd to all ſuch Artificers [a] as 'would come over and make Cloaths here; 'no Man being allow'd to wear any thing but 'Engliſh Cloth, except the King, Queen, and their 'Children; nor any Man to wear any Facings 'of Silks or Furs, but ſuch as could expend an 'hundred Pound per Annum. For by this Alliance they had not only a free admittance into the Kingdom, but had liberty of tranſporting Wools to uphold their former Trades; ſo that they advanced their own Intereſts, as well as the King's Strength. Edward having thus gotten a ſtrong Party abroad, next ſeeks all ways to raiſe Money at home to carry on this Chargeable Expedition. The tenth Penny is granted of Towns and Boroughs, a fifteenth of others, and a tenth of the Clergy, is granted in a Parliament of Northampton. All the Treaſure which had been committed to Churches throughout England for carrying on the Holy War, was taken out for the King's uſe. The next Year all the Goods of three Orders of Monks, viz. [b] Lombards, Cluniacks, and Ceſtercians, were likewiſe ſeized into the King's Hands, and another Subſidy as before granted at Nottingham. He likewiſe beſtow'd many Honours upon Noblemen, to encourage them for this intended Action. Henry of Lancaſter the younger was created Earl of Darby, William Montacute Earl of Saliſbury, Hugh Audley Earl of Gloceſter, William Clinton Earl of Huntington, William Bohun Earl of Northampton, Robert Ufford Earl of Suffolk, and Prince ['] Edward Earl of Cheſter and Duke of Cornwall. In the twelfth Year of his Reign, at a Parliament at Northampton, (as ſome write in the abſence of the King) he had granted him by the Laity one half of their Wools, and of the Clergy the whole was exacted, and they were forced to pay nine Marks for every Sack of fine Wool. The next Year after, a fifteenth was likewiſe paid in Wool by the Commonalty. And now for the better management of his Work abroad (having ſettled his Affairs in Scotland) he goes over into Flanders, takes with him his Queen and Children, and lies at Antwerp; where, by the Perſuaſion of the Flemings, he took upon him the Style, Title and Arms of the King of France, becauſe they held they might the better juſtifie their Actions in joyning with him, and diſpence with their Oath made to the French King, never to bear Arms againſt him; and thereupon the League was made between them and King Edward.

The French King being ſenſible of Edward's Actions was not behind him in his Preparations and [d] Confederacies, having engaged on his part the King of Bohemia, the Count Palatine of the Rhine [e], (who had agreed to ſerve him againſt King Edward and his Adherents with three hundred Horſe for fifty ſix thouſand Florins.) The Biſhop of Metz, Albert and Otho Dukes of Auſtria, Theodore Marquiſs of Montferat, Ame Earl of Geneva; beſides many Princes of States, and divers great Captains of Germany, French Counts, Savoy, Dauphin, Spain, and other Countries. So that all the chief Kingdoms of the Chriſtian World were either actually in Arms, or aſſiſting in this Quarrel between theſe two mighty Kings. Long were they preparing before they came to engage, and much was endeavour'd by the Pope and King of Sicily, who being a great Aſtrologer foretold an ill Event of this Quarrel to the King of France, to have compoſed the Difference, but to no purpose. The War began on the Borders of each other's Dominions; King Edward sets upon Cambray, defended by the French; and Philip seizes on the Dutchy of Guien, sending Count D'eu Constable of France, with the Earls of Foix and Arminiack, who surprized many strong places of it; besides he had a great Navy at Sea, which committed [a] much Spoil on the Coast of England. King Edward entred France by the way of Vermandois and Thierache, and approaches near to King Philip. Both Armies were encamped between Viron Fosse and La Flamenguere, and the Day for the Fight was appointed on the Friday after; the Armies on both sides made ready, but the French had the advantage by Numbers. Both sides were well furnished with brave Men, but yet departed without a Battel: The French esteeming it no Discretion to put the Person and State of their King to the hazard of a Fight within his own Kingdom; and the English, consisting of less Numbers, thought not fit to assail them. And so they passed the Day in facing one another, and nothing was done. Only this Accident fell out, which proved a matter of Sport afterward: An Hare starting before the Head of the French Army, a great Shout was suddenly made, which they who were behind supposing to have been at the Onset of the Battel, disposed themselves to fight, and some Esquires for their more Encouragement were, according to the Custom, presently Knighted, which were ever after call'd The Knights of the Hare. The next Morning early both Kings decamped, and the French retired to Paris, and the King of England to Brabant [b].

Wherefore as by this Act encouragement was given to ſuch as had Skill, but no Stocks, to come out of Flanders and ſettle here; ſo accordingly many, glad of this opportunity to advance their Fortunes, came into England, and ſettl'd in great Farmers Houſes at firſt, and after remov'd into Towns; from whence ſeveral ſort of Woollen Manufactures were made among us; as, at Sadbury, Bays; at Colcheſter, Says and Serges; in Kent, Broad-Cloths; in Devonſhire, Kerſes; in Wales, Frizes; in Weſtmorland, Kendal-Cloth, &c.

K. Edward returns into England.

King Edward having staid a little time at Brabant to settle his Confederates, and order his Affairs, leaves the Queen, and returns into England about Candlemas, after [c] a Year's absence from thence, and lands at the Tower about Midnight, which finding unguarded, he was much displeased, and sends for the Mayor of London, whom he commanded to bring before him the Chancellor and Treasurer, with John S. Paul, Michael Wath, Philip Thorp, and Henry Stratford, Clerks, (who were Officers for his Receipts) and John Sconer Justice of the Bench; all which, except the Chancellor, were arrested and committed to Prison, as were also divers other Ministers of Justice and Accomptants, upon Enquiry made into their unjust proceedings [d]. Then he call'd a Parliament in London in Lent, which 'granted unto him for the 'Custom of every Sack of Wool 40 s. for every 'three hundred Wool-fells 40 s. for every Last 'of Leather 40 s. and so for other Merchandizes 'proportionably; which Imposition was to en-'dure from that Easter to the Whitsuntide twelve-'month after. Besides there was granted of Ci-'tizens and Burgesses a ninth part of their Goods, 'a fifteenth of foreign Merchants and others; 'and the ninth Sheaf, Fleece, and Lamb for two 'Years. Also another tenth of the Clergy. And 'for his present Supply he had Loans of divers 'wealthy Persons, and the City of London lent 'him twenty thousand Marks. In Consideration 'of which Grants and Contributions, the King '(besides his Pardons to divers kinds of Offen-'ders) remitted all Amercements for all Transgressions in his Forests, Reliefs and Scutage, un-'to the first time of his going into Flanders. A. D. 1340. Reg. 14.

During King Edward's stay in England, William Montague Earl of Salisbury, and [e] William Ufford Earl of Suffolk, who were left in Flanders to oppose the proceedings of the French, having performed several great Exploits with happy Success, and presuming upon their Fortune, were in an Encounter about Lisle so overmatch'd with Numbers, that they were both taken and sent Prisoners to Paris, to the great Joy of the French King; who now, to hinder the King of England's return, had prepared a mighty Navy in the Haven of Sluce, consisting of two hundred Sail of Ships (besides many Gallies) and two thousand arm'd Men in the Port, ready to encounter him upon his landing. King Edward being inform'd of it, provided a like Number of Ships well manned, and puts out to Sea upon Midsummer-Eve, being met the next Day with a Navy from the North-parts, under the Conduct of Sir Robert Morley. With these Forces he encounter'd the Enemy, which lay in the way to intercept him, with such Courage and Strength, and so great advantage of Wind and Weather, that he defeated their whole Navy, took and sunk all their Ships, slew thirty thousand Men, and landed with as great a Glory as such a Victory would yield, which being the first that the English ever got by Sea, was the more honourable to him. Most of the French, rather than endure the Arrows and sharp Swords of the English, leaped into the Sea. This Loss was so great, that the French dare not tell the King of it, and therefore set his Jester on work to discover it to him, who going into his Presence in a seeming Passion, cry'd out often, Cowardly Englishmen, Dastardly Englishmen, Faint-hearted Englishmen. The King at length asked him, Why he called them so? The Jester answer'd, Because they durst not leap out of their Ships into the Sea, as our brave Frenchmen did. By which the King apprehended the Overthrow of his Fleet, which the French attribute to one Nicholas Buchett, one of their Commanders, who had manned his Ships with Soldiers of the baser sort, who would serve for small pay, and refused Gentlemen, and sufficient Soldiers, in regard they required greater Wages, as it hath often happen'd, that the Avarice of Commanders hath been the Cause of great Defeats. But notwithstanding this Loss of the French by Sea, their King, in those Martial Times, was soon supply'd with Power sufficient out of his own and Confederates Dominions to make a strong Opposition against the victorious and mighty King of England, who suddenly sets down before Tourney with all his own and his Adherent's Forces. And from Chyn (a place near it, where he lodg'd) sends his Cartel, July 17. to Philip de Valois, lodging at S. Andrews Les Air, with his mighty Army, declaring, 'That he with the 'Strength of his own Kingdom, and Assistance 'of the Flemmings, was come to recover his Right 'in the Kingdom of France, unjustly detained

'from him, contrary to the Laws of God and 'Man; and ſince no other means could prevail, 'he was forced to fly to the Sword. But becauſe 'the Controverſie was between them two, he 'offer'd, that the ſhedding of Chriſtian Blood, 'and Deſtruction of the Country might be ſpar'd, 'to try their Right by Combat in cloſe Camp, 'Body to Body, or each of them accompany'd 'with a hundred choice Perſons; which, if the 'ſaid Philip refuſed, then to joyn Battel within 'ten Days after, before the City of Tourney.

The French King's Anſwer to King Edward's Cartel and Challenge.

Philip de Valois return'd an Anſwer to this Challenge, the laſt of July, in this manner: 'Phi- 'lip by the Grace of God King of France, to Ed- 'ward King of England. We have peruſed your 'Letters ſent to the Court of Philip de Valois, 'containing certain Requeſts to the ſaid Philip; 'but becauſe it appears, that thoſe Letters and 'Requeſts were not written or made unto us, we 'will in no ſort anſwer you. But ſeeing by the 'ſaid Letters, and otherwiſe, we underſtand, that 'you, guided by your own Will, without all Rea- 'ſon, have entred our Kingdom of France with 'an Army, and have done no ſmall damage to 'our People and Country, contrary to the Duty 'of a Liege-man, who have lately ſworn Homage 'to us, acknowledging us, as by Right, King of 'France, and hath promiſed that Obedience that 'is due from the Vaſſal to his Liege-lord; as is ma- 'niſeſt by your Letters-Patents under your Great 'Seal, which we have with us, and you ought to 'have with you: Therefore our Intention is, as 'becomes our Honour, to chace you out of our 'Kingdom, as we firmly hope in Chriſt (from 'whom we have our Power) to do. Becauſe by 'this War, which you have moſt wickedly be- 'gun, our intended Journey into the Eaſt is hin- 'der'd, great numbers of Chriſtians there mur- 'ther'd, that Holy Service neglected, and the 'Church diſhonoured. And whereas you ſay, 'You are aſſiſted by the Flemmings; we aſſure 'our ſelves, that they will not ſo far forget their 'Honour and Fidelity to our Coſin their Earl, 'and us, their ſupreme Lord, as to act ſo much 'againſt the common Good. The French Hiſto- rians write, that King Philip ſent word to King Edward, by the Meſſengers of this Letter, 'That 'by his Cartel he ventur'd nothing of his own, 'but only expoſed another's Dominions, which 'was unreaſonable; That if he would hazard the 'Kingdom of England (tho' it were leſs) againſt 'the Kingdom of France, King Philip would en- 'ter the Combat in cloſe Camp with him, upon 'Condition, that the Conqueror ſhould enjoy both 'Kingdoms: To which, they ſay, Edward 'would not conſent. The ſingle Combat being thus rejected by both ſides, Edward went on with the Siege of Tourney, which held out three Months, ſo that nothing was effected but the Deſtruction of the Country. All Chriſtendom impatiently ex- pected the Event, and both Kingdoms were in doubt of the Conſequences of it, till Jane de Va- lois, Siſter of King Philip, and Widow of William Duke of Henault, the Father of Philippa the Wife of King Edward, undertook to negotiate a Peace between her Brother and Son; and leaving her Nunnery at Fontenelles[a], with indefatigable In- duſtry travell'd ſo long from one to the other, till at laſt by her Advice and Treaty ſhe obtained a Parley, which produced a Truce for a Year; ſo that theſe enraged Princes diſmiſſed their Armies, and the French King return'd home, and Edward with his Queen into England, having remained three Years in thoſe parts; in which time his Queen brought him two Sons, Lionel, afterwards

A Truce made between the two Kings by Jane de Valois.

Duke of Clarence, and John born at Gaunt, firſt Earl of Richmond, and after Duke of Lancaſter. But King Edward's Condeſcenſion to this ſudden Truce had really no other motive, but his want of Treaſure; which, notwithſtanding the great Impoſitions laid upon his Subjects, came ſhort, and muſt be ſupply'd, as indeed it was, yet af- ter ſome Delays, which thus happen'd: The King at his laſt being in England had removed his Chan- cellor, and impriſoned his Treaſurer, with other Officers, who were moſt of them Clergymen, and ſtill kept them under Confinement; which Seve- rity, tho' juſt, yet ſo angred John Stratford, Arch- biſhop of Canterbury, (on whom the King laid the Blame of his Wants) that he wrote a bold and ſharp Letter to the King to this effect: 'That it 'was for the Safety and Happineſs of Kings and 'their Kingdoms, to uſe wiſe and grave Coun- 'ſellors favourably and kindly, alledging many 'Examples out of holy Scriptures to prove the 'flouriſhing Condition of ſuch as took that courſe, 'and the Miſeries of thoſe that did the contrary. 'Then he adviſes him to call to mind, how his 'Father, being guided by evil Counſel, vexed 'the Nation, putting many of the Nobility to 'Death contrary to Law, and to conſider what 'were the ill Conſequences of ſuch Actions; and 'that he himſelf at firſt, through the ill Conduct 'of ſuch as managed his Affairs, had almoſt loſt 'the Love of his People; but afterward, by the 'great Care and wiſe Management of his Nobles 'and Biſhops, his Affairs were again brought in- 'to ſuch Order, as that he recover'd his Honour; 'and now remains in ſo great Credit with his 'People, that all, both Clergy and Laity, have 'yielded their aſſiſtance to him, more than any 'of his Royal Anceſtors; by which means he 'hath triumphed over the French and Scots, and 'is reputed the nobleſt Prince in Chriſtendom. 'But now, through the wicked advice of ſuch as 'affect their own Advantage more than his Ho- 'nour, or the Welfare of his People, he hath 'cauſed ſeveral Clergymen and others to be ar- 'reſted, and kept in Priſon by undue Proceed- 'ings, contrary to the Laws of England, which 'he was by his Coronation-Oath bound ſtrictly 'to obſerve, and againſt Magna Charta, which 'whoſoever ſhall preſume to break, are to be 'excommunicated by all the Biſhops, according 'to the Bull of Innocent IV. So that by theſe 'Actions he had brought no ſmall Danger upon 'his Soul, and Damage to his State and Honour. 'Then he tells him, That if he went on in this 'manner, he would certainly loſe the Hearts of 'his People, and their Help, ſo that he would 'not be able to carry on the War in hand, but 'expoſe himſelf to his Enemies, to the great ha- 'zard of his Perſon and Kingdom. And there- 'fore adviſes him to call an Aſſembly of the 'Nobility, and prudenteſt Men of the Land, and 'conſult with them (without whoſe Aſſiſtance 'and Counſel he could not govern the Kingdom 'well, nor go through with his preſent Deſigns) 'concerning what is amiſs. And whereas, ſaid 'he, ſome Perſons about you, by their Flattery 'and Cunning, betray and deceive you, we do 'hereby pronounce them Excommunicate, and 'beſeech you, as your Spiritual Father, to eſteem 'and deal with them as ſuch. Beſides, he urges, 'that whereas through the Negligence and Falſ- 'hood of ſome of his Miniſters, the City of Tour- 'ney was not taken; the Matter might be exa- 'mined in Parliament, and a diligent Enquiry 'made, into whoſe Hands, ever ſince the begin- 'ning of the War, the Wools and Monies raiſed

'have come, and how they have been beſtow'd, 'and by whoſe fault it was that the City of Tour-'ney was not taken, but left in that manner it 'was; and that as a juſt Prince he would puniſh 'ſuch as were found guilty, and not condemn or 'miſuſe his Subjects without a legal Tryal. This Letter bore Date January 1.

The Archbiſhop's Letter to the Chancellor R. Bouſer; and a ſecond Letter to the King and his Council.

Another Letter he wrote to Robert Bouſer (or Bourchier) Chancellor of England, relating what Contributions the Clergy had given the King by their free conſent, and that nothing more was to be exacted of them, requring him 'to do nothing 'contrary to the Law of Magna Charta; and 'that if any Writ, Commiſſion or Precept, had 'gone out of the Chancery, contrary to it, or to 'the Privileges and Liberties of the Church and 'Kingdom, he ſhould within ten Days after the 'Receipt of theſe his Letters (as he ſaid the Chan-'cellor was bound to do) recall, and make void 'the ſame. This Letter was dated January 28. After this he wrote a third Letter to the King and his whole Council, declaring, 'That whereas, 'contrary to the Liberties and Privileges of the 'Church and Kingdom, contained in Magna Char-'ta, John de S. Paul, Michael de Wath, Robert 'Chickwill, John Thorp, and Henry Stratford, 'were arreſted, committed to Priſon, and there 'detained, without being indicted or convicted 'of any notorious Crime; and that whoſoever 'by their Counſel had put the King upon ſuch 'proceedings, had incurr'd the Sentence inflicted 'in the Canon, which he had cauſed to be pub-'liſhed both in his own Dioceſs, and thoſe of his 'Suffragans. And therefore beſought the King 'and his whole Council without delay to releaſe 'the ſaid Priſoners, otherwiſe he threatens, that 'according to his Paſtoral Charge, he would pro-'ceed to the Execution of the Sentence; con-'cluding, That it was not in his Intention in the 'leaſt to include in it the King, Queen, or their 'Children, as far they could be excuſed. And 'for this end he ſends to the Biſhop of London, 'and all his other Suffragan Biſhops, and having 'complained of the great Wrongs done to the 'Church by Laymen, charges him and them not 'only to publiſh in their Churches, but fix up in all 'eminent Places, the Sentence of Excommunica-'tion againſt all Offenders that ſhould break 'thoſe Articles of Magna Charta, which he an-'nexed to his Letter, that (as he ſaid) no Man 'may pretend Ignorance of their fault.

The King ſends an Anſwer of the Archbiſhop's Letter to the Biſhop of London.

The King being thus rouzed by the Archbiſhop's Letters, ſends his Apology immediately to the Biſhop of London, in a Letter to him; wherein, having declared firſt how much he had honoured and truſted the Archbiſhop, he accuſes him of unjuſt and deceitful Dealing in his Truſt, and ſays, 'That it was by his Counſel and Advice he 'undertook this Action againſt the French, and 'was aſſur'd by him, that he ſhould not want 'ſufficient Treaſure to go through with it: So 'that he need do no more than provide Men to 'execute the Deſign; That notwithſtanding this 'Promiſe, through the Negligence or Malice of 'the Archbiſhop and his Officials, thoſe Supplies 'which were granted by his Subjects in Parlia-'ment, were ſo badly collected, and ſent over 'ſo ſlowly, that he was forced (to his great 'Grief and Shame) to accept of the laſt Truce, 'and through his extreme Want to come into the 'hands of Uſurers. Theſe Actions gave him 'juſt cauſe to look into the management of his 'Officers, of whom he found ſome ſo guilty of 'Male-adminiſtration of Juſtice, and ſuch Cor-'ruptions and Oppreſſions of his Subjects, that 'he removed the greateſt of them from their 'Places; and the leſſer, who were in the ſame 'Crimes, he committed to Priſon, and there 'detained them, that by ſtrict Examination he 'might find out their unlawful Proceedings, of 'which none could give him ſo good Information 'as the Archbiſhop, to whom he had for a long 'time committed the whole Adminiſtration of 'the Kingdom. And therefore being deſirous 'to confer with him at London about theſe pub-'lick Affairs, he had ſent a Meſſenger on pur-'poſe to him, his truſty Servant Nicholas de Can-'teluſe, to ſummon him thither. But the Arch-'biſhop had refuſed to come to him, alledging, 'That he ſtood in fear of ſome Perſons about the 'King, and would not run the hazard of depart-'ing from his Church. That after this he ſent 'Richard Stafford, with the Steward of his Houſe, 'with a promiſe of ſafe Paſſage under his Seal; 'but then was anſwered, That he would have 'no Conference with the King but in open Par-'liament, which he knew could not at that time 'be conveniently called. Then he aggravates The Archbiſhop accuſed of many Crimes. 'the Archbiſhop's undutiful Behaviour and falſe 'Dealings towards him; declaring, That tho' by 'God's Providence and an Hereditary Right he 'was advanced to the Throne of England, yet he 'abhorred all Abuſes of his Regal Authority, 'and deſired nothing more in this World than to 'govern his Subjects with ſuch Mildneſs and Ju-'ſtice, as that he might more deſerve their Love 'than Fear. That notwithſtanding this his Care 'to govern well, the Archbiſhop had wrongfully '(by his Letters publiſhed in divers parts of his 'Kingdom) injur'd his Innocency, and ſlander'd 'his moſt faithful Counſellors and Officers, who 'adminiſtred Juſtice, giving out, that the People 'were oppreſs'd, the Clergy ruin'd, and the Na-'tion burthen'd with heavy Taxes; and many 'Exactions, which the King argues could be done 'with no other deſign, but to raiſe Sedition among 'his People, and to alienate the Hearts of his Sub-'jects from him. Laſtly, To ſhew the Arch-'biſhop's Failings, he declares, That he himſelf, 'while he was under Age, had by his Advice 'made ſo many prodigal Donations, unlawful 'Alienations, and exceſſive Gifts, that his Trea-'ſury was now utterly exhauſted, and his Crown-'Revenues mightily diminiſhed; and that the 'Archbiſhop, being corrupted with Bribes, had 'remitted without any reaſonable cauſe great 'Sums which were due to him, applying to 'his own uſe, or of others not well deſerving of 'them, many Advantages and Revenues, which 'ſhould have been preſerved for his neceſſary 'ſupport. And therefore concluded, That un-'leſs he deſiſted from his rebellious Obſtinacy, 'he intended in due time and place to proceed 'againſt him; injoyning him to publiſh all and 'ſingular theſe his wicked Actions, and to cauſe 'others to do the like, for the more clear mani-'feſtation of his pious and princely Intention in 'relieving his own and his Subjects Wrongs. This Letter was ſaid to be penned by Adam Biſhop of Wincheſter, and bare Date the 12th of February, Anno Reg. 15. Thus the Difference between the King and his Officers, whoſe Actions muſt not be too ſharply look'd into, was ended, and the grand Imputation reſts upon the Archbiſhop, who is charg'd with the Receipt of great Sums, and vehemently urg'd by the King's Creditors to pay them. Shortly after this a Parliament was held at London, in which the King was hard put to it to ſatisfie their Demands; for he was earneſtly petition'd by the whole Aſſembly of the three States, That the Great Charter of their Liberties, and the Charter of Foreſts might be duly obſerved, and that whoſoever of the King's Officers did break the ſame ſhould loſe their place; That the high Officers of the Kingdom ſhould be elected, as they were in former times, by Parliament; but the King ſtood ſtrongly upon his own Election and Prerogative, but yielded (that he might gain his Deſigns, as he confeſſed) that thoſe Officers ſhould take an Oath in Parliament to do Juſtice to all Men in their Offices; and a Statute was made for that purpoſe, and confirmed with the King's Seal, to ſecure that and many other Grants to his Subjects, which notwithſtanding were for the moſt part ſoon after revoked.

The [a] Truce agreed upon at Tourney, and concluded at Arras, for one Year, by the Commiſſioners of both Kings, and two Cardinals from the Pope, yielded a Ceſſation of Arms, but not of Plots againſt each other. Lewis of Bavaria the Emperor being won over to the King of France's ſide, became his ſworn Confederate, and revoked the Vicarſhip of the Empire, which he had lately confirmed to the King of England, giving this as the Reaſon in his Letter [b] to King Edward, That he had made the Truce at Tourney without his conſent; which Edward fully and diſcreetly anſwer'd [c]. But inſtead of this remote and inconſtant Confederate, Providence brought him another, more near and more ſerviceable to his deſign, within that Kingdom, after this manner: The Inheritance of the Dutchy of Britain happen'd to be in Controverſie between Charles de Blois, Nephew to King Philip, and John de Monfort, upon this Title. Arthur Duke of Britain had by Beatrix his firſt Wife two Sons, John and Guy; and by Yoland Counteſs of Monfort his ſecond Wife, John de Monfort. John Arthur's eldeſt Son having no Iſſue, left his Neice Jane, his Brother Guy's Daughter (her Father dying before him) to ſucceed him in his Dutchy. This Jane Charles de Blois marries on Condition, that his Iſſue by her ſhould inherit the ſame; and after Marriage he is inveſted in it, and had Homage done to him during the Life of John their Uncle. But after his Death John de Monfort claims the Dutchy, and goes to Paris to do Homage for the ſame to the French King; but Charles de Blois in Right of his Wife oppoſing him, the Controverſie was referred to the Parliament, who gave Sentence for Charles. Monfort being enraged, immediately repairs to the King of England, and doth Homage to him for the Dutchy, by whom he was received with great applauſe, and his Title (tho' bad in France) was made good in England. Wherefore he returns again into Britain with Comfort and Abilities to oppoſe his Competitor; but after ſome Encounters, was taken and committed cloſe Priſoner to the Louvre in Paris. His Wife the Counteſs of Monfort, Siſter to Lewis Earl of Flanders, being a Lady of a Maſculine Courage, proſecutes her Huſband's Quarrel, puts on Armour, leads and encourages her People, ſurprizes and defends many places of Importance in Britain; but at length, being overpower'd by the Forces of Charles de Blois, ſhe begs aſſiſtance of the King of England, and obtains it, and hath it ſent thither ander the Conduct of the Lord Walter de Manny, which relieved her for the preſent, but not long, her Enemies being too powerful to be ſubdued with ſmall Forces. Wherefore Edward, who was not ſparing of Aids for his own deſigns, being ſollicited again by the Counteſs, who came over in Perſon to treat with the King about farther Supplies, and make an Alliance by tendering a Match between her Son and one of the King's Daughters, ſent over greater Forces with her, under the Command of the Earls of Saliſbury, Pembroke, and Suffolk, the Lords Stafford, Spencer, and Bourchier, with Robert de Artois Earl of Richmond. Many were the Rencounters between the Engliſh and French, many Caſtles were ſurprized, and recovered; in which Robert de Artois, at the Siege of Vannes, received his laſt Wound, but was brought over into England to die, leaving behind him, tho' many Marks of Valour, yet the diſhonourable Name of a Rebel to his own Country, againſt which he had not only inſtigated Edward, but ſerved him ſix Years. Shortly after theſe Supplies were ſent into Britain, King Edward followed in Perſon with more, and lying before Vannes, which was lately recovered by the French, John Duke of Normandy, eldeſt Son to the French King, ſent to aid Charles de Blois with an Army of forty thouſand, came to give him Battel; and being ready to engage, two Cardinals, ſent for that purpoſe by Pope Clement VI. undertook to mediate a Peace, and after much Sollicitation procured a Truce for three Years, upon Condition, that the Pope and Court of Rome ſhould hear and examine the Differences between the two Kingdoms, but not determine them without the Conſent of both Kings. This Ceſſation of Arms gave ſpace to both ſides to provide for greater Quarrels, tho' in Britain ſmall Skirmiſhes continued.

The Death of Robert de Artois.

King Edward being returned home after the Concluſion of the Truce, made an Expedition into Scotland againſt King David, and drove him into the Iſlands. At this time the Iſle of Man was conquer'd by William Montacute Earl of Saliſbury, whom the King made Governour of it, under the Title of King. At the King's return from Scotland, ſolemn Turnaments were held at Dunſtable, where two hundred and thirty Knights met him to exerciſe themſelves at that Paſtime (the only one then in Requeſt) as they did afterwards at Smithfield, Windſor, and other places. A Society alſo of Knights of the Round Table, in imitation of King Arthur, was now inſtituted, and a large Chamber of two hundred Foot round erected for the ſame at Windſor, many Strangers out of foreign parts being drawn to joyn in it. The King of France alſo erects the like Martial Society in France. [d] About this time alſo began the Order the Garter, being appointed at a ſolemn Feaſt at Windſor, which was held there many Days, not from the Counteſs of Saliſbury's Garter, which the King is ſaid to have taken up in Dancing with her, but only [e] as an Emblem of the cloſe Combination in Honour and Loyalty which ought to be among thoſe that are admitted into that Order. For it would be a Diſhonour to that Noble Inſtitution, which is perform'd with ſo much Religious Ceremony to imagine it ſhould ariſe from an Act of Lightneſs. But beſides the Exerciſes of Arms, which the King promoted at this time, he took alſo ſpecial Care of the Government; and that the Abuſes of it might be reformed, he called a Parliament at Westminster to consider upon, and administer a speedy and suitable Remedy for them. And the first thing they endeavoured to cure, was the Collation of Ecclesiastical Benefices upon Strangers, of which the Earls, Barons, [a] Knights and Burgesses grievously complained. This they try'd to effect, by sending a Letter to the Pope, Clement VI. the Cause of it, in humble manner representing to him, 'How inconvenient it was, and derogatory to 'the State of the Kingdom of England, that such 'Reservations, [b] Provisions, and Collations of Be-'nefices, as had been formerly used, should be 'continued, because the Churches of England had 'anciently been endow'd by noble and pious Per-'sons, that the People might be instructed by 'their own Countrymen in their Mother-Tongue. 'But by the Usurpation of some of his Predeces-'sors, Strangers and others, sometimes Enemies 'to the Realm, were preferred to many of them; 'by which means the Profits of them were sent 'out of the Nation, the Cures neglected, Alms 'and Hospitality disused, the Houses ruinated, 'the Charity and Devotion of the People much 'lessened, and many other Disorders (contrary 'to the Intention of the Founders) occasioned, 'which they could not suffer any longer; and 'therefore besought his Holiness to revoke all 'such Reservations, Provisions and Collations, 'that fit Men of the Natives might supply the 'Cures, and without delay to signifie his Inten-'tion in this matter, otherwise they would take 'speedy methods themselves for a Redress. These Letters were dated in full Parliament, May 28. 1343. and with them the King sent his Letters to the same effect, by Sir John Shordich, a grave Person, and of great Understanding in the Law; but at this time so unwelcome to the Court of Rome upon the account of his Message, that he departed without Leave or Answer; which, tho' the Pope sent afterward, yet the King and Parliament proceeded in their design of Redressing this Grievance, and made [c] the Statute of Provisors, prohibiting all such Provisions and Collations within this Realm, upon pain of Imprisonment, or Death to any such Person as shall for the time to come present or admit any Person or Persons, who was so preferred by the Pope, to the prejudice of the King's Royal Prerogative; and to this end were Writs directed to all Archbishops, Bishops, and others who were concern'd, strictly forbidding them to act any thing contrary to this Statute. In this Parliament Archbishop Stratford was upon his submission, but with much difficulty, accepted to the King's Favour. There was also a long Debate concerning Wools, how they should be assessed in several parts of the Realm, and what they should pay for Customs, when they were exported; and three Marks and a half upon every Sack was mentioned, but nothing was at this Session concluded. The Prince Edward also being then about thirteen Years old, was created Prince of Wales, and Commissioners were appointed to be sent to the Pope to mediate a Peace between the two Kings of England and France, according to the Articles propounded in the Truce, which were John Bishop of Exeter, Henry de Lancaster Earl of Darby, Hugh le Dispencier Lord of Glamorgan, the King's Cosins, Ralph Lord Stafford, with others.

A Parliament at Westminster to reform the Government

A. D. 1344.

The next Year after another Parliament, or rather the same prorogued, was held at London, in which, after many Contests, a tenth was granted the King by the Clergy, and a fifteenth by the Laity, for one Year; and a certain Gold-Coin, called the Floren, of base Alloy, which had been coined for the French Wars, cryed down, and Nobles of finer Metal coined, to the great Content of his Subjects; for whose Conveniency there were appointed places at London, Canterbury and York, to exchange their Monies in. Shortly after this the King caused General Musters to be made throughout the Kingdom, and a Certificate returned to him of all sufficient and expert Bowmen, and other Persons able to bear Arms. A Commission also was sent into every Country, to enquire into every Man's Abilities; and all Persons, that had from five to ten Pounds a Year in Lay-fee, were appointed to find an Archer on Horseback; they that had twenty five Pound, a Demilance; and so proportionably above. The King having thus gather'd an Army, goes over in Person into Flanders to make the People there firm to him; and at Sluce, Jaques van Artevile, with other Commissioners from the chief Towns, came to him, where a Motion was made, That either Lewis their Earl should do Homage to the King of England, or be disinherited, and Edward Prince of Wales received for their Lord. Upon which King Edward promises to erect their Country into a Dukedom. Artevile was forward to entertain the Motion, but the other Commissioners desired leave to acquaint their Towns with it, which were willing to have the Protection of the King of England, but did not care to purchase it by disinheriting their Natural Lord. Artevile notwithstanding undertakes to induce them to it, and for that end goes to Gaunt with five hundred Welshmen for his Guard, as he pretended, against one Gerhard Dennis Provost of the Weavers, who sought to destroy him. But the People, who had been so often led by him into Mutinies, now rose up unanimously against him, and a Cobler with an Ax struck out his Brains. King Edward having thus lost his principal Agent, was very angry. But the Towns sending a Message to excuse themselves of this Accident, which the People of Gaunt were only to be blamed for, and promising him to persuade their Prince (whom they could not consent to disinherit) to become his Homager, and to do him all faithful Service themselves; they so pacified the King, that he renewed the League between them: And so he went on to prosecute his other Designs. And now the Wars in Guien began to grow hot: The Earl of Darby, General of the Army, assaulted and took in Villa-Franche, Agenois, Angolesme, Rions, S. Basil, with many other Cities and Castles. The French King sent his eldest Son, John Duke of Normandy, to encounter him, who recover'd the Cities of Angolesm and Ville-Franche. These Skirmishes happen'd before the Truce was expired. The King of France blamed Edward for this breach of the Peace, and Edward accused him for the first Cause, in that he had instigated the Scots to invade his Realm, and entertain'd King David,

[a] The Commons were at first earnest to have the Pope's Power quite ejected out of the Realm, for his intolerable Encroachments upon the King's Subject's Rights, but at last were brought to gentler methods of dealing with him by Letters.

[b] The Pope's Provisions were thus made: When any Bishoprick, Abbacy, or good Benefice was likely to be void, the Pope having notice of it by some of his Agents here, would by an Act of Provision predispose of such Places to such Foreigners as he pleas'd, whereby Patrons were defeated of their Presentations, and Englishmen of their Preferments, unless they would buy off the Provisions.

[c] Notwithstanding this Act, Pope Clement sent two Cardinals the next Year with certain Provisions for Benefices next vacant, to the value of two thousand Marks; but the King and Nobles sent them back with Letters, purporting a full Resolution to withstand them.

when he fled from him. Thus both being prepared for a Quarrel, the Peace was quite laid aside, and the War began.

K. Edward goes with a mighty Army into Normandy

This mighty and active Prince King Edward had now begun the 20th Year of his Reign, and being full of Courage and Youth was very eager upon his Expedition into France, for which he prepared [a] the greatest Fleet that ever yet crost'd the Seas for France; and over he passed into Normandy in July, leaving for the Wardens of England in his absence the Lords Percy and Nevill, and taking the young Prince with him, who was about fifteen Years old, to give him a Specimen of the Labours and Atchievements of Princes to attain Glory. His Army consisted [b] of four thousand Men at Arms, and ten thousand Archers, besides Welsh and Irish, which follow'd him on foot. He had with him the Earls of Hereford, Northampton, Arundel, Huntington, Warwick, Suffolk, and Oxford; the Lords Mortimer (afterward made Earl of March) John, Lewis, and Roger Beauchamp, Cobham, Lucy, Basset, Barkley, Willoughby, and divers others both Knights and gallant Captains. He had also of late entertain'd Godfrey de Harcourt, a great Favourite of the French King's; but upon some discontent, or because he was suspected of favouring the English Party in Britain, for which the King of France had a little before executed Oliver de Clisson, Bacon, Piercy, and Geffrey de Malestroict, Men of Note, was forced to fly, and came to King Edward, with whom tho' he staid not long before he made his Peace with his Master, yet he did his Country and King much mischief. For upon King Edward's landing with his mighty Army in the Isle of Constantine in Normandy, by his Conduct he was made one of the King's Marshals, and the Earl of Warwick the other, the Earl of Arundel being appointed Constable. The King being landed, divided his Army into three parts, the one to march on his left hand along the Sea-Coasts, and the other on the right, conducted by the two Marshals, and himself in the midst with the main Body of his Army. The Earl of Huntingdon, Admiral of his Fleet, was order'd to take all the Ships he could find on the Sea-Coasts. The three Armies by Land lodg'd every Night in one Field. And first he sacked Charanton, burnt and destroyed the City, and slew all the Inhabitants, as well unarm'd as arm'd, saying, 'That he made them Sacrifices to Bacon, 'Peircy, and others, (whose Heads he saw fixed 'upon the principal Gates) unjustly put to Death 'by Philip. Thence he marched forward, and took St. Loo, a rich Town for Merchandise, and plunder'd it. Then he marched to Caen, and after some Skirmishes became Master of it, and put all the Country into so great a terror, that Falaise, Lyseaux, and Honfleur, strong wall'd Towns, came and render'd themselves to him. This done, he marches into the Isle of France, to provoke the King of France to Battel, giving out, that he would wrestle with him for his Kingdom in the Eye of all France, on the great Theatre before his Capital City of Paris.

His Actions and Success in France.

King of France's Army.

King Philip in the mean time was not idle in making all possible Preparations for his own Defence, and had gather'd one of the finest Armies (as the French Historians relate) that ever was seen in France, made up of French, Lorainers, Germans, and Genoeses, which he led towards Meulan, where it was said King Edward waited for him; but upon the News of his coming retreated, or as it was reported fled for fear, tho' the Event shewed, 'twas rather out of Policy. King Philip follows him, and overtakes him at a Village called Arenes, which signifying Sand, might have told Philip on how weak a Foundation he built his hopes of Victory, when he accounted all his own, because he was at home. King Edward retired, to gain the River of Some at Blanquetaque, where it is fordable at Low-water, but the Passage was to be disputed with the Sword, King Philip having sent Gondemar de Fay with a thousand Horse, and six thousand Foot to guard it. King Edward notwithstanding resolves to pass or perish, and plunges foremost into the River, crying out, Let them that love me, follow me. At which words the whole Army boldly crowded forward, striving who should follow his brave Example the closest, and presently gained the Shoar. Gondamer astonished with this sudden and unexpected adventure, so affrighted his People with his fearful Looks, that after a short and disorderly Encounter, they all fled before the English; but the Shame was greater than the Loss, because they had a safe retreat at Abbe-ville and S. Requeir, which were hard-by. King Philip enraged with this dishonourable Victory, resolved to revenge it, and presently to provoke King Edward to Battel. His Council advised the contrary, that he should suffer his Troops to rest a few Days, and recover their Spirits, and King Edward to spend his. But their King had not Patience to stay above one Day in Abbe-ville, but being elevated with hopes of Victory, marches into the Field to bid Edward Battel. King Edward more cool and wary, managed his Business with admirable Discretion; having very strongly encamped himself at Cracy, and on all sides by Trenches and other means secured his Army, which consisted but of thirty thousand Men, but in Order and Courage double the number. The Van-guard he gave to the Prince [d], and for his Guides the Earl of Warwick, Godfrey de Harcourt, the Lords Stafford, Delaware, Bourchier, Clifford, Cobham, Holland, Sir John Chandois, Sir Bartholomew Burwash, Sir Robert Nevill, with eight hundred Men at Arms, two thousand Archers, and a thousand Welshmen. The second Battel was committed to the Earls of Arundel and Northampton, the Lords Ross, Willoughby, Basset, S. Albin, Multon, and others, which consisted of eight hundred Men at Arms, and twelve hundred Archers. The third Battel, or Rereguard, was led by the King himself, having seven hundred Men at Arms, and two thousand Archers. The Army being thus rang'd, the King on a white Hobby rod from Rank to Rank to view them all, the one Marshal on his right Hand, and the other on his left, encouraging every Man to stand for his Right and their Honour. The French King's Army was greater both in shew and strength, being above sixty thousand fighting Men well arm'd: Of which the Chief Commanders were, Charles Earl of Alanzon the King's Brother, John de Luxemburge King of Bohemia, Charles de Blois the King's Nephew, Ralph Duke of Lorrain, the Earl of Flanders, Neverse, Sancerre, and the Dolphin of Viennois. On the Night before the Battel came Ame Earl of Savoy, with a thousand Men at Arms more to assist their King, which gave him such an assurance of Victory, that he long'd for an Encounter. The Vanguard he committed to Count d'Alanzon, the King's Brother, the Rear to the Earl of Savoy, and led the main Battel himself.

His Heat would hardly permit him to hear any Counsel of what was fit to be done. The old King of Bohemia advised, that the Army should first take some repast, and that the Infantry, consisting of about fifteen hundred Genoeses, with Cross-Bows, and sure Men, should make the Front, and the Cavalry to follow, which were both agreed to and done. But the Count de Alanzon took it so ill, that the Genoeses were put in the first Rank, that in his Fury, contrary to Order, he caused them to change their Place with Disorder, and so much to the Anger and Provocation of the Soldiers, that they were more furiously bent against the Captain than the Enemy. While this was doing there fell a piercing Shower of Rain, which dissolved the Bowmen's Strings, and made them unuseful; and then soon breaking up, the Sun shone full in the Face of the French, as if Heaven had joyned with the English in this Victory. King Edward, who had posted himself on the top of a Windmill-Hill, beholding from thence the present posture of the Enemy in changing their Places, and through the accident of the Rain resolves to take the advantage of both, and instantly sends a Party to charge them, without giving them leave to settle themselves. The discouraged Genoueses immediately give Ground, which when the Count de Alanzon perceived, he comes up in great Rage with his Horse, crying out, On, on, let us make way upon the Bellies of these Genoueses, who do but hinder us; and so forced his way through the midst of them, attended with the Earls of Lorrain and Savoy, and the Dolphin of Viennois, and held on his course till he came up to the English Battel, where he found the Prince better settled, attended on all hands with Troops of Archers, whose Strings having not felt the Rain, poured such Showers of Steel upon them, as cooled their Fury, and disorder'd them. The French King seeing his Brother in great danger, makes up to disengage him; whereupon the Fight grew so hot and doubtful, that the Commanders about the Prince sent to the King to come up with all his Power to assist them. The King demands of the Messenger, Whether his Son were slain or hurt? Who answer'd, Neither, but likely to be overpower'd. Well then, said the King, Go back and tell them that sent you, That so long as my Son is alive I will heaken to nothing, whatever happens; for I would have him carry away the Honour of this Victory. And thus being left to defend themselves, they bore up with such Courage, as that they recover'd the advantage by having killed the French King's Horse under him, so that he had almost been trodden to Death, had not he been saved by the Lord John Beaumont his new Pensioner. But this Accident so encouraged the English, and disheartned the French, that the English soon gained the greatest Victory that ever the French lost, having slain upon the Place, and in the Pursuit, thirty thousand; of whom the Chief were [a] Charles d'Alanzon, John Duke of Bourbon, Ralph Earl of Lorrain, Lewis Earl of Flanders, Jaques Dauphin of Viennois, Son to Imbert, who after gave Dauphin to the Crown of France; the Earls of Sancerre, Harcourt (Brother to Godfrey) and many other Earls, Barons, and Gentlemen, to the number of fifteen hundred. The French King himself with a small Company got to Bray in the Night, where he was received with the Tears and Lamentations of his People, whom yet he sought to comfort all he could. Some few Troops, that held together, sav'd themselves by retiring to Places adjoyning. This memorable Victory happen'd upon the Saturday after S. Bartholomew's-day, being Aug. 24. 1346.

King Edward managed this Victory with as great Moderation as he won it; and first having embraced his Son, and commended the Valour he shewed that Day, [b] he rendered Thanks to God, whose Aid he had before begged at the beginning of the Battel; and early the next Morning, being Sunday, he sent out three hundred Lances, and two thousand Archers, to discover what became of the Enemy, who met great Troops of Soldiers coming from Abbe-ville, S. Requier, Roan and Beauvays, (ignorant of what had happen'd) conducted by the Archbishop of Roan, and Prior of France, whom they likwise defeated, and slew seven thousand more [c]. Our Writers also report, That so great Numbers of Stragglers, which fled from the Battel, and lost their Way in the Fog the next Morning, were slain, as equall'd the kill'd in the Field. So great a Loss did France sustain by this one fatal Battel.

King Edward's Behaviour after the Victory.

But this was not all the Victories that fell to King Edward this Year, there was another of greater Importance gotten in England by the Queen and his People over the Scots, who being set on by the French to divert the War there, entred the Kingdom with sixty thousand Men, (as our Writers report) assuring themselves of Victory, because, as they supposed, the main Strength of it was in France. But they found the contrary. For the Lords of the North, as Gilbert de Humfrivile Earl of Angos, Henry Peircy, Ralph Nevill, William Daincourt, with the Archbishop of York, Bishop of Durham, and others of the Clergy, gather'd so strong an Army, and so well order'd them by the encouragement of the Queen (who was with them in Person) as that they utterly [d] routed this great Army, took [e] King David Prisoner, with the Earls of Fife, Menteth, Murrey, and Sutherland, the Lord Douglas, the Archbishop of S. Andrews, and others, and slew 15000 Scots. This Victory happen'd likewise on a Saturday [f], and six Weeks after that of Crecy. And as if Providence had design'd to make this Year in all places Triumphant, the Aids sent to the Countess of Monfort in Britain, under the Command of Sir Thomas Daggworth, overthrew and took Prisoner Charles de Blois, the Pretender to that Dutchy, and with him Monsieur La Val, the Lords Rochford, Beaumanoyr, Loyacque, with many other Barons, Knights and Esquires, and there were slain in the Encounter the Lord De La Val, (Father of him which was taken) Viscount Roban, Monsieur De Chastean, Brian de Malestroict, De Quintin, De Direval, great Lords, besides many other worthy Warriours, Knights and Esquires, to the number of seven hundred. Thus [g] all places fell before the Sword of England.

[a] In Gi. Villani's Italian History 'tis mention'd, That the old King of Bohemia was kill'd in the Battel of Cressy. His Arms were three Ostrich Feathers, and being taken by the Prince, he afterwards us'd the same Devise, which has ever since been born by the Princes of Wales, his Successors. According to this Author, James King of Majorca was also kill'd in this Battel.

[b] He said to him, Dear Son, God give you Grace to go on as you have begun; you are my best Son, you have acquitted your self nobly, and truly deserve the Crown for which we fought. The Prince made no Reply, but bow'd down almost to the Ground.

[c] Seven thousand Men of the Inhabitants of Abbeville, St. Requier and Rouen were slain the next Day; and besides these, the Archbishop of Roan and the Grand Prior's Troops were defeated, their Leaders and most of their Men being kill'd on the Spot.

King

K. Edward beſieged Calis.

King Edward purſuing his Victory in France, marches on directly forward, and without medling with the great Cities of Amiens and Abbeville, which were near, ſets down before Calais[a], a Town of more Importance than any for England, and the Gate for all the reſt, which John de Vienne Marſhal of France, and the Lord d'Andreghen, a great Man in his time, commanded. All that Winter King Edward having ſhelter'd his People as in another Town built of Sheds, and Coverts to dwell in, furniſhed with all Proviſions, lay without any Moleſtation of the French King, who was now likewiſe beſieged with the Miſeries of his own Eſtate, which was not only his real Misfortune, but thought his Fault. The King of France was in great Neceſſity, which muſt be ſupplied from a People who groaned under the Burthen of Poverty, and were very diſcontented for the ill management of the Treaſure, the falſhood of the Financiers, the crying down of the Money, want of Trade, greatneſs of Taxes, &c. No way could be found to ſet all things to rights, but by an Aſſembly of the States, wherein all the Financiers, Receivers and Managers of Monies, are called to an account, and the Treaſure is committed to the diſpoſal of the Clergy and Nobility, to take away all ſuſpicion of ill Dealings. Pierre de Eſſars Treaſurer of France was committed to Priſon, and obliged to pay a great Fine to the King, and the other Officers and Accomptants forced to reſtore at once what they had been gathering many Years. The Banquiers, Lombards, and other Uſurers are put to the Preſs for their unlawful Exactions, their Intereſts being proved to exceed the Principal, which was confiſcated to the King, and the Intereſts given to the Debtors. Thus was the poor oppreſſed People a little ſatisfied, and the King's Neceſſities ſupplied, by which he was enabled with the ready Service of his Nobles and ableſt Subjects to get another Army into the Field the next Spring to relieve Calis, but approaching it could find no way open to attempt it, the King of England being Maſter both of the Haven, and poſſeſſed of all other ways that were paſſible; and having [b] the Flemmings his Friends, who with an huge Army had beſieged Ayre, and did much miſchief on the Confines of France, which to oppoſe while the King called John Duke of Normandy; the Prince out of Guien, Henry of Lancaſter Earl of Darby, having an Army of twelve hundred Men at Arms, two thouſand Archers, and three thouſand Foot, Engliſh and Gaſcoignes, took in moſt of the Towns of Xantonge and Poictou, beſieged and ſacked Poictiers; and ſo returns to Burdeaux with more Plunder than they could well carry. Thus the French ſuffered every where, and their King was not able to relieve them. But at length, to ſhew his Will more than Ability, he ſends to the King of England, to ſollicit him to appoint ſome place of Battel, and he would encounter him. King Edward returned him an anſwer, 'If he could make his own way 'to come thither to him, there he ſhould find 'him; but he would not leave the Place, now 'he was ready to take it, having lain ſo long 'at it with great Labour and Charge. Then two Cardinals were ſent by the Pope to mediate for a Peace, but nothing could be effected. So that the French King was forced to break up, and retire to Paris, leaving Calis to the Mercy of the Beſieger; which, when they underſtood, they ſent to deſire a Parley, had it granted, and therein received this final Sentence, 'That ſix of their 'chief Burgeſſes ſhould be ſent to the King bare-'headed and barefooted, in their Shirts, with 'Halters about their Necks, the Keys of the 'Town and Caſtle in their Hands, and ſubmit 'themſelves to the King's Will, and the reſt he 'would pardon. This Sentence being related to the miſerable Townſmen, they were in great Lamentation about the choice of this Sacrifice, who of them it ſhould be that muſt die for the reſt, till 'one among them ſtands up, and ſpake boldly to this effect: 'Fellow-Citizens, I have ſo often 'expoſed my Life in this long Siege for my Coun-'try, (and have been every Day ſo ready to die) 'that I am now moſt willing to ſacrifice my 'Life, as my laſt Oblation for it, and will cheerfully carry my Head to the victorious King 'of England, not deſiring to ſurvive the Deſtruction of my miſerable Country. This free and reſolute Speech ſo wrought upon the amazed People, that now they ſtrived who ſhould be one of the ſix, and cryed out, Let us go, let us go unto Death; it is our laſt Duty to our Native Soil. So that ſix are preſently choſen, and ſent according to the King's demand, preſenting themſelves on their Knees to the King, and beſeeching him to ſhew Mercy unto them. The King commands them inſtantly to be carry'd to their Execution, and would not in regard of his Oath be perſuaded to ſpare them by all the Intreaties and earneſt Petition of his Council, till the Queen, great with Child, fell on her Knees before him, and with Tears obtained their Pardon, and had them given her. Which done, ſhe cauſed them to be cloathed, gave them their Dinner, and ſix Nobles a Man, appointing them to be conveyed ſafely through the Army, and ſet at liberty. An Act of Mercy worthy of ſo great a Queen. The King, tho' in this he was ſevere, yet was he more ſparing of Blood than his Grandfather Edward I. and had more of Compaſſion, as he ſhewed by one Act in this Siege. When Victuals within the Town began to fail, and all unuſeful Perſons, as old Men, Women and Children [d] were put out of the Gates, he forced them not back again, as he might have done, to conſume their Store, but ſuffered them to paſs through his Army, gave them Victuals, and two Pence a-piece to every one. And thus was the ſtrong Tower of Calis gotten, Aug. 3. 1347. after almoſt a Year's Siege, with infinite Coſt and Labour. All the Inhabitants were turn'd out of it, being forced to ſeek new Dwellings, and a Colony of Engliſh placed in it; and ſo it remained in the poſſeſſion of the Crown of England two hundred and ten Years. And now this Triumphant King having made a Truce for ſome few Months, and taken care to ſecure what he had gotten, goes over with his Queen, Prince, and many of his People into England, to ſpend ſome time in Feaſts and Triumphs, carrying over ſuch abundance of Spoils, that every Houſe almoſt had ſome part, and the Engliſh Wives are grown extreamly fine with French Ornaments. And to add to this Glory, the Princes Electors of Germany ſend in the midſt of this Jollity to the King, to ſignifie that they had choſen him King of the Romans [c]; but he refuſes the Office, tho' it was of great Dignity, becauſe it was out of his way, and would be burthenſome to him to ma-manage[a]. But before the end of this Year England's Mirth was turn'd into bitter Mourning, by the invisible Sword of Heaven. A contageous Pestilence, which first beginning in the East and South parts of the World, spread into all parts of Christendom, and raged so violently in England, that it is said to have destroyed more than half of its Inhabitants, so that the Church-Yards were not large enough to bury the Dead, but they were forced to purchase new Ground for that purpose. In London there died in six Months 57374 Persons, and other Cities and Towns suffered as deeply, according to their proportion. This Plague was attended with as mortal a Famine, Murrain of Cattel, and Barrenness of the Ground, caused through the Contagion of the Air, and want of Husbandry.

But all the former Calamities did only cause a short Cessation of Arms between the two Princes, not deter them from prosecuting their Quarrel; Edward's Kingdom was not so emptied, but he made a shift to keep his Fields and Troops full. The first Action after it was his Passage over to Calis, upon an Information of a Plot contrived by the French to surprize the Town after this manner: Monsieur de Charny[b] Governour of St. Omers had treated with Americ de Pavia, whom King Edward had left Governour of the Castle of Calis, and promised him twenty thousand Crowns to be admitted into the Castle. Americ accepts the Offer, and appoints a Night for the Business; in which Night King Edward, being inform'd by Americ, arrives with three hundred Men at Arms, and six hundred Archers. Monsieur Charny sets out likewise the same Night from S. Omers with his Forces, and sent a hundred Men armed before with the Crowns to Americ to possess themselves of the Castle. The Men accordingly were let in at the Postern-Gate, the Crowns received, and themselves put in hold; which done, the Gates of the Town are opened, and the King marches out first to encounter Monsieur de Charny, coming on with his Forces, who perceived himself betray'd, and therefore put his People into the best posture of defence he could. The King of England, because he would not be known to be there in Person, put himself and the Prince under the Colours of the Lord Walter Manny, and then fell to a sharp Engagement with them, in which he was twice beaten down on his Knees by Mongeur de Rihoumont, a strong and valiant Knight (with whom he fought hand to hand) but recovered himself, and in the end took Rihoumont Prisoner. Charny was also taken, and all his Forces defeated. King Edward the Night after (which was New-Years-Night) feasted with the Prisoners, and gave Rihoumont in honour of his Valour a rich Chaplet of Pearl (which he wore himself) for a New-Years-Gift, forgave him his Ransom, and set him at liberty. The rest paid dearly for what they got not, and were warned how they deal again in the same kind[c]. Yet the English not long after had better success by the same Arts, and got the Castle of Guisnes (a place of great Importance near Calis) for a Sum of Money given to one Beauconroy a Frenchman; of which Castle, when the French King demanded Restitution, in Consideration of the Truce, King Edward returns answer, That for things bought and sold between their People, there was no Exception in the Truce; and so held it.

A. D. 1350. Reg. 24.

Shortly after this, the French King, in whose Fate it was not to see better Fortunes, dy'd, and left his distressed Kingdom to his Son John, who endured far worse Calamities. For in his and the two following Reigns, the English became such powerful Masters of France, that they turned all into Blood and Confusion, and might have been absolute Masters of it, had not their Civil Dissentions among themselves given France time and leave to recover its Liberty and Strength. King Edward the next Year went again in Person with his Fleet to Sea, to encounter certain Spanish Ships passing from Flanders, loaden with Cloth and other Commodities, which after a sharp Fight, and much Blood shed on both sides, he took, with their Cargo of rich Goods. And this he did, because the Spaniards the Year before had entred the River Gironne, and taken certain English Ships laden with Wines, and slew all the English. In the mean time, the King's Forces in Guien were not idle, but there were many Conflicts between the French and them. In Britain also the War continu'd, and was hotly maintain'd between the two Ladies, the Widow of Monfort, and the Wife of Charles de Blois (who was a Prisoner in England.) Divers Propositions of Peace had been made by the Pope's Legates, and Commissioners had often met, to the great Expence of both Kings, but nothing was concluded; and so temporary Truces were set on foot to gain time. These Delays not only consumed our Men, but Treasure, for the War was not able to maintain it self, tho' invasive. The Money was here alter'd, and abated in Weight, and yet made to pass according to the former Value. And whereas before there were no other pieces of Money, but Nobles, and half Nobles, with small pieces of Silver called Sterlings; the King caused Groats and Two-pences of equal Value with the Sterling-money to be coined, which raised the Prices of Commodities, that usually rise or fall, according to the plenty or scarcity of Money, made Servants and Labourers to raise their Wages. Whereupon a Statute was made in the Parliament now held at Westminster, to reduce the same to the usual Rates given before the late great Mortality. This caused much discontent among them, especially against William Edington Bishop of Winchester, the King's Treasurer, who was thought the Adviser of the Abatement of the Coin. In this[d] Parliament also were several Orders made for the governing and ordering the Staple, because the King being displeased with the People of Flanders for disappointing him of the Match between his Daughter and their young Earl Lewis (who was escaped into France, and marry'd to the Duke of Brabant's Daughter) had removed the Mart, or Staple of Wools from their Towns, which were greatly enriched thereby, and caused it to be kept at Westminster, Chichester, Canterbury, Lincoln, Warwick, York, Newcastle, Exeter, Carmarden, Bristol and Hull, judging it more convenient to enrich his own Towns, than Strangers, by the Commodities of his Kingdom. An Act also was made in this Parliament, that all Wears, Mills, and other Stoppages of Rivers, which hin[d] Besides the following Acts made this Parliament, there was also an Act made, forbidding, that any Persons should bring any Bull, or Instruments from Rome into the Realm, or carry any Process thither, to the prejudice of the King's Subjects, under pain of incurring a Premunire, i. e. being put out of the King's Protection, and forfeiting their Lives, Bodies, Goods and Chattels. *Stat. dred the Passages of Lighters, Boats, and other Vessels up and down the Country, should be removed. An Act very advantagious to the Kingdom, but through Bribing and Corruptions of great Men, it took no effect. So that that Age had only the Honour of making so good an Ordinance. It is said also, that another Act was made this Parliament at the earnest Request of the Londoners, that no common Whore should wear any Hood, except striped with divers Colours or Furs, and their Garments reversed, the wrong side outward; a good design to make so foul a Sin become infamous, and at length odious.

After this Parliament, Henry Earl of Darby is created Duke of Lancaster[a], and Ralph Lord Stafford Earl of Stafford, and Charles de Blois, who had been a Prisoner long in England, was released for forty thousand Florins, and permitted to return into Britain to provide the same. Great Mediation was made by the Pope to reconcile the two Kings, and Commissioners met to conclude a Peace. Articles were propounded, of which the Chief was, viz. 'That the King of England 'should hold all the Lands of the Dutchy of 'Aquitain without Homage, and quit his Title 'to the rest of France, but the French would not 'yield to it, (tho' after they were forced to accept of the same Article at the Treaty of Britigny.) Whereupon the King of England being incensed, would not hear of any farther Prorogation of the Truce, tho' much urged to it by two Cardinals sent on purpose from Avignion by Pope Clement VI. and prepares a-fresh for the War. And first the Prince of Wales grown now a Man, is appointed by Parliament to go into Gascoigne, with a thousand Men at Arms, two thousand Archers, and a great number of Welshmen; and in June following sets out with three hundred Sail of Ships, attended with the Earls of Warwick, Suffolk, Salisbury, and Oxford, the Lords Chandois, and James Audley, Sir Robert Knolles, [b] Sir Frank de Hall, and many others.

1353. About Michaelmas following the King himself went over to Callis with another Army, taking with him his two Sons, Lionel of Antwerp, now Earl of Ulster, in right of his Wife Elizabeth, Daughter and Heir to William Burgh, and John of Gaunt Earl of Richmond. There met him at Callis a thousand Men at Arms out of Germany, Flanders and Brabant, which he had hired, so that his Army consisted of three thousand Men at Arms, and two thousand Archers on Horseback, besides Archers a-foot. The City of London sent him three hundred Men at Arms, and five hundred Archers, all in one Livery, at their own Charge. But with all this great Force he could effect nothing, because the French King would not be drawn to engage him, in regard he was too powerful, and his People under discontents; but he so removed all Provisions out of his way, that the King of England was forced to return. The Disturbances of France arose at this time from Charles King of Navarr, who had marry'd Jane the French King's Daughter, a Prince of an active Spirit, subtil and proud, by reason of his great Estate and high Blood, being the Son of Lewis Count D'Eureux, and Jane Daughter to King Lewis Huttin, who was disinherited of the Crown of France by Philip the Long her Uncle, by the Salick Law, but preferr'd by him to be Queen of Navarr, in whose Right this Charles her Son had the Title of that Kingdom, and other great Inheritances with it. But he not being content with them, coveted also the Countries of Champagne and Bry, which belong'd to his Mother by the same Right as the Kingdom of Navarr did; and taking himself wrong'd, enter'd into violent Courses; but not daring to complain directly of the King, he falls upon the Constable of France, as the Chief of his Council, and one of whom he was most jealous, in regard of the King's Favour to him, and in the end caused him to be murther'd in his Bed at L'Aigle in Normandy, rushing himself up into his Chamber, with his Brother Philip of Navarr, two of the Harcourts, and divers others of his Retinue; and then flying to his City of Eureux, justifies the Act to be lawful. The French King, tho' much displeased at the cruel Fact, yet was forced not to resent it, and promises the King of Navarr, if he would come and crave his Pardon, he should have it. Upon this he appears at Paris before the Council to give a Reason of the Fact, is condemned as guilty of Treason, (notwithstanding the King's Promise) and committed to Prison, and could be hardly released at the Request of three Queens, viz. his Mother, Sister and Wife. Being dismissed, he goes presently in his Passion and offers his Service to the King of England (who knew well enough how to make use of such a powerful Member) and withal surprizes several pieces in Normandy, endeavouring all he could to draw the Affections of the People from their King, when he had most need. These Injuries the French King for a while dissembles, till he could find some advantage against him, which at length fell out thus. Charles his eldest Son being lately invested in the Dutchy of Normandy, was visited by all the great Men of the Country, among whom came the King of Navarr, and is Royally feasted at Roan. The French King having notice of it at Paris, sets out with a Body of Men, takes him at Dinner with his Son, and without any process of Law causes four of the Chief that massacred the Constable to be presently executed, of which the two Harcourts were part, and sends the King of Navarr under a strong Guard to Arras, and his chief Servants to other Prisons. This sudden Execution enraged the Friends of Navarr, and especially Philip his Brother, who with Jeffrey Harcourt the Uncle of the executed Brethren, posted over into England, exclaiming against this barbarous Murther, begging aid of King Edward in revenging so notorious an Injustice, and offering him their Hearts, Goods, Towns and Havens to let him into Normandy, which the King was not backward to accept and entertain.

Soon after this Parliament broke up, the King, as hardy as courageous, went with his Army to recover Berwick, tho' it was then Winter, which had been of late

Reg. 29. surprized by the Scots, and not only recovered the Town, but had the whole Kingdom resigned to him by [a] Robert Baliol King of Scots, who had indeed the best Title to that Honour, but had not so good an Interest as his Competitor King Alexander [b] (then a Prisoner in England) who had a very powerful Party there, yet both of them were Kings to their own sides, to the great Distraction of the Kingdom [c]. So that all the neighbouring Nations were in great Troubles, but England, which flourished with Victories and Triumphs. While the King was busied at home, the Prince of Wales enters Guien, passes over Languedoc to Tholouse, Narbonne and Burges, without any opposition, destroying and spoiling the Country where he went; and being loaden with spoil, returns to Burdeaux. The French King being thus assaulted on all hands, gathers together all the Force he could, and first goes against his Enemy in Normandy, and recover'd many of his lost Towns, and might have prevailed there, had not the Prince of Wales, who was got abroad again, and had invaded Tureine, obliged him to carry his Army from thence to oppose him, and stop his Course; to which end he marched towards him with his whole Army, causing all the Towns and Passages upon the River Loyr to be strongly guarded. The Prince knowing himself too weak to encounter so great Forces as the French King was bringing up against him, retreats again through Tureine and Poictou towards Burdeaux, but was pursued by the French, who within two Leagues of Poictiers had him at an advantage. At this Instant came two Cardinals [d] from the Pope to mediate a Peace between them, and prevailed so far upon the Prince, that he was contented to restore to the French King what he had gained upon him, but without prejudice to his Honour, in which he said, He stood accountable to his Father and his Country. But the French King supposing that he now had his Enemy at his Mercy, would accept of no other Conditions, but that the Prince should deliver him four Hostages, and surrender up himself and Army into his Hands, to be used according to his Discretion, otherwise (notwithstanding the Legate's Persuasions to milder terms) he would immediately set upon the Prince with his Army (which was six to one [e].) The Prince being reduced to these Straights, that he must yield either to dishonourable terms, or fight immediately, prepares for a Battel, taking what advantage he could of the Ground, and providently getting the benefit of the Vines, Shrubs and Bushes on that side, where he was likely to be assaulted most furiously by the French Horse. The Success answered the Prince's Expectation; for the French Cavalry, to whom the French King designed to give the Honour of the Victory, with some discontent to the rest, being upon their first assault entangled among the Vines, were so disorder'd and gall'd by the English Archers, without harm or danger to themselves, that they were forced to give ground, and the whole Army was by that means conquer'd, and the Prince, who must have been ruined by delay, purchased so memorable a Victory, as was never before attained by the English with so few hands. For the French King [f] himself and youngest Son Philip (who valiantly defended his Father, when his other two Brothers had forsaken him, for which afterward he had the Title of Hardy, and Dukedom of Burgogne given him) were taken Prisoners, and with them Jaques de Bourbon, Count de Pontbieu, the Archbishop of Sens, John d'Artoys, Count D'Eu, Charles de Artoys, his Brother Count de Longueville, Charles Count de Tancarvile, the Counts of Vendosme, Salbourge, Dampmartin, and La Roche, with many other eminent Lords, besides two thousand Knights, Esquires, and Gentlemen; which the Conquerors holding to be [g] too great a Number to be kept Prisoners, released many of them. The French, who best knew their own Losses, relate, that there were slain in this Battel seventeen hundred Gentlemen, among whom were fifty two Bannorets, and many of the Nobility, as Peter de Bourbon, the Duke D'Athens Constable of France, Jan de Clermont Marshal, Jeffrey de Charny, High Chamberlain. Three of the French King's Sons escaped (for they were all in the Battel) viz. Charles the Dauphin, who was the first so entitled, Lewis afterward Duke of Anjou, and John Duke of Berry, all of them Men of great Action in the following times. This Blow might seem to have given France a compleat overthrow, and subdu'd it entirely to the Crown of England; but that it was a Body of so many strong Limbs, and so great extent, that it is almost impossible to weaken it so much, but that it will recover at length again, as it did soon after. The Prince of Wales in this Battel gained a double Victory, the one by his Sword, and the other by his Courtesie; for he visited the Captive King with all the Reverence and Respect due to his Majesty, comforted him by the Examples of like Fortunes in War, and assured him of all fair Treatment, according to his Dignity. The Chief Nobles, who attended the Prince in this Action, were the Earls of Warwick, Suffolk, Salisbury, Oxford, and Stafford, the Lords Cobham, Spencer, Barkley, and Basset, and of Gascoigne, Le Capital de Beufe, the Lords Pamier, Chaumont, and others. But the most remarkable Instance of Honour and Valour was the Lord James Audley, who having vowed to be the foremost of the Battel, performed his Word, and confirmed it with many Wounds, for which the Prince having rewarded him with five hundred Marks per Annum, Fee-simple in England, he presently gave it to four of his Esquires, who had underwent the same Dangers with him. The Prince knowing it, asked him, Whether he did not accept his Gift? He answer'd, Yea; but those Men had deserved it as well as himself, and had more need of it. The Prince was pleased at this Reply, and gave him five hundred Marks more, as if he resolv'd, that so much Worth should not go [h] unrewarded.

All things being carefully settled and accommodated by the Prince after the Battel, he retir'd with his Prisoners first to Burdeaux, and shortly after he passes with great Glory into England, land [a]; now the Theatre of Triumphs: The French King was lodg'd at the Savoy, then a noble Palace of Henry Duke of Lancaster's. Many Prisoners upon reasonable Ransome, and not a few upon the French King's Word (who undertook for them) were releas'd and sent home honourably. David King of Scots, who had been a Prisoner eleven Years in England, was at the earnest Solicitation of his Queen Joan, King Edward's Sister, releas'd; upon an Obligation to pay him an hundred thousand Marks Striveling [b] in ten Years: The Security the King had of France, was a means to grant this Prince his Liberty. The French King remained a Prisoner in England four Years, in which time many Overtures and great Offers were made for his deliverance, but nothing effected. Charles the Dauphin, a very prudent Prince, who manag'd the Kingdom in his Father's Captivity, endeavour'd all he could to procure a Contribution of his factious People to ransome his Father, but could not prevail. A Parliament was at length called to consult about it, and the Dauphin very gravely propounded to them the necessity of recovering and redeeming their King, in order to the Safety of the Kingdom; but after many Meetings of the Committee of fifty, to whom it was referred to avoid Confusion, there was a Resolution produced to the Dauphin, much different from what he expected: For instead of an Aid and Contribution, they require a Reformation of the State; and first the Bishop of Laon, who was chosen their Speaker, besought him to keep secret whatsoever should be spoken to him by the States. The young Prince answers, That it was derogatory to his Station in the Kingdom to receive Rules and Laws by his Father's Subjects, and thereupon commanded them upon their Allegiance, to speak their Intentions. The Bishop then complains of the ill Management of the publick Revenues, demands a speedy Redress, and that Commissioners should be appointed to call all Persons answerable to an Account. 'That all 'the present Managers of the Treasury should 'be displaced; That the Moneys and all Affairs 'of State should be manag'd henceforth by four 'Bishops and twelve Burgesses, of which those 'of the City of Paris should be the Chief, and 'that without this Council the Dauphin should 'do nothing; and in Conclusion, they require, 'That the King of Navarre should be set at Li'berty: Which things, if he would cause to be 'granted, they would give any reasonable Tax 'for Redemption of their King. To these Demands the Prince desired time to give an Answer [c], thinking by delays to separate and disunite their Councils; but the Deputies at length grew cold, and so nothing was done at that Meeting, save that it so much infected the Subjects, and especially the People of Paris, that they demanded to have the King of Navarre deliver'd immediately according to the Decrees of the Deputies; and at length so prevailed with Pinguigny, the Governour of Artoys, who had the keeping of him, that he was releas'd after nineteen Months Imprisonment, comes to Paris accompany'd with a stately Train, and so much Confidence, as if he would shew that he intended to revenge himself, and was receiv'd with universal Joy of the Citizens; to whom he declares with great Eloquence, what Wrongs he had receiv'd, and intimated, that he hada Title to their Crown, and so put that City into such a Combustion, that the Redemption of the King was quite laid aside, and the Prince was forc'd by an Act of Abolition to pardon the King of Navarre, and all his Complices for all former Offences to pacifie them. The Prince seeing the Perverseness of the Parisians, went to other Cities and Provinces to sollicit for Moneys towards the Redemption of his Father, leaving his Brother Philip Duke of Orleance at Paris to keep them in the best Order he could, in his Absence. The Province of Languedoc is highly commended in the French Histories for the first who made the largest Offers to purchase their King's Liberty, in the Assembly of the three States at Thoulouse, promising in it to their Governour the Count D'Armiiacque not only to contribute their Revenues, and moveables, but to sell their Wives Jewels to raise a sufficient Sum for it; and to testifie their Sorrow for their King's Misfortunes, they order'd, That no costly Cloaths, Feasting, Plays, or other Pastimes, should be us'd in their Province, during the time of their King's Captivity. Champaign follow'd this Example; but nothing could prevail with the People of Paris to give any thing. The King of Navarre had won them not only from their Obedience, but taught them to put off all Humanity, and put them into such Flames of Rebellion, that when the Dauphin return'd to the City, the Provost of Merchants beset his House with three thousand Artificers in Arms, and rushing up into the Prince's Chamber with some of his Company, slew Jan de Constans and Robert de Clermont, in his Presence, because, as he pretended, they being his chief Counsellors, had given him bad Advice; takes off the Prince's Hat from his Head, and having put on himself his own as the City Livery, went out to the Throng, and caused the Bodies of these two Noblemen to be drawn along the Streets, that the Rabble might applaud the Murther. Then the Provost writes in the Name of the whole City to all the great Towns to joyn with them, and take their Livery, as the Prince had done for the Reformation of the State; and in the mean time, they composed a Council among themselves, of which the Bishop of Laon was President: And the Provost, with some of the University chief Heads, assuming a Sovereign Power to order all Affairs of State as a Commonwealth. In so great a confusion was the Kingdom without an Head, and so ready to shake off all Regal Authority and Power.

The rest of the great Towns refusing also with much Disdain to joyn with the City of Paris, offer him their Aid: So that he was much encourag'd, and likely to have effected his Desires in a short time, had not the King of Navarre, who sought his Destruction, raised new Troubles in the State, and taken Arms against him; by which means not only he was much hinder'd in his Designs, and the Malecontents of the Nation encourag'd to disturb the Peace (for the Peasants, who had been undone by the Soldiers, and miserably plunder'd by their Lords, armed themselves in the Country of Beauvasis, and reveng'd themselves upon the Gentry and such as had done them wrong, spoiling and burning their Houses, killing their Wives and Children in a barbarous manner, and Troops of disbanded Soldiers, who had nothing to subsist of, joyned together in Companies, and ravag'd the Kingdom) but also hinder'd the Redemption of their King; so that King Edward, who longed to fill his Treasure with a large Price for his Ransome, began not only to exact Homage of the Captive King for his Kingdom of France, but resolved to make an end of this Work with the Sword, and take Possession of the Kingdom of France by Force [a], which the Captive King would not resign to him. Wherefore he passes over into France with eleven hundred Sail, and lands at Callis with a mighty Army [b], which he divided into three parts, committing one to the Conduct of the Prince of Wales, another to the Duke of Lancaster, and the third he leads himself: And first he marches to the City of Arras, which he took within three Days, thence into Champaign, where the Cities of Sens and Nevers are surrender'd to him. The Dutchy of Burgogne being terrify'd with these Examples, redeem'd it from Spoil, by paying to the King two hundred thousand Florins of Gold [c]. Being furnished with this Treasure, King Edward marches up to Paris, where the Dauphin (who having lately overcome the Faction, and executed the principal Mutiners, was created Regent) had posted himself with a considerable Body of Men, who in the common Danger flocked together to defend their Country, and would not (by the Example of his Father and Grandfather) be drawn out to hazard them, but only stood upon his Defence; which the King of England seeing, after many Provocations, he raised the Siege and [d] returned into Britain to refresh his Army. In the mean time, the Regent lays in great store of Victuals, and provides that he might have enough to maintain his Soldiers without oppressing the Inhabitants, and with extream Diligence so fortify'd the City, that King Edward returning with all his fresh Power, was not able to do any thing against him, as he expected; and so the City, that so lately was like to have endanger'd the whole Kingdom, was now the only means to save it. From Paris therefore King Edward goes with his Army towards Chartres with a Design to besiege that City; but in the way he was so affrighted with a terrible Storm of Hail, Thunder and Lightning, which fell upon his Army, that he vow'd he wou'd make Peace with the French King upon any reasonable Conditions, as he shortly after did at the Treaty of Britigny near Chartres upon these Articles, viz. 'That the Country of Poitou, the Fiefs of Thouars and Belleville, the 'Countries of Gascoigne, Agenois, Perigort, Limosin, Cabors, Torbe, Bigorres, Rovergne, Angoulesm in Soveraignty, with the Homages of the 'Lords within those Territories; Monstruel on 'the Sea, Pontbieu, Callis, Guines, La Merke, 'Sangote, Boulogne, Hames, Vales, and Onis, 'should be under the Command of the King of 'England; That King John should pay for his 'Ransom three Millions of [e] Scutes of Gold, of 'which six hundred thousand to be presently 'paid in hand, four hundred thousand the Year 'following, and the remaining part in the two 'next Years upon reasonable demand: And in 'Consideration of the former Grants, the King of 'England, and his Son the Prince of Wales as 'well for themselves as their Successors, for ever 'should renounce all the Right which they pre-tended to the Crown of France, the Dutchy of 'Normandy, the Countries of Tourin, Anjou and 'Main, the Soveraignty and Homage of the 'Dutchy of Britain, and the Earldom of Flanders; and within three Weeks King John should 'be carry'd to Callis, and set on Land at the 'King of England's Charge, except the Expences 'of his House. And for the sure Performance of these Articles on the King of France's part, the King of England was to have these Hostages deliver'd to him, Lewis Duke of Anjou, John Duke of Berry (his Son) Philip Duke of Orleance his Brother, John Duke of Burgogne, the Counts of Bloys, Alenzon, *S. The Scots also were not to be aided by the French King, nor Flemmings by the English: Charles King of Navarre, and his Brother Philip were likewise comprehended in these Articles, &c. This Agreement of Peace enter'd into by both Kings, was ratified by their two eldest Sons Charles and Edward, and sworn to by the Nobility of both Kingdoms. The Hostages were thereupon deliver'd to King Edward; who departing from Honfleur, brought them over into England, leaving the Earl of Warwick in France to compleat the Peace [f]. King John is honourably attended to Callis, ready to be deliver'd at the Payment of the first part of his Ransom, which to raise the City of Paris, pays one thousand Royals, and by their Example other Cities contributed their Proportions: And so King John was again set at Liberty [h] after having remain'd about five Years a Prisoner in England, the two King's parting from each other with all outward Demonstrations of Brotherly Love.

Lancaſter. And ſhortly after, by the like Diſpenſation, the Prince of Wales marries the Counteſs of Kent [a], the Daughter of Edmund, Brother to Edward II. The King upon this Marriage gives to the Prince of Wales the Dutchy of Aquitain, reſerving to himſelf [b] Homage and Fealty; and ſhortly after ſent him over with his Wife and Retinue to keep his Court there. His Son Lionel Earl of Ulſter is ſent into Ireland with an Army of fifteen hundred Men, to guard his Earldom againſt the Iriſh, and was created Duke of Clarence in the next Parliament held at Weſtminſter in November, and continued till the Feaſt of S. Brice, his Birth-day, and fiftieth Year of his Age. This Day, that he might render remarkable to his People, and make it a Jubilee, he ſhewed himſelf exceeding Gracious to the Nation, freely pardoning many Offenders, releaſing Priſoners, recalling baniſh'd Perſons, [c] &c. And upon a Petition of the Commons order'd, that all Pleadings, which before were in French, ſhould be made in Engliſh, that the Subjects might underſtand the Law, by which he holds what he hath, and is to know what he doth. An excellent Act, and worthy of ſo great a Prince; but he had deſerved greater Honour, if he could have freed it from thoſe Difficulties and Myſteries, which render it a greater Affliction to the People than a Remedy. In it alſo was made a Statute for Purveyors (as there had been many before) enacting, That no Proviſions for the King's Court ſhould be taken up, but for ready Money, under a ſevere Puniſhment. For which Eaſements the Parliament granted him 26 s. upon every Sack of Wool tranſported for three Years. And ſo both People and Prince were generally pleaſed, ſaving that ſome particular Men look'd upon themſelves aggrieved by removing the Staple from England to Calis, on purpoſe to enrich that Town of his own acquiring, which might make it to be born withal. And as this greateſt of Engliſh Princes was careful to enlarge his Dominions, and make his People Great abroad, ſo alſo to reform their Vices, and make them Good at home. And to this end, in the next Parliament held at Weſtminſter, Anno Regn. 37. he cauſed to be enacted certain ſumptuary Laws to prevent all Exceſs both in Apparel and Dyet, appointing every degree of Men, from the Shepherd to the Prince, what Habits and Stuffs they ſhould wear, prohibiting all Ornaments of Gold and Silver, Silks, and rich Furs to all, except Perſons of Quality; by which foreign Superfluities were excluded from the Nation, and our own Manufacture only uſed. The Labourer and Huſbandman appointed but one Meal a day, and what Meats they ſhould eat, &c. By which means Gluttony and Drunkenneſs, thoſe Vices which have enfeebled the Nation ſince, were totally baniſhed. So careful was this wiſe and frugal King to preſerve his Subject's Eſtates from exceſs. And as provident was he for the ordering and ſecuring of his own Treaſure, committing the Cuſtody of it to Conſcience and Religion. For by a Certificate ſent to Pope Urban, Anno Regn. 39. concerning Pluralities, and the Eſtates of the Churchmen in England, there were more Clergymen in Office about the King, than about any Prince in Chriſtendom beſide. For firſt Simon Langham Archbiſhop of Canterbury was Chancellor of England; William Wickham Archdeacon of Lincoln, keeper of the Privy-Seal; David Weller Parſon of Sommerſham, Maſter of the Rolls; ten Beneficed Prieſts, Civilians, Maſters of Chancery; William Mulſe Dean of S. Martin le Grand, Chief Chamberlain of the Exchequer, Receiver and Keeper of the King's Treaſure and Jewels; William Aſhby Archdeacon of Northampton, Chancellor of the Exchequer; William Dighton Prebendary of St. Martin's, Clark of the Privy-Seal; Richard Cheſterfield Prebendary of St. Stephen's, Treaſurer of the King's Houſe; Henry Snatch Parſon of Oundle, Maſter of the King's Wardrobe; John Newnham Parſon of Fenni-Stanton, one of the Chamberlains of the Exchequer, and Keeper of the Treaſury and Jewels; John Rowſby Parſon of Harwich, Surveyer and Controuler of the King's Works; Thomas Brittingham Parſon of Aſhby, Treaſurer to the King for the Parts of Guiſnes, and Marches of Calis; John Troys Treaſurer of Ireland, a Prieſt, and beneficed there. Theſe Men, who were deſtitute of Feminine Allurements to Expence and Pomp, and devoted to pious Thriftineſs, were thought the fitteſt to be truſted with his Riches by this wiſe King.

King Edward's Care to preſerve Treaſure, and his Confidence in the Clergy.

Shortly after this [d] three Kings came to viſit the King of England, the King of France, King of Scots, and King of Cyprus. The occaſion of the French King's coming was chiefly to free ſome Hoſtages [e] that remained here, and to clear himſelf of the Imputations laid to him, for not obſerving the late Peace in all points; wherewith his Nobles were much diſcontented, and many Conteſts roſe about it; ſo that in an Aſſembly of the States at Paris, certain Lords, whoſe Homages by the Treaty were due to the King of England, proteſted againſt it, alledging, 'That the King 'could not diſpoſe of the Sovereignty of his 'Kingdom, nor alienate his Demeſne, and there'fore they would not ſubmit to it. Nevertheleſs the French King, leſt King Edward ſhould look upon it as Contrivance between the King and his Subjects, publiſhed his Edict to command the Obſervation of the Treaty, and certified the King of England of it. Beſides, he had reſolved upon an Expedition to the Holy War, and deſired to ſettle all things at Peace at home before his going. And theſe were the Occaſions of his coming, and not his Love to the Counteſs of Saliſbury [f], as was imagined by ſome. But howſoever it was, this King ſhewed a ſtrange Inclination to return to his Gaol, where he had endured ſo much Affliction, and where ſhortly after his coming he ended his Life [g], much lamented of the King of England, who ſolemnly attended his Corps to Dover, from whence it was conveyed to S. Denis, and there entomb'd with his Anceſtors. The Debate for the Dutchy of Britain was about this time ended by the Death of Charles de Bloys, who was ſlain in a Battel near Vannes by John de Monfort, and the Engliſh Forces commanded by the Lord Latimer, Sir John Chandois, and Sir Hugh Caverley. John de Monfort marries Mary the Daughter of King Edward, and by his Conſent did Homage for that Dutchy to Charles now

A. D. 1364. Reg. 38. King of France, compounding with the Widow of Charles de Bloys for a Sum of Money, and ſome Eſtate in Land. And now Peace began to flouriſh, which is unwelcome to none but Soldiers, of which many, whom the War had bred, and Peace would not maintain, getting into ſtrong Bodies in France, did much miſchief, till a new Employment was found for them in the Spaniſh Wars, which happen'd ſoon after. A Company of them paſſed over into Italy under the Conduct of Sir John Haucut [a] a great Warriour, who found ſuch Entertainment among the Princes there for the Reſtoration of military Diſcipline among them, and ſuch Honour and Eſtate by his Valour, that his Fame remains to this Day, and his Statue (tho' he was but Tayler) is there ſet among their Princes, moſt memorable for Virtue and Actions. So able was England at that time to furniſh the World with great Commanders.

Sir John Haucut famous in Italy, and by them call'd Johannes de Acuto.

1366. And now is this mighty King come to the fortieth Year of his Reign, which if it had been the laſt, he had dy'd the moſt glorious Prince of the World, having always hitherto had Fortune his Friend; but after this he ſuffer'd a Declination in his Glory, and his Age and Frailties brought ſome Blemiſhes upon his Actions. Charles V. King of France, ſurnam'd the Wiſe, having learned, by the Sufferings of his Father and himſelf, to manage a Crown before he had one, by his prudent Government got great advantages of him, and by the Advice of a wiſe Council, and good Conduct of his Wars by Gueſelin, a Britain, choſen Conſtable of France, recovered his Eſtate and Power.

Charles K. of France gains much from the K. of England.

1367. The Prince of Wales remaining in the Dutchy of Aquitain, with a great Court, and many military Attendants, which had no Employment, was ſollicited by Peter King of Caſtile [b], whom his Baſtard-Brother Henry had driven from his Kingdom to aſſiſt him in recovering it; which the Prince, having obtained his Father's Conſent, and being allured to, by the large Promiſes of Requital made by the ſaid Peter, undertakes. The Cauſe was much better than the Perſon. For this Peter, Son to Alphonſus II. King of Caſtile, was become intolerable to his Subjects, by his many tyrannical Cruelties acted upon them, oppreſſing and deſtroying his Nobles to enrich himſelf, and after murthering his Wife (who was the Duke of Bourbon's Daughter, and Siſter to the preſent Queen of France) by the Inſtigation of his Concubine Maria de Padilla, whom he after marry'd. Theſe Actions of his ſo incenſed his People, that they adhering to his Baſtard-Brother Henry, a more virtuous Prince, crown'd him King of Spain at Bargos, and forced Peter to fly his Kingdom. Peter being thus rejected of his People, and expelled his own Dominions, fled to the Prince of Wales, and obtained of him ſo much, that he went with an Army of thirty thouſand, attended by his Brother John Duke of Lancaſter, and many other Engliſh Lords, to re-inveſt him in his Kingdom. Henry had to ſupport his Poſſeſſion the French, under the Command of Gueſelin Conſtable, and Dandreben [c] Marſhal of France, beſides ſo many Caſtilians, Chriſtians and Sarazens, as made him up an Army of near an hundred thouſand Men. Upon the Confines of Caſtile theſe Princes and their Armies came to a Battel [d], and the Prince had the Victory, Henry being put to flight, the French Captains taken Priſoners, and Peter placed upon his Throne again at Burgos. The Work being done, the Prince required the promiſed Reward, but Peter could not, nor would provide it; but having tired him with Delays, forced him at laſt to return to Burdeaux, without Money to pay his Army, and which was worſt, without Health, which he never after recovered. This Succeſs proved not fortunate to either. Peter, an ungrateful Tyrant, enjoy'd not his Right long, but was ſoon after diſpoſſeſſed again, taken and put to Death. The Prince of Wales returning out of Spain without Reward, was forced to find out ways to content his Soldiers, who wanted their Pay; and impoſed a new Tax upon the Gaſcoignes, of Feuage, or Chimney-money; which ſo diſcontented the People, that they exclaimed againſt the Government of the Engliſh, and appealed to the King and Court of France for Redreſs. The King of France, at the earneſt requeſt of the great Lords, and others, who by the late Treaty were obliged to hold of the Crown of England, ſends a Gentleman to the Prince of Wales at Burdeaux, to ſummon him to anſwer to their Complaints before him and his Court at Paris [e]. At the ſame time alſo the Lords Arminiacq; D'Albert, Peregort, Cominges, and many others, made their Proteſtations againſt the King of England, in behalf of the Crown of France, 'which, ſaid they, they were by Nature 'to obey, and not a ſtrange Prince; That it was 'againſt the Fundamental Laws of the Kingdom 'to ſeparate them from the Crown; That the 'Contract was made in Priſon, and therefore 'conſtrained, and ſo not to be obſerved by the 'Right of Nations. So that they were reſolved to ſpend their Lives and Eſtates, rather than be under the Government of England. And by their Example the Cities of the County of Ponthieu ſubmitted themſelves to Guy Count de S. Poll, and Guy de Chaſtillon. The King of England diſpleaſed with this Breach of the Treaty, complains to the Pope, and the Emperor Charles IV. who made a Journey into France on purpoſe to determine the Buſineſs, and reconcile the two Kings. The Ambaſſadors on both ſides declared their Cauſe to him. The Engliſh alledged firſt, 'That this Treaty 'having been made more for the advantage of 'France than England, in that we reſigned thereby not only our Title to Normandy, Tourain, and 'Anjou, the richeſt Countries of France, but our 'Title to the Crown, that we might have the 'Sovereign Dominion of the Dutchy of Aquitain, 'the County of Ponthieu, with ſome other pieces, 'which by Right of Inheritance belonged to the 'Crown of England, whereby the Effuſion of 'Chriſtian Blood was prevented, France had 'Peace, and their King reſtored upon as reaſonable Conditions as could be deviſed. Notwithſtanding this, the French King (who himſelf, 'with all the Council of France, had agreed upon the Peace, and ſworn to obſerve it) hath 'contrary to the Law of God and Nations (after 'he had gotten his Hoſtages by Fraud) ſeized 'upon the Dutchy of Aquitain, and Country of 'Ponthieu, without denouncing War, &c. A. D. 1369. Reg. 43.

French reply, 'That we by the Treaty ought to 'have immediately drawn our Army out of 'France, but did not during all King John's 'Reign, by which means the Peace was more 'offensive to them than the War, they being 'forced to purchase the departure of our Soldiers 'at more Charge than would have maintain'd an 'Army: So that the Breach was on our side. 'That King Edward was bound by it to renounce 'his Title to the Crown of France in an open 'Parliament of both Realms, which he had not 'done.' And as to the Release of their King, 'they said, that it cost France more Gold than 'it did to redeem their King S. Lewis, with his 'Nobles and whole Army, when taken by the 'Solden of Egypt, an Infidel. Thus both sides defended themselves. But the French King (it seems) tho' willing to get in what he could of his Country, yet was unwilling to renew the War, and therefore courted the King of England to Peace by many Presents. But Edward seeing himself thus deluded, prepared to vindicate himself by the Sword; and having borrowed great Sums of Money of the Clergy, sends over John Duke of Lancaster, and Humphrey Bohun Earl of Hereford, with a mighty Army to Callis, to invade France on this side, while the Prince of Wales endeavour'd to recover the revolted Towns of the other. But the Duke returned a little after without effect. Thomas Beauchamp Earl of Warwick was then sent over with fresh Supplies, but dy'd in the Journey. Sir Robert Knolls [b], a Man highly celebrated in those times for his Conduct and Valour, was sent with another Army, consisting of many great Lords, who disdaining to be commanded by one that they accounted their Inferiour, overthrew themselves, and frustrated that Expedition [c]. Thus the English lost their ground, and the French King grew greater both in Power and Alliance. For Margaret, the only Daughter and Heir of Lewis Earl of Flanders, to whom King Edward sought to match his Son Edmond, was won to marry Philip the Hardy Duke of Burgogne, Brother of the French King. This much vexed the King of England, who to revenge himself the better, calls a Parliament at Westminster, wherein he resumes his Claim to the Crown of France, and desires an Aid of his Subjects to recover it, and obtained it. The Clergy granted him fifty thousand Pound to be paid the same Year, and the Laity as much. For the levying of which every Parish in England was rated at first to pay 23 s. 4 d. (the Great to help the Less) upon a Supposition there had been Parishes enough to have made up that Sum. But by a Certificate made in return to the King's Writs, sent out to enquire what Number of Parishes there were in every Shire, they found it came short, and then they rated every Parish at 5 l. 16 s. (the Greater to help the Less) and so of 8600 Parishes found to be in the 37 Shires, 50181 l. 0 s. 8 d. was raised. But in regard of the great Poverty of Suffolk and Devonshire, the 181 l. was abated, and so the King received 50000 l. for the Laity. Upon the grant of this Supply, the King again confirmed [d] the great Charter, and the Charter of Forests, and promised that they should be observed in all points, which in most of his Parliaments was his first Act, as appears by the printed Statutes. And now John Duke of Lancaster, and Edmund Earl of Cambridge, are sent with Forces into Aquitain to assist the Prince of Wales, who after he had taken Limoges [e] that had revolted, his Health not holding out to perform any more, left the prosecution of the War to his Brother, and with his Wife, and young Son Richard, born at Burdeaux, returns home into England, and resigns to his Father the Dutchy of Aquitain. The Duke of Lancaster, after the departure of the Prince, did little else but provide himself a Wife. For being a Widower by the Death of his Wife, who dy'd about two Years before, near the time of the Queen Philippa's Death, he marry'd Constance the Daughter of Peter King of Castile, by whom he had (after her Father's Death) the empty Title of King of Castile and Leon, but left it to his Daughter to possess. For Katherine, whom he had by her, being marry'd to Henry the Grandson of the Usurper, Henry the Bastard, and in her Right now King of both those Realms, became Queen of Castile and Leon, and left her Posterity Kings of Spain. Edmund Earl of Cambridge marry'd at the same time Isabel the Daughter of King Peter, and both of them shortly after return'd into England, tho' without Victory, yet with Wives. Lionel Duke of Clarence, a little before, had marry'd Violenta, the Daughter of the Duke of Milan in Italy, where they feasted him so much, that he dy'd soon after. The City of Rochel, which yet held out for the English, had endured a long Siege both by Sea and Land; to relieve which important place, the Earl of Pembroke is sent with forty Ships well mann'd and victuall'd, and furnish'd with twenty thousand Marks to defray the Charge of the Voyage. But encountering the Spanish Armado, which was sent to aid the French in this Siege by Henry King of Castile, after a long and cruel Fight he was taken Prisoner, and his Navy utterly destroyed. King Edward himself, tho' now aged, sets forth with a mighty Army to recover these Losses, but lost the more, Winds and Fortune being against him to beat him back; so that all his Preparations, in which he had spent nine hundred thousand Marks, were to no purpose. Shortly after John Duke of Lancaster went over to Callis with another, which he led through France by the way of Avergne, and lost many of his People in the Mountains for want of Victuals, and almost all his Horse; so that he came to Burdeaux with his Army almost starv'd. After he had refreshed them well, he made some attempts upon the Enemy, but without effect; the Date of the English Victories was out, and all things were unsuccessful. The Duke returns the next Year, and all Gascoigne revolted, except Burdeaux and Bayon. King Edward obtained another Supply of the Parliament, a tenth of the Clergy, and fifteenth of the Laity, towards these Wars. But sought all means to end them by a Treaty; a very unlikely way to do any good. Yet two Years were spent therein at Burges and other places, at great Charges by Commissioners, and with much Debate. The French having now the advantage of the Time, would make their own Conditions, requiring Callis, and Restitution of great Sums of Money, which would not be granted. So that nothing but temporary Truces could be gotten,

K. Edward miſled in his Old Age.

Nor was the ſtate of the King's Affairs better at home than abroad. The Sickneſs of the Prince grew deſperate, the Government diſorder'd, the King in his Age miſled, the Treaſure exhauſted, and all Affairs ill managed. A Parliament [a] was call'd at Weſtminſter to cure theſe Evils, in which the King's Wants were laid open, and Supplies required; but the whole Body of that Aſſembly, weary of bearing ſuch continual Burthens, inſtead of contributing, prefer Complaints, charging the King's Officers with Fraud, and humbly begging, that [b] the Duke of Lancaſter, the Lord Latimer then Lord Chamberlain, Dame [c] Alice Peirce the King's Concubine, and one Sir Richard Sturry, might be removed from Court. Theſe Complaints and Deſires were ſo vehemently urg'd by their Speaker, Sir Peter la Mare [d], that the King, rather than not be ſupply'd, gave way to them, and all thoſe Perſons are immediately expell'd from Court. The Prince was thought to favour theſe proceedings, becauſe there was no good Correſpondence between him and his Brother the Duke of Lancaſter, who manag'd all under his aged Father, and whoſe Ambition might be dangerous to his young Son Richard, whom he was like to leave to his Mercy. In this Parliament, the King being now in the 50th Year of his Reign, to gratifie his Subjects, granted another General Pardon, as a ſecond Jubilee, only excepting [e] William Wickham Biſhop of Winchеſter, who was lately fallen under the King's Diſpleaſure, through the procurement of the Duke of Lancaſter, and forbidden to come to the Parliament. But this Jubilee was turn'd into Sorrow by the Death of the [f] Prince of Wales, which happen'd while this Parliament ſate: A great loſs to the State, being a Prince endued with all excellent Virtues, and free from all Vices. His Death chang'd the face of Affairs. The late excluded Perſons return to the Court, and their former Places; and ſo this Parliament (tho' call'd the good Parliament) produced ill effects by their Petitions. For Sir Peter de la Mare, at the Suit of Alice Peirce, an impudent Woman, was committed to a perpetual Impriſonment at Nottingham. The Duke of Lancaſter is [g] enſtated in the Regency, and manages all the Affairs of the Kingdom. But King Edward, to prevent the miſchiefs which might ariſe by diſordering of the Succeſſion, providently ſettled the ſame in Parliament upon Richard of Burdeaux, creating him firſt Earl of Cheſter and Cornwall, and then Prince of Wales; which made much for his Safety againſt the Deſigns which the Duke of Lancaſter had form'd to ſupplant him. For this Confirmation by the Parliament, which he had offended, and the Breach he had with the Londoners ſoon after, deterr'd him from ſo much as attempting that which his Son in the next Reign effected. But yet in the Station he was in under his Father, he play'd the King very much, and carry'd himſelf very imperiouſly. And firſt he ſhews his Authority upon the Earl of March, commanding him to go over to guard Callis, and the parts adjoyning, which the Earl refuſed, and choſe rather to lay down his Office of Earl Marſhal, than obey his Command in that. His Office the Duke gave to Sir Henry Percy, one of his intimate Friends. About this time the Parliament met again at Weſtminſter, (whether it was a new one, or the laſt prorogued, I know not) and thither the Duke himſelf brings Prince Richard (being about eleven Years old) and places him in the King's Seat, having taught him to demand a Subſidy, which was two Tenths to be paid in one Year, or Twelve-pence in the Pound of all Merchandiſes ſold for one Year, and one Pound of Silver for every Knight's Fee, and of every Fire-Houſe one Penny. And this Demand the Duke earneſtly urged, ſaying, 'That one of them 'muſt of neceſſity be granted, becauſe the Ene-'my had proclaimed War, and purpoſed to in-'vade the Realm. The Knights of the Parliament (who were all pack'd by the Duke, as 'tis ſaid, except twelve, which he could not remove) required a time to give their Anſwer, and ſo a day was appointed. The major part made choice of one Hungerford, a Creature of the Duke's, to give their Anſwer. The other would have Sir Peter de la Mare to be enlarged, and deliver theirs, and anſwer to what could be objected againſt him before the Lords in Parliament, and ſubmit to their Judgment. Then the Duke demanded Aid of the Biſhops, but they refuſed to treat about it, without their Brother the Biſhop of Winchеſter, who was prohibited from coming to the Parliament; and ſo nothing was obtained, and the Duke diſappointed, which he ſhew'd no ſmall Reſentment of afterwards.

[h] Mr. Daniell ſeems to have taken up an Account of John Wickcliffe's Preaching, and other Circumſtances, from his Enemies the Monks. He repreſents him little better than a poor Pariſh-Prieſt, ſo ſtreightned for Preferment, that he wrongfully ſeiz'd upon another's Benefice; and becauſe he was juſtly depriv'd of it, meerly out of Anger and Diſcontent, he broach'd a Schiſm, and factiouſly maintain'd ſeveral Anti-papiſtical Doctrines. But the truth is far otherwiſe: For tho' his Parentage be not known to us, yet his Education and Life is manifeſt enough. He was brought up in Merton-College in Oxford, where he took his Degrees to Doctor of Divinity, and perform'd all his Exerciſes with great applauſe, according to the Reputation he had for Learning in that Univerſity. He was once ſent Ambaſſador by this King to the Pope, and his Commiſſion is extant in Mr. Fox, p. 390. and bears Date July 26. 1391. He was Reader in Divinity ſeveral Years in Oxford, and was only through force of Truth induc'd to hold the Doctrines againſt the Real Preſence Pilgrimages, Purgatory, &c. He had a Living in Oxford, where through Zeal to reform the Church, he preach'd the ſame Doctrine, and ſo enrag'd the Monks, that they procur'd Simon Sudbury Archbiſhop of Canterbury to ſilence and deprive him. Several Noblemen favour'd and encourag'd him, if for any politick ends, 'twas their fault; we find not that he us'd their Favour for any Intereſt, but to defend himſelf in Preaching the divine Truth. We wonder Mr. Daniell ſhou'd not have inform'd himſelf better of Wickcliffe's Condition. Mr. Wood in his *Antiq. his Doctrine there and at London, gotten himself many Followers (who after were called in Contempt Lollards) professing Poverty, going bare-footed, and poorly clad in Russet; which made them (as Extreams usually are) the more noted, and get the more into the Opinion of the People, who are apt to embrace Novelties, and usually beguiled with Disguises, being more apt to believe than judge. Among other his Doctrines he taught, That neither any King nor Temporal Lord could give any thing in Perpetuity to Church-men; and that Temporal Lords, if they needed, might lawfully take away the Goods of such Religious Persons to relieve themselves in their Necessities by the Example of 1377. William Rufus, &c. A Doctrine very pleasing to great Men, who embrace Sects, either thro' Ambition to get, or Fear of losing, or thro' Hatred, that they may revenge themselves.

The Duke of Lancaster favours Wickliff.

This Man, the Duke of Lancaster, and Sir Henry Peircy, much favour'd and encourag'd, extolling him both for his Learning and Integrity of Life; which so emboldened him, that he daily in one Church or other publish'd his Opinions freely: Whereupon, at length, he is cited to answer before the Archbishop and Bishop of London, and others in S. Paul's. At the day appointed the Duke of Lancaster and Lord Marshal went to conduct him, and by the way he was animated by his Followers not to fear the Bishops. When they came to S. Paul's the Press was so great, that hardly any Passage could be made into the Church; whereupon the Marshal using some Violence, thrust in among the People; which Courtney the Bishop of London observing, forbad him to do, saying, 'If he had 'known that he wou'd have behav'd himself so 'in that place, he should not have come into it. The Duke hearing these words, angrily replied, 'That the Marshal should execute his Authority 'whether he would or not. When they were come to our Lady's Chapel, the Duke, Barons, and Bishops sitting down; John Wickliff being sent for in by the Lord Marshal, was by him desired to sit down, because as he said, The Man had much to answer to, and needed a convenient Seat. The Bishop of London told him, That it was against all Law and Reason, that a Person cited before his Ordinary should sit, and thereupon angry words arose between the Lord Marshal and the Bishop. The Duke takes the Marshal's part, and sharply reproved the Bishop, and the Bishop returns the like to the Duke; who in great Rage, seeing he could not prevail, swore, 'That he would pull down the Pride of 'of him, and all the Bishops of England: And 'tho' you trust, said he, to your Parentage, that 'shall do you no Service. The Bishop answer'd, 'I trust not in my Parents, nor any Man living, 'but in God only, in whom I ought to trust. The Duke, as if he whisper'd in his Ear, told him, 'That he had rather pull him out of the 'Church by the Hair of the Head, than suffer 'such Indignities and Affronts; which Words the Londoners over-hearing, swore with a loud Voice, 'They would lose their Lives, rather than 'suffer their Bishop to be thus injur'd, and threaten'd to be pull'd out of his own Church. And their Fury was the greater towards the Duke, because the day before in the Parliament (of which he was President) it was requir'd in the King's Name, that from thenceforth there should be no more a Mayor of London, but a Captain appointed for the Government of the City, and that the Lord Marshal of England should arrest Offenders within the Liberties, as in other places. About this Business, and the Wrong offer'd to their Bishop, the Citizens assembled the next day, to consult among themselves what to do; which, as they were concerting upon, the Lord Fitz-Walter and Guido Brian, came into the City. The People seeing them, furiously ran to them, and had like to have fall'n foul upon them for coming unsent for at that time: But the Lord Fitz-Walter protested, That he came for no other end, but to offer his Service to the City, being by Inheritance their Standard-bearer; and therefore thought himself oblig'd to take all Injuries offer'd to them as done to himself, and desir'd them to stand upon their own Defence. At this they presently take Arms, assault the Marshal's Inn, and breaking open the Gates brought forth a Prisoner in his Shackles, and set him at Liberty, but found not the Lord Marshal, whom they sought, being at Dinner that day with the Duke at John de Ypres's[a] House. Then did the furious Multitude run to assault the Savoy, the Duke's House; which a Knight of the Duke's Retinue seeing, went in haste to the Place where the Duke dined to acquaint him with this Uproar in the City. The Duke hearing it, leaps so hastily from the Table, that he broke both his Shins against the Form, and with Sir Henry Peircy, passes over by Boat to Kensington[b] near Lambeth, to the Prince and Princess his Mother, to complain of the Violence offer'd him by a riotous Rabble of the Citizens. In the mean time, the Multitude coming to the Savoy met a Priest, who being inquisitive to know the Business they were about, was answer'd, 'They were going to take the Duke 'and Lord Marshal, and compel them to release 'Sir Peter de la Mare from his unjust Imprison-'ment. The Priest replied, 'That Sir Peter was 'a Traitor to the King, and deserv'd to be hang'd. The Rabble at these words cry'd out, 'This is 'Peircy, the Traytor to England, his Speech be-'trays him, tho' in Disguise, and presently they fell upon him and kill'd him. The Bishop of London hearing of this Tumult, leaves his Dinner, and goes in haste to the Savoy; where he admonishing the People to be mindful of the Holy Time of Lent, and beseeching them for the Love of Christ to desist from such seditious Attempts, and assuring them that all things should be ended for the Good of the City: He so pacified them that they forbore to assault the Duke's House, having missed of his Person, whom in their Fury they had certainly destroyed, if they met with him, as also the Lord Marshal; but to shew their Anger, they hung up his Arms revers'd in Sign of Treason, in all the principal Streets of the City. The Princess, from Kensington, sent Albert de Vere, Lewis Clifford, and Simon Burleigh, to the Citizens to persuade them to make their Peace with the Duke. They returned Answer, 'That for her Honour they would do whatever 'she commanded, but enjoyn'd the Messengers to 'require the Duke to suffer the Bishop of Winchester and Sir Peter de la Mare to have their 'Lawful Tryal according to the Custom of England. They sent likewise some of their chief Men to the sick King to excuse themselves for this Tumult; protesting, 'That they were not pri-'vy to it, but endeavour'd all they could to sup-'press it, but could not do it, because the whole 'Commonalty were in a Commotion; being in-'form'd, That all their Liberties were likely to 'be taken from them by Parliament. The King

'ther to enlarge them; and therefore required them to rest satisfied, and keep their People in Peace and order, which upon this Answer they easily did. But they could not hinder Rhymes and Libels (those secret Stings of Discontent) which were spread daily about the City to defame the Duke, and make him odious to the People; for which the Duke caused the Authors to be excommunicated by the Bishops. But notwithstanding these harsh Proceedings of the Duke's, very incommodious as well to himself as the King, yet the Commons being assembled in Parliament, granted the King a Tax, upon condition that being levied, it should be put into the hands of certain Earls and Barons to be disposed of according to the Occasions of the King and Kingdom. This Tax was perfectly new; every Person, Man and Woman, within the Kingdom above fourteen Years of Age, was to pay 4 d. a Head, those that lived upon Alms only excepted. The Clergy likewise granted 12 d. a Head for every Person beneficed, and 4 d. for all other Religious Persons: A mighty and unknown Aid, never granted to any King before, but a Precedent to the following Reigns; in the next of which it caused the greatest popular Insurrection, that ever was seen in the Kingdom. And so the Parliament ended, but not the Duke's Displeasure against the City: For the Mayor and Aldermen were brought before the King at Shene, and advised to submit themselves to the Duke, and crave Pardon for their grievous Offences. They protest as before, That they could not stop the Rage of the Multitude, who committed those Insolencies, and beseeching the King not to punish them who were innocent and ignorant of the Fact; promised the Duke to use all means that they could to bring in the Malefactors, and oblige them to satisfie his Honour, and more they could not do. Upon this Answer, they were sent from the Court, and shortly after put from their Places by the Duke's Power: Sir Nicholas Brember was made Mayor instead of Adam Staple, and other Aldermen put in their Places. The King was desirous to have reconciled them to his Son, but Sickness disabled him from his Design, Death forced him to give over the World by its near Approaches. At his last Moment, when he stood most in need of Attendants, tho' they did not of him, he was deserted by all; his Concubine packing up all she could lay her hands on, even to the Rings of his Fingers, left him; which tho' a very bad Example, and like such a Woman's, yet was imitated by his Counsellors and Attendants, who forsook him and left the Room where he lay a dying empty; which a poor Priest [a], who was passing by observing, enter'd, and going to the King's Bed's-side, whom he found sensible, he besought him to remember his Saviour, and beg pardon of his Offence, (which none before would do) and so wrought upon him by his Advice, that he resign'd his last Breath, with many Signs of a sound Faith and hearty Repentance, at his Manour of Richmond (or Shene) June 21. *A. King Edward's Death.

He was a Prince best known by his Actions, the soonest a Man, and the longest that held so of any we read. He was of a comely Personage, of a good and graceful Stature, affable and courteous, well expressing himself. He was a great Lover of Justice, Order, and his People, the chief Vertues of a King. His Justice he shew'd in making so many Statutes for the Execution of it, and the Oaths he caused his Justices to take for that end, and the severe Punishment he inflicted upon his Judges (viz. Sir Henry Green, and Sir William Shipwith) for their Corruptions. He also better'd the Form of publick Justice, which his Grandfather began, and settled it so as it remains to this day. His Care of the Order of the Nation is proved from so many Laws made to restrain Excesses in all kinds. His Love to his People he expressed by often easing their Grievances, and Willingness to give them Satisfaction at all times, particularly in granting the Observation of their Charters in most of his Parliaments; and when (Anno Reg. 14.) they were jealous, that upon his assuming the Title of King of France he would subject England to that Crown; he passed a Statute to clear their Doubts, that this Kingdom should remain entire as before, without any Violation of their Privileges. He was very circumspect in all his Actions, never undertaking any thing but what he had means to perform; which his Subjects knowing, yielded him more Taxes readily, than any of his Predecessors had before him, and he was as careful to expend them for the Good and Honour of the Kingdom. He was indeed covetous to get Money, but without the oppressing any Man, as his Grandfather did the Judges, Jews, and his other Officers. His Gifts were never profuse, or misplaced, so as to hurt his Treasure, Fame, or Reverence with his People. In fine, he was a Prince who knew his Work, and did it; and therefore was he better obeyed, more respected, and better served than any of his Predecessors.

Love to his People.

His Works of Piety were many. He founded the Abby of Eastminster for Cistertians, near the Tower, a Nunnery at Deptford; the King's Hall in Cambridge for poor Scholars; an Hospital at Callis, and S. Stephen's Chapel at Westminster, and the Church he endowed with 300 l. per Annum. He enlarged the Chapel at Windsor, and made a Provision not only for the Churchmen, but twenty four poor Knights. These were his publick Works, the best Monuments to perpetuate the Memories of Princes. Besides these, his private Buildings were many; as the Castle of Windsor, which he re-edified and enlarged, the Castle of Quinborough, Fortifications at Callis, and other Places. He shewed his Magnificence in his Triumphs and Feasts, which were sumptuous, with all due Rites and Ceremonies to preserve Reverence and Majesty. To conclude, He was a Prince whose Nature was so suitable to his Office, as if he were made only for it. His Failures are to be imputed to Age, in which Princes are never happy, their Vigour and Fortune departing usually together. His Queen was a Lady of excellent Vertue, who tho' she brought him little or no Estate, yielded him much Content, some Alliance and a fair Issue. She conspired to advance his Honour and Power, and was very gracious and loving to the Nation, doing many pious Actions; among which, Queens College in Oxford is a Monument of her Goodness and Name. She bare him seven Sons, of whom five lived to have Children; Edward Prince of Wales [b],

REMARKABLE OCCURRENCES in the Reign of Edward III.

IN the fourth Year of his Reign, on the 16th of July, there happen'd a great Eclipſe of the Sun, and the Rains were ſo violent this Year, that the Harveſt did not begin till Michaelmas. At Chriſtmas a mighty Weſterly Wind overthrew ſeveral private Houſes and publick Edifices, tore Trees up by the Roots, and did a vaſt deal of Miſchief.

In his 9th Year the Rains were ſo fatal, that the Corn was ſpoil'd, a Dearth enſu'd, Wheat being ſold for 40 s. a Quarter as much as 20 s. a Buſhel now, and the Cattel was deſtroy'd by a Murrain.

In the 12th Year it rain'd almoſt continually from the beginning of October to the beginning of December, and then came a Froſt upon it, which laſted twelve Weeks; yet, tho' the Corn was deſtroy'd by it in a great meaſure, the War with Scotland, ſays my Author, made Money ſo ſcarce, that all ſorts of Grain were ſold at a reaſonable Rate.

In his 13th Year one hundred and twenty Laymen and ſeveral Prieſts, beſides Women, were drown'd by an Inundation of Water at Newcaſtle upon Tine.

While the Battel of Creſſy was fighting, in the 20th Year of his Reign, there fell a violent Storm of Hail, accompany'd with an Eclipſe, and terrible Thunders, at which time prodigious Flights of Crows hover'd over the Engliſh and French Armies.

In his 22d Year it rain'd from Midſummer to Chriſtmas ſo conſtantly, that there was not one Day or Night dry together. This wet Seaſon caus'd great Floods, and a Peſtilence, which rag'd for a whole Year: The Earth was at the ſame time barren, and even the Sea did not produce ſuch Plenty of Fiſh as formerly. The Mortality was ſo great, that in the City of London two hundred Corps were bury'd every Day in the Charterhouſe-yard, beſides thoſe interr'd in other common burying Places, and this laſted from Candlemas to Eaſter.

His 27th Year was remarkable for the Scarcity of Corn and Proviſions in England and France, occaſion'd by a great Drought: 'Twas call'd the Dear Summer, Rye was brought out of Zealand to ſupport the Poor, who otherwiſe muſt have periſh'd for want of Suſtenance.

In his 34th Year Men and Beaſts were deſtroy'd in ſeveral Parts of England by Thunder and Lightning; many Houſes were burnt and ruin'd by it, and ſtrange Sights were alſo ſeen. The ſecond Mortality happen'd, ſo call'd to diſtinguiſh it from that we have mention'd already: This latter was the more remarkable, becauſe it ſeiz'd generally on Men; and in the ſame Year, if we may give Credit to the Continuator of Nic. Trivet's Hiſtory, two Caſtles were ſeen in the Air, the one in the South-eaſt the other in the South-weſt, out of which Caſtles about Noon there ſeem'd to ſally ſeveral Troops of arm'd Men. The Band that came forth of the Caſtle in the South-eaſt appear'd in White, and the other in Black: They fought for ſome time, the White conquer'd at firſt but in the end the Black got the Victory.

In his 39th Year the Rains were again violent, and a great Dearth and Peſtilence follow'd: Flights of Sparrows fought in the Air, and many of them dropp'd dead down to the Ground. Caxton.

In his 42d Year a Comet appear'd in March between the North and Weſt, the Beams were darted towards France, and were thought to preſage new Troubles to that Kingdom in the following Year. The Weſtern Parts of England, and Oxford particularly, were ſorely afflicted with a Peſtilence.

Edward the Black Prince, John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, Henry Duke of Lancaſter his Father-in-Law, Edmund Earl of Cambridge afterwards Duke of York; the Earl of Warwick, the Earl of Huntington, the Earl of Saliſbury, the Earl of Stafford, the Earl of Northampton, the Earl of Arundel; the Lord Cobham, the Lord Baſſet, the Lord Thomas Holland, the Lord Walter De Manny, the Lord Spencer, the Lord Chandois, the Lord James Audley; Sir John Copland, Sir Thomas Felton, the Capital de Beuſe Knight of the Garter, born in Gaſcoign; Sir Robert Knolles, Sir Hugh Calverly, Sir Thomas Piercy, Sir Hugh Haſtings, Sir Baldwin Freville, Sir John Harleſton, Sir James Pipe, Sir Thomas Dagworth, and Sir John Hawkwood, were all of them famous for their brave Actions in War: As thoſe that we are about to name, were for their Vertue and Learning, John Baconthrope, Doctor of both Laws in the Univerſities of Oxford and Paris; William [b] From him by the Marriage of Blanch, ſole Heireſs of Henry Duke of Lancaſter, Son of Henry Earl of Lancaſter, Son of Edmund Earl of Lancaſter, Brother to Edward the firſt, was deriv'd the Title of the Lancaſtrian Family to the Crown; which the three Henry's ſucceſſively enjoy'd, as Heirs of that Family, but yet with much War and Bloodſhed, as we ſhall ſee in the Courſe of this Hiſtory. This Title was very little made uſe of, and indeed was a very weak one; for all the Sons of Edward the third, and the Poſterity of Edmund Earl of Kent, Son of Edward the firſt, had a Prior Title to the Deſcendants of Edmund Earl of Lancaſter, younger Brother to Edward the firſt.

THE LIFE and REIGN OF RICHARD II.

A. D. 1377. Reg. 1.

His Age and Descent.

RICHARD II. surnam'd of Burdeaux, a City in the Province of Guienne in France, because he was born there, when his Father, the most illustrious English Hero, Edward the Black-Prince was Duke of Aquitain, succeeded his Grandfather Edward III. in the Throne of England, June 21. 1377. He was but eleven Years old when he began his Reign; but there appear'd in him so great a pregnancy of Wit above his Years, and so sweet a Disposition, set off with an admirable Beauty and proportion of Body, that the People were enamour'd with him, and as if the Virtues of both his immediate Ancestors were united in him, received him for their King with universal Joy and Satisfaction; the loss of their brave Prince Edward III. so lately deceased, was quite forgotten, being swallow'd up with the hopes of that Happiness which they promised themselves under this his Successor. And indeed their high Opinion of this young Prince was much confirm'd by the first Action which he undertook after he was King, viz. the Reconciliation of the Duke of Lancaster and City of London, in which he shew'd a Prudence and Moderation much above his Age. For whereas the Citizens, who had gotten a certain Information of the King's approaching Death, had made an Address to him, then Prince of Wales, the day before his Grandfather's decease, assuring him of their Service and Fidelity, if their present King should die, and petitioning his Highness to mediate between his Uncle the Duke of Lancaster and them; he return'd them not only promises of his Love and Favour to their City, but of his Endeavours to effect their Desires; and accordingly the very next day spoke to his Uncle about it, and brought him to submit to his Decision. Of which he gave the Citizens notice immediately by the Lord Latimer, Sir Richard Adderbury, Sir Simon Burley Prince Richard's Tutor, and Sir Nicholas Bond, whom he sent on purpose upon that Message, and to tell them, that he expected the like Submission from them. The Citizens were a little afraid, lest the Influence which the Duke had upon him might prove to their disadvantage, if they should leave the matter entirely to his Judgment; but Sir Richard Adderbury giving them hopes of a good Conclusion, brought them to yield; and so certain Aldermen going along with them to him (then King) at Shene near Richmond, were reconciled honourably to the Duke in the Name of the whole City; and in favour to them, the King also released Sir Peter de la Mare from his Imprisonment, and receiv'd him into his special Grace.

The Duke of Lancaster and Londoners reconcil'd.

The only thing which threaten'd a disturbance to the Nation being thus composed, the next Care was to settle the Crown upon the young King's Head; and to that end, June 16. was appointed for his Coronation. This the Nation took for a fit opportunity of testifying their Affections to him; and therefore all things by general consent were so prepared, that it might be as magnificent and splendid as possible. The Duke of Lancaster, who for his Dukedom of Lancaster, and Earldoms of Leicester and Lincoln, was admitted upon his Claim to be High Steward, Bearer of the King's chief Sword, call'd Curtana, and Carver at that Solemnity, (which two last Offices he executed by his Deputies the Earls of Darby and Stafford) held the Steward's Court several days in Westminster-Hall, to receive the Claims of such Persons as by certain Tenures or Custom were to officiate at that Ceremony, and such as were of an inferiour degree, he put Noblemen into their places, that none but Persons of the best Quality might attend upon the King at it. On the day before the Coronation, the King rode through the City to Westminster in great State, and being royally attended by his Nobles and Great Men, the Citizens in his passage gave him large demonstrations of their Loyalty and Affections, having adorn'd their Houses with rich Tapestry, and erected several costly Pageants, the Conduits ran Wine, and the People in crowds saluted the King with loud Acclamations, and wishes of Blessings and Prosperity. The Duke of Lancaster, and the Lord Peircy, who rode before the King, behav'd themselves with so much Obligingness and Respect to the Citizens all along, that all the Spectators were fully persuaded, that the late Reconciliation made between the City and them was real and hearty. The King lodged at Westminster that night, and the next day was crown'd in the Abby-Church, by Simon Sudbury Archbishop of Canterbury, with the usual Ceremonies of Anointing, giving him the Sword of Justice, taking an Oath of him for the good Government of the Nation, and requiring the People's Consent to have him for their King. After his Coronation, the King return'd to Westminster-Hall to Dinner; but before he sate down, he created four Earls, viz. His Uncle Thomas Woodstocke, Earl of Buckingham and [a] Northampton; Thomas Mowbrey, the younger Brother of John Lord Mowbrey Earl of Nottingham; Guisbard Angolisme, a Gascoigne, his Tutor [b], Earl of Huntington; and Henry Peircy [c], Son of Henry Lord Peircy Earl of Northumberland; allowing his Uncle and Tutor a thousand Marks a Year a-piece out of his Trea-fury, till he could provide them an Eſtate of equal Value. He alſo made at the ſame time nine Knights. The next day was celebrated a very devout Proceſſion by the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots and Clergy, to pray for the Peace of the Realm, and proſperous Reign of the King. Thomas Brinton Biſhop of Rocheſter preach'd, and in his Sermon pathetically exhorted all Men to Peace and Unity, conjuring all of a ſuperiour degree to deal gently with the Commons, and the People to obey their Superiors willingly; but moſt of all, the Nobility, who were to be about the King, to give him a Religious and Virtuous Example, leſt the King being either by their Flattery or Vices miſled, the People ſhould have cauſe to curſe them. Thus was the young King fully ſettled in his Throne; but becauſe he was himſelf, by reaſon of his tender Age, unable to rule, the Government was committed to the Care of the King's Mother[a], his two Uncles, John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, and Edmund Earl of Cambridge, and certain Biſhops, who were as well to provide for the Security and Happineſs of the Nation, as the Education of the King.

But notwithſtanding the ordering and ſupreme diſpoſal of all things was put into ſo many hands, and thoſe of ſuch Perſons, whoſe Conſcience, Intereſt and Honour were obliged to manage all Affairs, for the good both of the King and People; yet as if a Kingdom could never be govern'd well by Guardians, or as if many Governours were very little better than none, the old Enemies of the Nation, the French and Scots, thought the Minority of the King a fit opportunity to annoy and ſpoil it. The French, who had been making Preparations for that end in King Edward's Reign, and had mann'd out a Fleet juſt before his Death, to revenge all the Loſſes they had ſuffer'd by his victorious Sword, entred the narrow Seas immediately after his deceaſe, and while the Nation was buſied in ſettling their new King, invaded the Coaſts of England, and did much miſchief, which they continu'd for ſeveral Months without oppoſition. On S. Peter's day, June 29. they put in with fifty Sail at Ry in Suſſex, and having rifled and plundered the Town at their pleaſure, ſet it on Fire, and ſo departed, leaving the miſerable and helpleſs Inhabitants to quench the Flames with their Tears.[b] From hence they coaſted to the Iſle of Wight, and enter'd it without Reſiſtance. The Houſes they ſpoil'd of all ſuch Goods as were valuable, and eaſily carry'd to their Ships, but ſpared the Buildings from burning, having compounded with the People of the Iſle for a thouſand Marks to forbear that Cruelty; and ſo left it, ſooner perhaps than they intended, becauſe they could not, after ſeveral attempts, make themſelves Maſters of the Caſtle of Cariſbrook, which was bravely defended againſt them by the valiant Governor of it, Sir Hugh Tyrrell. From hence they return'd back to do the like at Winchelſea, ſuppoſing that the terror of the Sufferings of their neighbouring Town of Ry would have made it an eaſie Prey to them, but they found the contrary at their coming. For the Abbot of Battel, being a Man of Courage, and ſome Skill in Warlike Affairs, had ſo fortify'd and mann'd the Town for its defence, that the French could gain no entrance into it; yet ſuppoſing it to be eaſily taken, they ſent to the Abbot to redeem it from Aſſault; but the Abbot return'd them anſwer, That he had no reaſon to redeem what was not loſt. The French hereupon having in vain endeavour'd to draw the Defendants out of the Town to a pitcht Battel in the Fields, fell to battering the Walls with ſuch Engines and Warlike Inſtruments as they had brought with them on purpoſe, but with no ſucceſs. So that they were forced to leave the Town with little advantage. But in the mean time they ſent a Party to Haſtings, which finding almoſt void of People, who were gone to maintain the Siege of Winchelſea, they burnt and utterly conſumed it. Their next attempt was upon the ſmall Town of Rottington in Suſſex, near Lewis, where the Prior of Lewis, Sir John Faleſley, Sir Thomas Cheyney, and one Mr. Brookes, ſo zealous for the preſervation of their Country, that they did not conſider what Forces they had to do it with, encountred them boldly with an unarm'd and undiſciplin'd Rabble; and tho' they kill'd many of their Enemies, yet were in the end beaten, the Prior and Knights, with ſome others, being taken Priſoners, and an hundred ſlain. Many other Towns they plunder'd and robb'd, as Portſmouth, Dartmouth, and Plymouth; by the Spoils of all which, having fill'd their Ships, they return'd home; and ſoon after their arrival, beſieged the Caſtle of Arde[c], which they got not by their own Valour, but the Treaſon of the Lord Gurney, a German, the Governour of it, who for a Bribe reſign'd it to them. But he had but ſmall Enjoyment of his baſe Gain, being ſoon taken by Sir Hugh Calverley Governour of Callis, and ſent into England to ſuffer the deſerved Puniſhment of his Treachery. The Scots in the mean time were not idle, (tho' not ſo miſchievous as the French deſired them) for they aſſaulted the Town and Caſtle of Roxborough, then in the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, and having gain'd it with no ſmall loſs to themſelves, took what was of any price out of it, and then burnt it. Thus was the Nation miſerably afflicted by a double Enemy, and little or no care taken to ſecure the People from them; whether out of negligence, deſign, or want of Shipping, or whether it was forborn till a Parliament could meet, and provide ſome more effectual Remedy againſt them, is uncertain; yet the Duke of Lancaſter, who had the chief Management of publick Affairs, brought an incurable Odium upon himſelf from the People ever after, becauſe he did not endeavour their Relief ſo diligently as his Place and the People's Neceſſities required.

Winchelſea bravely defended by the Abbot of Battel.

The Caſtle of Arde gotten by the French.

About Michaelmas a Parliament met, to rectifie the Diſorders, and provide for the Security of the Nation, the firſt thing they went upon[d] was the puniſhment of Alice Peirce, the late King's Concubine, who had been the cauſe of many Miſchiefs in the laſt Reign, and for that end had been baniſh'd from the Court, and made to take an Oath, that ſhe would never return again; but, as it generally happens, that thoſe who allow themſelves in one Sin, ſeldom make any Conſcience of committing another, ſhe kept her Oath no longer than the fear of the Parliament was removed; ſhe became as great at Court, and as inſolent as before, and caus'd Sir Peter de la Mare, the Speaker of the Houſe of Commons, to be impriſon'd. Theſe impudent Actions the Parliament thought fit to take notice of, and Sir Peter de la Mare contributed his utmoſt to have them puniſh'd, which was by general conſent thus agreed upon: That ſhe ſhould be baniſh'd, and all her Goods confiſcated, which was immediately done[a]. Then the Neceſſity of a Tax being made known to them, to provide a Navy for the defence of the Kingdom, againſt the Invaſion of the French, and their Confederates the Spaniards, there was granted to the King two Tenths of the Clergy, and two Fifteenths from the Laity; yet upon theſe Conditions, that the Monies collected ſhould be depoſited in the hands of two eminent Citizens of London, William Walworth and John Philpott, who were to take care that they were expended for the publick Good: 2. That for the future the King ſhould maintain his State and Wars out of his own Revenues, which if well manag'd were judg'd ſufficient to maintain both. The Laws which the King made in Compenſation of this Tax, for the good of the People were ſeveral. He confirm'd the Great Charter[b], Charter of Foreſts, and the many good Laws of his Anceſtors unrepeal'd; and enacted, 'That the Peace ſhould be carefully 'preſerved, and Juſtice impartially done to all 'his Subjects; That the Prelates, and the reſt of 'the Clergy, ſhould have a Remedy by Action of 'Treſpaſs againſt all Purveyors, who contrary to 'the Laws of his Predeceſſors, did without their 'conſent take away their Corn, Hay, Beaſts, or 'Carriages from their Houſes, Mannours, or 'Granges for the King's uſe, and ſhould recover 'treble Damages; That Perſons that ſhall maintain any Quarrels, if Officers of the King's Exchequer, or other Courts, ſhall loſe their places, 'and others be fined at the King's pleaſure; That 'all Perſons that ſhall arreſt any Clergyman in 'his Church, or the Church-yard, or while he is 'performing divine Service, ſhall ſuffer Impriſonment, and be ranſom'd at the King's Will, 'but ſhall firſt make ſatisfaction to the Perſon 'arreſted. The King alſo confirm'd the Pardon 'granted by his Grandfather in the fiftieth Year 'of his Reign. In this Parliament it was farther moved, 'That the Clergy might be reſtrain'd by 'Statute from impoſing Money-penance upon Offenders, becauſe by this means the Church exhauſted the Treaſure of the Nation. The Clergy hotly oppoſed the Propoſition, and the King unwilling to diſoblige the Churchmen, order'd, 'That 'the Prelates ſhould proceed therein as formerly, 'according to the Canons of Holy Church, and 'not otherwiſe. But tho' the Commons could not prevail in the reſtraint of their own Clergy's Exactions, they were more ſucceſsful in oppoſing the Pope's Encroachments; for they obtained ſeveral Acts, whereby it was order'd, 'That the Pope's 'Collectors ſhall gather the firſt Fruits of Bene'fices in this Realm no longer, and that the Cler'gy ſhould not pay them; That no Man ſhould 'procure any Benefice by proviſion from Rome, 'on pain of being put out of the King's Protecti'on; That no Engliſhman farm any ſuch Benefice 'of any Alien, on the like penalty. In it 'tis 'ſaid, the French had ſix thouſand Pound yearly from England by ſuch Benefices; That a Remedy be provided againſt the Pope's Reſervations of Dignities Elective, they being againſt 'the Treaty made with the Pope by King Edward III. Theſe Matters being thus ſettled and debated, the Parliament broke up about the Feaſt of All Saints.

Taxes granted, and Laws made.

After the Parliament was riſen, the Governours of the Nation being enabled to act againſt the Enemy, began to think upon ſome ways to revenge the laſt Summer's Loſſes, ſuſtain'd by the People from the French; and having received Information, that the Spaniſh Fleet lay at Sluce in Flanders, richly laden with Wines, and other Commodities, and waiting only for a fair Wind to return, they ſent out a great Fleet, under the Command of the Duke of Britain, Earl of Buckingham, the Lords Latimer and Fitz-Walter, Sir Robert Knolles, and other choſen Captains, to intercept them in their paſſage; but by contrary Winds they were ſo diſpers'd and ſhatter'd, that they could at that time effect nothing. A little after Chriſtmas, Sir Hugh Calverly Governour of Callis was more fortunate in his Adventures againſt the French. For making an Inroad towards Bulloigne, he plunder'd twenty-ſix Veſſels, beſides Barges, which lay in the Haven, and a great part of the Suburbs of that Town; and in his return, drove along with him into Callis a great Booty of Sheep and Oxen, which he found in the Paſtures adjoyning, to the great enriching of his Garriſon. He alſo recover'd the Caſtle of S. Mark, on the ſame day the French had it betray'd to them by the Picards, whom Sir Hugh homag'd. Not long after, Sir Hugh with his Garriſon Soldiers made an attempt upon the Town of Eſtaples on the Fair-day, when the Merchants of Paris, Amiens, Bulloigne, and Lutterell, had brought great Quantities of Goods thither to ſell, which all became an eaſie prey to the Engliſh. The more valuable and portable they carry'd back with them, the reſt they ſold to the Merchants themſelves for a great Sum of Money, reſolving otherwiſe to have burnt them. While the Garriſon at Callis thus acted its part under its valiant Captain, the Fleet under the Earl of Buckingham being gotten together, and new rigg'd, ſet out to Sea, and cruiſing upon the Coaſt of Britain near Breſt took eight Spaniſh Ships, and might have taken more, had not their own Diviſions and the tempeſtuous Weather been an Impediment to their farther Succeſs. While the King's Ships were thus employ'd againſt the Enemy, divers private Men and Towns provided Ships, and obſerved all opportunities of annoying them. The Lord Peircy[c] with one great Ship and ſome ſmall Veſſels putting out to Sea, met with a Fleet of fifty Sail of Spaniſh and Flemiſh Ships, laden with French Merchandize, which to attack look'd more couragious than prudent; yet he was ſo fortunate, that he took two and twenty of them, the reſt eſcaping by flight. The Inhabitants of Winchelſea and Ry, who had felt ſo much of the French Cruelty, being bent upon a ſharp Revenge of their late Sufferings, fitted out a certain Number of Ships, with ſufficient quantity of Men and Proviſion; with which they made an Inroad into Normandy, enter'd and plunder'd the Towns of S. Peter's Haven and Willet, where they found and recover'd many of the Goods, which the French had lately taken from them, and having ſet the Houſes on Fire, took their Ships, and got home ſafe. Thus did the Engliſh in ſome meaſure repay the French for the Injuries they had done them, and free their Coaſts a-while from their Depredations.

but before he retir'd, he ſettled ſuch Governors about the King as were more pleaſing to the People, viz. [a] William Courtney Biſhop of London, Edmund Mortimer Earl of March, and ſeveral others, yet becauſe the Biſhop of Saliſbury and Lord Latimer were put in the Number, they were not fully contented, and thro' a deſire of ſecuring the Nation from their Enemies, he requeſted that the Money granted the laſt Parliament for that end might be put into his hands, and he would take care to guard the Coaſts from the Incurſions of the French, and their Confederates, for the ſucceeding Year. Some of the Nobility oppos'd his Propoſition, but it was at length conſented to, and the Duke immediately ſet himſelf to provide a ſufficient Navy for the Safety of the People, and hired eight Ships of the City of Baion to joyn with it; but before the Duke's Ships were ready (whither thro' neceſſary, or wilful delay, is not known) one Mercer, a deſperate Scot, having gotten together a ſmall Number of Scotch, French, and Spaniſh Ships, enter'd the Haven of Scarborough, and ſeizing upon ſeveral Ships in it, carry'd them away to Scotland. This Miſchief he did to that Town, becauſe his Father, who had been taken not long before by ſome Northern Veſſels, was by the Earl of Northumberland committed Priſoner to Scarborough Caſtle. This Succeſs much encourag'd him and his Crew, ſo that he greatly infeſted thoſe Seas; and tho' the Duke of Lancaſter had undertaken to prevent ſuch Evils, and Complaints of it were brought to the King and his Council, yet none appear'd to oppoſe the Pirates, ſo that thoſe Parts of the Kingdom ſuffer'd many Calamities from them.

Alderman Philpot's Bravery.

The News of theſe things being brought to London, John Philpott, an Alderman, and a great Lover of his Country, pitying the Miſeries of the People reſolv'd upon a Relief at his own Charge; and fitting out ſuch a Number of well-built Ships, as would conveniently carry a thouſand Men, with all Ammunition and Proviſion, which he hired and paid himſelf, he ſet out to Sea with them himſelf being their Captain, and found out Mercer and his Aſſociates, whom he immediately ſet upon, and after a ſmart Engagement conquer'd; taking Mercer himſelf, and all the Veſſels he had carry'd from Scarborough, with fifteen Spaniſh Bottoms well laden with rich, tho' ill gotten Goods. With Spoil and Victory Philpott returns to London, where he met with Acclamations from the People, but no welcome from the Nobles, who envy'd him that Honour which they had not either Courage or Fidelity enough themſelves to ſeek and gain. For he was ſent for to come before the Council, to give an Account of his Action; which tho' they could not diſlike, yet much blam'd him for daring it without a Commiſſion from the King and his Council; and Hugh Earl of Stafford charg'd him with doing a very unlawful Act to levy Arms in the King's Dominions without his Leave. But Mr. Philpott made a modeſt and ingenious Defence, telling them, 'That it was not out of any Deſire or 'ambitious Aim to get himſelf a Name, or raiſe 'to himſelf the Reputation of being a great Sol-'dier, that induc'd him to venture his Money 'and Men to vanquiſh the Scotch Pirate, but 'merely out of Love to his Countrymen, and 'for the Honour of the Nation, that the Sloth 'of ſuch as ought to have ſecured the Nation, 'might not ruine the People and make it con-'temptible. This Anſwer ſo ſatisfied the Council, that he return'd with as much Commendation from ſome of the Nobility as he was receiv'd by the City with Applauſe.

The Duke of Lancaſter's Preparations and Succeſs.

While the Duke of Lancaſter lay at Anchor with his Ships, getting in Proviſion and Ammunition ſlowly, and with unneceſſary Delays, ſome of his Men weary of their unmanlike Idleneſs, and of plundering their own Brethren, ſet out to Sea under the Command of the Earls of Saliſbury and Arundel, and ſailed towards the Coaſts of Britain; Sir Peter and Sir Philip Courtney, two Brothers, who had the Command of ſome Ships, ſpying certain Veſſels belonging to the Enemy inconſiderately aſſaulted them, being the whole Spaniſh Fleet; and tho' they bravely fought and defended themſelves, yet in the end were beaten, moſt of their Men, who were good Gentlemen of Somerſetſhire and Devonſhire, being ſlain, and Sir Peter with ſome others were taken Priſoners. This Misfortune at their firſt ſetting out much diſheartned them, but yet they perſiſted in their Deſign, and went on in their intended Voyage, which proved ſome Compenſation to their former Loſs; for being arrived, they found the King of Navarre fall'n into a Difference with the King of France, and very deſirous of an Alliance with the King of England: Whereupon, for a certain Sum of Money lent to the ſaid King, and a Confederacy eſtabliſh'd between the Engliſh and him. The Haven of Chierburg was put into the Poſſeſſion of the Engliſh, whereby an eaſie Entrance was made for them at all times into Normandy, and preſent occaſion given them to annoy the French; but this advantageous Alliance was not thought ſufficient to compenſate the Loſs of the Gentlemen that were kill'd, and taken Captive at the beginning of this Voyage: Yet the Spaniards did not long eſcape without Loſs; for the Ships of Baion coaſting about the Kingdom to defend it from the Enemy, took fourteen Ships laden with Wine and other Goods.

Pope Gregory's Letters againſt John Wickliffe.

In the latter end of this Year Pope Gregory XI. wrote a Letter to the King, requiring him to aſſiſt the Biſhops in ſuppreſſing John Wickliffe and his Adherents; but that the Biſhop's Heat ſtirred up by his Letters to them almoſt of the ſame Date, was little encourag'd by the King's Authority, the Favour that Wickliffe found may ſerve for a Demonſtration. The Letters from the Pope to the King and Biſhops are printed at large in Mr. Fox Acts and Mon. in the beginning of this King's Reign.

About Midſummer the Duke of Lancaſter having compleatly equipp'd his Ships, put out to Sea with a great Force, and landing in Britain, laid Siege to S. Malo de Liſle, an important Fortreſs in thoſe Parts. The Earls of Buckingham, Stafford, Warwick, and other Noblemen, who had great Experience in Warlike Affairs, manag'd it with much Art and Subtlety; but it was ſo well defended by the French, that the Duke was forced to raiſe the Siege and return home. A little after the Duke's Departure from England, viz. on Aug. 11. was committed a barbarous Murther in the Sanctuary at Weſtminſter, which whether cauſed by the Duke or not, is uncertain; yet he was ſo far concern'd in it, as that it redounded much to his Diſhonour, and increaſed the Hatred of him among the People. The Occaſion of it was this: In the War, which the Black Prince Edward had in Spain for the Reſtauration of Peter King of Caſtile and Leon, two Gentlemen Robert Hawl, and John Shakell, had by their Valour taken the Earl of Denia Priſoner; and that ſuch brave Actions might be encourag'd,

the

A. D. 1378. the Prince himſelf, and Sir John Shandois, a chief Commander under him, gave him to the Gentlemen to make the beſt of his Ranſom. The Earl being thus left in their hands, made an Agreement with them for his Liberty, and left his Son with them as an Hoſtage, till the Ranſom was paid; which the Earl neglecting, the Earl's Son remained with them many Years. The Duke of Lancaſter, who had marry'd one of the Heireſſes of the Crown of Spain, but was kept out by their Uncle, caſting about him to find out all ways how to recover his Wife's Right, thought upon the Reſtitution of the Earl of Denia's Son, whereby he might oblige his Father to engage in his Intereſt, and make a Party among his Friends for him. Wherefore the Duke ſends to Mr. Hawl and Shakell, in the King's Name, to deliver up their Priſoner; and becauſe they obſtinately refuſed, he cauſed them to be impriſon'd in the Tower. The Gentlemen, tho' thus unjuſtly handled, yet kept him; but after ſome time made their eſcape out of the Tower, and got to the Sanctuary at Weſtminſter, where they hoped to find more Liberty and kinder Uſage. The Conſtable of the Tower, Sir Allen Buxhall, a great Friend of the Duke's, much troubled at this eſcape, contriv'd with the Lord Latimer and Sir Ralph Ferrers, two of the Duke's Creatures, to take them by Force out of the Sanctuary; and accordingly with a ſufficient Strength of arm'd Men enter'd the Abby-Church when the Monks were at Prayers, and ſeiz'd upon the two Gentlemen. Mr. Hawl made ſome Oppoſition, and was ſlain in the Quire, with a Monk, and his Servant who ſtood up for his Aſſiſtance; but Mr. Shakell they carry'd away with them to the Tower, from whence he at length got his Freedom, by reſigning his Priſoner to them, upon condition, that he ſhould receive an hundred Marks per An. and that the King ſhould found a Chantry of five Prieſts to pray for the Souls of Mr. Hawl and his Servant. This Violation of the Sanctuary was ſo highly reſented by the Archbiſhop, Biſhop of London and other Biſhops, that they excommunicated all that were Aſſiſtants in this Murther, except the King, Queen, and Duke of Lancaſter; and the Biſhop of London pronounced the Excommunication every Sunday, Wedneſday, and Friday, for a long time after. The King looking upon it as a Reflection upon himſelf and the Duke, ſent to the Biſhop to ceaſe it; who not regarding the Order, he was ſummon'd to Windſor, but he would not obey: Whereupon the Duke of Lancaſter in a Rage told the King that he would fetch the Biſhop by Force to him in ſpite of thoſe Rebels the Londoners, if he would give him leave. Theſe words loſt the Duke the Good-will of the City, and made him generally thought the Author of the Murther.

Second Parliament, and the Taxes granted and Acts made in it.

On the 20th of October the Parliament met at Gloceſter, out of Diſpleaſure taken againſt the Londoners. In it many things were propounded, but few concluded; beſides that the King had granted to him a Subſidy of a Mark for every Sack of Wooll, and Sixpence in the Pound for all Foreign Commodities brought into, and ſold in the Nation. The chief things enacted were, 1. Concerning Merchant Strangers, That it ſhould be lawful for them in all Places of the Land to buy or ſell all ſorts of Commodities by Wholeſale or Retail, which was a great Encouragement to Merchandize. 2. And whereas both Pope Urban and Clement had ſent to the King, Nobles, and Biſhops, to accept each of them for lawful Popes, the Legality of both Popes Election was debated, and in Concluſion it was agreed upon and paſſed into a Law, That Pope Urban was duly choſen, and ſo ought to be accepted and obey'd; That all Benefices of the Nation, which were held and enjoy'd by ſuch Cardinals, or others of the Clergy, as were Rebels to Pope Urban, ſhould be ſeized into the King's hands, and the Profits of them anſwer'd to him; That whoſoever ſhould purchaſe or obtain any Proviſions, or other Inſtruments from any other Pope than the ſaid Urban, ſhall be put out of the King's Protection. This Law is ſaid to have been made through the Advice of the Archbiſhop. 3. That all Perſons that ſhall report any ſlanderous words, concerning any Biſhop or Nobleman, ſhall be impriſon'd till he can produce the Author of ſuch Calumnies. Some other things were propounded, but nothing enacted concerning them. The Archbiſhop complained of the late Violation of the Sanctuary of Weſtminſter, and deſired that ſome effectual Courſe might be taken to ſecure the Privileges of Sanctuaries; but the Nobles objecting the voluntary Abuſes of them maintained by the Clergy in protecting Debtors, Accountants, &c. the Archbiſhop dropp'd the Motion, leſt they ſhould be depriv'd of thoſe Advantages. Complaint alſo was made by the Commons againſt the Clergy for taking Timber as Tyth under the Notion of Silva Cædua; and it was deſired, that it might be limited to Woods of ten Years Growth, but the King anſwer'd them, That he would not alter common Uſage.

The Scots infeſt and invade England.

Soon after the Parliament was riſen Robert King of Scots raiſed an Army to invade the Borders of England, being put upon it by the King of France; and one Alexander Ramſey, a valiant Scot, with forty of his Countrymen, ſurpriz'd the Caſtle of Barwicke, and ſlaying Sir Robert Bointon, the Governour of it, with the whole Garriſon, made themſelves abſolute Maſters of it. This firſt Attempt proved not only advantageous to the fortunate Aggreſſors, who ſeized much Spoil, and put the Governour's Wife and Children to pay two thouſand Marks for their Ranſome, but open'd a freer Paſſage for the whole Army into England. The Earl of Northumberland, who had the keeping of that Caſtle and Town committed to him, as ſoon as he had received Information of it, raiſed an Army out of thoſe Parts for the Recovery of it; the Earl of Nottingham, the Lords Nevill, Lucy, Graiſtocke, and Stafford, Sir Thomas Muſgrave, and many other Knights and Gentlemen brought in their Aſſiſtance to him: So that the Earl had ſoon gotten an Army of above a thouſand Men well arm'd. With theſe he marched to Barwicke, and finding that the Townſmen had broken down the Draw-bridge, by which only the Scots could get into the Town; ſo that Ramſey and his Fellows could have no Aſſiſtance from their Army, which lay near. He laid ſiege to the Caſtle, and within nine days after his Arrival took it by a two hours Aſſault: All the Scots but Ramſey their Captain were put to Death, and he ſaved partly in reſpect to his Valour, and partly that he might diſcover the Strength and farther Deſigns of the Scotiſh Army. The Earl and Lords with the Engliſh Army being flush'd with this Succeſs, ſent out a Party of ſix hundred Men under the Command of Sir Thomas Muſgrave to purſue the Scots Army, which upon the Loſs of Barwicke were a little withdrawn into the Country: But Earl Douglaſſe watching his Opportunity, fell upon them at ſuch an Advantage, that he utterly defeated them, taking Sir Thomas himſelf, and one hundred twenty more Priſoners, the reſt hardly eſcaping by flight. In this Expedition the Earl of Northumberland's eldeſt Son Henry, behaved himſelf ſo bravely, that he was highly commended and admir'd.

A. D 1379.

About Chriſtmas Sir Robert Rouſe, who was made Governour of Chierburg the laſt Summer, and had done many brave Actions againſt the French in taking Sir Oliver Cliſſon[a], and by other adventures, was call'd home, and Sir John Herleſton put in his place. Sir Hugh Calverley alſo was remov'd from his Government of Callis, and made Admiral, being joyn'd in Commiſſion with Sir Thomas Piercy, and William Montacute Earl of Saliſbury ſucceeded Calverley as Governour of Callis. This noble Perſon began his Office with an Inroad into France, by which he took a great Booty of Cattel, and much enriched the Town. Nor was Sir Hugh leſs active againſt the Enemy by Sea, than he had been formerly by Land; for ſoon after he had ſet out, he took ſeven Merchant Ships laden with Goods, and one Man of War. The Merchants of London being angry with a Genoeſe Merchant, who had brought into Port a Ship laden with rich Spices, becauſe he would not ſell them at ſuch low Prices as they would give, but was departing to ſeek a better Market, fell upon him and ſlew him[b]; which unjuſt Action was very much reſented by the Government, and the Actors, as they could be taken, puniſhed according to their deſerts. About this time began the Popes to ſtir up an Holy War, for the Eſtabliſhment of themſelves ſingly in the Papacy, and ſent their Agents into the Nations, which ſubmitted to them, to undertake a War againſt the Antipope. The Archbiſhop of Caſſils in Ireland, who had been lately at Rome, brought with him a full power from Pope Urban to excommunicate all Perſons that ſhould hold with Clement, or uphold his Cauſe; and becauſe the French were the chief Maintainers of Clement, who had eſtabliſh'd his See at Avignion, the ſame Archbiſhop in a Sermon preach'd at London, told the People, 'That the 'French were excommunicated, and that if ever 'they could hope for ſucceſs againſt that old Ene-'my of the Nation, now was the time, when they 'would have no Courage to make Reſiſtance; or 'if they had, the powerful Curſe would ſo weaken 'their Hands, and bind them over to inevitable 'Ruin, that they would become an eaſie Prey to 'the Engliſh. Thus did the Vicar of the Prince of Peace blow up the Flames of War among Chriſtians; a very bad proof of ſo high Office, to act ſo directly contrary to the Practice of him, whoſe Deputy he pretends to be.

Third Parliament, and its Acts and Taxes.

A little after Eaſter the Parliament was aſſembled at Weſtminſter, and ſome things ſettled of moſt neceſſity. For after the King, according to the uſual Cuſtom, had confirm'd the Privileges of the Church, and the two Great Charters; the principal was about the Privileges of Sanctuaries, and particularly of that of Weſtminſter, which being found to be abuſed to protect Debtors againſt their Creditors, it was enacted, 'That all ſuch Debtors, 'as after they have made over their Goods and 'Lands by Feoffments, Deeds of Gifts, or other-'wiſe, to their Friends, and had for protection 'fled into Sanctuary, ſo defrauding their Credi-'tors, if they did not render up themſelves upon 'Proclamation made at the Gates of the Sanctua-'ry, Judgment ſhould paſs againſt them, and an 'Execution be awarded upon their Goods and 'Lands, which were without ſuch privileg'd 'places, as well ſuch as are given by Colluſion 'as otherwiſe. By this Parliament a Poll-Tax was given to the King, but with a particular Exemption of the Commons, and therefore laid the more heavy upon the Nobility and Gentry; for Dukes and Archbiſhops were to pay * twenty Marks; Biſhops, Earls, and mitred Abbots, ſix Marks; Monks, ten Groats; and Gentlemen, and all the other Clergy, at a certain Rate, none was ſpared; but the Commons paid nothing.

A Plague in the North.

This following Summer the Plague ſo afflicted the Northern Counties, that the Inhabitants were many of them forced to remove their Dwellings into other parts of the Nation; and thoſe, whom either Neceſſity or Charity oblig'd to remain there, the Scots being ſure of no reſiſtance, ſo infeſted with frequent Incurſions and Robberies, that the Country was almoſt wholly depopulated.

Reg. 3.

Duke of Britain returns home, and has aid to ſettle him.

The Duke of Britain, who in the firſt Year of this King's Reign came into England to beg the King's aſſiſtance againſt his Rebellious Subjects, who by joyning with the King of France had expell'd him out of his Dominions, was now invited home by his Nobles, to return and accept the Government of his Country. He had hitherto ſollicited with ſmall ſucceſs, becauſe the Duke of Lancaſter thought to have got his Dukedom for himſelf, and for that end went over with a powerful Army; but the Conſtable of France oppoſed him with ſo ſtrong a Force, that he was obliged to give over the thoughts of it; but now he had ſufficient Aid granted him to attend him into his Country, and greater Forces promiſed to be ſent after him. On Auguſt 4. Sir Hugh Calverley and Sir Thomas Peircy ſet him aſhoar in his own Country, where he was received by his Nobility, and all his other Subjects, with a great deal of Joy, except ſome few who held great places under the French Government, and were likely to loſe them by his coming. But becauſe it could not be expected, but the French Faction would create him great Troubles and Diſturbance; therefore on the Feaſt of St. Nicholas, Sept. 10. the Army promiſed him, to maintain him in his Dignity, was ſent after him under the Command of Sir John Arundel, Sir Thomas Baniſter, Sir Nicholas Trumpington, and Sir Thomas Delaware, with others; but in their paſſage they met with ſo terrible a Tempeſt, that they could not touch the French Shore, twenty five Ships were caſt away, moſt of the Captains drowned, and a great number of Soldiers. This unlucky Accident was look'd upon as a juſt Judgment from Heaven upon them for their Wickedneſſes, which they had commited on Shore[c], not only plundering Houſes, and robbing Churches, but raviſhing Men's Wives and Daughters, and carrying them on Board with them to ſatiate their Luſts, whom they caſt into the Sea when the Tempeſt began, and ſo inhumanly haſten'd the ruin of their Souls, as well as corrupted their Bodies.

Sir John Harleſton, and his Men, who held the Town of Chierburg, having Intelligence that the French had laid up great quantities of Proviſion in a Church and Mill adjoyning, as in Storehouſes, ſally'd out with a ſtrong Force, and poſſeſſed themſelves of them, tho' guarded and defended by the French. But in their return were encountred by Sir William de Bourd, the French Captain in Mountbergh, the Counter-Garriſon to Chierburg. The Engliſh, loth to loſe ſo ſoon what they had ſo lately gotten, ſtood upon their defence, and there follow'd a furious Battel. The French were the greateſt in Number, but the Engliſh in Reſolution, which Fortune ſo far favour'd, that by the help of a few freſh Men, who came out of the Town to their aſſiſtance, they obtain'd a compleat Victory, taking Sir William himſelf, and a hundred and twenty Priſoners. But this advantage was allay'd by as great loſs to the Engliſh ſoon after; for ſeveral Engliſh Ships lying in the Haven of Britain, under the protection of a Caſtle, then kept by the Engliſh, under the command of Sir John Clarke, a valiant Captain, the French had intelligence of it, and going with a Squadron, ſent one Ship into the Haven, either to fire them, or draw the Engliſh Ships to a purſuit of it, by which means they might come into their hands. The Engliſh, not ſuſpecting the deſign, accordingly purſu'd the Ship, and Sir John Clarke and his Men went aboard to effect the taking of it, and ſo fell into the Ambuſcade. Sir John perceiving his danger, fought bravely to free his Ships, but all was in vain, the French were too ſtrong for them; and tho' few of the Men fell into the Enemy's hand, many being kill'd, among which was the Captain himſelf, and ſome eſcaping aſhoar, they gain'd the Ships, but ſo ſhatter'd they could not carry them home.

1380. About Chriſtmas the Earl of Saliſbury was remov'd from the Lieutenancy of Callis, and Sir John Devereux was put in his place. Sir John Harleſton alſo was call'd home from Chierburg, and Sir William of Windſor ſent over to ſucceed him. About the Feaſt of St. Hilary a Parliament met at Weſtminſter, and ſate till the beginning of March. In this Parliament it was enacted, 'That ſince many 'of the richeſt Church-preferments of the Nation 'were got into the hands of Strangers, who nei'ther could nor did do their Duty in hearing 'Confeſſions, preaching to, and teaching the Peo'ple, maintaining Hoſpitality, or furthering the 'good of Men's Souls, contrary to the intent of 'the pious Donors, and the ancient Cuſtom of 'the Realm, whereby the Riches of the Nation 'was carry'd into foreign parts; therefore no 'Alien ſhould hold any Benefices in England, nor 'any Engliſhman be a Farmer, Procurator, or At'torney for ſuch Aliens, without an expreſs Li'cenſe from the King and his Council. The Commons alſo petition'd, 'That a Proviſion ſhould be 'made againſt the Pope's Collectors of the firſt 'Fruits of all Eccleſiaſtical Benefices within this 'Ream, and that all Priors Aliens might be re'mov'd out of their Houſes, and licens'd to de'part the Nation, never to return, and that Engliſhmen be put in their places, anſwering the 'King's Revenues as they did. At the Requeſt alſo of the Lords and Commons, Thomas Beauchamp Earl of Warwick was make ſole Governour of the King's Perſon, inſtead of the greater number of Biſhops and Barons, which hitherto had enjoy'd that Office, becauſe they were found burthenſome and chargeable to the Nation; and he had a competent Salary allow'd him for his Care and Attendance. This Parliament granted to the King a tenth of the Clergy, and a fifteenth of the Laity, but upon condition that the King ſhould not ſummon another Parliament till the Michaelmas twelve-month after, which tho' at preſent he aſſented to, yet was not perform'd.

A little after Eaſter, the Lady Jane de Courtney, the King's half Siſter, was marry'd to the Lord Valeran Earl of S. Paul, who having been taken Priſoner in the Marches of Callis, was kept in the Engliſh Court, and by his winning Behaviour much engag'd the young Lady's Affections to him. The Princeſs her Mother was very much againſt the Match; but fearing leſt it might be prejudicial to the young Lady to croſs her Affections, ſhe yielded, and the King gave his Conſent, and for her Dower beſtow'd upon the Earl the Mannour of Biefleet.

The Duke of Britain having been diſappointed of the Aids which he expected from England ſoon after his arrival, but were kept back by a Tempeſt, not knowing the Cauſe of the Delay, ſent a freſh Petition to the King for his aſſiſtance; whereupon ſeven or eight thouſand Men were raiſed to be conducted thither, under the Command of Thomas Woodſtocke Earl of Buckingham, Sir Thomas Peircy, Sir Hugh Calverley, Sir Robert Knowles, Sir John Harleſton, and other experienced Commanders; but to avoid the former danger by Sea, were ſet on Shoar at Callis, June 4. and ſo were to paſs through France into Britain. In their March through the Country, tho' they did much harm to the French, yet they met with no Oppoſition. The Duke of Burgundy would have fain oppoſed them, and the injur'd People were very ready and deſirous to cruſh their Inſolencies; but King Charles, being a very politick Prince, ſtrictly commanded his People not to engage them, who could have no Refuge in the midſt of their Enemies, but an irreſiſtible Boldneſs and Deſperateneſs; he order'd them to keep themſelves and Cattel cloſe in their Towns, while they paſs'd by, and in the mean time he ſo dealt with the Britains, that he made their Journey unſucceſsful; for the City of Nantz deny'd utterly to receive them, and the Britains gave them a cold welcome; which Diſappointment did more damage to the Engliſh, than the French had ſuffer'd by them, and Charles's Policy outdid their Force, tho' he liv'd not to ſee the ſucceſs of it. For that great Prince having been poiſon'd about the time that the Engliſh landed at Callis, was hardly preſerved by a German Phyſician a few Months, and dy'd Sept. 26. juſt as the Engliſh were paſſing the River Sartie, and left his Kingdom to his Son Charles VI. then but twelve Years old. This Accident might have prov'd fortunate to the Engliſh, had the Duke perſiſted in his Quarrel with France, eſpecially ſince there was a Diſſention among the French Princes of the Blood about the Regency and Government of the King's Perſon; but the Peers of Britain being more deſirous of Peace than War, and the French as willing to comply with them, the Engliſh were ſent home again, and a Peace concluded to the no ſmall diſpleaſure of the Earl of Buckingham, and his whole Army, whom to appeaſe the Duke pretended, that his Nobles over-rul'd him, and forc'd him to it; which Excuſe did not ſatisfie the angred Soldiers.

While the Engliſh under the Earl of Buckingham were paſſing France, the French and Spaniſh Gallies under the Command of the Lord Oliver de Cliſſon, and other great Men, much infeſted the Coaſts of England, eſpecially in the Weſtern parts, where they took ſeveral Ships; and at laſt, entring the Thames, burnt Graveſend, after they had plunder'd it, and ſo return'd with much Booty. About the latter end of June the Merchandizing Towns of the Weſt ſet out a Fleet to repreſs their Inſolencies, which being in purſuit of them, forced them into Ireland to Kingſale; but they were ſo aſſaulted from the Iriſh and Engliſh on both ſides, that above four hundred of them were ſlain, moſt of their Captains and Ships taken, beſides one and twenty Veſſels, which had been taken from the Engliſh, which they now recover'd; but four of the moſt deſperate of their Captains eſcaped, who being enrag'd at their loſs, got up what Force they could together, and obſerving their opportunity, came again upon the Engliſh Coaſts, robbing, killing, and burning in a more outragious manner than before; againſt whom, tho' the People oppos'd themſelves with what ſtrength they could get, and did ſome Execution upon them, yet they ſuffer'd much damage, for they burnt the Town of Winchelſea, and put the Abbot of Battel to flight, who came to defend it, as alſo Rye, Haſtings, and Portſmouth, were deſtroy'd and plunder'd by them; which having done, they retir'd for Fear.

The Scots invade England.

The Scots, who were always joyned with their old Confederates the French, in aſſaulting England, were not backward at this time to contribute their Aſſiſtance; and becauſe the French acted only as Pirates, without Declaration of War, therefore the Scots made this a Pretence of their Invaſion, that the Townſmen of Newcaſtle and Hull had taken one of their Ships worth ſix or ſeven thouſand Marks, tho' they took it not from the Scots, but from the Pirates that infeſted England. Whereupon the Scots, with a conſiderable Body of Men, enter'd Cumberland and Weſtmorland, ſpoiling and deſtroying the Country; and out of the Foreſt of Inglewood drove away forty thouſand Head of great and ſmall Cattle as was thought. It happen'd, that juſt at this time Penrith Fair was kept; of which, when the Scots had notice, they haſted thither; and finding none to oppoſe them, for the Tradeſmen, who were naked and unarm'd, hearing of their coming, had left their Goods to ſave their Lives; they ſeized upon all their Shops and Stalls, and returned loaden home by the City of Carliſle; which, tho' ſtrong enough to defend it ſelf, yet made no Reſiſtance; and ſo the Scots got ſafe into their own Country, ſave that an Ambuſh of Archers cut off ſome few of them. The Earl of Northumberland, who was the Guardian of thoſe Northern Parts, hearing of theſe Miſchiefs done by the Scots, was preparing a ſharp Revenge againſt them, but was forbidden by Letters from the King and Council to proceed againſt them, till the time of Treaty with them was paſt, that it might be known, whether they would make any Satisfaction for thoſe Wrongs or no.

A Treaty with the Scots.

About Michaelmas the Duke of Lancaſter, the Earls of Warwick and Stafford, with other Noblemen, went with a great Army into the North, and lay on the Borders to treat with the Scots. This Negotiation, which laſted long, ended in a Truce till Eaſter following, but was ſo great a Burthen to the poor Inhabitants, that they had rather have had the Scots ſtill their Enemies, than the Company of their Friends with the Army that attended them, who did them as much Injury as they could have done. The Truce was indeed no Security to the Engliſh, the Scots ever making uſe of ſuch Ceſſations of Arms to plunder England the more fearleſly; for they never obſerv'd them longer than they could gain an advantageous Opportunity to break them. While the Engliſh Army lay here, ſome treaſonable Letters were found at London by a poor Man, ſeal'd with Sir Ralph Ferrers's Arms, who was one of the King's Council, and directed to Sir Bertram Glequrn, the Lord de la River, Chamberlain of France, the Lord Gueſelin, and the Patron of the French Gallies. They were carried to Mr. John Philpott, and by him to the King and Council, who ſent him with them to the Duke of Lancaſter, that the Knight might be ſeiz'd and ſecur'd; which the Duke accordingly did, and impriſon'd him in Durham Caſtle, but upon his Examination at the next Parliament he was ſet at Liberty, four Barons being bound for his Appearance, till his Innocency could be more fully cleared.

Fifth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

The King called another Parliament to meet at Northampton in November, a place tho' not very convenient in Winter for the Entertainment of ſo great a Company, and ſo Auguſt an Aſſembly, yet was thought more fit than London at that time; becauſe he was reſolved to puniſh John Kirby, a Merchant of London, who was one of thoſe that had barbarouſly kill'd the Genoeſe Merchant: And it was feared, that his ſuffering in the City might occaſion ſome Tumult by the Intereſts of his Dependants or Friends, ſo he had his Tryal at Northampton, and was hanged. By this Parliament was granted to the King a * Tax of 6 s. 8 d. for every Prieſt and Nun, and 4 d. by the Poll upon all Perſons whatever being of the Age of fourteen Years and upward (ſuch as took Alms only excepted) which was then thought ſo conſiderable a Sum, that it raiſed a great Diſcontent among the Commons, as we ſhall ſee, when we come to the Account of the Collection of it.

A. D. 1380. Reg. 4.

Soon after the riſing of this Parliament, which was about Chriſtmas, Thomas Braintringham Biſhop of Exeter, was put out of his Office of Treaſurer, and Sir Robert Hales Lord Prior of St. John's Hoſpital in Smithfield, was put into his place; a very worthy and gallant Perſon, but not beloved of the Commons. Alſo a Marriage began to be treated of between the King and the Emperor's Siſter, and the Duke of Tarſilia and the Cardinal of S. Praxedes, came over to the King about it. The Cardinal made it a very advantageous Negotiation, for preſuming upon the King's Favour and Permiſſion, he ſold Indulgences, Confeſſional Letters, Portative Altars, Abſolutions and Diſpenſations at dear Rates to the ſuperſtitious People and Clergy, who glad of ſuch near Markets, catch'd at them eagerly, to the great enriching of the Cardinal.

The Truce with the Scots renewed.

The Truce with the Scots being now juſt upon the Expiration, the Duke of Lancaſter was ſent into Scotland to procure a Continuation of the Truce for a longer time, viz. three Years. The Duke was the more zealous to promote a firm Peace at home, becauſe he had an Opportunity put into his hand, as he thought, of recovering his Wife's Right to the Crown of Spain, by a Breach between the King of Portugal and the Uſurper. The former had ſent to the Duke to aſſiſt him, and he diſpatch'd away his Brother Edmund Earl of Cambridge, with the Lords William Beauchamp and Botreux, and Sir Matthew Gourney, with a conſiderable Force to help him, intending to follow himſelf with greater Strength as ſoon as things were put into a ſettled Poſture at home; but while he was endeavouring to lengthen the Peace with a Foreign Nation, an unexpected Diſturbance, but very dangerous one, aroſe at home among the People upon this Occaſion.

An Expedition into Portugal.

The Rebellion of Jack Straw, and the Occaſions of it.

The Collection of the Poll-Tax, which was ſo much diſpleaſing to the Common People, began in the Spring, and, being manag'd by indiſcreet and uncivil Officers, raiſed ſuch Diſcontents in moſt Counties of England, that they were every where almoſt ripe for Rebellion: For tho' 'tis probable the ſevere exacting of ſo ſmall a Sum would not have raiſed ſuch Combuſtions alone, yet meeting with other Grounds of Diſſatisfaction, which the People had long ſmother'd, it ſwelled them to ſo big a Bulk, that they could not be kept longer in. The Government of the Duke of Lancaſter, the Exactions and Corruptions of Lawyers and Attorneys, and the Oppreſſion from Lords of Manors by their Tenures of Villanage, had ſat very uneaſie upon their Shoulders a great while, and they longed for a Deliverance from both; but more eſpecially from the inſupportable Burthens of their Lords, whoſe Slaves and Servants they generally were, doing all their Work and Drudgery, as plowing, ſowing, carrying their Dung, cutting their Wood, and carrying it to their Houſes, which being a great Avocation from their own Buſineſs, and Diſadvantage to their Labours, they were glad of a juſt Cauſe and Opportunity of vindicating their Liberty. And this they were much the more encourag'd to do by the Sermons of a ſeditious Prieſt, nam'd John Ball, who in his Popular Diſcourſes told the Commons, 'That 'all Men were equal by Nature; That as Chil-'dren of Adam no Man is better than another; 'That if God had appointed any Man to Slave-'ry, he would have declared, who ſhould be 'Lords, and who Servants; That Servitude, 'which is gotten by unjuſt Force, is confirmed 'by as unjuſt Laws; and therefore he adviſed 'them to go to the King and require their Li-'berty, which if they could not obtain, to re-'cover it with their Swords. Whether theſe Inſtigations had produced any ſettled Reſolutions in the People to eaſe themſelves after that manner, is uncertain [a]; but that they made them more ready to lay hold of a ſlight Occaſion to rebel, is out of Queſtion, and ſo were the chief means to raiſe that Flame, which the Poll-Tax ſerved but as a Pretence to. This Rebellion firſt began at Dartmouth in Kent, where a rude Collector of the Poll-Groats having offer'd ſome Incivility to [b] one Jack Tyler's Daughter, created a Quarrel with the Father; which coming to Blows, Tyler being a Thatcher, with his thatching Staff [c] beat out his Brains. The Fact was applauded by his Neighbours, but yet fearing he ſhould be puniſh'd for it, they gather'd together for his Defence, and in a ſhort time were become a large Multitude [d] able to defend themſelves againſt any Force almoſt whatſoever: For not only the People of Kent, but Eſſex united themſelves in one Body, and as if his Cauſe were common to them all, reſolv'd to vindicate themſelves and him from all ſuch unjuſt Oppreſſions and Abuſes. Wat. Tyler became the Head and Captain of this Rabble, which being ſo ſtrong as he thought to be beyond all Reſiſtance, and able to vindicate themſelves from all Wrongs, which they in their own Opinions ſuſtained from their Superiors; he firſt engag'd them each to other with an Oath, 'That they would be true to King 'Richard, and the Intereſts of the Commons of 'England; That they never would receive a 'John (meaning the Duke of Lancaſter) for their 'King; That they would perſuade all their 'Neighbours to joyn in the ſame Cauſe, and 'would never yield to the Payment of any Tax, 'but a 15th. Being firmly united by this Oath, they began their March from Maidſtone, where their firſt Rendezvous was, towards London, plundering all that would not joyn with them in their Paſſage. At Blackheath they had a general Muſter, where they appeared to be ſixty thouſand, or as others ſay, an hundred thouſand ſtrong. The King hearing of the Approach of ſo great a Multitude in an Army, ſent to them to know the Cauſe of their tumultuous meeting, and they ſent him word, 'That they were come to ſpeak 'with him about Matters of Importance, and 'deſired him to come to them. The Meſſage being related to the King, it was debated in the Council, whether he ſhould go to them or no: Some thought it the beſt way to appeaſe them, but Simon Sudbury, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Chancellor, and Sir Robert Hales the Treaſurer, were utterly againſt it, as not ſafe for the King's Perſon. This Advice was taken, and the Rebels Petition rejected, which as ſoon as they heard the Authors of, they vow'd they would cut off their Heads; but the King fearing that this Denial would provoke them, he went down by Water as far as Rotherhith to talk with them. They were pleaſed with his Preſence, and petition'd him to come a-ſhore among them, but that would not be granted: So that this new Diſtruſt created a greater Diſpleaſure againſt the King's Miniſters, and Perſons about him.

Rebels come to London, and their Actions there.

As ſoon as the King had left them, they marched forward to London, and on Corpus Chriſti Day, June 2. enter'd Southwark; where they plunder'd the rich Houſe-keepers, let out the Priſoners of the Marſhalſea and Kings-Bench, whom they liſted into their own Company. The Mayor and chief Men of the City adher'd firmly to the King, and ſhut up their Gates againſt them; but the Commonalty taking their part, and the Rebels themſelves threatning to burn all the Borough of Southwark, unleſs they had free Acceſs into the City; they were forced to open the Gates to them, as well for their own as Friends Safety. And now being Maſters of all the Wealth and Power of the Nation, they made no Law for their Actions, but their own Will; the Wine-Cellars and Shambles yielded them Dainties for their Bellies and Palates, and every Banker's Shop was their Treaſury. The meaneſt Peaſant knew no Want, when abundance of all things was at hand: But theſe Lawleſs Actions they juſtified by their Zeal for the common Good, and taking off ſuch as they called the Enemies of the publick, which they were not ſparing in the Execution of, or in deſtroying their Houſes and Poſſeſſions. For they burnt the Archbiſhop's Palace at Lambeth, and the Duke of Lancaſter's Houſe in the Savoy, with all their rich Furniture and Goods; which, as if they had been devoted to God, they would ſuffer no Man to reſcue from the Flames; but when one of their Company took a piece of Plate, and put it in his Boſom, they caſt him into the Fire. S. John's Hoſpital in Smithfield alſo they ſet on fire, and the Manor of Highbury, belonging to it. All the Profeſſors of the Law, which they could get into their Power, they put to Death; and entring into the Temple, they deſtroy'd all the Rolls or Records of the Chancery which they could find, with all Law-Books and Writings of the Students, and ſo they dealt with the other Inns of Court. They divided themſelves into three parts to prevent any Oppoſition, and remained one part in the City under Jack Straw, another at Mile-End [e], and a third at Tower-Hill [f]. The King and his Guards (tho' twelve hundred) were ſo much afraid of them, that they allow'd them to come into the Tower, and took out from thence the Archbiſhop Simon Sudbury, then Chancellor, and Sir Robert Hales the Treaſurer, and beheaded them on Tower-Hill. In the City alſo they were very ſevere to Foreigners, eſpecially the Flem-

Their Shibboleth to discern them by, was to pronounce the words Bread and Cheese, which if they could not do, but said as usually, Brot and Cause, they instantly beheaded them. Wat. Tyler's private Revenge in beheading his old Master, Richard Lyon, in Cheapside, for his necessary Severity to him when he was his Apprentice, much stain'd their glorious Pretences of reforming publick Disorders, and punishing bad Ministers of the State. Nor was it very agreeable to the Justice they pretended to observe, to open the Prisons of Newgate and the Compters, and let out those Pests of Societies, Thieves, Burglers, and other disorderly Persons, burning their Registers, that in more settled times they might not be again apprehended: But so it for the most part happens, Hypocrites can't keep the Vizzard on so close, but their Pretences will be seen through, and their disagreeing Actions betray the Wickedness of their Designs.

The King compassionating the Miseries of his People, which by force he was unable to relieve, consulted with his Council about such Courses as were best to be taken to prevent them; and upon deliberation it was advised, That since Rebels, tho' strong, are yet timorous, the King should offer them all Pardon for their former Offences, and give them Charters of Freedom to confirm their Liberties for the future. The greatest part of the Rebels accepted of the King's Favour, and especially the Essex Men, who sorry for their Disloyalty, departed immediately home, leaving only some of their chief Men to get their Pardon and Charter of Freedom pass'd and sign'd. But

Wat. Tyler Captain of the Kentish Rebels.

Wat. Tyler, and his Kentish-Men, which were about twenty thousand, still continued unsatisfy'd, and persisted in their mischievous Actions of plundering and killing whom they pleas'd. The King and his Council made larger Proposals to him, but nothing would be accepted, tho' he pretended he would be quiet upon reasonable Conditions; which that the King might know, and comply with for the Peace of the Nation, he with many of his Nobility, the Mayor and Aldermen of London, and his Guards, went into Smithfield, and sent one of his Attendants, Sir John Newton, to summon Tyler to a Parley with him. Sir John thinking it Condescension enough in the King to send for so mean a Subject, hasten'd Tyler to attend upon his Majesty; but he told him, he would come at his own time; and tho' he set forward, yet did it so slowly, as if he had been as great a King, which he dream'd he should soon be, and the King were to wait upon him. His delays caused Sir John to be sent again, and to quicken his pace, without respect to him; which so angred the proud Rebel, that he drew his Dagger at him to kill him; and tho' he was in the King's Presence, would not lay aside his Fury: Whereupon Sir John was commanded by the King to deliver up his Dagger to Tyler, and submit[b]. When the King and Tyler came together, as he gave very little Respect to the King, so his Demands were very unreasonable; for he required, That the ancient Laws of the Land should be abolished; That the Sword, which was carry'd before the King, should be deliver'd to him; and many other insolent matters, unfit to be granted. William Walworth the Mayor of London, and John Philpot an Alderman, both Men of as undaunted Courage as zealous Loyalty, told the King, That the rude Behaviour of Tyler to him was intolerable, and desired that the Mayor might have liberty to arrest him, being in his Jurisdiction. The King doubting the issue of such an Attempt, which their Passion would not suffer them to consider, was very unwilling to permit them, but at last yielded; and Walworth immediately with his Sword struck him from his Horse[c], and being seconded with Philpot, and others that stood by, they kill'd him. The Rabble seeing their Captain dead, presently incited one another to revenge his Blood, and bent their Bows to shoot at his Murtherers, as they call'd them. The King considering their unavoidable danger, though but fifteen Years of Age, rode bravely up to the People, and said, What will you kill your King? Be not troubled for the loss of your Leader, I will be your Captain, and grant you what you desire. These Words had so great an influence upon them, that they laid aside their Intentions, and march'd with the King into St. George's Fields, as sure to obtain their Requests of him. In the mean time, Walworth posted into the City, and brought back with him a thousand Citizens well arm'd, who waited under Sir Robert Knowles to give the King assistance, when it was most seasonable; and upon this notice, immediately march'd in good order into the Fields to the King. The Rabble were amaz'd at their approach, and flung down their Weapons, begging the King's Pardon; which being obtain'd, they fled, and got home as fast as they could. The Nobles and others that attended the King, desired him to execute three or four hundred of them instantly for a terror to others; but the King would by no means consent to it, and only order'd, that the City should give them no entertainment, and that the Heads of them should be apprehended, and legally punish'd. The Tumult being thus compos'd, the King sensible of the Service which Walworth and Philpot had done him, with so great hazard of their Lives, conferr'd the honour of Knighthood upon them and some other Aldermen, John Standish, Nicholas Brambre, John Lawnd, and Nicholas Twiford; and as a perpetual Memorial of the City's Loyalty, commanded the Dagger to be added to their Arms, and gave also an hundred Pound per Annum to Walworth, and forty Pound per Annum to all the rest. After this success, the King return'd to the Tower, where he was receiv'd by his Mother with much Joy, and the more, because she knew him to be in great danger of Life from the numerous and heady Rout of his rebellious Subjects.

While the former Commotions were about London, the Commons in other parts of the Nation raised the like Stirs and Tumult, under the same Pretences, being instigated by the Emissaries of the Kentish Rebels, John Ball and John Wraw, two seditious Priests, who had a special Talent of Haranguing the Rabble into Discontents and Rebellion. In Suffolk, about St. Edmundsbury, they were gather'd together into a Body of fifty thousand, under the Command of Robert Westbroom an Inkeeper, and John Wraw the abovementioned lewd Priest, as his Assistant. They made it their business also to go about the Country to plunder and murther Lawyers, Justices, and all such as they imagin'd to be the Instruments of [a] This cannot be right, for Mr. Lyons was a very eminent Merchant, the same that had been in the former Reign condemn'd in a great Fine to the King for several Misdemeanours, and Alice Peirce begg'd it off for him when she was in favour. So 'tis not probable, that Wat the Thatcher or the Tyler was ever Prentice to him.

[b] He was angry with the Knight, because he did not dismount in his Presence, but presum'd to talk to him on Horseback.

[c] Sir William Walworth seeing Tyler begin to meddle with the Bridle of the King's Horse, and play'd with his Dagger, shifting it from one Hand to the other, was afraid he meant some mischief to his Royal Person, and struck him on the Head with his his Dagger; Alderman Philpot seconded the Blow with his Sword, and so the Rebel came down.

the People's Slavery. Theſe beheaded Sir John Cavendiſh Lord Chief Juſtice, who had his Dwelling in thoſe parts, and the Prior of Bury, John of Cambridge[a], forcing the Monks of the Abby to bring forth and burn thoſe Writings, by which the Privileges of the Monaſtery over the Townſmen were granted and confirmed; and leſt the Abbot, who eſcap'd from them, ſhould recover his former Immunities of them, they put a Croſs, Chalice, and other Jewels belonging to the Monaſtery into their hands, that the Abbot ſhould be oblig'd to ſeal a Releaſe of all Services to them for the recovery of them. In Cambridgeſhire alſo and the Iſle of Ely there were the like tumults, and many miſchiefs done by the ſeditious People, who ſhrunk away upon the firſt Proclamation of Pardon, and ſav'd themſelves. But in Norfolk, tho' they were as forward in diſquieting the Nation, yet they were not ſo wiſe to ſecure themſelves. John Litteſter, a Dyer of Norwich, whom they ſtiled King of the Commons, headed a vaſt Rabble, and with the ſame mad Fury deſtroy'd the Lawyers, Lords of Mannours, and ſuch as they believ'd Inſtruments of their Slavery. Theſe were, as they thought, more politick than their Fellows in other parts, in compelling ſeveral Gentlemen of that Country to joyn with them to increaſe their Numbers, and make themſelves the more Conſiderable, as the Lord Scales, Sir William Morley, Sir John Brewes, Sir Stephen Hales, and Sir Robert Salle. This laſt was too Loyal to comply with ſuch a rebellious Rout, and too Bold to keep his Sentiments of their wicked and unjuſt Actions to himſelf; wherefore reproving both their Attempt, and the ill Conduct of it, he was knock'd on the Head by them. The reſt ſav'd their Lives with ſuch ſervile Compliances as were worſe than an honourable Death, for they were forced to ſerve Litteſter at Table upon their Knees[b], and outwardly applaud his brave Endeavours for the People's Liberties. They ſought to have brought William Ufford Earl of Suffolk to the ſame Union with them, but he had ſome notice of their Intentions, and ſo timely made his eſcape, and went to the King. When the Proclamation of Pardon to the Rebels about London was publiſhed, they had news of it; but whether they ſuppoſed themſelves not included in it, or whether they diſputed with themſelves about accepting it, is uncertain; yet they kept together in a Body, and ſent three of their chief Leaders, with Sir John Brewes and Sir William Morley, with ſtore of Money[c] to obtain their Pardon. The Biſhop of Norwich, Henry Spencer, a Man of a Warlike Spirit, tho' a Clergyman, being zealous to purge his Dioceſs of ſuch Troublers of the Nation, was at the ſame time coming down with a ſmall Force, of eighty Lances, and a few Archers, and hoped by the aſſiſtance of ſuch as continued Loyal in his Dioceſs, to rout the Rebels. The Meſſengers from the Mutineers met the Biſhop near New-Market, who queſtion'd them about their Buſineſs, Company, and the People in Arms; and finding that three of the chief of the Rebels were with them, and that their Camp lay at North-walſham ſtrongly entrench'd, the Biſhop being hot in the purſuit of them, beheaded the three Leaders, ſet up their Heads at New-Market, and haſting forward with Sir William Morley and Sir John Brewes, gather'd an Army of ſuch Gentlemen and Commons, as flock'd to them in their paſſage; which making up no inconſiderable Body, the Biſhop aſſaulted their Camp, and routed them, tho' with ſome difficulty. Litteſter, and ſeveral others of his Aſſociates, he beheaded; but Wraw, with ſeveral Priſoners, were ſent up to London to receive the juſt Puniſhment of their Demerit. Thus was the Rebellion ended, and almoſt as ſoon ſuppreſſed as raiſed, not continuing above three Weeks, or thereabouts, from the beginning to the end of May, the heady Rabble wanting Skill and Courage to maintain their bad Cauſe.

The King raiſes an Army.

The Nation being thus a little appeaſed, tho' not ſettled, the Governours with the young King thought it neceſſary, for the compleating of its Quiet for the future, to raiſe a good Army of ſuch as were firmly Loyal to the King, who might be able to ſuppreſs any Inſurrections hereafter, which were not a little to be feared, becauſe the Commons were yet in a ferment, and they had reſolv'd to puniſh many of the Leaders of the Rebellion, that were in Cuſtody in ſeveral places of the Nation, with as great ſeverity as their Crimes deſerv'd, which would probably incenſe the People, and cauſe new Stirs. The King thereupon call'd all his Friends together about London, and ſent into the Country to ſuch as he knew to be Men well-affected, and Perſons of Intereſt, to attend him, and bring what Men they could with them well arm'd; by which means he got in a few Days a gallant Army of above forty thouſand Men, which he muſter'd himſelf in Perſon at Black-heath with great pleaſure and ſatisfaction. As ſoon as this Force was got together about the King, news was brought him, that the Commons were riſen again in two parts, viz. in Kent, and in Eſſex about Billerica. The King, whether tired with the former Provocations, or exalted with the Preſence of his Army, which he wanted before, forgot all his former Gentleneſs, and immediately reſolv'd to go himſelf into Kent, and deſtroy the whole Country, and to ſend the Earl of Buckingham and Lord Piercy to repreſs the Eſſex-Men, to whoſe Petition for Liberty, though promiſed before, he reply'd, that [d]Slaves they were, and Slaves they ſhould be. But the Lords, by their earneſt Perſuaſions, allay'd the Fierceneſs of his Paſſion, and brought him to yield to more gentle and legal ways of proceeding againſt them. So the Earl of Buckingham, and Sir Thomas Piercy, with a good ſtrength of Men, went into Eſſex, and finding the Rebels entrench'd between Billerica and Hatfield Peverell, within Ditches and Carts; they aſſaulted their Camp, kill'd five hundred of them, and took eight hundred Horſes, the reſt eſcaping towards Colcheſter, which they ſollicited in vain to joyn with them, and from thence went to Sudbury. The Lord Fitz-Walter and Sir John Harleſton with a Body of Men purſu'd them ſo hard, that they ſlew and took them almoſt all Priſoners, and committed them to ſeveral Gaols in their own County. And with the like ſucceſs did the King's Army ſubdue the ſeditious People of Kent. After the Compoſure of theſe Diſturbances, there appear'd a general Quietneſs over the Nation, which made way for the Puniſhment of thoſe Captains of the Rebels which were reſerv'd for Juſtice.

Jack Straw's Confession.

Sentence of Condemnation, to be beheaded; which was executed on them accordingly. Jack Straw, without any Promiſes, or Hopes of Pardon, ingenuouſly confeſſed at his Execution, 'That if they had been ſucceſsful in their Enterprize, and could have gotten all the Power into their hands, as they had no ſmall Reaſon to hope, being ſo very ſtrong, they intended to have ſlain the King, Noblemen, Biſhops, Monks, Canons, Parſons, and all the richeſt and wealthieſt of the Commons, and ſeiz'd upon their Poſſeſſions, leaving only the Fryars Mendicants to adminiſter Sacraments and divine Service: And when they had thus gotten all into their hands, they would have eſtabliſhed new Laws for the Government of the Realm, which they had contrived to divide among their Leaders; Wat Tyler was to be King of Kent, and others of them in other Countries were to have their petty Kingdoms. This, he ſaid, was true, as God ſhould help him in thoſe his laſt Moments. John Ball, who was taken about Coventry, was ſent up to the King, and try'd before him at S. Albans, with other of the Rebels, brought thither from Hartford Goal. Ball behaved himſelf with very great Irreverence to the King; and tho' he was adviſed to ſubmit and beg pardon, he ſcorn'd and deſpis'd his Monitors: So he was condemn'd and executed with fifteen others, July 15th. As for the reſt, the King ſent out his Judges with Commiſſions into the ſeveral Counties of the Nation to try them. Sir Robert Treſilian, Chief Juſtice, went into Eſſex, and the King himſelf accompany'd him at their Examinations. The Eſſex Men in a Body of about five hundred Men, addreſs'd themſelves bare-foot to the King for Mercy, and had it granted upon condition, That they ſhould deliver up to Juſtice the chief Inſtruments of ſtirring up the Rebellion; which being accordingly done, they were immediately try'd and hang'd ten or twelve, on a Beam at Chelmsford; becauſe they were too many to be executed after the uſual manner, which was by beheading. In other Counties alſo, where the Rebellion had come, were the like Executions done; and the Lords of Manors dealt with the like Severity with their Tenants, and puniſh'd many of them with Death: So that in divers places of England, no leſs than fifteen hundred are computed to have ſuffer'd for this their Diſloyalty; by which means the Miſchiefs they did to others, and the Blood they ſhed, was juſtly return'd upon themſelves.

Wickliffe's Doctrines no cauſe of this Rebellion.

This Rebellion hath ſince been imputed to Wickliffe and his Followers Principles, of whom John Ball is ſaid to have been one; but that this is an Aſperſion invented by Monkiſh Hiſtorians, to blacken the Proteſtant Doctrines, may appear from hence, that the Rebels were very cruel to ſome of the chief Followers of Wickliffe, as the Duke of Lancaſter; and that Wickliffe himſelf, then reſiding upon his Parſonage of Lutterworth in Leiceſterſhire, was never called in Queſtion for this Rebellion; and tho' John Ball, who was a Franciſcan Friar, was ſaid to be impriſon'd by the Archbiſhop for preaching Wickliffe's Doctrine; yet 'tis probable his Diſcontents, not Opinions, made him forward to promote theſe Diſturbances of the Nation, and therefore neither Wickliffe nor his Doctrines were to blame.

The Duke of Lancaſter was all the time of theſe Commotions in Scotland, not ſo much to conclude the Peace, which upon the firſt News of them he ſuddenly clapt up; becauſe if the Scots had heard of them, they would certainly have rejected all Propoſitions for it, as to ſecure his own Perſon, to whom he knew they bore a deadly Hatred. The Scots, tho' vexed that the Duke had by his Policy debarr'd them from a great Advantage upon England by it, yet offer'd him twenty thouſand Men to guard himſelf againſt the Rebels, if he purpoſed to return home; or if he thought it better to ſtay till the Storm was ſpent, the Accommodations of Holy-rood Houſe; but the Duke accepted the latter, and abode ſome Months in Scotland extraordinary. This gave the tumultuous Multitude occaſion to report, That the Duke of Lancaſter was gone over to the Scots, and had obtained of them an Army to invade and conquer England; but as ſoon as the Rebellion was allay'd, the Duke cleared himſelf of that foul Aſperſion, by ſending a Meſſage to the King to give an account of the Reaſons of his ſtay; yet aſſuring his Majeſty, That if he had any Suſpicion of his Diſloyalty, he would either come to him without any Attendance, or at his Command go into a voluntary Exile. But the King giving no Credit to the Report, ſent him word, That he might return with his Retinue; and being come to Court, gave him an hearty welcome. Soon after his Arrival there happen'd a furious Quarrel between the Duke of Lancaſter and Earl of Northumberland; becauſe Sir Matthew Redman, Governour of Barwicke under the Earl, had deny'd the Duke Admittance into that Garriſon, when he was on the Borders of Scotland, by the Earl's Order. This Act the Duke complain'd of to the King in the Earl's Preſence, and accus'd him of Ingratitude, Unfaithfulneſs and Diſobedience. The Earl being a Man of an high and angry Spirit, burſt out into foul and reproachful Language againſt the Duke; and was ſo very furious, that tho' the King commanded him Silence, yet he would not hold in his reproachful Language. Whereupon the King commanded him to be arreſted and impriſon'd; but the Earls of Warwick and Suffolk undertaking for his Appearance at the next Parliament, he was left at Liberty, and returned into his own Country. About this time the King made William Courtney, Biſhop of London, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was a zealous Oppoſer of Wickliffe and his Followers.

Sixth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

About the beginning of November the Parliament met at Weſtminſter, and the Earl of Northumberland, and Duke of Lancaſter attended it; but with very large Retinues of armed Men, to the great Terrour of all Places where they came. The Earl and his Company were lodg'd in the City, and the Duke with his Men in the Suburbs, and both went every day to the Parliament Houſe with their Guards, to the Amazement of the Citizens. The Quarrel between theſe two great Perſonages was firſt debated by the Houſes, and took up ſo much time before it was fully decided by the King, that News was brought of the Queen's Arrival at Dover, before they could proceed to any other Buſineſs; and ſo the Parliament was prorogued to give Attendance upon her Reception, and the Celebration of the Marriage: For many of the Nobility, and others of the Parliament, were ſent to receive her, and convey her honourably to the King's Preſence. Before ſhe came to London, the Mayor and Aldermen, with a great Company of the chief Citizens, met her at Blackheath, and led her into their City with great Honour and Reſpect; from whence ſhe was conducted in Triumph to the King at Weſtminſter. Within a few days ſhe was marry'd to the King by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, by the Name of Ann, the Daughter of the late Emperor Charles IV. and Siſter to Winceſlaus the preſent Emperor. Theſe Solemnities being ended, the Parliament met again ſoon after the Feaſt of Epiphany, and ſettled many good Laws for the publick Benefit: For after the Confirmation of the Liberties of the Church, the great Charters, and many old Laws found by Experience conducible to the Nation's Welfare, they eſtabliſh'd ſeveral new ones, viz. That no Gold or Silver ſhould be carry'd out of the Realm, either in Coin, or otherwiſe; it being found then, as well as now, that Traffick with ready Money impoveriſhes the Nation. That all Merchants, that were the King's Subjects, ſhould traffick in Engliſh Bottoms only. That no Wines ſhould be ſold for above ſix Marks by the Tun. That all Manumiſſions, Obligations, Releaſes, and other Bonds made by Force and Compulſion in the late Tumults, as being againſt the Laws of the Land, ſhould be void. That it ſhould be lawful for the King's Loyal Subjects to ſeize and apprehend all Perſons, whom they ſuſpect to be riotouſly aſſembled, if there be in number above ſix or ſeven, without the King's Writ, and impriſon them till they are brought to anſwer it. That ſuch Perſons as out of Zeal to the Safety of the King and Peace of the Realm, had taken up Arms to repreſs and ſubdue the Rebels without a ſpecial Commiſſion from the King, ſhould be all pardon'd. That ſuch Perſons, as in the late Troubles had loſt their Charters, Releaſes, Obligations, Deeds, and other Monuments, (for the Rebels burnt many, and deſtroy'd them) upon their Petition to the King and his Council, and a Proof of the Contents of the Form and Tenure of them, their Rights, Titles, and Privileges, ſhould be confirm'd otherwiſe to them. That Strangers might perſonally ſell their Goods in London, without Impeachments to the Merchants of England. That no Furs nor Girdles garniſh'd with Gold or Silver, ſhould be worn, with ſome other Laws concerning the Regulation of Courts of Law, and Officers Fees. By this Parliament a Subſidy call'd a Maletoſt (which is a fiftieth part) was impoſed upon all Wools bought or ſold by the Merchants, and at the Requeſt of the Lords and Commons, the Lord Scroop, a Perſon eminent for his Knowledge and unbiaſs'd Integrity, was made Chancellor, and Sir Hugh Segrave Treaſurer, thoſe great Places remaining vacant ever ſince the Rebellion, wherein the Archbiſhop and Sir Robert Hales were ſlain *.

The Death of the Earl of March in Ireland.

About this time Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March, Lieutenant in Ireland, dy'd in that Nation. He was nearly ally'd to the Crown by the Marriage of Philippa the only Daughter of Lionel Duke of Clarence, by whom he had large Poſſeſſions in the Province of Ulſter; and by his prudent Government, had before his Death ſettled that barbarous People in great Peace and Order; he left one Son, Roger, who ſucceeded him in the Earldom of March, and a Daughter, Ann, who by Richard Earl of Cambridge was Grandmother to King Edward IV. John Wickliffe alſo publiſhed an Explication of ſeveral of his Doctrines and Opinions, which the Archbiſhop and Biſhops were very zealous to ſuppreſs; as Mr. Fox, and our Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtories relate it.

Seventh Parliament its Acts and Taxes.

On the Tueſday after the Feaſt of S. John Portlatine, May 6. another Parliament met at Weſtmin- ſter; in which, at the earneſt Petition of the Knights of the Shires, John Wraw, a Prieſt, who had been active in raiſing the Rebellion in Suffolk, was tried, and after a Legal Sentence drawn and hang'd. In this Parliament, among other things of leſs Importance, one Act very memorable is ſaid to have been made, which began the firſt Perſecution that ever was among the Engliſh for the Chriſtian Religion, on the Followers of Wickliffe. By it it was enacted, That Commiſſions ſhould, upon the Certificate and Requeſt of the Biſhops into the Chancery, be directed by the Chancellor to the Sheriffs, and others, to apprehend certain Preachers of Hereſie, who without the Licence of their Ordinaries, preached not only in Churches and Church-yards, but in Market-places, and other Places of Concourſe, Sermons full of Errors and Hereſie, and their Followers, and to keep them in ſtrong Priſon until they ſhall juſtifie themſelves according to the Law of the Holy Church. By Authority of this Act, the Biſhops not only proceeded with great Severity againſt the Followers of Wickliffe's Doctrine, but as if the Power had been in their own hands, they procured Commiſſions from the King directed to themſelves to proſecute them; and ſo cruelly impriſon'd them in their own Houſes, and puniſh'd them as they pleaſed. But this Act, tho' put in our Statute-Books, was not paſſed by the Aſſent of the Commons (as Mr. Fox in his Acts and Mon. p. 406. ſhews) but was fraudulently procured of the King by the Biſhops to gratifie their own bloody Malice againſt thoſe whom they pleaſed to call Hereticks. A Subſidy was granted to the King by this Parliament, but upon condition, That it ſhould be expended upon a Navy to guard the Nation by Sea.

Several memorable things happen'd.

This Summer ſome Ships that belong'd to Rye, and the adjacent Towns, meeting with ſome Pirates engag'd them, and overcoming them took ſeven of their Ships (of which one was an Engliſh Ship, call'd the Falcon, belonging to the Lord Latimer) richly laden with Wine, Wax, and other Merchandize, which they had taken from others. Alſo [b] John Northampton, alias Comberton, Mayor of London, obſerving with Sorrow the Lewdneſs and Debaucheries of the Citizens, ſet himſelf with all Diligence to ſuppreſs them; and ſeverely puniſh'd all ſuch as he found guilty of Whoredom, by impriſoning both Sexes, and cauſing the Women to be carry'd thro' the Streets of London with their Hair ſhorn, as Thieves were in thoſe days uſually expos'd to Shame, with Trumpets and Pipes going before them; nor did he ſpare the Men more. The Biſhops pretending, that the Puniſhment of ſuch Immoralities belonged to their Juriſdiction rather than the Mayor's, were highly diſpleaſed with him, and forbad him; but that did not in the leaſt deter him from proceeding in ſo good a Work, ſo long as his Power laſted, tho' againſt the Biſhop's Will, who ought to have encourag'd him. Whether this uneven Zeal of the Church-men againſt Opinions and Doctrines, more than vicious Practices, were the cauſe of thoſe fearful Judgments which happen'd at the ſame time they were carrying on their Proſecutions, is hard for us peremptorily to determine; but certain it is, that many heavy Calamities befel the Nation at this time. Such an Earthquake was felt, as not only wrought great Terrours in the Inhabitants, but ſhook down divers Churches and Houſes in the Nation, and

Reg. 6.

King's Diſpoſition at ſeventeen Years of Age.

The King, being now in his ſeventeenth Year, began to diſcover his Inclinations and Affections. He lov'd the State and Magnificence of a King, and was very Noble, Generous and Liberal, outgoing all his Anceſtors in ſtately Equipages, and the pompous Gallantry of a Court; but he lov'd not the burthenſome Cares and dangerous Atchievements of a Crown, giving himſelf up to Pleaſures and Eaſe, and favouring ſuch as moſt encouraged and applauded him by their Flatteries and Company in that courſe of Life. His beſt Friends, and wiſeſt Counſellors, knowing how much ſuch a Life was inconſiſtent with the Greatneſs and Intereſts of a King, could not countenance his Choice, but much diſapproved his Actions, to which he being too fondly addicted, and beyond all compulſive Reſtraints, became averſe to the Perſons and Counſels of ſuch as really tender'd his Advantage, and the flouriſhing State of his Reign, and pleaſed himſelf in the Company and Careſſes of thoſe Perſons which ſought to pleaſe him, with advantage to themſelves, magnifying his Power, and extolling that Life of Eaſe and Pleaſure which he naturally lov'd, as moſt ſuitable to the Happineſs and State of a King. The chief of theſe Men were Alexander Nevill Archbiſhop of York, Robert de Vere Earl of Oxford, a young and ſprightly Nobleman, Michael de la Poole a Merchant's Son of London, and Sir Robert Treſcilian Chief Juſtice. Theſe Men had the Ear, the Company and Favour of the King, whilſt others bore the heavy Toils and Troubles of Government, and ſcarce received Thanks for their pains; which raiſed Diſcontents in the one, and Pride and Inſolency in the other; Paſſions which can never ſubſiſt long quietly together, as this Accident diſcovers to us: One of theſe Favourites having obtain'd a Conceſſion of ſome part of the King's Revenues, went to the Lord Chancellor, Richard Scroop, to have it confirm'd by the Great Seal. The Chancellor, conſidering that Gifts are the Rewards of Deſerts only, and that it was hardly agreeable to the Truſt repoſed in him, to confirm ſuch Grants raſhly as the King had given indiſcreetly, put him off with this Anſwer, 'That the King was himſelf much in 'debt, and that all Profits of the Crown were 'therefore to be employ'd to the benefit of the 'King; wherefore he refuſed to ſet his Seal to 'ſuch Grants till the King was of greater Age and 'Judgment. The angry Petitioner goes immediately to the King, and with Aggravations of the Chancellor's Diſobedience, repreſents his Denial to him. The King, impatient of all Oppoſition at beſt, but much more now, being enrag'd by the Inſtigations of ſuch as were about him, ſent immediately to him to deliver up the Seal; but the Chancellor, having been put into that Office by the Parliament, refuſed to reſign it, till the King came himſelf in Perſon and demanded it of him; to whom he, with all due Reſpect, ſaid at his parting with it, 'That ſince his Fidelity to his Inte-'reſts was ſo diſpleaſing to him, he never would 'again ſerve him in any place of Truſt, tho' he 'would obey him as a good Subject. The King having thus gotten the Seal, gave it [a] to Robert Braybrooke Biſhop of London. And tho' he pleaſed himſelf and Favourites in thus transferring that great Office, yet it much diſguſted the Parliament, who had put the Lord Scroop into it, and diſcontented the People, who accounted him the fitteſt Perſon of the Nation for that Office, becauſe of his impartial Juſtice and great Knowledge.

His Favourites.

A. D. 1382.

Not long after this Change, the Parliament met at Weſtminſter, in the Octaves of St. Michael. In this Parliament, after the Confirmation of the Charter and old Laws in the uſual manner, it was enacted, 'That Deeds enrolled, which had been 'torn and defaced by the Rebels, ſhould be exemplified under the King's great Seal, and ſuch 'Exemplifications ſhall be of as great Force as 'the Originals; which much pleaſed the King's loyal Subjects, whoſe Eſtates were endanger'd by the loſs of their Writings. John Northampton Mayor of London alſo procured an Act, in prejudice to the Fiſhmongers of London, 'That no Vi-'ctualler ſhould exerciſe any Judicial Office, ei-'ther in the City of London, or in any Borough, 'Town, or Sea-port, through the Realm, unleſs 'where no ſufficient Perſon elſe can be had for ſuch 'Office, in which Caſe ſuch Perſon was to abſtain 'from his Trade during the time of his Office. By this Act all Victuallers, viz. Fiſhmongers, Butchers and Grocers, (for ſo it ſeems they were then reputed) were debarr'd from being Mayors of London. Sir John Philpot was much againſt this Action of the Mayor, and is ſaid to have been put from the Bench of the City for oppoſing it. Mr. Fox in his Acts and Mon. p. 406. ſets down a Petition of the Commons of this Parliament, extracted out of the Parliament Rolls, Art. 52. wherein the Commons humbly requeſt of the King, 'That the Act 'made the laſt Seſſion, giving the Biſhops Autho-'rity upon their Certificates into Chancery to re-'quire Commiſſions to apprehend and impriſon 'the Preachers, Maintainers and Abettors of Wick-'liffe's Doctrines, ſhould be diſannulled, becauſe 'it was procured without their conſent; and the King yielded to their Petition. Yet by the Artifices of the Biſhops the aforeſaid Repeal was ſuppreſſed, and Proſecutions carry'd on by virtue of the ſaid ſurreptitious Act, without the leaſt regard had to the Repeal; which is the Reaſon that that Act of Repeal has never ſince been printed among our Statutes. Theſe were the chief Matters tranſacted by this Parliament; for no Tax was granted but a ſingle fifteenth, inſtead of which the King granted a general Pardon to all concerned in the former Rebellion, excepting only ſome of the more notorious Leaders in it.

Eighth Parliament, its Acts.

The ſecond Holy War began now to be eſpouſed in earneſt in England. For Pope Urban ſent over his Bulls to Henry Spenſer Biſhop of Norwich, a Man better qualify'd for the Camp than Church, granting large Pardon of Sin, and promiſing as great Imputations of Merit and Happineſs, as if they had went againſt Turks and Infidels, to all ſuch as would either go in Perſon, or contribute Money to maintain a War againſt Clement the Antipope, and his Adherents. The Clergy preached up the Merit of this Expedition, and gained many Lords, Knights and Gentlemen, as well as great multitudes of the common People to undertake it. Nothing but Money (which they had gather'd in great Sums, yet not ſufficient for ſo chargeable an Undertaking) and the Conſent of the King and Nation were wanting to the intended deſign, both which they referr'd to the Conſideration of the next Parliament.

The War between the Antipopes.

Toward the latter end of this Summer, Edmund Earl of Cambridge return'd out of Portugal, with the Engliſh Army under his Command, much diſcontented for the ill ſucceſs of his Voyage. They had had a very hard and dangerous paſſage, and when they arriv'd,

They lay nine Months in Lisbon in Garrison, without any Action of moment, giving their Enemy the King of Spain time to raise an Army, which with such aid as he procured out of France thro' Arragon, was too strong for Opposition. So that by that time the Portugueze and English were ready to fight, the Spaniard was irresistible, and that King, who had no mind to fight at first, was in the end justly deterr'd from it. The English nevertheless being weary of Idleness, could not by the Persuasions of their General be kept from attempting something. Wherefore they invaded the neighbouring Territories of Spain, and taking several small Cities, put Garrisons into them. This angred the King of Portugal so much that he refused to pay the English according to agreement; which had like to have begotten a Quarrel between them, tho' Confederates; for the English had purposed to plunder the Country, and satisfie themselves. But this Breach being composed, the King of Portugal made a Peace with the King of Spain, and sent away the English with all speed, as if he had been glad to rid his Kingdom of so terrible Guests. The Earl of Cambridge was so much incens'd with this unexpected Treatment, that he departed in a great anger, and would not leave his Son behind him, tho' he had affianced him to the King of Portugal's Daughter. His arrival in England was no good news to the Duke of Lancaster, whose Title became so much the more worthless, as his Enemy was more successful.

1383. Ninth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

A little after Christmas a Parliament met at Westminster, to which the Consideration of the intended Expedition against the Adherents of Pope Clement was referr'd, and upon a full Debate disallow'd; but the Clergy and their Friends at length made such Interests that it was permitted, and a fifteenth which had been granted to the King by the former Parliament was given for the carrying on the Expedition, and only a tenth granted by the Clergy, reserved for the King's use.

The Bishop of Norwich's Expedition against the Abettors of Pope Clement.

The Bishop of Norwich having received this Encouragement, sent out his Letters immediately unto all Parsons of his Dioceses to preach up the Merit of this Holy War, and pronounce Pardon of Sin to all that would go to it; and his Brethren in other Dioceses did the same: Which had so great an effect, that by the entrance of the Spring he had an Army ready to attend him of fifteen thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse. The chief Men, who accompany'd the Bishop in this War, were Sir Hugh Calverley, Sir William Farrington, Henry Lord Beaumont, Sir William Elmham, Sir Thomas Trivet, Sir John Ferrers, Sir Henry Spenser the Bishop's Nephew, Sir Matthew Redman, Sir Nicholas Traicton, and some others. Few of the Noblemen would engage in it, because the Duke of Lancaster opposed it, and would by no means be induced to joyn in it, unless they would have made War upon the King of Castile, who was also a Clementine. On the the 23d of April these Religious Warriours put to Sea, and landed at Callis. The King had some Days before sent to the Bishop to attend him at Court before he left the Realm, for what Reason was not known; but the Bishop fearing it was to countermand his Proceedings, would not go to the King, but went on his intended Voyage. When they were all arriv'd at Callis, they entred into a Consultation which way they should bend their Forces. Some were for invading France, because their Commission was to make War only upon Pope Clement and his Party, of which the French were the chief. But the Bishop was for invading Flanders, because the Earl Lewis had lately expell'd all the English out of his Dominions, upon a Supposition, that King Richard had joyned with the People of Gaunt against him, and many in their hasty Removal from Bruges, and other places, had sustain'd great Damages in their Merchandizes. To the Bishop's Judgment they all yielded, tho' Sir Hugh Calverley and some others did not approve of it; and therefore entring Flanders in the beginning of May, they besieged and took in less than three Weeks Graveling-Burburgh, Dunkirk, and Mardike. This sudden Storm the Earl of Flanders not suspecting, sent to the Bishop to know the Cause why he made War upon him, and was answer'd, Because he had a Commission to assault all the Abetters of Pope Clement. The Earl's Messengers reply'd, That they then were his Friends and Allies, being for Pope Urban; but that was not sufficient to divert the English from them. Whereupon the Earl raised an Army of twelve thousand Men to oppose the Current of their Victories, and engag'd them about Mardike; but the English behav'd themselves with that Valour and Resolution, that they slew [a] nine thousand of their Enemies on the place, and gained a great Victory; upon which they immediately became Masters of all the Country between Graveling and Sluce, and got such Spoils as laded one and forty Ships with the Riches of the Country. The Earl of Flanders being thus driven to the lowest ebb of Fortune, hath no Refuge but to the King of France, whom he sollicited with the greatest Earnestness to oppose and stop the Current of the English Victories, which would certainly in the issue prove dangerous to his Kingdom. The Duke of Burgundy seconded the Earl's Request, and prevail'd so far with the French King, as to raise an Army of a hundred thousand Men. In the mean season, the English being reinforced with twenty thousand Gauntiners, had laid close Siege to the City of Ipres, and tho' it was a very strong Town, were in no small hopes of taking it. But the Earl of Flanders hastening out the French Forces against them, obliged them to raise the Siege, after one successless Assault, and retire to Burburgh, wherein they fortify'd themselves with Waggons set upon the Rampeirs and Ditches. The French pursu'd them, and besieg'd the Town; but by the mediation of the Duke of Britain, a fast Friend to the English, a Composition was made, 'That 'the English, upon their surrendring up the Town 'to the French, should have safe Conduct, with 'Arms and Baggage, to Callis; which was perform'd on both sides. The English being thus driven out of Flanders again, all the places which they had taken fell into the hands of the French, who spoil'd them of all the English had left. The King, to whom the Bishop of Norwich had given an account of the French Army's success while he was besieg'd in Burburgh, had order'd the Duke of Lancaster to hasten over with all the Force he could to relieve the Bishop; but the Duke delay'd so long, till the Bishop had left all, and was landed in England. Thus this Expedition concluded, with both Dishonour and Disadvantage to the English; for they not only lost the Towns, but the Prey they had gotten, being forced to burn their Ships, lest they should come into the Enemy's hand; which that the King might shew his Resentments of, he seiz'd upon the Bishop's Temporalties, and imprison'd Sir Thomas Trivet and Sir William Elmham soon after their return.

The French ſent out ſeveral Ships to infeſt the Coaſts, and annoy the Paſſage into Gaſcoign and Flanders: The Scots invaded the Borders, drove away a great Booty of Cattel, took the Caſtle of Werke, and burnt it. The Inhabitants of Portſmouth, and the Neighbouring Towns, ſet out ſome Ships to defend their Coaſts, which took five Ships of the French after a ſharp Fight; another Squadron of Engliſh Veſſels took eight French Ships laden with Wines, to the Quantity of fifteen hundred Tun; but the Scots found no Oppoſition till the Parliament met, and gave a Tax to defray the Charge of the Expedition.

Tenth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

On the Monday before the Feaſt of All Saints, the Parliament met at Weſtminſter, and after the Confirmation of the Charters, and other old Laws, repealed the Act againſt the Victuallers made in the laſt Parliament, and enacted, That no Foreigner ſhould purchaſe any Benefice of the Church in this Realm, or enjoy the ſame without a ſpecial Licence from the King, with ſeveral other Laws. But ſince the main end of their meeting was to provide for the Defence of the Nation againſt the Scots, it was reſolved, That a puiſſant Army ſhould be immediately raiſed to repreſs their Inſults with Severity; and for that end, there was given the King half a fifteenth of the Laity, and half a tenth of the Clergy; and becauſe it would require ſome time to raiſe an Army of ſuch Strength as was deſign'd, therefore a part of the Tax was order'd to be allow'd the Lords of the North to guard the Borders, till the Grand Army could arrive. The Scots having Advice of this impending Storm, ſued to the King for the Continuation of the Truce, which they had broken, but were deny'd, and ſent home to provide for their Defence; and the Care of providing and conducting the Army, was committed to the Duke of Lancaſter and the Earl of Buckingham, with Order to be ready to march early in the Spring.

A Peace propounded between the Engliſh and French.

The Duke of Britain ſeeing Matters to ripen a-pace to a War between the French and Engliſh, ſmall inroads and Incurſions being uſually Prologues to great Battels, ſollicited the French King earneſtly to come to a Peace, and by many Importunities prevail'd, of which he gave the King of England ſpeedy notice. About Chriſtmas the Commiſſioners on both ſides met: The Duke of Lancaſter, Earl of Buckingham, Sir Thomas Holland and Sir Thomas Peircy, were Plenipotentiaries for the Engliſh; the Dukes of Berry and Burgogne, the Biſhop of Laon, and the Chancellor of France, were for the French. The King of Spain alſo had ſome Embaſſadors at the Treaty, becauſe the French would not conclude any thing, unleſs the Scots and Spaniards were included in it. Three Weeks or more were ſpent in Propoſitions on both ſides, but the Demands of the French were ſo extravagant, and ſo obſtinately perſiſted in, eſpecially in having Aquitain, Callis, and ſome other Caſtles, which the Engliſh then held in France, deliver'd up to them, that they came to no Agreement; but for the preſent made a Truce for ten Months, and at the end of them agreed to meet again to conclude a Peace, and ſo the Engliſh returned. The Spaniards, Scots, and Gauntiners, were included in this Truce; and the French were, by an Article of it, to give the Scots notice of it. Soon after this Accord the Earl of Flanders died, and the Duke of Burgundy, who had marry'd the Earl's Daughter, being Heir of all his Dominions, was very buſie in ſettling himſelf in his Government, ſo that he forgot to give the Scots notice of the Truce. The Engliſh having already made Preparations to invade Scotland, proceeded in their Deſign; and about the beginning of Lent, the Duke of Lancaſter, and his Brother the Earl of Buckingham, went with a very great Army down thither, and waſted all the Country with Fire and Sword, as far as Edinburgh; out of which alſo the Inhabitants were fled, with the beſt of their Goods, to ſave themſelves from this Torrent. The Duke of Burgundy hearing of this Rupture, which was no Breach of the Truce, becauſe it was not confirm'd with the Scots through his own Neglect, immediately diſpatch'd an Embaſſy into Scotland to compoſe this Breach; but the Scots, who had receiv'd ſo much Damage, were ſo hardly brought to ſit down without Revenge, that the Engliſh Army did almoſt as much harm by their long Continuance on the Borders to their Countrymen, as they had done to the Scots; but at laſt a Ceſſation of Arms was conſented to for the time fix'd, and the Engliſh return'd home. About this time happen'd very great Thunders and Lightnings, Preſages of thoſe Tumults, which concurr'd in the City of London between John Northampton, call'd for his turbulent Humour Cumbertown, and Sir Nicholas Bramber, Mayor.

A Convocation of the Nobles, in which the Duke of Lancaſter was accuſed of Treaſon.

A little after Eaſter there was a Convocation of the Nobles at Saliſbury, and in it one John Latimer, B. D. an Iriſh Fryar appeared, and brought an Information againſt the Duke of Lancaſter, That he had a deſign to deſtroy the King, and uſurp his Crown, relating ſuch Circumſtances of his Actions, as render'd the Accuſation very probable. The Duke being about the King at the ſame time came into his Preſence, as ſoon as the King had receiv'd the Accuſation, not ſuſpecting what had happen'd; but ſeeing the King diſpleaſed, withdrew. The King having taken Advice of his two Chaplains about it, ſent for the Duke, and told him how and by whom he was charged of high Treaſon againſt his Perſon. The Duke not ſeeming concern'd, as if he had been innocent, gave ſuch an Anſwer to every Particular, as ſatisfied the King that he had no ſuch Intentions; yet deſired, that the Fryar might be put into ſafe Cuſtody, till he ſhould clear himſelf of what he had charg'd him with: Whereupon he was committed to the keeping of the Lord Holland, the King's Brother, in the Tower. When the day of Tryal was come, and the Duke was to clear himſelf, and convince the Fryar of falſe Accuſation, in a publick Judicature, the Lord John Holland and Sir Henry Green, two of the Duke's Friends, the Night before entring the Fryar's Lodgings, cruelly put him to Death with their own hands, by hanging him up by the Neck and privy Members, and laying a great Stone upon his Breaſt, which brake his Back; and as if they had done this by publick Authority, drew his dead Body through the Streets the next day, as being deſervedly puniſh'd as a Traytor. This cruel Action got the Duke much Diſhonour, and tho' it rid him of a falſe Accuſer, as was thought till the Fryar was ſo illegally put to Death; yet it render'd his Innocency more ſuſpicious than before, and many believed him really guilty, who before thought him falſly accuſed. This Parliament gave the King half a Tenth of the Clergy, and half a fifteenth of the Laity, and ſo was diſſolv'd.

The Scots break the Truce, and invade England.

The Scots notwithſtanding the Truce, which they were over-perſuaded, rather than yielded to, could not forbear to revenge the Wrongs they ſo lately ſuffer'd by the Engliſh; and therefore infeſted the Borders with continual Inroads and Plunderings all this Summer, and particularly did much Wrong to the Inhabitants of Northumberland. The Earls of Northumberland and Nottingham, who were the

A. D. 1384. the Guardians of these Northern Parts, gather'd an Army of two thousand Spears, and six thousand Archers, and pursuing the Scots ravag'd the Country, as far as Edinburgh, and return'd safely.

Reg. 8. The Truce renewed with France. The Truce made with the French and their Allies being now near the Expiration, the Duke of Lancaster was sent over again with a great Equipage to endeavour a Peace, or renew the Truce for a longer time. He remain'd a great while there, as if some great things were settled; but at length return'd with the News only of a Continuation of the Truce till May, which was generally meanly thought of, as not worth the time and Expence [a] that was consumed about it. In the Duke's absence John Northampton, Alderman of London, was accused by his own Chaplain of conspiring against the King and Government, and raising Stirs in the City. He had his Tryal at Reading, before many of the Nobles of the Realm, but could alledge nothing in his own Defence, only that he ought not to be condemned in the absence of the Duke of Lancaster [b]; yet being found guilty, he was sentenced to perpetual Imprisonment at an hundred Miles distance from London, and all his Goods to be confiscated, which Sentence was executed strictly, and he was sent to Tintagil Castle in Cornwall and his Goods and Estate were all seized for the King. The like Punishment did his Associates John More and Richard Norbery suffer.

Eleventh Parliament, its Acts and Taxes. On the Morrow of St. Martin, Nov. 12. the Parliament met at Westminster to furnish the King with Moneys for the War, which threaten'd him from the Scots and French; which, when his Subjects had given liberally, the King in Recompence passed several Laws for the exact Administration of Justice, viz. That no Judge should keep an Assize in the County where he lives; That a Judge should take no Fee or Reward for the Administration of Justice, but only of the King; and if any Judge raze a Record, make a false Entry, or change a Verdict, he shall after Conviction make Satisfaction to the Party aggrieved, and be fined at the King's Pleasure. While this Parliament was sitting, the Scots besieged and took the Town and Castle of Barwicke, yet not so much by their Valour as by the Bribery of the Governour; who being put in by the Earl of Northumberland, to whom belong'd the keeping of that Garrison, by Inheritance from his Ancestors, brought great Blame upon the Earl. For the Duke of Lancaster, who bore an ill Will to the Earl, so aggravated the Loss of the Town, that he had almost perswaded the Members of both Houses, that it was a treasonable Conspiracy in him and his Deputy to resign it to them; but the King observing the Passion and Prejudice of his Uncle, permitted the Earl to go down to recover it, tho' many of the Nobles were for imprisoning him. He bestirr'd himself so briskly among his Friends in the North, that he gather'd an Army, and so straightly besieg'd the Castle, that the Scots surrender'd it in a few days upon better Conditions than they gave the English, viz. That they should march out with their Arms and Goods, and have two thousand Marks paid them down by the Earl, because he was willing to get it again in as small time, and with as little Loss to the Nation as possible. This set him right again in the good Opinion both of King and Parliament, and taught him more Care for the future, in chusing such Deputies as would be faithful. In the time of the sitting of this Parliament were two Combats fought before the King, one between John Welsh, an English Gentleman, and a Navarrois, and the other between John Wallis and a Navarre Esquire. The English Gentlemen were Victors, and the Navarrois hang'd, as false Accusers; for Victory in these single Fights was accounted a sign of Innocency. A. D. 1384.

1385. The Duke of Lancaster plotted against. The Duke of Lancaster, who being the King's Uncle, and chief Governour about the King, was the greatest Obstruction to the ambitious Aims of the King's Favourites; who growing now impatient of Delays, thought upon all ways to remove him, if not out of the World, yet out of the King's Affections, was now in great Danger of losing both his Life and Honour by their means. For these cunning Flatterers having by forged Crimes and Accusations incens'd the King against him, contriv'd to have him suddenly arrested, and try'd before Judge Trisilian; who being perfectly framed to their Interests, would be ready enough upon such Evidence as they should produce to condemn him. But these Consultations were not so closely manag'd, but they got Wind, and came to the Duke's Ear; who knowing that Innocency in such cases could not be Guard sufficient against their bloody Designs, fled to Pomfract Castle, and there strongly fortified himself against his Adversaries, drawing in all his Friends of the Nobility to his Assistance. The Duke indeed was not very well belov'd by the People, yet the King's Favourites were generally so odious, that the greatest Endearment to the People was to oppose them: So that if the King had persisted in his Anger against the Duke, here was a Foundation laid for a Civil War between his Favourites and Nobility. This the King's Mother presently observ'd, and easily foresaw the Effects of, and therefore in her own Person undertook a Mediation between the King and Duke; and to make a Peace between them, tho' she was very corpulent and unfit for Travel, yet made many Journeys from the one to the other; and in the end, by the Duke's dutiful Submission, wrought a perfect Reconciliation between them, to the great Satisfaction of the Nation, as well as her own Eternal Honour.

The French and Scots make War on the English. The Truce between the English and French being to expire in May, the French King resolv'd upon a vigorous War with England as soon as it was ended, and to that end first sent the Duke of Bourbon with an Army into Aquitain to drive the English from thence, and then provided a great Fleet, which he fill'd with Land Soldiers, to invade the Coasts; and that the Scots, his inseparable Confederates, might be able to make the stronger Opposition on their part, and divert the English the more, he sent his Admiral John de Vienne into Scotland with a thousand Men at Arms, besides Cross-Bows, to strengthen them against the English. The Scots were not at all pleased at their Arrival, because they thought themselves strong enough to encounter the English alone, and chiefly because their Country being barren, could not afford Forage for Strangers, without some Prejudice to the Inhabitants: But the French Admiral promising the King of Scots a large Sum of Money for the Damages they should sustain, and for their Assistance, encourag'd him to raise an Army of thirty thousand Men, to joyn with his Master. The King of England and his Council were not ignorant of these joynt Proceedings against the Nation; and to provide against both, not only fitted out a strong Navy, under the Command of the Lord S. Johns and Sir Thomas Peircy, but sent into all Parts of the Kingdom to summon together an Army against the common Enemy. The general

A. D. 1385. Fear of an Invaſion ſtirred up ſo many to ſtand up in the publick defence, that the King in a ſhort time had an Army of three hundred thouſand Men to attend him. With a part of theſe, viz. ſixty thouſand, the Duke of Lancaſter was immediately ſent towards Scotland, the King himſelf reſolving to follow as faſt as he could with the reſt. The Scots and French had been very buſie in plundering, burning and killing, before they had the news of the Duke of Lancaſter's approach; but as ſoon as they heard of that, they retreated home, and with their Cattel withdrew themſelves into the Mountains: So that the Duke found no oppoſition. The King being come to York, heard of the Scots retiring, yet proceeded in his Journey, and joyning with the Duke deſtroy'd the Country
Reg. 9. of Scotland as far as Edenburgh, which City alſo they burnt, all but the Abby of Holy-rood, which was ſpared by the Interceſſion of the Duke of Lancaſter, becauſe he had been civilly entertain'd in that Convent in the time of the late Rebellion. The French were very deſirous to have ſtopped the progreſs of the Engliſh Army, by giving them Battel; but the Scots ſhewing them from the Hills the Numbers and Strength of the Engliſh, prevail'd with them to wait for a more probable way of revenging themſelves by an Invaſion of England on another ſide. So they paſſing over the Hills, fell into Cumberland, and did much miſchief there to countervail their own Loſſes. The King of England and his Army remain'd but five days about Edenburgh, and then return'd, and by the way heard of the Scots Inroads. The Duke of Lancaſter adviſed the King to ſtop up the Paſſes ſtrongly, that they might all fall into his power, which they could not have avoided, had it been done; but the Earl of Oxford, who was moſt in favour, and whoſe advice the King principally follow'd, ſuggeſted to him, that the Duke of Lancaſter deſigned to bring his Perſon into danger: Whereupon the King neglected the advantage, and departed home. In his return, a great trouble happen'd to the Army by the Murther of the Earl of Stafford's eldeſt Son, ſlain by the Lord John Holland, the King's half Brother. The Murther was
The King's Juſtice in puniſhing Murther. ſo foul, being without any provocation on the Lord Stafford's part, that the King reſolv'd to puniſh his Death by Law, and ſo much the more, becauſe he was the Queen's Favourite. The King's Mother was very importunate with him to pardon the Lord John Holland her Son, who was fled to Sanctuary at Beverley, but not obtaining, ſhe fell ſick with the violence of the diſcontent, dy'd within four or five days, and was bury'd at Wallingford. The Scots being return'd home, found their Country ſo miſerably haraſſed and waſted, that they turn'd their Fury upon the French, who had been the Movers of them to this War, and ſpoiling them of all they had, ſent them home.

Nor was the French Navy more ſucceſsful againſt the Engliſh, than their Land Army had been. The Engliſh Fleet indeed, through negligence of the Commanders, did not act its part ſo well as it might have done; but yet it kept them from landing, and the People of Callis, Portſmouth, and Dartmouth, with the Ships belonging to their Ports, took about thirty Ships at ſeveral times from them, which with eleven that they loſt by Storms, much leſſen'd the Fleet, and depriv'd them of the Triumph they dream'd of. And thus ended the French Expedition.

Twelfth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes. On the Monday after S. Luke's-day a Parliament met at Weſtminſter, wherein though little publick Buſineſs was done, yet there happen'd a ſignal Conteſt about the raiſing of a Subſidy then granted to the King[a]; for after the Laity had granted him a fifteenth and an half, the Clergy refuſed to bear their proportion of a tenth and an half, according to the uſual manner, and Archbiſhop Courtney boldly deny'd the Payment of it. The Commons being incenſed at this Refuſal of the Clergy, petition'd the King, that he would ſeize upon their Temporalties. But the King, who was always a great Favourer of the Church, anſwer'd, 'That he would continue the Patronage which 'he had always ſhew'd to the Church ſo long as 'he liv'd, and would rather gratifie the Clergy's 'Humour, than offer any Injury to their Function.' This mild and pious Anſwer ſo prevail'd upon the Clergy, when the Archbiſhop related it to them, that they voluntary gave the King a tenth part of their Benefices; which being ſo freely done, and beyond the King's expectation, the King told them, That it was more pleaſing to him than if he had received four times as much by Compulſion; and upon the Petition of the Biſhops, who came to make the Tenders of this Subſidy, he reſtor'd the Biſhop of Norwich to his Temporalties, which he had kept ſome Years in his hands. In this Seſſion of Parliament the King made ſeveral Promotions, creating ſeveral new Dukes and Earls. Edmund Earl of Cambridge he made Duke of York; Thomas Earl of Buckingham, Duke of Gloceſter; Robert de Vere Earl of Oxford, Marquiſs of Dublin[b]; Henry of Bullingbrooke, eldeſt Son of the Duke of Lancaſter, Earl of Darby; Edward Plantaginet, the eldeſt Son of the Duke of York, Earl of Rutland; Michael de la Pool, Earl of Suffolk, and Lord Chancellor; Thomas Mowbrey, Earl of Nottingham, Earl Marſhal; and by the Authority of this Parliament Roger Mortimer Earl of March was publickly proclaim'd Heir apparent to the Crown of England. And then the Seſſion ended by reaſon of the approach of Chriſtmas.

1386. The King and Queen kept their Chriſtmas at Eltham this Year, according to Cuſtom of theſe times, which was at the three great Feſtivals of the Year to keep open Court, and in a moſt magnificent and princely State to feaſt and entertain all the Nobility of the Nation, and foreign Princes or their Miniſters. To the King at this time came Leo King of Armenia, who had been expell'd out of his Dominions by the Turks, endeavouring to make a Peace between the Kings of England and France, that he might engage them both againſt the common Enemy of Chriſtianity. He had no ſucceſs in his Propoſals of Peace, becauſe both Nations hated each other too much to hearken to any moderate terms of Agreement; but he was nobly entertain'd for two Months by the King and Nobility, and preſented with many rich Gifts, and at his departure the King, by the advice of his Council, ſettled a yearly Penſion of a thouſand Pound for his Life upon him. A little after Chriſtmas, the Earl of Darby marry'd the only Daughter and Heireſs of Humphry Bohun Earl of Hereford, in whoſe Right he was a little after made Duke of Hereford. A Peace alſo was now concluded between the Citizens of Gaunt, who had by the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh held out a War with the late Earl of Flanders all his Life-time, and the Duke of Burgundy their new Lord; whereupon Sir John Bourchier the Captain of the Engliſh, and Peter de Bois one of the chief Captains of the Gauntiners, were ſent over into England from Callis, and King Richard allow'd De Bois a hundred Pound a Year Sterling out of his Cuſtoms upon Wools. About the ſame time alſo Roger Earl of March having received freſh news, that the wild Iriſh had done much Injury to his Eſtate in Ulſter, which was deſcended to him by his Mother, he undertook a Voyage into Ireland to appeaſe them, and reſcue his Lands from their Depredations, but was very unfortunate in this Attempt; for not long after his arrival, the Iriſh being aſſembled in a great Company, aſſaulted and took his Caſtle, ſlaying him and almoſt all his Retinue. He left behind him a numerous Off-ſpring, viz. two Sons and three Daughters. His two Sons, Edmund and Roger, dy'd Childleſs; Ann his eldeſt Daughter was marry'd to Richard Earl of Cambridge, then eldeſt Son to the Duke of York, by whom ſhe had Richard Earl of Cambridge, the Father to Edward IV. Of the other two, Eleanor was a Nun, and Alice left no Children, if ſhe were marry'd.

The King of Spain pretending a Right to the Crown of Portugal by his Wife, made War this Spring upon that King, and beſieged Liſbon, the Metropolis of his Country. The Portugueſe had twice encounter'd the Spaniards, and had by the help of ſome Engliſh as often foil'd them, but yet could not raiſe the Siege of Liſbon. Wherefore the King of Portugal being ſenſible that the Duke of Lancaſter, who was King of Spain in Title, would be glad of any opportunity to make himſelf ſo indeed, and that there could not be a better way to ſecure himſelf, than by a Conjunction of their Arms together, ſends an Embaſſy into England to the Duke, to beg his ſpeedy aſſiſtance, and promiſe him an eaſie recovery of his Right, becauſe he had already foil'd the Spaniards twice alone, and their united Arms would infallibly effect a Conqueſt. The Duke, who had been for ſome time making Preparations for this Expedition, and was much encouraged to it by the King and his Friends, who long'd to have him out of their way, was ready to embrace ſo likely an Offer; and therefore, that he might loſe no time, muſter'd up his Forces with all ſpeed, and began his Voyage thither in the beginning of May. His Fleet was eighteen Ships, and ſeven Gallies, of which Sir Thomas Piercy was Admiral; and his Army, of which the Lord John Holland, who marry'd his Daughter, was Conſtable, and Sir Thomas Moreaux one of his Marſhals, conſiſted of twenty thouſand Men, viz. two thouſand Men of Arms, eight thouſand Archers, and ten thouſand others. Many Noblemen accompany'd the Duke to ſhare in his Fortunes, as the Lords Lucy, Talbot, Baſſet, Willoughby, Fitz-Water, Poynings, Bradſton, Fitz-Warren, Beauchamp, and Beaumont, beſides many Knights and Gentlemen. He carry'd along with him his Wife, the Lady Conſtance Princeſs of Spain, and Katherine her Daughter, with Philippa his other Daughter. Juſt before his departure, he and his Dutcheſs took their leave of the King and Queen, and the King gave the Duke a [a] Silver Crown, and commanded that his Men ſhould obey him as King of Spain; and the Queen gave the Dutcheſs another Crown of Silver, with many good Wiſhes of Succeſs in obtaining their Right.

The Duke of Lancaſter call'd King of Spain.

Reg. 10. As the Duke paſſed by Breſt with his Army, he called upon Sir John Roche then Governour of the Town, who complaining that he was much infeſted by two Forts lately built by the French to annoy his Garriſon, the Duke ſent out a ſtrong Force under the Lord Fitz-Water to aſſault and demoliſh them, which they at length did; but they were ſo well defended by the French, that it coſt them many Lives of valiant Men, as Sir Robert Swinerton, John Bolton Eſq; [b] and others, and was gained by them at laſt by Capitulation, the French Governor the Lord Maletret being wounded, and moſt of the Men in the Fort ſlain. From Breſt, after this brave Exploit, the Duke paſſed along the Coaſts of Gallicia, and landed at the Groin with all his Army upon S. Lawrence's Eve, Aug. 9. Here they tarry'd a Month, and then the Duke went to Compoſtella. While the Duke winter'd at Compoſtella, the Lord John Holland kept the Army in Action, and won many ſmall Garriſons in the neighbouring Country, and others willingly ſubmitted to the Duke, becauſe his Dutcheſs, the right Heir of the Spaniſh Crown, was with them. The Duke in this Seaſon, which was not fit for Action, conſulted with the King of Portugal about their Expedition in the Spring at Monſon, and it was agreed that they would with their united Forces invade Spain; and to confirm their Alliance, the Duke affianced his Daughter Philippa to the King of Portugal.

A. D. 1386.

While the Duke of Lancaſter was in his paſſage towards Portugal with a numerous Army, the King of France, who had for ſome Years paſt reſolv'd upon an Invaſion of England, reſum'd his Thoughts afreſh, and as if he had now met with an opportunity, wherein he could not miſs of the Succeſs he deſired, becauſe he thought the Duke of Lancaſter had empty'd the Nation both of Soldiers and Commanders, gather'd ſuch a mighty Army and Fleet, as if he intended to conquer and people England at once with his French. He is ſaid to have had fifteen hundred Ships, and a numberleſs Army, in which were twenty thouſand Noblemen, with a proportionable Number of Commons. The news of theſe mighty Preparations not only ſtruck a terror into the Engliſh, but put a ſtand to all the important Affairs of Chriſtendom. The King of England, to ſecure his Nation, gather'd an Army of two hundred thouſand Men, and with part of them fortify'd all the Sea-port Towns, and with another part defended the naked Shores in the places where they were moſt likely to land. The City of London alſo was in ſuch fear, that they guarded their Walls, pulling down many Houſes to make their defence the eaſier from them. Publick Faſts were appointed to lament the Dangers, and implore the Protection of God from their Enemies. All good Men bewail'd the approaching Invaſion, as an unavoidable Scourge for the Nation's Sin, and could think upon nothing but Servitude or Death. The only Remedy and Defence againſt this Calamity was a Parliament, which upon that account was call'd together about Michaelmas, and accordingly met; but the Nobles brought ſuch numbers of Men along with them, to be ready for their defence againſt the French if they ſhould land, that all Towns within twenty Miles round about London, as well as that City and Suburbs, were filled with armed Men, who for want of pay were a great damage to the Inhabitants.

Thirteenth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

At the opening of this Parliament, the King, as the occaſion requir'd, demanded a preſent Subſidy to pay thoſe Armies, which he had already got for the defence of the Nation, and make ſuch other Proviſions againſt the Enemy as the ſtate of Affairs required. The Parliament were ſenſible of the danger the Kingdom was in; and eaſily conſented to the King's deſires, but thought it unreaſonable to put any great Sums into his power, ſo long as he was ſo pliable to the covetous Humours of his Favourites, who made his Revenues but a Prey to enrich themſelves. For Michael de la Poole the Chancellor, had, in leſs than a Year's time, by farming the King's Cuſtoms, and other Incomes, and waſting his Treaſure, purchaſed a thouſand Pound a Year in Land, and gather'd great Sums of Money which he kept in bank.

He

A. D. 1386. He was generally reputed guilty of Bribery in his Office, and indeed it could not be thought he could grow ſo ſuddenly rich, but by the Abuſe of the King's Favours: Wherefore the Parliament unanimouſly reſolved to have him removed with the reſt of his Aſſociates, or to give the King no Tax. This they ſignified to him by a Petition, wherein they not only repreſented the Miſdemeanours of the Chancellor in his Office, and abuſing the King's Favours to his own Gain; but the Poverty of the People, which ought much to be conſider'd, and not further preſſed than Neceſſity requir'd, which they humbly conceiv'd was not ſo great; but if the Chancellor were brought to a juſt Account, the King's Revenues, and the great Debts in the Chancellor's hands would be ſufficient to defray them [a]. The King receiv'd the Petition very ill, and that he might avoid an Anſwer to it, withdrew to Eltham, leaving the Chancellor to preſs them to grant a Tax, and to demand four fifteenths in his Name. The Lords and Commons ſeeing the Cauſe of the King's Retreat, plainly told him, That they would give no Anſwer to his Demand, unleſs the King himſelf were preſent, and he was removed from his Office. The King had Intelligence ſoon of theſe Proceedings, and immediately ſent up to the Parliament to order, that forty of their wiſeſt Members ſhould come down to him at Eltham, to declare to him the Reaſons and Grounds of their Actions. The Parliament were in a great Diſpute about this Meſſage, becauſe it was ſaid, That the King had a Deſign to deſtroy and enſnare them; but at length it was agreed upon by both Houſes, That the Duke of Gloceſter, and Thomas Arundel Biſhop of Ely, ſhould be ſent to the King in the Name of the whole Parliament, and the King was contented to have it ſo. When they came into his Preſence, after all due Reverence paid to him, they ſubmiſſively declar'd their Meſſage to this effect, 'That the 'Lords and Commons in Parliament aſſembled, 'deſir'd nothing more than to live in Peace 'and Quietneſs like good Subjects under his Go-'vernment; That as he might lawfully once a 'Year ſummon a Parliament, and require the 'Preſence of the Lords and Commons at it, that 'by mutual Advice and Conſent, they might 'reform all Oppreſſions, Wrongs, Extortions, 'and other grievous Enormities in the Realm, 'and enact ſuch wholſome Laws as were for the 'Peace and Welfare of the King's Subjects, ſo 'they were met according to their Duty, and 'had no other Deſign than to purſue thoſe Ends; 'That his late abſence was a great Diſcomfort to 'them, and ſince there was an old Statute, 'whereby it was enacted, That if the King not 'hinder'd by Sickneſs or neceſſary Buſineſs did 'abſent himſelf forty days from his Parliament, 'they might return home, they ſhould be oblig'd 'to leave him, if he ſtill deny'd them his Pre-'ſence. The King remaining yet in his Diſcon-'tent and Anger reply'd, That he perceiv'd his 'People went about to rebel againſt him, and 'that he thought it better to deſire the Aſſiſtance 'of the King of France, than ſubmit to his own 'Subjects. The Lords reply'd, That the French 'King was the ancient and moſt inveterate Ene-'my of the Nation; who as he uſurped his Do-'minions in France, ſo gaped after the Engliſh 'Throne, and therefore no Aſſiſtance was fur-'ther to be expected from him, than ſuch as 'might be a fair Pretence for him to get the 'Poſſeſſion of his Right: That ſuch Reſolutions 'could proceed from nothing but the deſperate 'Advice of his evil Counſellors, who by their 'Policy ſought to uphold a Breach between him 'and his Parliament, which would end in his 'and his Peoples Ruine; wherefore they be-'ſought him to lay aſide all Prejudice againſt his 'good Subjects, and to return to his Parliament, 'which no leſs ſought and deſir'd his Felicity 'than Preſence. Theſe, and other Arguments, which theſe wiſe Peers urged to the ſame Purpoſe, had ſo good an Effect upon the King, that he promis'd them to follow them, and accordingly came to the Houſes ſoon after them. And here, in the midſt of his Nobles and People, he immediately ſhewed how wiſe and good a Prince he was in himſelf, being ſeparated from the bad Company and ill Counſellors that were about him; for he without much Reluctancy granted a Commiſſion to the Duke of Gloceſter, Earl of Arundel, and certain other Biſhops and Noblemen, to ſurvey and examine the Eſtate of his Houſe and Courts, all his Officers and Miniſters, Rents, Profits and Revenues; to correct and amend any Defaults and Offences prejudicial to his Perſon or Crown, and particularly to call Michael de la Poole Earl of Suffolk, the Chancellor, to an account about the Management of his Office. John Ford, or Fordham, Biſhop of Durham, alſo was removed from his Place of Treaſurer, and John Gilbert, Biſhop of Hereford, was put in his Place. And becauſe the Realm had for ſome Years paſt been badly govern'd, the Adminiſtration of all publick Affairs was put into the hands of thirteen Perſons choſen by the Parliament, viz. Thomas Arundel Biſhop of Ely, the Treaſurer [b]; Nicholas Abbot of Waltham, Lord Keeper; William Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Alexander Archbiſhop of York, Edmund Duke of York, Thomas Duke of Gloceſter, William Biſhop of Wincheſter, Thomas Biſhop of Exeter, Richard Earl of Arundel, Richard Lord Scroop, and John Lord Devereux. Richard Earl of Arundel, and Thomas Mowbrey Earl of Nottingham, were made Admirals, and ſent to Sea with a ſtrong Navy to defend the Shore, and hinder the Paſſage of the Enemy. Robert de Vere Marquiſs of Dublin, created Duke of Ireland in this Parliament, was at the Petition of the Lords and Commons, order'd to be ſent to Ireland before Eaſter next; and that the Nation might be rid of ſo dangerous a Perſon, and ill Counſellor, they conſented that he ſhould have thirty thouſand Marks, which were ſhortly to be paid the King for the Heirs of the Lord Charles de Blois by the French, to provide him with an Equipage, and ſupport his Charge there. While theſe things were thus order'd by the main Body of the Parliament, the Duke of Gloceſter, and Earl of Arundel, with the other Lords in Commiſſion with them, had examin'd and try'd the Chancellor; whom having found guilty of many high Crimes, Frauds and Treaſons, they not only depoſed him from his Office, but confiſcated his Eſtate of a 1000 l. a Year, and fined him [c] twenty thouſand Marks. Thus did the Parliament not only pro-

[b] Thomas Arundel, Biſhop of Ely, was made Chancellor. Henry Knighton. There were but eleven Commiſſioners appointed to have the Inſpection of Affairs. Notwithstanding these Preparations in England for its Defence, the French King held on his purpose to invade it with no less hopes of Success; and having all things ready for that Enterprize, waited at Sluice for nothing but the coming of the Duke of Berry, and a fair Wind [a]. On All Saints Even a fair Gale blew, and the French King set Sail for England, tho' the Duke of Berry was not arrived, chusing rather that the Duke should follow them than lose so fair an Opportunity; but when they had passed about seven Leagues the Wind unexpectedly and suddenly turned, and brought them back again with much Loss. Before the Wind favour'd their Design again, the Duke of Berry, who was always averse to the Attempt, and delay'd his coming on purpose to prevent or discourage it, was arriv'd; and because the Winter was pretty well advanc'd, it being December, he very much dissuaded the King and Council from proceeding in it, as being both unsafe to his Kingdom and Army [b]. This Advice was thought so reasonable, that the farther proceeding was laid aside till the Spring, and so that chargeable Design in the end came to nothing. But a clear different Account was carry'd of these Affairs into Spain; for there it was given out, that the French Army was landed in England, and therefore the King of Portugal's Council gave him Advice, That he should defer his Marriage with the Duke of Lancaster's Daughter, till they should know the Event of the French Expedition into England; because if that proved successful, as 'twas probable, an Alliance with the Duke would be of no Worth, which occasion'd some Coldness in the Duke's Affairs in Portugal, tho' the Reasons were kept from him for the present.

Michael Pool's Fine forgiven, and he receiv'd into Favour.

The Parliament being broken up, and returned home, the King was left again to his own unsteady Resolutions and partial Affections, which being so fast link'd to his old Companions, easily made way for their Reconciliation, or rather for fresh Engagements of his Favour: For as if their Sufferings had been immerited, or inflicted against his Will, he received them again with wonderful Expressions of Love. The Fine which had been imposed upon the Earl of Suffolk, Michael de la Pool, he immediately released; and as if he had intended to make him Satisfaction for what he had suffer'd by redoubling his Honour, he caused him to be cloathed in Royal [c] Robes, and to sit at Table with him, and that in publick upon Christmas Festivals, to the no small Grief and Trouble of the Nobility. The Duke of Ireland, and Archbishop of York, he admitted into greater Intimacy than ever, and they became again the three only Persons in the Nation, which the King shewed any particular Delight in. This doting Humour of the King they were not sluggish to improve, as they thought for their own Advantage, which they imagin'd would be best promoted by a sharp Revenge upon the chief Instruments of it, whom they look'd upon as the only Obstacles of their ambitious Aims and design'd Happiness. They easily persuaded the King, 'That 'all they suffer'd was for his Sake; That their 'Crimes were forged to make him odious to the 'People; and that if he could not protect them, 'who did nothing but by his Command, and for 'his Interest, it would not be long but he would 'be too weak to defend himself; That the main 'Aim of those ambitious Nobles, their Enemies, 'was to dethrone him by disgracing his Mini'sters. For 'tis an easie and popular Inference, 'That the King is not fit to rule, who knows not 'whom to trust: He must be a bad Prince, that 'hath bad Officers. By these, and such like Arguments, the King was wrought to so great an Hatred of those they accounted their Enemies, that he readily concurr'd with them to put in Execution any Contrivance for their Deduction. The Duke of Gloucester and Earl of Arundel were the most eminent, being the Earl of Suffolk's Judges; and therefore the first Plot was to take off the Duke, and then proceed to the rest, as they had Success in their first Attempt. This they contriv'd to do under the fair Pretence of Friendship, inviting the Duke to a Feast at Sir Nicholas Bramber's House in the City, where the Mayor, Sir Nicholas Exton, and Aldermen, had made a Treat for several Peers and great Men; and having resolv'd, that while the Duke was in his Mirth, and not suspecting any ill Design, he should be either poison'd or assassinated. This base Action was so much abhorr'd by the Mayor, Sir Nicholas Exton [d], that he privately gave the Duke notice of it, and desir'd him to take care of his present and future Safety, which he did by not going to the Feast: And so this their first wicked Purpose was defeated.

The Duke of Gloucester and other Lords to be poison'd.

The Earls of Arundel and Nottingham, who were appointed Admirals of the Navy, which by Order of Parliament was to defend the Nation and annoy the French, did all the Winter following use their utmost diligence to furnish themselves with able Ships and stout Men, that the Noblemen who were to see them muster'd before they embarked, might give a good Account of them to the Governors; for they had spar'd no Cost nor Charges to gather up the bravest and strongest Men in the Nation for this special Service. In the Spring they were all ready to embark, and having receiv'd Information that the French, Flemish, and Spanish Fleet, laden with Wine, lay at Rochell waiting for a fair Wind, to sail to their several Ports for which they were bound, the Earls put to Sea with all speed to intercept them in their Passage. On Lady-Eve they met them, and after a short Engagement took an hundred Sail of them richly fraught, with nineteen thousand Tun of Wine, besides other Commodities [e]. The Citizens of Middleburgh offer'd the Earls to buy all their Wines at 5 l. a Tun, but they refusing so good a Market told them, That they would let none but the People of England whom they served, to have the Use and Advantage of them; and bringing them into divers Ports of the Nation, caused so great a Plenty, that Wines were sold generally for a Mark a Tun, and the best not above 20 s. Their own Shares they generously gave among their Friends, and having refitted their Ships, went out to Sea again. had much terrify'd the Enemy, and therefore in this ſecond they met with but faint oppoſition; for they landed in many places on the Coaſts of Flanders, and burnt or plunder'd the Country as they pleas'd; and at length arriving at Breſt, they took a new Fort [a] which the French had lately erected to annoy the Caſtle, mann'd it, and ſupplying it with plenty of Proviſion and Ammunition, return'd home. Succeſs always raiſes Men's Reputation with the Commons; but theſe Earls having added to their couragious and brave Actions a generous Contempt of their own Advantage, and a ſignal Zeal for the common Good and publick Safety, begot ſo high an opinion of their Worth in the Minds of all Men, that they became a Subject of publick Praiſe and Admiration. But this happen'd very unluckily for the Deſigns that were managing at Court againſt the Earl of Arundel, and thoſe of his Party, that he whom they had decreed to Deſtruction ſhould be thought moſt worthy of Life by all Men; and leſt the King himſelf ſhould conceive a more favourable Opinion of them for theſe Actions, they endeavour'd by all their Artifices to blaſt the Reputation of them, telling the King, 'That though the Vulgar 'cry'd up the late Action of the Earls of Arundel 'and Nottingham, in taking the Flemiſh Fleet, as 'a brave and glorious Atchievement, yet to ſuch 'as could ſee farther into things it was really far 'otherwiſe; for by thus robbing the Merchants 'all our foreign Trade would be ſpoil'd, and no 'Nation would care to trade with us, who liv'd 'ſo much upon the ruin of them. So that tho' 'a ſmall Gain did redound to the Nation by their 'Pyracy for the preſent, it would prove an in-'eſtimable Damage in the end. The King's Mind being thus byaſſed by their Calumnies, look'd upon his Admirals great Service as demerit; and when they came to Court, gave them ſuch a cold Reception, that they could eaſily ſee their Enemies had been with the King before them, and their good Actions were made their Crime; at which they took ſo great a diſguſt, that they reſign'd their Office [b] and retired to their private Manſions, chooſing rather to live in Obſcurity, than to ſerve that King who would not thank them for their moſt faithful Labours, but counted their Merits little better than Faults.

The late diſappointment which the King's Favourites had met with in acting againſt the Duke of Gloceſter's Life, did not ſo diſcourage them from farther attempts, but they were ſtill hatching new deſigns againſt him, till they could find out ſome more effectual way; the Duke of Ireland, knowing him to be a Perſon very jealous of his Honour, and impatient of the leaſt contempt to his Royal Blood, put away his Wife to anger and affront him, without any juſt cauſe for a Divorce, and marry'd a Bohemian, one of the Queen's Maids of Honour [c]. The injur'd Lady, being ſo nearly related to the King himſelf, (for ſhe was the Daughter of Iſabel his Father's Siſter [d], and ſo Coſin-German to the King, and Neice to the Duke of Gloceſter) hoped to find ſome redreſs of her Wrong by appealing to the King, but petition'd him often in vain: Her Huſband was too deep in the King's Favour for her to obtain any Juſtice againſt him. But the Duke of Gloceſter could not forbear to ſhew his Reſentments of the Wrong done to his Family, and to the King himſelf (if he would have impartially conſider'd it) and told him plainly, That he would revenge the Wrong done to his Kinſwoman. This Threat from a Man of ſuch Power and rough Diſpoſition as the Duke of Gloceſter was, put Spurs to the wicked Contrivances of the three Favourites and their Friends, as fearing, that if the Duke were not ſuddenly taken off, their own Lives were in manifeſt danger. A. D. 1387.

Eaſter now drawing nigh, at which time the Duke of Ireland was to go into that Kingdom, great Preparations were made for his departure, as if he had been in earneſt. And not long after that Feaſt, he began his Journey into Wales, in order to his paſſage thither; the King himſelf, with the Earl of Suffolk, Judge Treſilian, and ſome others, accompanying him in State, ſtay'd ſome time there with him, till they thought the Expectations of the Nation being ſatisfied, he might return again without much notice. In this Progreſs, or rather Retirement, for the ſafety of their miſchievous Conſultations, they ſet all their Wits on work by various methods to compaſs the deſtruction of their Enemies; and being come to Nottingham in their return, which is near the heart of the Nation, they began to make ſome Eſſays how their Devices would ſucceed. The firſt thing they had contrived, was to ſuppreſs them by force; and to effect this, they ſummon'd all the Sheriffs of the adjoyning Counties to the King at Nottingham, and demanded of them what Forces they were able to raiſe to aſſiſt the King againſt the Lords, if they were required to do it? They anſwer'd, 'That the People were generally perſuaded 'that the Lords were the King's Friends, and that 'they ſought the good of the Nation in all they 'did, and therefore they believed that they ſhould 'get very few to oppoſe them. This diſappointment was the leſs, becauſe they knew that the Lords were very popular, and they had ſtill other Plots which they hoped would prove effectual, tho' this had miſcarry'd. Wherefore they next mov'd it to the Sheriffs and Gentlemen, then attending on the King, whether they could not by their Intereſts and Power chooſe ſuch Men for the next Parliament as the King ſhould nominate to them, and approve as moſt faithful to him? They reply'd, 'That the People would be very hardly 'depriv'd of their ancient Privilege of chooſing 'their Members of Parliament, and that if there 'were a true freedom obſerved in chooſing, it 'would be almoſt impoſſible to impoſe any Perſons againſt the People's liking, eſpecially ſince 'they would eaſily gueſs at the deſign, and the 'more reſolutely ſtand upon their Right. The Sheriffs anſwer a little ſtartled them, becauſe they confided much in this Invention; for what was done by a Parliament would, as they imagin'd, carry a face of Juſtice, and their private Revenge would be turn'd into publick Puniſhment; but loſing their point, they diſmiſſed the Sheriffs and Gentlemen, and fell upon their laſt, but moſt deſperate Stratagem, to ruin them by Law. And to this end the King ſent his Summons to all the Judges to attend him. Sir Robert Treſilian, Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench, was one of the Cabal, and being preſent with the King, had drawn up ſeveral Articles for their purpoſe, to have the Opinions of the reſt of his Brethren upon. Sir Robert Belknap Chief Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, with Sir John Holt, Sir Roger Fulthorp, and Sir William Burgh, Judges of the ſame Bench, and John Lockton the King's Serjeant, Robert Bramble, and the other Judges of the King's-Bench, obey'd the Summons, and went to Nottingham according to appointment. Soon after their arrival, a ſolemn Council was called, Aug. 11. and the King, in the preſence of many Nobles, demanded of them the Judgment of the Law upon theſe following Que-ſtions, which had relation moſt of them to the Actions of the laſt Parliament, and chiefly to their dealings with the Earl of Suffolk, and required them by their Faith and Allegiance which they ow'd him, to deliver the true Senſe of the Law upon them, viz.

1. Whether the Statute and Commiſſion made the laſt Parliament were prejudicial to the King's Prerogative? They all unanimouſly anſwered Yes, becauſe it was obtain'd againſt his Will.

2. and 3. How thoſe Perſons ought to be puniſhed, who were either eager to procure it, or mov'd the King to conſent to it, and grant it? They ſaid, With Death, unleſs the King would pardon them.

4. How they were to be puniſhed, who forced the King to grant it? They ſaid, As Traitors.

5. How they ought to be puniſhed, that reſtrained the King ſo far from exerciſing his Prerogative, that he might not remit Penalties or Debts owing to him? They reply'd, As Traitors.

6. Whether, when the King hath order'd the Parliament to proceed upon certain Articles, the Lords and Commns may refuſe, till the King ſhall grant what they pleaſe to demand of him? They anſwer'd, That to reſiſt the King's Commands in ſuch Caſes was High-Treaſon.

7. Whether the King may not diſſolve the Parliament when he pleaſes? They reſolv'd he might.

8. Whether, ſince it was a Prerogative of the Crown to puniſh the Offences of, or remove all publick Officers or Judges, the Lords and Commons, without the King's permiſſion or order, might impeach ſuch Officers and Judges in Parliament? They determined, That they might not, and it was Treaſon in any or all the Members of Parliament to attempt it.

9. What Puniſhment they deſerv'd, who mov'd or brought in the Statute, by which Edward II. was depoſed to be a Preſident for the above-mentioned Commiſſion? They defined, As Traitors.

10. Whether the Judgment given againſt Michael de la Pool Earl of Suffolk were erroneous, and revocable? They ſaid, That it was erroneous and revocable in every part, and that if it were again to be done they would not paſs it.

Theſe Reſolutions being given, the King required them to ſubſcribe them, and ſet their Seals to them, in the preſence of the Lords[a] and other great Perſons there aſſembled. Treſilian and his Judges readily comply'd, but Belknap with his Brethren, well knowing the drift of what was done, was not willing to leave any ſuch Marks of his Opinion behind him, and therefore refuſed to ſubſcribe them, till the Duke of Ireland and Earl of Suffolk by ſevere Menaces forced him to ſign them, contrary to his Conſcience, as may be juſtly thought from his words which he then ſpake, 'That he wanted only an Hurdle, an Horſe, and 'an Halter, to compleat the Reward of that Acti-'on, by which he had betray'd the Lords. The Opinions of the Judges being thus known, a Jury of Londoners ſummon'd to Nottingham for that purpoſe were ready to indict the Duke of Gloceſter, Earls of Arundel, Warwick, Darby, and Nottingham, of High-Treaſon for what they did in the laſt Parliament, and upon a full and formal hearing before the Judges they were condemned to Death[b], and their Lands being forfeited to the King, were diſpoſed to and among his Favourites; and that the Sentence might be fully executed, the King ſent into all parts of the Nation to gather an Army able to maſter all Oppoſition they could make againſt what had been done; which, tho' it met with cold Reception from many, yet great multitudes not knowing the Deſign in Hand, readily yielded their aſſiſtance, as their Duty to their King in their opinion obliged them.

The Lords condemned by a Jury of Londoners.

While theſe things were tranſacting againſt the Lords at Nottingham, there happen'd a very great diſturbance in the Church upon this occaſion. One Walter Diſſe, a Carmelite Fryar, and formerly Confeſſor to the Duke of Lancaſter, having obtained of Pope Urban, in favour of his old Maſter, a liberty of conferring the Honour and Privileges of the Pope's Chaplains on ſuch as would purchaſe them for their Money, Peter Pateſhull an Auſtin-Fryar, and a Favourer of Wickliffe's Doctrine, being deſirous of liberty and freedom from his Monkiſh Confinement, and the Society of thoſe vile Perſons he lived with, procured himſelf to be admitted the Pope's Chaplain, and immediately left his Monaſtery. He was a Perſon pious and learned, and ſpent his time much in Preaching after his Releaſe. His abhorrence of the wicked Lives of the Monks, which he had with great Sorrow obſerv'd while he liv'd among them, made him very zealous in blaming their Hypocriſie and wicked Actions, ſo unbecoming their ſtrict Profeſſion of Religion. The People much applauded his Diſcourſes, being generally diſaffected to the Monks, and addicted to Wickliffe's Doctrine, which his Invectives favour'd of. The Monks, impatient of Reproof, ſhew'd great diſpleaſure againſt him and his Sermons, and ſo frequently diſturb'd his Preaching, that partly through the Conteſts between his Hearers and the Monks, who ſometimes would come to Blows even in the Churches, and partly through fear of them, he was forced to give over publick Preaching, and by the advice of his Friends (of whom ſome were very conſiderable, viz. Sir William Nevill, Sir Richard Sturry, and Sir John Montacute) betake himſelf to Writing; in which he accuſed the Monks of many horrid Crimes, as Murther, Sodomy, and Treaſon, of which he gave ſuch convincing proofs, by naming the Perſons, both Actors and Patients, that all People credited his Relations, and believed the Monaſteries no better than what he term'd that from whence he came, The Devil's Dungeon. But theſe Books angred the Biſhops, being look'd upon as the Diſgrace of the Clergy, who thereupon were very zealous to ſuppreſs them; and to that end obtain'd of the King a Commiſſion directed to all Sheriffs and Juſtices, commanding them to ſearch for, and ſeize all Heretical Books, and ſuppreſs Lollardy in the whole Kingdom; which tho' it took no great effect, yet allay'd the preſent Heat and Conteſt between the Monks and their Enemies.

The Biſhops Zeal for the Monks.

The Judgment which the King and his Favourites, through the compliance of the Judges, had paſſed upon the Lords, tho' abſent, was no ſooner given, but the Lords themſelves had a full account of all the proceedings of it to their great amazement; and tho' the Duke of Gloceſter was an hot and cholerick Man, yet the ſenſe of his Duty to his Prince taught him a more ſubmiſſive way of providing for his own defence than to run preſently to Arms, which he knew would embroil the Nation, and hazard many Lives. Wherefore ſending for the Biſhop of London, Robert Braybrooke, he repreſented to him his own Caſe, and that of the Nobles with him, how unjuſtly they were condemned, and what danger they were in; and having taken a ſolemn Oath upon the Evangeliſts, that he was ſtudious of the Safety and Prosperity of the King's Person and Realm, and never had entertained so much as any undutiful Thought against him, much less had done any thing which might deserve so severe a Sentence as was pass'd upon him, unless the Revenge which he had threaten'd the Duke of Ireland with for doing so great an Injury to his Kinswoman, and did not yet recede from, might be interpreted for such; and desired him to wait on the King to mediate a Reconciliation between himself, and the Lords and King. The Bishop did not unwillingly undertake so good an Office, and being a Person both prudent, learned and eloquent, prov'd so good an Advocate, that the King seem'd satisfy'd with his Uncle; and because the Bishop had fully satisfy'd him, that a Quarrel between him and his Uncle would ruin them both, he desired a Reconciliation. But the Earl of Suffolk, who was by, knowing that if it were compleated 'twould prove fatal to him, interposed, and with a virulent Charge of Popularity and Rebellion laid upon the Lords, alter'd the King's good Inclinations to Peace, and the Bishop was commanded out of his Presence; tho' he with undaunted Courage maintain'd his first Arguments, and told the Earl, That he being a Person condemn'd by Parliament, had no other way to be safe, and revenge himself of his Adversaries, (as he accounted all the chief Members of it) but to set all things in a Combustion, and therefore was not to be allow'd to speak, who was a Party; yet he return'd, without success in his Negotiations, to the Lords. The Duke of Gloucester and the condemn'd Peers in the mean time were not unmindful of their own safety, but had conferr'd together to secure themselves in case their submissive Address to the King for Peace should prove ineffectual, which they had reason to fear, so long as the Authors of those violent Courses were about his Person, and could so easily byass him against them. Wherefore when the Bishop return'd with the news of his ill success, they resolv'd immediately to raise what Force they could, and standing up in their own defence to expostulate with the King, why he sought their Death, and suffer'd himself to be govern'd by such Traitors. The King and his Friends easily foreseeing the effects of this fresh Provocation, thought to prevent any opposition from them by seizing them singly before they could get together, and for that purpose sends the Earl of Northumberland to apprehend the Earl of Arundel at his Castle of Rygate; but he found him so well guarded, that he was forced to dissemble the Reason of his coming, and let it pass for a Visit. This disappointment the King thought to amend by surprize, and therefore sent a strong force the same night to arrest him; but the Earl suspecting what after happen'd, had made his escape to the Duke of Gloucester at Harringey-Park, near Highgate, and there they joyn'd their Forces [a] with the Earls of Warwick, Nottingham, and Darby [b]. The news of the Lords being united much disturb'd the King and his Friends, who could now expect no easie terms from those whom their own ill dealings had made desperate, and who were too powerful to be readily master'd. Wherefore a great Council was call'd to debate and consult what was best to be done in so difficult a Juncture. Alexander Nevill Archbishop of York would have had the King to send his Commissioners to the City of London, and into all parts of the Nation, to raise a Royal Army, and repress those his Rebellious Subjects by main force; but this being found upon tryal a thing not feasible, (for tho' the City could raise an Army of fifty thousand Men soon, yet very few of them would fight against the Lords) the Duke of Ireland, and Earl of Suffolk, and two or three more, who persuaded the King that the Lords intended to bring him under their Government, and make themselves absolute, advised him to make the King of France his Friend, by resigning Callis and all his other Dominions beyond Sea to him. These three Favourites counselled thus, because nothing but Arms could secure them from the Lords Fury. Whereas those whose Guilt and Fears were less, offer'd quite different Propolals. Ralph Lord Basset told the King plainly, That he was his true Subject, and so would ever continue, and if the Quarrel had been his own, he would venture all he had in the defence of his Right, but would not have his Head broke in the Duke of Ireland's Cause. The Earl of Northumberland assured the King, That the Lords, tho' now in Arms, were his true and faithful Subjects, and would not attempt any thing against his Crown and Dignity; but all they aim'd at was to ease themselves and the Nation of those ill Persons about him, who sought to oppress and destroy them, and many of his good Subjects; and therefore humbly begg'd of the King, that he would send to them, and require the Reasons of their assembling with so many People, and he doubted not but they would give him just Satisfaction. The greatest part of the Council approv'd of this Proposition, and the King himself assented to it. Whereupon the Archbishop of Canterbury and Bishop of Ely were sent immediately to the Lords, who were advanced near London, to inform them, That the King had no mind to commence a War with his Subjects, but was willing to know the Cause of their Discontents, that he might relieve them; for which end he desired the Lords to meet him in Westminster-Hall on Sunday next, and exhibit their Complaints to him. The Lords were not unwilling to meet the King, but were jealous of the treacherous designs of such as were about him, and told the Bishops, That they would certainly attend his pleasure upon promise of Protection. The Bishop of Ely, being very zealous to make up the Breach between the King and his Nobles, engag'd himself upon Oath, that if there were any dangerous Designs laid against them, he would give them timely notice of it; and so got their promise to meet the King that day. The time of Meeting approaching, and the Lords being ready to attend the King, a Message came the night before from the Bishop of Ely to them, giving them Information, That an Ambush of a thousand Men, commanded by Sir Thomas Trivett and Sir Nicholas Bramber [c], was laid in the Mews to surprize them; and advising them either to delay their coming, or if they adventur'd to come, to guard themselves with a sufficient Force for Security. But the Lords thought the first least hazardous, and so appear'd not. The King, as had been agreed upon, came to Westminster, expecting to have met the Lords; but seeing himself disappointed, demanded with some warmth of the Bishop of Ely why the Lords did not appear according to their promise sent by him? The Bishop as boldly and plainly reply'd, That the Lords had certain Information of a Plot against their Lives laid in the Mews, which being so contrary to the Faith of a Prince, they thought it in vain to treat with him. The King startled at this reply, as if he had no ways been privy to it, swore that he knew nothing of it; and immediately gave the Sheriffs of London order

This Action of the King's, confirm'd by his Oath, seem'd such a Proof to the Lords, that that base Contrivance was carry'd on purely by their Enemies without the King's Approbation, tho' not without a full Confidence of his Pardon, if it had been effected; that upon his fresh Promise of their Security, they soon after attended upon him at Westminster, yet with such strong Guards, as shew'd that they came not to submit or petition, but to demand or capitulate. On the day of their meeting the King being set on his Throne in his Robes, and the Nobles present and kneeling before him, the Chancellor, who was the Bishop of Ely, deliver'd the King's Mind to them in a short Speech, telling them, 'That 'the King hearing of their riotous assembling in 'Haringey-Park, tho' he was advised to have re-'pressed them by force, which he could easily 'have done; yet out of his Princely Clemency, 'had chosen to put gentler Methods first in Exe-'cution, to avoid the Effusion of his Subjects 'Blood if possible; and therefore had sent for 'them to discourse with them, and know the 'Reasons and Causes of their Discontents, and 'why they in so tumultuous a manner had drawn 'together such a number of People. The Lords made answer, 'That it was not out of any am-'bitious or turbulent Humour, that they had 'taken Arms; for they neither affected his 'Crown, nor envy'd his Peace, but through an 'unavoidable Necessity of preserving his Person 'and Realm, and securing their own Lives from 'the impending Dangers, which were falling 'upon them by such Persons as were Enemies to 'both, and shrowded their ill Actions under his 'Favour; That the Duke of Ireland, Earl of 'Suffolk, Archbishop of York, Sir Robert Tresilian, 'Sir Nicholas Bramber, and some others, were 'those Traytors to the King and Realm, which 'they were afraid of, and sought to remove; 'because so long as they were in Place and Fa-'vour, the Nation must be miserable, nor could 'any Man be safe; and that they had not 'brought any false Accusation against them, they 'declared themselves ready (if his Majesty would 'yield to it) to justifie what they had alledg'd 'by single Combat (and then threw down their Gloves as the Challengers). The King having heard them with much Calmness, gave them this moderate and rational Reply; 'That sup-'posing it were true which they had alledged, 'yet they had taken a very improper Method 'to rectifie their Grievances, which ought to be 'done by Rules of Justice, not Acts of Rebellion; 'That their present Tumults were of very ill 'Consequence, and would encourage the Multi-'tude to make use of the like Methods, which 'would be difficult to repress; That he would 'speedily call a Parliament, wherein the Persons 'accused should appear and all Matters of Dif-'ference should be adjusted, and all true Causes 'of Trouble or Fears to themselves or the Nation 'be remov'd; and in the mean time, would par-'don all that was past, and take them into his 'Protection. The King having thus finish'd his Speech, took the Duke of Gloucester by the hand, raised him from his Knees, and bid the rest arise; and retreating with them into a private Chamber, gave them a Treat, and licens'd them to depart. The Lords were greatly satisfied with this Behaviour to them, and after the King had put forth his Proclamation of Pardon, looked upon all things in a certain way of Settlement at the next Parliament.

The King and Lords meet in Westminster-Hall, and are reconciled.

A. D. 1387. The Duke of Ireland, and the rest of the Persons accused, were not present at this Meeting of the King and Lords; and therefore tho' the Lords were in good hopes of a fair Conclusion, yet they thought it not safe, lest there should lurk some secret Contrivance against them, to dismiss their Army. Which Resolution taken up merely from Suspicion, or upon Information, proved very fortunate to them; for while Affairs looked so well at London, the Duke of Ireland had a private Commission from the King to gather an Army of such as were his Friends about Chester, and to come to London; in which they hoped to find so many Assistants, as to make up their Forces collected from the Western Parts to become invincible, and so able without great Difficulty to subdue the Lords. This tho' acted with great Privacy, and at a mighty Distance, was not hidden from the Lords and their Friends; who therefore contrived to intercept the Duke in his Passage, by sending the Earl of Darby with a strong Party to lie in those Countries through which he was to pass. The Duke of Ireland having by the Interest and Assistance of Sir Thomas Molineux, Constable of the Castle of Chester, Sir Ralph Vernon, Sir Richard Ratliffe, the Sheriff of Chester, and others, gather'd a good Body of six thousand Men out of Cheshire and Lancashire, stout and well armed, marched according to the King's Order towards London; but at Radcott Bridge near Burford in Oxfordshire, they were met by the Earl of Darby and his Men, who to prevent their Progress and force them to fight, had broken down the Bridge. The Duke was surprized at their approach, and being fearful of his own Fate, persuaded the Gentlemen to retreat; but Sir Thomas Molineux being a Man of great Courage said, 'That it was but a Party of the 'Lords Army, and that commanded by the Earl 'of Darby, a Man famous neither for Courage 'nor Conduct; and if they should give ground 'to these, they could not hope to effect any 'thing against the whole Power of the Lords, 'and therefore encourag'd them to prepare for a 'Fight. The Cheshire Gentlemen were easily won, and the Duke himself yielded, tho' his Guilt and Fears would not suffer him to consent, and so a Fight was begun the next day. The Battel was very sharp, and lasted long; Sir Thomas Molineux was slain, and most of his Army either kill'd or taken. The Duke saw the beginning of the Engagement, but fled long before the Victory shew'd it self, swimming over the River Thames to make his escape; but was forc'd to quit his Horse, because he could not make the farther Bank, and get away on foot. His Horse and Baggage, with his Armour, were all taken, and brought to the Earl of Darby. In his Trunks was found a Letter sent to him by the King himself, wherein he commands him to hasten to London with what speed he could, and promises him to live and die with him. The Duke of Ireland was suppos'd to have been drown'd, because his Horse was found in the River; but afterward he was discover'd to have fled into Holland, and from thence into France. The News of this lucky Victory, tho' over but a small Party, was not better receiv'd by the Lords than it deserv'd; for it proved in a manner the utter Overthrow of their Enemies. For the Duke of Ireland never return'd, the Earl of Suffolk fled to Calais to his Brother, who was Captain of that Fortress; the King betook himself to the Tower, and Tresilian and the Archbishop of York, with all the rest of the Party, withdrew from London, and concealed themselves. The Enemies of the Confederate Lords all disappear'd, and no Opposition was visible: Whereupon the Lords being again united, marched with their Army of forty thousand Men to London, and muster'd at Clarkenwell [a] within the Prospect of the Tower. The Archbishop, and some others of the Peers, who were desirous to end this Quarrel, pray'd the King to condescend to a peaceable Composure of Affairs, but he made slight of the Proposal, and told them, 'That they would soon dissolve of 'themselves without any Treaty, their Multi-'tude would in a short time consume all their 'Provision, and then they must break in pieces 'of course. The Lords had notice of these words, and being incens'd a little at them swore, That they would not depart from London (which by this time had open'd her Gates to them) till they had spoken with him; and having given him notice of it, set a strong Guard about the Tower, that he might not elude them by a private escape. The King being thus beset, and having no way to avoid a Treaty condescended, and sent the Archbishop to acquaint them with it. The Lords accepted the News joyfully, but fearing some Treachery might be laid for them in the Tower, if they should attend him there, as he had appointed, they begg'd that the King would meet them at Westminster, but at length receded from that Desire, because the King dealt so candidly with them, that he sent them the Keys of the Gates, Turrets, and strong Chambers, and gave them leave with two hundred Men to search all Places, and clear up their Suspicions. The Duke of Gloucester and Earls of Warwick, Arundel, Darby, and Nottingham, were the chief who manag'd this Treaty with the King, who receiv'd them in a Pavilion of State, and after retir'd with them into his Chamber. Here they charg'd him with many dishonourable and unjust Actions against themselves, and the Nation, viz. 'That he had 'by forg'd Crimes and an unjust Sentence, con-'spir'd with his Favourites at Nottingham, to 'take away their Lives; which tho' they had 'at their meeting at Westminster been sparing to 'upbraid him with, out of respect to his Ho-'nour, because they saw an amicable Agreement 'likely to go forward, yet now they could not 'but lay before him, because they had since 'found Letters from him to the Duke of Ireland, 'to raise Forces in Cheshire against them, even at 'the time of their former Treaty; by which Action 'he added Perfidiousness to Cruelty, and plainly 'shew'd that his Favour and Grace then pre-'tended, was but a Vail to his ill Designs against 'them. That he had made an Agreement with 'the French King (as by some Letters which they 'had intercepted, and then shewed, they made 'it appear) to resign Callis, and his other Domi-'nions on that side to him, upon condition he 'might enjoy them, as an Homager to his Crown, 'and that Letters of safe Conduct were sent to 'him to compleat this Agreement, which was 'indeed to betray the English Possessions, pur-'chased with so Blood, into their Enemies hands. Many other lesser Grievances they also mention'd, which they were plentifully furnish'd with from the ill Conduct of the Ministers of State, employ'd by him. The King had little to say in his own Defence, because their Accusation was so plainly proved; but falling into an ingenuous Confession of his Errors and Misgovernment, with Tears, agreed to meet them the next day at Westminster, to rectifie whatever was amiss by their Advice and Consent. The Lords upon this Promise departed, all but the Earl of Darby, whom the King invited to Supper with him, and detained, as an Instance of his Resolution to joyn with them in settling all Disorders of the Nation, which he expressed much Satisfaction in, so long as the Earl was present. But when the Earl was departed, the King fell into Consultation with such as were about him; who tho' not so obnoxious as those that were fled, yet being either their Friends, or acting by their Measures, soon turned his Mind from his former purpose; and because they had buzz'd it into his Head, that that Meeting tended much to the Hazard of his Person, and would end with a great Diminution of his Authority, he fully resolv'd against it. The Lords, according to Appointment met the next day at Westminster, and expected the King, but in vain, for he would not leave the Tower; which when they understood, they grew impatient at his Inconstancy, and sent him word plainly, 'That if he would not meet them ac-'cording to his Promise, they would certainly 'chuse another King, who should have more re-'gard to the faithful Advices and Services of his 'Lords than he had. This Message being smart and unexpected, wrought the King into Compliance; so that he met them on the Morrow in Westminster-Hall. The main thing that the Lords insisted upon, and the King tho' not very freely agreed to, was, That several traiterous and wicked Persons, should for the Honour of the King's Person and the Good of the Nation, be removed from Court; and accordingly Alexander Archbishop of York, John Bishop of Durham, and Fryar Rustock, the King's Confessor, John Bishop of Chichester (the two first of which were fled) were strictly forbidden to come into the King's Palace or Presence. The Lords Zouch, Burnell and Beaumont also, Sir Albericke de Vere, Sir Baldwin Beresford, Sir Richard Alderbury, Sir John Worth; Sir Thomas Clifford, and Sir John Lovell, suffer'd the like Banishment from Court, but with a farther Imposition, That they should give Sureties for their Appearance at the next Parliament, which was to meet shortly. Some Ladies also of no very good Reputation were expelled the Court, and forced to give Sureties for their Appearance the next Parliament, viz. the Ladies Mohun, Molings, Poynings, and Worth [b]. Others whose Crimes were greater, or at least more open and prejudicial to the Nation, were imprison'd, viz. Sir Simon Barly, Sir William Ellingham, Sir John Salesbury, Sir Thomas Trevit, Sir James Barnish, Sir Nicholas Dagworth, and Sir Nicholas Bramber, Knights; Richard Clifford, John Lincoln, and John Motford, Clerks; Sir John Beauchamp, Keeper of the King's Privy-purse, Nicholas Lake, Dean of the Chapel, and John Blake, Barrister of Law, to be tried the next Parliament.

The King's bad Ministers arrested and secured.

The time drawing very near, when the Parliament was to meet by the unanimous Agreement of the King and Lords, the King, who knew very well that it would prove fatal to his Friends, sought all means to prorogue it; but not daring to stand upon his Prerogative at this time, lest they should raise as great a Mischief to himself, permitted them to meet on Feb. 3. The Lords came to it with such Attendance, as seem'd necessary for their Safety. The Commons resorted to it with great Diligence, because of the general Expectation there was of a compleat Reformation of all Disorders by this Session; which it so well effected, that it was thought to deserve the Name of The Wonder-working Parliament. D. 1388. they entred upon Action, and on the first day of their meeting arrested all the Judges that were sitting in Westminster-Hall upon the Bench, except Tresilian, who concealed himself in disguise, and Sir William Shipworth [a], and sent them to the Tower, viz. Sir Robert Belknap, Sir Roger Fulthorp, Sir John Cary, Sir John Holt, Sir William Brooke, and John Lockton the King's Serjeant at Law. Their Crime was, 'That in the last Par-'liament they had over-ruled the Actions and 'Determinations of the Lords with their Advice 'and Directions, and had assured them that all 'was done according to Law, but afterwards had 'given the King a contrary Judgment at Not-'tingham, and had deliver'd it as their Opinion, 'that the Actions of the said Parliament was il-'legal and traiterous. The Judges had nothing to plead in excuse of this base Action but their Fears of the Duke of Ireland, who threaten'd their ruin, unless they made such Answers to the Questions as he expected and desired, and therefore left themselves to the Judgment of the Parliament; who considering that the whole matter was managed by Tresilian, and that the rest of the Judges were surpr zed, and forced to give their Sentence, laid the milder Punishment upon them [b], and only confiscated their Goods, and banished them for their Lives, having resolved to deal the more severely with the Author of that illegal Judgment when they could apprehend him. The next thing that they entred upon was to proceed against Robert Vere Duke of Ireland, Alexander Nevill Archbishop of Tork, Michael de la Pool Earl of Suffolk, Sir Robert Tresilian Lord Chief Justice of England, and Nicholas Bramber [c] Lord Mayor of London, who being fled from Justice were summon'd only, and not appearing were sentenced to perpetual Banishment, and their Estates confiscated. Not long after Sir Robert Tresilian was discover'd by one of his own Servants, and seized upon in disguise at an Apothecary's in Westminster, where he lay to observe the Transactions of Parliament. He was carry'd first to the Duke of Gloucester, who secured him in the Tower, and in the Afternoon he was brought before the Parliament, by whom he was sentenced to be drawn to Tyburn, and to have his Throat cut [d], which Judgment was immediately executed upon him. For what Reasons that Punishment, never used before or since, was inflicted upon him, is hard to know, unless the greatness of his Crimes was signalized by so remarkable a Punishment. The Parliament having thus dealt with the greater Offenders, descended to the lesser, and having taken Sir Nicholas Bramber, a Person who to serve the Court-designs against the Lords had been several times made Lord Mayor of London, and in that Office by his illegal Cruelties had ruin'd and murther'd many of the Lord's Friends, for which Services he was to be made Duke of Troy, the ancient Name, as some have written, of that City, they condemn'd him for those and others his wicked Actions to be beheaded with that very Ax [e] (as some write) which he had made to inflict the same punishment on others. Sir John Salisbury, Sir James Barnish, John Beauchamp, John Blake, and Thomas Uske, were all drawn and hang'd for the same Crimes. Sir Simon Burley, Lord Chamberlain, and Constable of Dover-Castle, being accused of conspiring to deliver up that Castle to the French, was also beheaded; tho' the Earl of Darby interceded much to save his Life, because it was not prov'd against him; but the Duke of Gloucester, whose severe disposition made every one a Criminal that he did not love, would hearken neither to Reason nor Importunity, and so this poor Gentleman fell a Sacrifice to the Duke's Anger and Morosenes. With these Men the Parliament hoped that the Disorders of the Nation would be removed, the chief Causes of them taken away, and their Sufferings terrifie all that were like-affected; and therefore, as if all things were to begin a-new, the King and Parliament agreed to ratifie their Resolutions of doing their Duty to each other by Oath. The King promised to stand by the Lords in governing the Realm, and took his Coronation-Oath again, and the Houses swore Homage and Fealty to the King, as if both had vy'd together whether should be the better, the King or his Subjects. This Pacification was so well resented by the Parliament, that they granted the King half a tenth of the Clergy, and half a fifteenth of the Laity, 12 d. in the Pound for all Merchandises, except Wines, upon which they laid 2 s. a Tun, and 53 s. for every Sack of Wool, and then was dissolved; but the King was discontented, and angry at what he had done in it. Just at the rising of this Parliament, the Lord John Holland was created Earl of Huntington.

The Earl of Arundel being made Admiral again by the Parliament, put forth to Sea with a great Navy, well stored with Land-Forces and several Noblemen to assist the Duke of Britain, who being under the King of France's displeasure, because he had imprison'd the Lord Guesclin Constable of France, fear'd an Invasion from thence. The English Fleet arriv'd at Rochel, and landing some Men, began to spoil the Country about Marrant; but a Peace being suddenly concluded between the Duke and the French King, the Earl return'd, and in his way meeting the French Fleet, took eighty of them, and invaded the Isle of Beas, and burnt it. He also took the Isle of Oleron.

Reg. 12.

Earl of Arundel sent to assist the Duke of Britain.

The Truce between the Scots and English being expired about this time, the Scots looking upon the Dissentions of England to be an advantageous Juncture for them to invade it, made great Preparations for that end, and entred the bordering Countries, burning, killing, and plundering all places they came in. Gillesland in Cumberland, which belong'd to the Lord Dacres, felt their Fury first, whose Inhabitants they shut up in their Houses by two hundred in a Company, and set them on Fire. They then invaded the North with the like Barbarity, and came as far as New-Castle, where they met with the Earl of Northumberland, and his Sons, Henry Lord Peircy, surnam'd Hotspur, and Ralph, with a small Force to oppose them, as Guardians of those parts, and sworn Enemies of the Scots. The young Noblemen desirous to gain Honour, were eager to engage them; and

[a] Sir William Skipwith was not with his Brethren the Judges at Nottingham when they answer'd the King's Queries. He was absent by reason of Sickness.

[b] They were all of them that were in Custody condemn'd by the Lords Temporal, with the assent of the King, to be drawn and hang'd as Traitors, their Heirs disinherited, and their Lands and Tenements, Goods and Chattels to be forfeited to the King; which Sentence past upon Sir Robert Belknap, Sir Roger Fulthorp, Sir John Holt, Sir William Burgh, Sir John Cary, Judges; John Lockton the King's Sergeant, and Thomas Usk Under-Sheriff of Middlesex, who pack'd the Jury that found the Bill against the Lords. The Bishops, just as Sentence had past, came in and intereceded for their Lives, which the King granted them; but their Estates were seiz'd, and their Persons imprison'd. Rot. Parl. 11 Richard 2.

[c] He had been Lord Mayor, but was not so at this time.

[d] His Throat was not cut; the Sentence given by the Lords against him was, That he should be drawn on a Hurdle through the City of London to Tyburn, and there be hang'd by the Neck. Walsingham and Caston, and after them Holingshead affirm he was hang'd. Rot. Parl. 11 Richard 2.

[e] It appears by the same Rolls, Par. 3. N° 15. that Sir Nicholas Bramber was condemn'd and executed in the same manner as Tresilian.

Earl

A. D. 1388. Earl Dowglaſſe, who commanded that party of the Scots, and envy'd Hotſpur's Fame, was as forward to joyn the Battel. They came to a fight at Otterborn, and Earl Dowglaſſe encounter'd the Lord Peircy ſingly, ſeeking by force to extort his Name from him; but being equall'd in Courage, and overmatch'd with Strength, he was ſlain, and became a Monument of his Enemy's Valour. This Victory was hardly obtain'd before the Earl of Dunbar came upon the Engliſh with a much greater Force, and having ſlain the greateſt part of them, took the Lord Peircy and his Brother Priſoners.

Fifteenth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

The Parliament was again ſummon'd to meet in September, and accordingly aſſembled at Cambridge (as our Hiſtorians unanimouſly agree, but our Statute-Book ſay at Canterbury) on the morrow after the Nativity of the Virgin Mary, Sept. 9. This Parliament ſeems to have met to ſettle ſeveral Diſorders and Irregularities of the Nation, not ſufficiently provided for by Law before; and to that end enacted, 'That no Offices under the 'King, or Miniſters of Juſtice, as Judges, Juſtices 'of the Peace, Sheriffs, or any other Officers in 'any of the King's Courts, ſhould be ordain'd or 'made, for any Gift or Brocage, Favour or Affection, but for their known Abilities and Deſerts only; it being but reaſonable to ſuppoſe, 'as it is uſually found, that they who buy ſuch 'Places make no Conſcience of doing Juſtice, but 'by Exactions, Delays, and unreaſonable Fees, 'make the Adminiſtration of Judgment a Grievance, inſtead of a Relief to Subjects. That 'Servants ſhall not paſs from one Hundred to 'another without a Teſtimonial under the King's 'Seal; and if any Servant be taken up without ſuch Teſtimonial, he ſhall be put in the 'Stocks. This Law was made to keep Servants to their good Behaviour, and ſecure Maſters from retaining idle and falſe Perſons in their Services; and becauſe Servants grew too exacting for their Wages, therefore a Law was made, 'That no Perſon ſhould give or receive more Wages for the 'Service of Men or Women, than what was limited by the Statute under ſeveral Penalties. It was alſo enacted, 'That all ſturdy Beggars, who 'were able to ſerve, ſhould be puniſhed, and the 'ancient Statute of Labourers ſhould be put in 'execution; ſo that the want of Men to work in 'Huſbandry might be no plea to enhance their 'Wages. A Statute alſo was framed to forbid Servants to wear a Sword, Buckler, or Dagger; Another to prohibit all Perſons uſing any unlawful Games; Another to puniſh any ſcandalous Abuſes of the Peers and great Men of the Kingdom; Another to prohibit the making of Dunghills, and caſting of Carrion into Ditches near great Towns to infect the Air, by which Diſeaſes were created among the Inhabitants; Another to make it a Præmunire for any Perſon to go to Rome to procure any Benefice of the Pope; and laſtly, A Statute was made to remove the Staple of Wool from Middleburgh to Callis. The King had a tenth of the Clergy, and a fifteenth of the Laity granted him by this Parliament. During this Seſſion, Sir Thomas Trivett, a Favourite of the King's, riding to Barnwell with the King to his Lodgings, was thrown by his Horſe, and dy'd of the Bruiſe receiv'd by the Fall. His Death was not much lamented by the People, becauſe he was accounted an Enemy to the Lords, and the common Good.

Soon after the riſing of this Parliament a Treaty of Peace was ſet on foot between England, France, and Scotland. The Commiſſioners for England were Walter Shirlow Biſhop of Durham, the Earl of Saliſbury, Lord Beauchamp, Sir John Clanbow, and Sir Nicholas Dagworth; for France, the Biſhop of Baieux, the Lord Valeran Earl of St. Paul, Sir Guillam Melin, Sir Nich. Bracque, and Sir John Mercier; and for the Scots, the Biſhop of Aberdeen, Sir James and Sir David Lyndſey, and Sir Walter Sancler, four for each Nation. They met at Balingham, a ſmall Town between Callis and Bulloigne, and after many Debates with much difficulty, came at length to agree upon a Truce between the three Nations for three Years, to commence from Midſummer next enſuing. While it was in agitation the Scots had made ſeveral Incurſions into Northumberland, and carry'd away great Booties, which Thomas Mowbrey Earl of Nottingham was not able to prevent, tho' he was ſent againſt them with five hundred Archers, becauſe his Force was too weak to withſtand their much greater numbers. The Scots were ſo well pleaſed with their Robberies, that they gave the news of Peace no kind welcome, and were hardly perſuaded to accept it by the Lord Valeran, and ſome others of the French, who came over to ſee it eſtabliſh'd and confirm'd in theſe Nations; and ſo at length the Truce began on Auguſt 1. on the Borders, and on Aug. 15. in other parts of both Nations, and all Hoſtilities ceaſed on both ſides.

An eminent Quarrel between the Oxford-Scholars.

In Lent this Year was a memorable Conteſt between the Oxford-Scholars. The Welſh, who were always quarrelſome and proud, having firmly united the Scholars of the Southern parts to their ſide, began to abuſe the Scholars of the North, who being very numerous, ſtood up together in their own defence; and ſo by the oppoſition much miſchief was done on both ſides. At length they came to an agreement, to determine all by a pitcht Fight; but the Duke of Gloceſter hearing of it, and being much concern'd not only at the ill Example, but bad Conſequences of it, found means to prevent it, and cauſed ſeveral of the Welſh, who were the Authors of this unhandſome Broil, to be expell'd the Univerſity, and others to be puniſh'd with the uſual Academick Mulcts, and ſo put the whole Body into good order again.

Peace being thus every ways eſtabliſhed at home and abroad, the King and his Friends, on whoſe Counſels he chiefly confided, thought this the beſt opportunity to aſſume to himſelf the Government of the Nation out of the Lords hands, in which it had been put for ſome Years. He was now full one and twenty Years of Age, and was undeniably capacitated to be maſter of his own Dominions; which becauſe the Lords, either not ſenſible of his being of Age, or not willing to take notice of it, did not reſign, he reſolv'd to claim; and to that end calling a great Council of his Nobles[b] and great Men to attend him at Weſtminſter. As ſoon as they were all ſeated, and the King himſelf at the head of them, he demanded of them, 'What Age they ſuppoſed him to be of 'now?' They anſwer'd, 'That they thought him 'to be ſomething above one and twenty.' The King then reply'd, 'That it was unreaſonable that 'he ſhould be deny'd what his meaneſt Subjects 'enjoy'd, who at that Age came into the management and full poſſeſſion of their Birthrights, and were no longer under Guardians and 'Tutors; and therefore he claim'd the Government of his Kingdoms out of their hands.' The Lords, tho' fearing the ill Conſequence of his Rule,

[b] Henry de Knighton and Thomas Walſingham ſay, He came to the Council-Chamber, the Privy Council being then ſitting; and do not mention the ſummoning any Aſſembly of the Nobility who were not Privy Counſellors.

A. D. 1389. yet did not deny what he required, but readily yielded up their Power entirely to him; in which Act the King was not so well contented, but that he declared publickly, 'That he renounced their 'Rule, and from thenceforth did assume to him-'self as full a Power of governing, disposing 'Affairs, and administring Justice in his Realm, 'as any of his Predecessors, the Kings of Eng-'land, did and might lawfully use and exercise.

Reg. 13. The great Officers of State altered. And that he might give an Instance of his Power and try their Submission, he like a new King made an Alteration among the great Officers of State; for he took the great Seal from Thomas Arundel Bishop of Ely, then Lord Chancellor, and gave it to William of Wickham, then Bishop of Winchester, who very unwillingly accepted of it; John Fordham[a] also Bishop of Exeter, then Treasurer, he remov'd from that Office and put in another, which also he did to Edmund Stafford, Keeper of the Privy-Seal; the Earl of Arundel, Lord Admiral, he also deprived of his Command[b] and gave it to the Earl of Huntingtou; the Earls of Arundel and Warwick, and Duke of Gloucester, he put out of his Privy Council, and made five new Judges in the room of those that were hang'd and imprison'd. Many other Alterations he made in the Court, which was look'd upon as a new Model of a worse Management than had been before settled, and for some time so well carried on by the Lords.

The Bishops concerned at the spreading of Wickliffe's Doctrine. The State being thus at Peace for the present, Matters of Religion began to be look'd into, which in the late Troubles had been neglected. The Followers of Wickliff were not insensible how happy a Juncture it was for them to promote their Doctrines, while their Enemies Heads were otherwise employ'd, and accordingly had so bestirr'd themselves, that they were become a form'd Church, and in many Parts of the Nation had regular Congregations, with Pastors well qualified and chosen to administer Sacraments, and preach to the People. The Bishop of Salisbury, John Waltham, had gotten a very particular Account of all their Party, and their present Condition, by one that had been of their Society; and tho' he acquainted his Brethren with the great Increase of them, yet neither himself, nor any of the Bishops raised any Persecution against them. The Bishop of Norwich, Henry Spencer, threaten'd them loudly, That if any were found in his Diocese, he 'would make them, as he term'd it, Hop headless, or fry a Faggot; and 'tis very probable, that he being a rough and Warlike Prelate, would have made good his Words, but they had Wit enough to keep out of his way. One John Swinderby, a Priest, was punish'd as an Heretick in the Diocese of Hereford; but because we read of no other that suffer'd, it may be suppos'd, that some Imprudence in himself brought him into Troubles. The chief Popish Doctrine that they opposed was, their Pilgrimages to Images, especially the Rood and Lady of Walsingham; which being so profitable a Custom to the Priests, would have brought a Storm upon them, as soon as an Opposition to any other Doctrine; but it was carried so privately, that tho' many were averse to it, yet few would expose themselves for it.

The Duke of Gloucester falsly accused of Treason. The Duke of Gloucester being thought under some Displeasure with the King, because he was not of his Council, it gave Encouragement to some Court Parasites to seek his Ruine, and forge a Crime against him to endanger his Life, viz. That he was about to raise an Army, and depose the King. The Duke was thereupon called into Examination privately, and charged with the Accusation; but he cleared himself so well, that it was judged a Forgery both by the King himself and his Council. The Duke having escap'd the Danger, begg'd of the King, that the Authors of such false Crimes should be punish'd; but the King, either desirous to incense the Duke, or out of a Love to Flattery, enjoyn'd his Uncle neither to expostulate the Matter, nor question his Accusers.

The Duke of Lancaster returns out of Spain, and his Success there. In November, this Year, the Duke of Lancaster returned out of Spain into England. He had for almost three Years undergone a various Fortune, and tho' he had pass'd through many Troubles, at last made an honourable Conclusion, and came home with Joy and Triumph: He had met with as good Success at his first Entrance into Spain, as he could have desir'd. Many Spaniards came over to assist him in recovering his Wife's Right against the Usurper, and his Arms were every where victorious. The Spanish Army under Don Alverez de Perez was totally routed, and the Spaniards terrified with the Loss, kept themselves close in their walled Towns, which were also many of them taken by the English and Portuguese. The French indeed promised them Assistance to drive out the English, after the intended Expedition into England was over; but a more kind Fate so befriended them, that the English were conquer'd without Weapons: For the Heat and Unkindness of the Climate so afflicted with mortal Diseases his whole Army, that he lost many of his best Men, as the Lord Fitzwater, and others, and the rest were made unfit for any Warlike Action. The Spaniards also, who had sided with the Duke, being angry with the English for making such havock of their Country without Cause, deserted him and went home; by which means the Duke and his Friends were left so naked and open to the Enemy, that in great Sorrow and Anguish of Mind he lamented his Misfortune, and begg'd of God, who judges of every Man's Right, to interpose on his behalf, and make an honourable Conclusion of that Expedition for him; which Prayer the Event so well answer'd, that God may well be judged to have heard him in his Trouble. He indeed endeavour'd to retrieve his Loss, by sending into England for a Recruit of his Forces; but the Troubles there would not allow the King to spare him any, which farther encreased his Grief. The Duke then having obtain'd leave of the King of Spain, that his sick Soldiers should remain in his Country till they were recover'd, departed in Sorrow to Baion, a City in Gascoigne, and there remained in much Melancholy for his ill Luck. Here Providence made way for that happy Conclusion, which the Duke had desired: For the Duke of Berry, the French King's Uncle, making a Proposition of a Marriage with Katharine the Duke's Daughter, and Heiress to the Crown of Spain after her Mother's Death, so roused the Thoughts of the King of Castile and Leon, left that Match should by the Union of two such potent Interests in France and England, bring greater danger to his Throne than her Mother's had; that he by the Advice of his Council, became an earnest Suiter to the Duke of Lancaster for a Match between his Daughter and his eldest Son Henry. Some Propositions tending to a Conclusion with the Duke of Berry had been made;

[a] John Fordham was Bishop of Durham, Favourite to King Richard and Lord Treasurer, was remov'd in a turn of State three Years before; into his Place the King put the Bishop of Hereford, a Friend to the Lords, and now he turn'd him out of his Office, to give it to one of his own.

A. D. 1389. but the King of Spain's Offers being more agreeable to the Wiſhes, and making more for the Honour of both the Lady and her Parents were greedily embraced, and the Marriage ſoon concluded upon theſe following Conditions advantageous to all ſides, 1. That Henry Prince of Spain ſhould marry the Lady Katharine eldeſt Daughter of John Duke of Lancaſter, and Conſtantia his Wife, and that they ſhould be call'd after Marriage Prince and Princeſs of [a] Auſtria, ſo long as the preſent King lived. 2. That the Kingdom of Spain, after the preſent King's Death, ſhould deſcend to the ſaid Prince and Princeſs, and the Heirs of their Bodies; and for want of ſuch Heirs to [b] Edmund Duke of York, who had marry'd King Peter's other Daughter, and his Heirs. 3. That the King of Spain ſhould pay the Duke of Lancaſter 200000 l. towards the Charges of the Expedition, and 10000 l. a Year during his and his Dutcheſs's Life at Baion. The Concluſion anger'd the French King, and produc'd ſome Threats of a War for the Wrong done the Duke of Berry. But the King of Spain valu'd not his Menaces ſo long as he was ſure of the Aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, and the Duke of Lancaſter return'd with Joy into England. Juſt at his landing the King had ſummon'd a great Council of his Peers to meet at Reading, whereupon the Duke immediately haſted thither; not only to meet the King and pay his Duty to him, but to reconcile the Difference which he had heard began to ariſe between the King and his Nobles. This Act of Piety he happily effected, and made them all Friends. The King kept his Chriſtmas at Woodſtock, and the Duke of Lancaſter at Hartford Caſtle, and the Nobles in their Countries.

1390. The young Earl of Pembroke killed at Juſts.

While the Chriſtmas Carnivals continu'd at Court, John Haſtings Earl of Pembroke, an hopeful young Nobleman, learning to juſt (which was an Exerciſe much uſed in thoſe times) with one Sir John St. John, receiv'd an unlucky Blow on the bottom of his Belly, and died of the Bruiſe. He was much lamented, becauſe he was a generous and affable Perſon; but it ſeems it was a Fate entail'd upon his Family, to meet with an untimely Death: For it was obſerv'd, that from the time of Aumer de Valence, Earl of Pembroke, who was one of the Peers that condemn'd Thomas Earl of Lancaſter at Pomfret, about eighty Years before, none ever lived to ſee his Son, tho' the Deſcent in the whole Blood laſted all the while; which was thought a juſt Puniſhment of their Anceſtors Sin againſt that great Peer, whom the Pope canonized for his Vertues as a State Martyr.

Sixteenth Parliament, its Acts and Taxes.

A little after the Feaſt of S. Hilary a Parliament was aſſembled at Weſtminſter, and divers things were enacted for the common Good, concerning the Officers of the Court, as Conſtable, Steward, Marſhal, Clerk of the Market, Admirals, Serjeants at Arms, and Juſtices of Peace, concerning Weights and Meaſures, and ſeveral other Matters; but the moſt remarkable Acts that were made this Parliament were, 1. That againſt the Procurement of Pardons for thoſe Peſtilential Crimes of all Societies, Murders, Treaſons, and Rapes. The Commons having obſerved that the King's Pardons were an Encouragement of ſuch Facts, petition'd, That the King would oblige himſelf not to grant any Pardons for thoſe Crimes. This the King refuſed to do, becauſe he would not deprive his Crown of a Branch of his Prerogative, which his Anceſtors ever enjoy'd, but yet he paſs'd an Act in effect the ſame; for he enacted, That in all Pardons which he granted the Crime ſhould be ſpecified, and the Perſon at whoſe Suit it was granted endors'd; and that all Perſons who procured a Pardon for any guilty of the ſaid Crimes, ſhould be fined according to their Quality, an Archbiſhop or Duke a 1000 l. a Biſhop or Earl a thouſand Marks, an Abbot, Prior, Baron or Baronet [c], five hundred Mark, and inferiour Ranks two hundred Marks, and a Year's Impriſonment; by which means, tho' the King had ſtill his Power to pardon, yet Suiters were ſo diſcourag'd, that the Multitude of Pardons much abated: For Kings ſeldom grant but with importunate aſking. 2. That it ſhould be Treaſon to purchaſe or bring any Proviſions from the Pope for any Eccleſiaſtical Benefice in England; which tho' it had been before enacted by King Edward III. was not obſerved, and ſo it was enforced again to be put in Execution better. Theſe Acts being paſs'd, to the great Satisfaction of the Commons, they granted the King ſeveral Subſidies, viz. 40 s. a Sack for Wool, whereof 10 s. to be paid to the King for his own Expences at Pleaſure, and 30 s. to be put into the Treaſury for the Defence of the Nation; and a Tax of 6 d. by the Pound, 4 d. to the Treaſury and 2 d. to the King, and then they were diſmiſſed home. At the riſing of this Parliament, the King made John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, Duke of Aquitain, and had him enſtalled by the Cap and Bonnet, and Edward the eldeſt Son of the Duke of York Earl of Rutland.

Several unlucky Accidents.

In the beginning of the Spring ſeveral unlucky Accidents befel the Nation together: Such a tempeſtuous Wind aroſe in March, that blew down many Houſe, and did much other harm in ſeveral Parts. The Plague raged much, eſpecially in the North, where many thouſands died of it; but it was particularly obſerved to have the moſt malignant Effects upon young Men, who very rarely eſcaped, and were moſt eaſily infected with it. At the ſame time there was a great Scarcity of Corn, ſo that a Buſhel of Wheat was ſold for 13 d. which was thought a great Price in thoſe days. Thus by a Concurrence of Evils, did Divine Providence puniſh the Irregularities of the People of this Nation.

An Engliſh Army ſent againſt the Sarazens, and another into Pruſſia, which had both Succeſs.

Theſe Calamities at home made the Engliſh more ready to pity and relieve the Afflictions of others abroad; and for that end, two Parties were ſent into foreign Countries. The one to Genoa, under the Command of John Beaufort, Natural Son of the Duke of Lancaſter, Sir John Ruſſel, Sir John Butler, and others; and the other to Pruſſia, under the Command of Henry of Lancaſter Earl of Darby. The Occaſion was this; the Sarazens of Barbary being very troubleſome to the Citizens of Genoa, and by their Numbers threatning the Ruine of their Territories, had no way to ſecure themſelves, but by begging the Aſſiſtance of the French and Engliſh; who looking upon it as the common Intereſt of Chriſtendom to keep out thoſe Barbarians from Europe, gladly embrac'd the Requeſt of the Genoeſes, and ſent a choice Army of valiant Men thither. The Engliſh paſſed over into France and joined with the Forces, intended for the ſame Expedition by the French King, with whom they marched to Genoa, and there took Ship to aſſault the Infidels in Africk. The Sarazens were prepar'd to oppoſe their landing, and ſtood on the Shore ready to
